For their part, Glimmerlight and Brimstone had simply stood with stern eyes and waited the criticism out, ignoring the slavers entirely in favour of appealing to Protégé instead. The dark unicorn had simply stood and watched them back, apparently gauging their readiness to help.

Really, I couldn't blame them for accepting the help. Only out in the corridor I could hear the frantic calls for ammunition. The raiders were only barely being kept at bay. Less than twenty feet away through a couple of walls there were slavers holding the line behind upturned tables and opened doors, trading shots that rang and echoed all the way to sting my ears with raiders who occasionally tried to sneak around their defences or make a concerted push. Every slaver present was on edge. The word had already gone out that the entire Mall was on lockdown. No pony was to move more than a few dozen feet from the perimeter until this was done. I'd heard as much from the planning when we had entered the room.

We were as trapped as the rioting raiders.

"Somehow I don't get the feeling this was one of their brightest ideas, Murk," Caduceus muttered back to me. The nurse was trying to brush some of the dirt from his white clothing. It was already stained beyond recovery from just living in Fillydelphia, but he persisted as though from some nervous tick or motion.

"Just throw them in chains and wait till it's over before he rejoins them!"

"You think they can do what we can't?"

I cast my eyes around them. Earth ponies and unicorns, stallions and mares, all types of ponies from the slaver team in the Mall were consistent in their belief. But there was one voice I expected to hear, but didn't.

My eyes found The Master. He was standing on the opposite side of the table from Glimmerlight, looking smug as ever. Spotting my own eyes lingering on him, he twisted his head to grin at me. I retreated behind Caduceus again, pressing close to his side.

"This isn't their job!"

"He's already bloodied, look at him! He's killed some of us, I bet!"

Finally, I heard Protégé's voice clearly ring out through the opposition.

"They may aid us."

The shouting reached a height upon which I could not even detect individual voices. My head hurt.

Protégé raised a hoof for silence, aided by The Master slamming his huge hoof on the desk for order. At their combination of wills, the slavers shut up immediately. Protégé looked at each of them, before lowering his voice.

"Brimstone has never defied our rules as a worker. unless Glimmerlight is threatened. That much I understand. In this case, I have no reason to doubt his resolve in this matter."

"I am going in." Glimmerlight stated the matter with a seriousness I'd never heard before. "Coral Eve is in there, and come hell or high water I will get her out. She may hate me, but until I know why or what caused it, I'm not turning my back."

Protégé nodded reassuringly.

"You will have your chance, Glimmerlight. We—"

A screaming suddenly broke through the background noise, begging and high pitched. A stallion's voice, fearful and simply howling.

"Don't! Please, oh please, no! DON'T! NO! PLE—"

A detonation from the plaza erupted up, cracking and damaging the internal windows that looked upon the plaza. Everypony present ducked, but the tough glass held. We all ran to the windows, looking down to see a small mushroom cloud of smoke rising from a series of exploded boxes. Raiders were laughing and running around it. I could swear I saw bound pony parts away from the centre of the explosion. Had they just tied somepony down to them and execu... oh Celestia on high.

I saw Protégé scowl. Brimstone merely watched with glazed eyes, his voice level and low.

"They're working themselves into a frenzy down there. Every bit of hate and crazed ideas that raiders get, that perversion of freedom. You trapped it. Pushed them into a hole, let it build up, boil to the top. Now you're seeing it unleashed. Not all raiders are bloodthirsty maniacs, but you turned them into what everyone thinks they are by keeping them cooped up so tight in there."

Protégé's brow narrowed, before he turned away from the window, staring at every slaver in the room, nodding to Glimmerlight.

"We will end this. We are a faction of believers in a dream, of a better Equestria when everypony might help one another in better terms. Who are we to deny those wishing to save lives by aiding us? I will not stand to see workers killed in such senseless violence. We put them through enough in the pursuit of Unity. They deserve rescue from this. It is our duty to use whatever we can.”

Calm and polite, yet authoritative and permitting no nay-saying, Protégé had their attention. To my amazement, I saw The Master nod and speak.

“I say let the slaves work with him. That’s what they’re here for after all. To work for us.”

Around the table, I saw at least half of the slavers suddenly agreeing. Had Protégé swayed them with his more idealistic words or were they just agreeing with The Master? I had a nasty feeling where the real power in this room lay, regardless of rank.

“Thank you, Chainlink Shackles. Working together we can bring an end to this atrocity. Brimstone, you know Barb well?”

He nodded. “One of my Big Four, spent the best part of a decade running with him. If he’s commanding them, you’re not going to be able to play by any rules.”

“Right, well we want you at the briefing then. In fact, all four of you come along. Shackles? You too. Mosin, bring your assistant to help discuss what we have to correctly arm ourselves up. Ragini, make sure the defence cordons are still in place. How long do we have until Stern’s griffons arrive to raid?”

“No word yet, but I’d say slightly over an hour. By the time we make a push, it may be just about sixty minutes. They won’t wait long before launching an all out aggressive storming of the plaza.”

“Right. That isn’t going to happen. Keep your ear to the sky and find out for me exactly how long the moment you can get word from the griffons. Everypony do your duty now and reconvene here in less than five minutes. We can end this without unnecessary bloodshed of those who are trapped in there.”

He trotted over to the blueprints, stomping a hoof on them before glancing over the table at each slaver and slave in turn. His eyes met mine, resting there for a few seconds before looking up again.

Preparations began immediately.

Protégé was busy organising the slavers into teams for the assault; the rest of them had left to deal with their various duties on the defence lines. We were effectively left to ourselves in the old security room, amidst the hustle and bustle of preparations and frantic calling to get together for Protégé’s briefing. Alone, dodging out of the way of a swearing slaver dragging heavy boxes of ammo across the floor on a cart, I looked around. Now empty cages lined each wall where weapons were once kept. Feeling vulnerable, I found myself trotting over to lie down with my head in my hooves inside one.

Glimmerlight had been staring through the window, Brimstone beside her. Those two, they were so convicted to go into the battle to come. Both had reasons and those to protect. They simply felt they needed to, choosing to be the good pony. Already I could see Caduceus standing beside Glimmerlight, laying a hoof on her shoulder and nuzzling her gently, clearly about to make his own choice.

“Glimmer, you’ll need somepony who can treat a wound in there, I’m coming.”

"You don't have to, Caddy. My life's mess ups aren't yours to—"

"Help all those who need help.' That's what Helpinghoof told me. We all believed it in there. Him, I, Life Bloom and all the others working or studying in that clinic. Trapped here, I found a new meaning to it with Doctor Weathervane, that sometimes we need to not just wait for those in need to come to us. I want to help. Not just because it's you, even if that may be a part of it."

He grinned, to which I saw Glimmerlight only chuckle lightly, seemingly thankful for the more innocent notion. Her hoof tapped his cheek.

"You're such an oddity in this world. A real gentlecolt. Guess Tenpony makes 'em that way. But stick behind me, okay? Don't get in the firing line. Besides, I doubt you'll have a problem with that view on things, eh?"

He blushed, but couldn't help but nod. The pair giggled, quickly hugging. Alone at the back of the room, I could see the little bonds that aided each other, the mutual humour and ease of speech that was keeping them calm about their choice to do this.

Now he was in as well, just leaving me alone in the cage wondering about my own place in this. The only pony in the room still too afraid to say 'yes'.

I wasn't a fighter or a healer. I didn't know how to survive battles. The real one I had been in ended with stabbed in the shoulder. I'd been a liability.

A thick stomping announced the brass hoof-clad Brimstone moving across the room. He had been touring the defences. Many times I'd heard his voice cry out to force slavers into a better position or when to expect a push. He may not have known how to fire too accurately, but it was clear Brimstone wasn't a 'Grand Warlord' for just the fancy title, with his grasp of tactics and understanding of his enemy.

I'd just hid in here, away from all the fighting outside, oddly detached from it all.

Settling near me, the armour clattered as Brimstone sat down, and I saw one eye peering down at me. He nodded at the pair of Glimmer and Caduceus, who were sat around an old rifle, Glimmerlight stripping it down while chatting to him about random nothings.

"Seems that wee buck's gonna follow her wherever. So, you coming along, kid?"

Lifting my head out of my front hooves, I glanced up at the big earth pony with wide eyes.

"N-no."

"Hmm?" He seemed surprised, turning more to face me.

I just looked away, quivering slightly. I knew he didn't mean to put me under pressure. It was just his way of life to be direct.

"I'm-I'm scared." I rubbed my shoulder. The sight of that knife pushing its way into my flesh, our encounter with the raiders had brought it all to the surface. "I don't want hurt again. I'm afraid of Barb."

"Everypony gets scared." Brimstone spoke quietly, closing his eyes. "Glim's scared of losing Coral. I'm scared of losing her. It's just about whether you can push it down, put on a brave face, and keep going."

"But I'm not worth anything to this, I'd just get in the way. This is just too direct, too big for me. It's best if I stay here and just pray for you all."

Brimstone shrugged.

"No need to stand still to pray. Actions speak louder than words to the Goddesses, Murk. You've made it this far, survived this much. You think I'd really let you hang around if I thought you were causing us problems?"

I wasn't sure if that was a compliment or not. Still shivering, I met his eyes before he slipped one hoof free of the brass weapons and gently tapped my head. It still felt like being hit with a frying pan. He chuckled at my yelp.

"Just have a think, Murk. But you don't need to come if you don't want to. Just know you're welcome."

Well, that was surprising. Was he trying to make up for earlier? That melancholy tone was in his voice again.

"I know I'd feel better knowing those ears of yours were watching out for us. You've got a place with us now. But it's up to you. Just remember what you've already managed to do. You're braver than you think."

Getting up, the raider stomped off toward the window, glowering through it with gritted teeth. I curled up again, whimpering as I heard another drawn out wail, a female voice this time from within the plaza. The sound of Glimmer screaming shot back through my head like a sickening wave. Nothing waited in there but pain. I'd be up against Barb. I couldn't beat him! He was just too good, too beyond any ability I had. He'd stalk us, outwit us, and kill me. He'd hurt my friends.

"Weapons here! Get armed up!"

Mosin had returned, galloping in with a cart from the corridors where the battle still raged to hold the raiders at bay, a small wheeled tray of weapons right behind him pulled by another pony. A younger assistant was guiding it. A unicorn buck, light grey as though a less severe version of Mosin himself, but clad in an oddly clean blue shirt. He hummed loudly as he polished an ornate pistol with gold trimmings and an patently absurd large scope on top the moment he stopped. That was likely the extravagant assistant Mosin had mentioned outside the Stable.

"Hoi! Oyobuk!" Mosin clipped the assistant over the ear. "I tell you! This is serious planning, not ebanaty weapon convention! Put away compensation, Blunderbuck, distribute rifles!"

"Ow! Don't talk about her that way."

He rubbed his head, muttering something under his breath that I was sure only I heard. Something about 'old fashioned blunt idiot who didn't know the beauty of a unique weapon if it was shoved up his—'

"Is silly filly gun! Not proper weapon unless at least slightly rusty and still working. Proves is gun for stallion. Now shut hole and get working or I morgaly vikalyu, padla!"

Outside, many slavers ran in, heads low. Shots whined past the doorway of the security room. Could Protégé not have put his planning room further from the front line?

They clambered to the armoury cart, snapping up magazines, spare rounds, and energy cells for the rarer magic weapons. A rush moved past my little hiding spot, clattering hooves on the floor making me hold my ears closed. Oh this was all too much. Ponies were reloading, test sighting, sharpening knives all for the big fight.

I spotted Protégé running amidst it all.

"You there! Get those mines down to the armoury floor as a last resort! Hardnut, I want you to take three of your subordinates to guard the storage room against further flanking efforts, go! Does anypo— DOWN!"

At the command, everypony dropped. The toughened windows as they were peppered with gunfire. Some flew right through, ricocheting around and lancing into slavers. I saw one ping from Brimstone's armour when he sheltered Glimmerlight. Caduceus leapt immediately to a screaming slaver, holding him down to work on his neck. Five slavers sprayed blind fire from unicorn magic-held weapons over the broken sections of glass. I huddled into the corner.

Too much, just fighting and pain and death. Too much...

"Those were armour piercing rounds. Mosin, how much stock of them did they possibly get!?"

"Not much! I must trust slavers with potato long before I trust them with AP rounds!"

"Those will chew through cover at the wrong time if they save them though. We need something to even the odds. Do you think you can stock us up with some better equipment and ammunition?"

The strange armspony snorted. "Is no trouble. Armoury is precisely for this role after all. As you requested, I have brought appropriate weaponry upon cart from assistant. All may arm from him for higher quality firearms!"

His eyes crept over to Brimstone.

"Even if means this svoloch may break more rifles."

Brimstone stamped one brass hoof hard enough to make almost everypony jump in shock, myself included.

"Won't need any of your pop guns now." He almost growled at the armspony as he wandered past him into the far side of the security room to wait.

Glimmerlight rubbed her chin with a hoof, cantering over to the cart. Four more slavers were picked out as the arming up began. In the end, Glimmerlight had drawn a long rifle and simple pistol for herself, along with some leather armour stitched up with small metal plates on the shoulders. She dropped Caduceus a larger saddlebag of stored medical supplies and a small sub-machine gun for self defence.

I simply stuck back from the rush to get at the weaponry. Was I even allowed? Glancing across at Protégé, I saw him slipping some extra ammunition for his revolver into his battle barding. My master glanced back at me even as his magic drew another small backup pistol to store in a second holster. Our eyes met briefly, or rather his eye. Even with one visible, anything beyond the visage of Unity's student was hard to tell.

"Right, everypony! Briefing time, gather around, we don't have long!"

Thus began the sequence of planning.

Everypony leaned in over the table, a couple dozen in all.

My friends turned back toward the table as slavers were pushing in. Ragini swept through the larger doors from storage, returning from her hunt. Brimstone and Caduceus trotted over. Glimmerlight stopped near me.

"Made a decision, Murky?"

She tried to offer a smile, but it was strained. Her eyes held fear and apprehension, yet shone with determination.

I didn't want to leave her. But in the end, I shook my head.

"I'm not going. I... I just— sorry, I'm too scared of him."

My eyes couldn't match hers. I looked away, curling up inside the cage to spend my time. Her hoof gently ruffled my mane, leading me to look upwards again and see her grin.

"It's alright, it's not going to be nice in there. No shame, okay? We'll take care of it."

With another gentle pat, she moved on toward the table. I watched her go, followed by Caduceus. Everypony was coming together to help save a few slaves, Brim's raw power, Protégé and his slaver teams, Glimmer's training and stoic mindset, Caduceus' medical abilities; everypony throwing in every little ability they had. How did they do it? How could they be so brave and go in there without being scared?

Brimstone's words echoed back to me. Everypony gets scared.

But didn't being brave mean that you weren't scared?

Protégé held the spot before the Mall's blueprints. Already I could see markings with chalk on the paper that circled various corridors.

"Now, the raiders have broken well free of the areas we sought to contain them in." Protégé's voice was terse. "The guard room that should have held them has fallen, permitting them access to firearms and a defended position that makes a direct assault on the plaza incredibly difficult. The only main entrance to the plaza is through the cage door. The very thing we used is now the biggest obstacle to us. It's a chokepoint. Not only that, but they've also branched out, here, here, and here."

A small cane pointed to three corridors leading out from the guard room away from the plaza cage door. Each had a red scrawled line.

"In other words, polnyi pizdets. Armoury is secure, but slaves have acquired much inventory from guards." Mosin tossed his head back to his small cart, tapping that wooden hoof over what I guessed was the armoury on the map. "There is no chance of them reaching the armoury now, however."

"Good." Protégé moved the cane. "Those red lines show where we stopped them, but it's clear Barb knew exactly what he was doing. Those positions were hard to take and cost him dearly, but very easy to defend from. Straight corridors with no cover and a hard shelter at the far end."

Mosin grunted. I began to wonder if he held more of a tactical position than I had previously realised within Protégé's staff of slavers.

"Makes little difference, we have rocket propelled grenade. Boom, yes?"

"Normally, yes." My master's face sunk a little, before tapping the lines again with the cane. "Those sick wretches have strapped the workers to their cover as living shields. Any assault would have to kill them to get by. That is not something I will accept as a course of action."

Brimstone nodded, simmering a little.

"Just what I'd have done, but he won't kill them himself. Those prisoners are all that's stopping anypony launching some hot metal down the corridor and blowing everything in it to hell."

"You're sure?"

"Barb isn't stupid. He knows his raiders can't take a direct hit from a heavily armed and organised group in a meatgrinder assault."

That made Protégé pause a second, rubbing a hoof against his chin.

"Then why make this whole stand in the first place? He must know that griffons or, if it got real bad, alicorns would simply wipe out the entire population."

Brimstone actually laughed, making many of the slavers cast unsure glances to one another.

"He's smart, but that don't mean the wee tryhard bastard's not still a raider! They don't want a slow death in here, boy. They want to burn out in a blaze of glory. To make people see their great last surge of violence and make all those behind fear them in their nightmares. He doesn't want out of this."

Wait, no! That wasn't true, Barb had said as much that he could get out and return to the wastes more powerful than before. But why was he doing this then? Why incite The Master against him by destroying his slaves? He had a deal going. What was all this risk about?

I wanted to shout it, let them know he clearly had something else in mind, but those light green watchful eyes just kept staring into my heart from across the table. He seemed to chuckle as I withered under his gaze.

“Then what do you propose, master?” Ragini had been quiet thus far, but spoke up, trying to divert the discussion back toward the matter of the mission.

“A good question, Ragini. A question to the most experienced warfighter in this entire room. Warlord Brimstone, what would you suggest is the best way to placate this gang?”

Brimstone shot Protégé a harsh look. “They are not a gang. Get that thought from your head now or this is not going to last long. They may not say it anymore, but they are a clan. Strong as a group, ferocious in numbers, and without fear given proper motivation. Death before failure. One strong leader can make a rag tag group of mad ponies into an unending wave of frenzied aggression. They take after their leader. That’s why so many of them are as brutal. They had me. But now many are shifting to Barb’s style, deception and backstabbing with a sick streak to scare people. He is their icon. Kill the leader, kill the brain and the soul in one stroke. They will be much easier to bring down after that.”

“You think we can get to him? Last we spotted him from the internal windows, he was on the higher areas, deep within what is now their territory.”

“Barb is where he wants to be, don’t trust your eyes with him. As for hunting him?” He gestured to the slavers. “With this pish lot? Not a chance.”

The slavers erupted in protest, swearing at Brimstone. Glimmerlight leaned in, muttering by his side.

“Very diplomatic, Brim.”

Shackles slammed a hoof again, silencing them. He had been quiet thus far, simply sitting there and thinking with a blank look.

“Quiet down, all of you wretches! I won’t stand to see a stock under me lost like this! Shut up and listen or get out now! Understand?”

That shut them up. I wasn’t even talking and I felt myself nodding along with them that I was now listening. Protégé, meanwhile, seemed to go into thought for a while.

“Well, then we give them what they want, or what they think they’ll be getting. A distraction. We don’t assault properly, but detonate a lot of explosives and throw a lot of deliberately inaccurate fire toward them. Make it seem like a large storming that’s just stalled and is consistently failing on their barricades. Take all their attention. I’ll need three teams. Shackles, I want you to organ—”

Protégé’s eyes crossed across mine across the table and room. He must have seen something in my look. He stopped on the spot, thinking deeply. I knew he had his own suspicions.

“...no. Mosin, make up three teams from the guard groups. Call in any you need. Shackles, I want you to go and try to delay the griffons as long as you can. Stern has already contacted me to say her raid team will not be considering workers a valued hostage to rescue. We must get this done before they arrive.”

If The Master had spotted the divergence, he stayed quiet about it and carefully hidden. Instead, he just gruffly snorted and tossed his filthy mane at the mundane job offer.

“While we do what to get the slaves?”

“A raid. A small team shall infiltrate the plaza. I believe there is an outside door leading to one of the shop cells.”

So he did know.

“I will take a group including Brimstone, Ragini, and a select few others to launch a surgical strike into the heart of the raiders while the majority are distracted out in the guard room with the false assault. The objective is simple. Kill Barb by any means and if possible. Clear one barricade from behind once we have a sustainable position inside the plaza. Other guards will follow us in greater numbers to cover our backs once the element of surprise is lost. Fast, direct, and aggressive. Cut off the head and let the body wither.”

Glimmerlight immediately spoke up, shifting away from me to lift her front hooves onto the table, trying to take what authority she could. I could feel her shivering. My poor friend was still feeling the shock of earlier.

“If there’s a team going in, I’m going too. We can try to secure the slaves inside or get them out the side door. Some of them do not deserve this.”

Shackles actually laughed.

“Silence, slave. Your masters will choose who goes and who stays. You offered your help, but a rookie initiate is not going to alter our plans.”

“No.” Protégé spoke quickly. “While I cannot say I fully agree with either of you, you are welcome to come and attempt to protect any we find or Coral should you locate her, Glimmerlight. But Barb’s death takes precedence to end the greater incident.”

Glimmerlight hadn’t taken her eyes off The Master, looking very wary.

“That’s fine, so long as I get a chance to help them.”

“Good. Get your things ready, we will be leaving soon.”

Glimmerlight nodded firmly and turned to canter to the other side of the room, continuing to strip the long rifle down and pull parts from Mosin’s cart. Without his knowledge, I noticed.

Caduceus glanced at her snapping it all together, joining the growing noise of preparations and then respectfully bowed his head to Protégé.

“You’ll need a healer with you. I had already decided to follow Glimmer. I suspect many of the slaves will require immediate attention after being under the raiders’ activities.”

“That is acceptable, I would also wish to ask you, Murk, if you wish to accompany the raid team. That hearing could provide a useful asset. That and a pony who can sneak around may be helpful against the Shades. Will you accompany us?”

Words caught in my throat. I’d been simply a bystander to all the important ponies in their planning and discussion. Now I felt eyes on me, everypony at the table had shifted to look across the room. I could see the same look on Protégé’s face as Glimmer’s. There was no shame to say no.

I wanted to say yes, I really did.

But I simply looked away, curling up again. My body was shivering and aching from wounds that, although healed, still seemed to hurt the more I thought about what these ponies were preparing for.

Just a coward.

I heard Protégé sigh lightly, before tapping for attention.

“The rest of you, stock up on every explosive and louder weapon you can to make the false offensive as convincing as possible. Mosin, find four of the best guards in the Mall to join us for the raid. Nine should be large enough for the team. Assault teams, be ready to make the push if we clear a barricade. Once inside, force a perimeter to any slaves and evacuate them above all else! This is our time to show them that their service is valued more than any. We move in fifteen minutes, so we'll only have a short time to make it happen. Let's do it!"

The cheer hardly sounded enthusiastic, but everypony split off into a mass of final readiness.

Three stallions and one mare appeared from Mosin's picking and moved quickly to the weapons cart, stripping it almost bare of what remained. Two of the stallions, earth ponies, took a riot shotgun each and a couple of heavy duty pistols. The others, the unicorn stallion and mare, acquired carbines, one as a dual barrelled battle saddle (That lucky...). All stuck with the thick padding of their slaver guard, strapping a couple of cylindrical canisters to themselves and making sure their gas masks were ready.

They were going on what sounded like a suicide mission.

Glimmerlight racked shut the bolt of the rifle with her hooves, while holding a few test rounds in her magic. She'd left small parts all over the floor, instead crafting what looked like crude metal sights for the top out of some scrap. Her face was still and serious, concentrating on the work. Even as I watched, she moved on to a spark battery, stripping the casing off till I could see the pulsating magic gem at the centre. She held it near the barrel. What was she planning with that thing?

How could she think so calmly to do this? Going in with a team to the centre of almost a hundred raiders? They were all probably going to die! What let them make the choice?

Glimmerlight's eyes hadn't looked brave, but she was going in there anyway.

I just didn't understand. How could you be brave and scared at the same time? That wasn't how it worked, right? I wished I had time to tune into the radio. The DJ would know what to say, how the 'good fight' worked.

But there was another voice in my memory. The mare. Back when I had been beaten down, hurt and degraded in front of an entire city, she had been willing to stand up and show her support of me, despite her fear of The Master. She'd said something.

"Please, don't give up. There is a bright future. You will find your courage, Murky."

After those words, I'd stood on my own and walked almost proudly away, not letting The Master have the satisfaction of me being hurt before her.

I'd been scared, but I'd done it anyway.

Back in the Stable, when I had been trapped, separated from the ponies I had only then begun to see as friends, I had finally begun to know what it was like to take strength in others. To trust and have confidence in somepony.

I'd been scared then too, but Glimmer had talked me into knowing I could do it anyway.

Was that what bravery was? To be scared, but to be able to stand up tall and push through even when your mind tells you it won't end well? To take the risks because you know they have to be done?

I was so scared of Barb. That one pony was everything I feared. Somepony I couldn't hear or sneak away from. His raiders had caused me pain and tears in so many amounts. They had almost hurt Glimmerlight beyond thinking not one hour ago. They had to be stopped.

Another voice I remembered, much more recently, the Ministry Mare herself, Twilight Sparkle. The twinkling lights of that star-shape message emerged in my mind to utter those words.

"Make friends, take time to make amends, do not be afraid to fight if in defence of a better world. This message is to let you see from me the thoughts and fears of everypony now. We're all dreaming of the same peace, even if we don't know it. Good luck."

Brimstone was right. Everypony was scared. We were all afraid, but we all wanted the same thing in the end.

A final voice, amidst the clutter and banging of the battle and arming up. It was so clear, just like before in the wreck of Mosin's wagon outside the city.

"The obstacles in our path can be overcome if we just work together. So don't abandon those you care about y'hear? Only by sticking together can we truly save lives and make ourselves better, no matter what horrors we all must share along the way."

The DJ had inspired me to take up arms before to defend my friends. Yet now, very quickly, a greater fear began to come to mind. I had seen the raiders execute somepony in the plaza, heard them torture others.

What if those were my friends next time, and I simply had to sit in here and listen to it happen?

Those words, from ponies I cared for, that I had been inspired by, or had learned from circled around my mind, repeating, meshing together their messages. My eyes were clenched shut, hearing ponies scream for help before being cut short in drawn out and agonising howls of pain. I heard slavers planning and shouting orders. Heard Brimstone galloping around, tirelessly aiding in the defence I hadn't even worked up courage to look at. Heard Glimmerlight muttering nothing but numbers and theories about her weapon work.

But those three voices cut through my cluttered head. The DJ, Twilight Sparkle, and the nameless mare. They'd told words of courage, of hope, and of inspiration.

"Only by sticking together can we truly save lives and make ourselves better, no matter what horrors we all must share along the way."

"Make friends, take time to make amends, do not be afraid to fight if in defence of a better world."

"Please, don't give up. There is a bright future. You will find your courage, Murky."

They whirled, as I remembered them time and time again. Those voices that had helped me in each individual case finally coming together. The one message I knew they had all been telling made up of their combined words. The message that in one beautiful moment of clarity, shut out all sound as I heard it simply spoken in my mind.

"Only by sticking together can we truly save lives. Do not be afraid to fight if in defence of a better world. You will find your courage, Murky."

I stood, quickly grabbing my saddlebag, fighting back the tears. I had come this far, survived Ministries, a Stable, the Fillydelphia crater, the parasprite pits, and even survived two escape attempts. Each had required me to gather my courage again and again. They were nothing near as dangerous as this was going to be.

But it had to be done. I couldn't let them face it alone.

Galloping across the security station, I ran into the room where everypony was gathering. Just let The Master watch me. I wasn't beaten yet.

Glimmerlight, Brimstone, Caduceus, Protégé, Ragini, The Master, Mosin, and every other slaver present turned at my pitter pattering hooves running in. Stopping, tears dripping from my eyes, I tried to get my breath through a rough heat scorched throat.

"I'm... I'm in. I'm scared b-but it needs to be done..."

Glimmerlight smiled. I even saw Brimstone nod in respect. Protégé maintained watching me, before grinning slightly with a knowing tilt of his head. The Master seemed to chuckle from the back of the room, but stayed quiet. I stomped my front hooves, trying to look serious. This was a proper rescue, I couldn't let myself lose momentum.

"So..."

They all craned in, curious.

"What do I do first?"

The silence that lasted was somewhat uncomfortable, broken only by Ragini snorting with laughter into a wing. I even caught Glimmerlight lightly chuckling. Hey...

Protégé just nodded and stomped a hoof on the blueprints.

"Your aid is greatly welcomed, Murk. May I request your presence with the raid team?"

I had to stick with my friends, be brave for them.

"Y-yes, I'll be there.."

I felt my heart thump hard, sensing the inevitable slide into something I didn't want to do edging past the point of no return. Terror clenched at me. I'd just agreed to go into this. Oh Goddesses.

"Good. Fetch the armament you require. I want you beside me for this, warn me if you hear anything."

"Yes, master."

I turned, trotting over on shaky legs to the weapons cart. I found it almost empty in the wake of my friends and the slavers. All that was left were some long rifles larger than myself and a small series of revolvers that I just knew would be a nightmare to reload. Umzing and aahing, I paced around the cart, biting my lip. No battle saddles? Oh come on.

"Murk, is something wrong?" Protégé wandered past, checking his own revolver.

"I... I don't know what to pick. I'm not really f-familiar with guns..."

"I see." He turned away from me. "Mosin! Can you sort something out for little Murk here?"

"Negative. Nothing in the cart that won't break his little teeth. I assumed you only wanted tiny pony for warning when he cries or to act as distraction." Mosin seemed to chuckle a little at me.

Protégé did not laugh.

"I am not prone to wasting those under me, Mosin. Find him something. I won't leave Murk unprotected."

"Fine, fine, but not me. Too much real work to do arming ponies who won't leave puddle on each shot. Blunderbuck! Blunderbuck, where are you?"

The assistant reappeared from where he had been helping one of the slavers to attach grenades to his barding in a floral pattern and began waltzing his way across the floor to join us. Right, this buck was a little weird.

"Blunder, reporting!"

"Find this filly weapon. Take to the armoury and get something that will function on his level. Don't take too long to equip the little filly or—"

"Uh, Mosin, I don't think he's a fill—"

"Could have fooled me! Now toropit'sya!"

The buck saluted dramatically on the spot, before spinning in a completely unnecessary direction to face me, smiling entirely too much.

"Are you ready to get ready, friend?"

"Uh..."

I never had a chance to finish what I was thinking of saying.

"Let's get you to the armoury! Oh we are going to have such fun finding you something!"

Slack jawed at the entirely over enthusiastic, sing-song voiced Blunderbuck, I just stared to the side, noting Glimmerlight nodding her head encouragingly.

"Go with him, Murky. He's alright, I've worked with him before"

Blunderbuck brightened up.

"Ah! You remember me! Yes, Murky, is it? Wonderful!"

Protégé trotted past, away from the cart, nodding to his assistant armourer and myself.

"Be back within a few minutes if you can. We commence in ten minutes, with or without. We'll only have an hour or so to commence the raid."

"Got it, sah!"

"Y-yes, master."

I felt myself being pulled by Blunderbuck out into the hallway, where he happily trotted beside me.

"S-so, what are we going to do, um, specifi-specfu... exactly?"

"Do?" He asked with wide eyes. "Dear Murky, this is an important thing. A pony's proper outfitting is like acquiring a new suit! Oh we must find you that something that fits just right. Oh yes, I know you'll just love them! And they'll love you!"

He took off at a gallop, his magic pulling me lightly along.

"This will be so fun! Time to find a gun! Oh yes!"

The armoury was gigantic in the Mall. Behind a dozen guards and a huge door that was over a foot thick, it was even more secure than storage or the plaza. This must have been some sort of safe vault back in Old Equestria. But now, the large cages within it contained benches and racks of all sorts of weaponry. Massive wall docks housed shelf after shelf of parts and boxes of ammunition. Another cage had explosive warning signs all over it. All this from just the entrance, and I could see it only went further in.

Blunderbuck danced his way into it, springing from hoof to hoof before spinning to face me, a rather too large smile on his face as I trotted in, wide eyed.

"Oh, Murky my dear, I cannot express my delight! It's abundantly clear that somewhere in here is the gun that will fit you just right!"

Carefully trotting away from all warning signs, I followed him into the primary workshop, surrounded by all sorts of bizarre de-constructed firearms. Nervously, I tried to offer at least some requirements to avoid breaking my own mouth.

"I uh, can't wait to get started. But first, can I say a few things? It's kinda important the gun that I get, is something that's quiet and small."

He swaggered past me, passing a hoof around my neck briefly to wink and dive off into one of the large cages.

"Quiet! Small! Got it!"

A dull crash sounded as he dragged a box off of a cabinet top to dig around, shouting out to me as he searched. I picked at what seemed to be a giant cannon with a tiny bayonet attached to the end.

"I have so many wonderful firearms, just wait! You will see!"

I poked my head in the cage, finding him surrounded by a wealth of guns strewn all over the floor. He looked like one of the foals I'd seen in a Hearth's Warming Eve poster years ago with presents.

"Can I have something that fires a small bullet, so it won't hurt me?"

"Sure! How 'bout a shotgun? It's loud and proud and big as can be!"

The massive combat shotgun hovered up in front of me, the barrel about as wide as my hoof. Even I found myself looking around it with a little exasperation.

"...loud, proud? Have you even seen me?"

"Ah... well. Murky, have faith!" He threw one hoof around me, the other arcing out over the racks of pistols, rifles and shotguns. "You see I will bet you... that somewhere in here is the gun that will get you! Come on! I've got everything from mouth-held to battle saddles!"

I gasped on the spot. Yes! "Battle saddles sound good! I'd like one of th—"

I was distracted by a crash, caused by Blunderbuck throwing open another cage door and dragging out a box filled to the brim with pistols of all shapes and sizes. Digging through it eagerly, he drew one, shoving it right into my mouth without so much as asking.

"Really? Because I think this big magnum has your name written all over it! Aww... look it matches your mane!"

Glancing down, I saw the grip did indeed have a wooden construction rather similar to my own filthy hair, but the chambers revealed bullets liable to make me swallow the gun if I fired it. Sighing, I spat it back into the box.

"Uh... pass."

But Blunderbuck was already gone, heaving open a third of the tall cage doors to throw out weapon after weapon that, standing in the main workshop, I found myself dodging repeatedly. Behind him, I could see two larger cages in the darkness, heavily secured with more advanced locks. I could swear there was a pony shaped something back there. Something big, easily a foot taller than Brimstone himself.

"I have so many wonderful choices for you to decide!"

Galloping back out, he threw or dragged a couple of items up to me whilst I glanced into the back of the room until I was literally surrounded.

"There are big launchers and guns for massive fun!"

Indeed. All of them had long bullets or thick grenade shells dropped near them as examples. Finding my lower body half buried in them as I sat down, I just sighed on the spot.

"Launchers and big hunting guns are not quiet!"

Blunderbuck trotted over, almost disappointed looking before he nudged one of the thick grenade launchers, or rather the enlarged places where what seemed like small artillery shells would go instead. Mister Peace would have gotten along with Blunderbuck, I was certain.

"Maybe not, but I've heard of this particular shell launcher throwing people ten feet in the air when it lands!"

Urgh. This buck was just insane. I'd likely be better off asking Glimmer if I could borrow her backup pistol again. I stood up, crawling out from under the pile of firearms and weapons.

"That's all, I think. I'm gonna head outta here and—"

"Wait! There must be a gun here that will fit the ticket; how 'bout a minigun or a nice flamer?"

His magic pulled them out, holding the massive weapons beside him. True to Mosin's tale before, I could see a sniper scope on the flamer. What was with this...

Wait.

Those weapons were attached to battle saddles! Eee! Maybe he had one in my size!

“Smaller and lighter!”

“Smaller, lighter, right!” Blunderbuck dropped the heavy equipment onto the ground haphazardly (was that flamer full!?) and darted off to his workbench, where he started yanking a small mesh crate from below it, snapping together various parts. “I’ve got just the thing in this box, Murk! Meet your new fabulous big sniper!”

Holding it out proudly, I saw a silver and gemstone decorated anti-machine rifle emblazoned with some unknown writing along the side. It was garish to my art minded eyes, but just seemed to be like any other of the half dozen big rifles I could see on the walls.

“Not just any big and loud sniper! A silenced big and loud sniper!”

He pointed with a hoof to a tiny bit on the end of the barrel that looked like it would silence it in the same way that me standing on a small book would make me tall.

“So, um, like I said...”

I sighed, turning to face the rather dejected looking armourer pony. He held the silver rifle close.

“Blunderbuck, please, these won’t do it. Any gun in my mouth will just hurt me. I need something on a saddle, something tiny! With recoil that won’t make me defy gravity!”

“Hmm...” Blunderbuck rubbed his chin, scratching his light grey coat. The rifle folding and disassembling back into the box. He began casting his eyes toward a yet untouched cage that only now I saw was filled with straps... saddles! “I’m sensing you want a gun that’s small.”

Even I couldn’t cull the deadpan tone from my voice. “You think?”

Not one to seemingly let my denial of his favourite big guns get the better of him, Blunderbuck swivelled on the spot, smiling the moment he came to face me again. I hated to admit it, but the joyful eccentric manner was starting to catch me up in his sheer enthusiasm. Especially as it might have a battle saddle by the end of it!

He began scrambling to throw open the cage door, ushering me inside before grabbing a measuring tape with his magic and checking me over with it.

“I have plenty of wonderful guns that’ll go by your side! Like a sweet combat shotty or a giant dual IF-Nine!”

“Better, but smaller!”

He began to pull some leather straps with small gears and slides of metal off the racks, wrapping them around me. I could barely contain my excitement, he was customising it for me! I was getting my very own at last! But what to have on it? Oh the possibilities!

“I see. Well how bout a carbine, or a sawn off or a pistol? There are so many wonderful firearms the likes of that.”

Each swept into the cage or down from above to hang before me where I let my wide eyes glance across them. Oooh...

“Or there are plasmas and lasers, they both have no recoil! Or perhaps what you need is a hushed and poisoned dart.”

“Now you’re talking!”

The odd contraptions for energy weapons hurt my brain to even imagine how they worked. But bright coloured flashes sounded really cool! I could even make them match my coat and mane! I wanted to skip in a circle, but the gradually building light battle saddle around me held me in place. I heard a whirring and sliding as it wound its way around my fleece, attaching little spindles and mechanical instruments to one side. The hooks for weaponry and tools went on next!

Blunderbuck hopped around me. If anything, his voice became higher pitched the more he wildly got excited. But I cast my eyes across the half dozen weapons arrayed before me. I wasn't even really into shooting, but a battle saddle was just so cool that I had no idea what to pick for it. When would I ever get the chance again? My fear of the mission was thrown back, hidden for now by the delight of all this choice.

"Hm. But instead of just one stand out, now that's too many!"

He craned a hoof over me, holding his head against mine. Normally, I'd have recoiled at somepony being so close, but too much excitement was whirling around in my body to care.

"Not a bad problem to have if you ask me!"

Once again, I cast my eyes over it, feeling the momentum of the moment and his excitement mesh with my own.

"The darts would be awesome, but the carbine I'm liking too. Do you have something in a longer ranged dart?"

"No, but I've got a dart that's less than lethal, if them dying's not for you!"

Argh, so much choice! "Oh... what to do, what to do... OH!"

I visibly hopped, an idea finally coming to mind!

"Of course! That's it! There's really just one way, to find the gun that really suits me best!"

Blunderbuck's eyes widened, seemingly confused as I hopped into the racks and racks of small pistols, searching and searching.

"A shiny pistol! That's small! Quiet and polite, that will fit on this saddle just right!"

Aha! There it was! My hooves dumped dozens upon dozens of pistols out of the way or threw open the cages to spot it. Rarity's Grace lay atop a pile, right where it had been left! As gorgeous looking as ever, it would sit gracefully and artistically upon this new battle saddle of mine! I grabbed it in my mouth, before it flew out again from Blunderbuck's magic and began to clip on amongst the various fragile pieces he was attaching to my sides.

"Don't forget style! That should be considered!"

"So we know for sure it won't sparkle and glitter?"

"For the one who is sneaky and small..."

"Just like me!"

Finally, leather straps and a small metal frame descended over it. The entire saddle felt tiny on me, tight fitting and thin, with Rarity's Grace covered by thin black leather to hide the sheen. This saddle was probably the lightest one I'd ever seen to fit me, and only capable of holding small weaponry and tools, but I didn't care! I had one! I had one at last!

"It might hold much less, but it feels the best!"

"Cos it's all measured up just for you, see?"

Blunderbuck laughed out loud at hearing my pleasure with it. Pulling a strap tight to latch the mouthpiece to my... side? Well that was interesting, but with a quick flick of my hoof, pulled by Blunderbuck, the mouthpiece whipped off my side and flicked around to be ready in front of my jawline. Oh wow! Another flick sent it flipping back out of the way! But it didn't restrict me moving at all! It was just an extra little bit of leather and metal that sat around me to support light arms and things! I smiled so much to Blunderbuck. Why couldn't all slavers be as cool as him?

"This is the number one, greatest, and perfectest saddle in the world for me!"

Armed up, no, saddled up, I trotted in a circle, grinning, before heading to the doorway. Rarity's Grace felt snug and smooth beside me under a little flap of dark leather to stop it glinting. Blunderbuck accompanied me into the corridor before waving goodbye.

"Then let the mission begin... and may the best side win!"

With a laugh, I turned and galloped off back toward the briefing. I'd be scared as all hell soon, but for now, I could be happy with a proper little saddle just for me at last!

...eee!

Unfortunately, merely owning a battle saddle didn't particularly make me feel any more powerful en-route back to the security room. Twice I was ushered by galloping slavers to simply flee with them away from a barricade as armour piercing rounds ripped through it. The corridors were a warzone of barely blocked off defences holding the ferocious raiders inside. They weren't the best shots, but they had a frenzied courage to not flinch from any incoming fire.

Sticking low, I dodged under slavers that returned the shots with their own, squealing whenever somepony kicked my small form out of the way or knocked past me in doorways.

I just stayed happy inside, tried to force it all out, and concentrated on the reassuringly tight and comfortable feel of a little battle saddle around me. Yes, stay happy, stay brave.

The thought occurred that Protégé must really trust me to simply hand me a weapon for the raid. Not too long ago, he had shot me. From taking so long to properly heal, I now had a scar on my chest from that. He had stood before me, denied me, and brought me down with a bullet. Now I was being permitted to be around him, carrying a loaded firearm.

The shock of the thought made me stop just outside the doorway to the security room.

What if I'd been the one with a gun? Could I have pulled the trigger if he had been in my way to freedom?

Somehow, achingly, I began to suspect that I could not have. Despite everything that he had done to me, I could not envision myself in that position and going through with the last horrific pull of a trigger to find freedom at the cost of killing somepony who seemed to care for me, as twisted as that kindness was.

Sighing and trotting inside, I found most ponies still in a state of half-readiness. Somepony had dumped armour and suits from the security station lockers on the floor, where they had been stripped of their metal plates. But the atmosphere was different. No pony was really talking. Most seemed to be in their own little worlds; checking weapons, carving wood with magic into little shapes, cleaning a bolt or barrel. Brimstone paced nearby. I couldn't see him in this portion of the multi-roomed security station, but I could certainly hear him. Part of me wanted to talk to him, but even with our little exchange earlier, I just didn't feel quite ready to know what to say to the hulking raider so soon after his complete rampage in the storage room.

Everypony had their little tricks to keep themselves distracted, to try and prepare themselves mentally for the upcoming storm. I could see Glimmerlight still working around her long rifle, attaching the spark battery to the end of the barrel. It's light blue glow shone through the protective casing with clearly overloaded energy. I could see three other drained batteries near her. Whatever she was up to, I doubted I wanted to be near it when it went off.

She looked up as I trotted nearer, smiling widely to me. But I'd been around her long enough to spot when it was just her forcing it. Even Glimmerlight couldn't be too happy about this situation. She'd had a rough day with Coral revealing her secrets to us all and then the encounter with Barb's raiders.

"You're looking swanky in that saddle, Murky. It suits you!"

I tried to smile as well, succeeding in a much less effective manner.

"T-thanks. It just feel good to have, and-and look!"

I twitched my front leg, making the mouthpiece pop out and flick around on sprung gears. The oh-so-satisfying sound made my smile a little more genuine. With the same movement, I sent it back, then out again. Eventually, Glimmerlight just laughed, reaching over to ruffle my mane. But her eyes were more serious, looking into mine.

"Good stuff. Loving the flick action. But I'd prefer if you didn't need to use it. Please, Murky, try to stay back from the fighting when it starts. I don't know how I'd feel if I had to lose you so soon after we've met, y'know? After hearing from Coral I just..."

She looked away, then back, before hugging me tightly.

"I just feel glad knowing there's still a few folks care for an free living, spontaneous mare like myself. Don't think I didn't see you trying to help when those raiders."

I just tugged tightly back, nuzzling into my 'sister's' shoulder. My voice was muffled, but I tried to make it as sincere as I could.

"I just wanted you to be okay. I don't know what I'd have done up till now without you. If I'd been left to hear Sundial talk about his mother without you around t-to help..."

"We help each other, Murky. We're both hurting, but we're in this hell together. But, I have to save Coral now, no matter what, I'm going all out. So, if anything happens in there —"

I cut her off. "No. We'll both—"

Glimmer didn't even let me continue. "If anything happens to me, I want you to stick with Brim, alright? He says he's all for me, but I know he's better than that. He'll protect you."

Already I could feel my eyes tearing up, but I held it back at just a few drips, forcing myself to nod. "I will..."

"Thanks, Murky. But don't worry, there's plenty of fight left in this mare yet. Now, go see Caduceus, he wants to check you over before we head in. Don't worry about me."

She tapped the strange rifle she was toying with. I could actually see the individual bullets all popped open to be adjusted with something. What was she doing?

"I've got plenty of bang all readied up for those bastards in there. We'll go in, get the slaves, kill Barb, and then piss off to the Roamer to get stinking drunk. Might even try to hook you up with somepony."

I blushed on the spot, feeling embarrassment overwhelm even fear for one wonderful moment of simple worry. I hugged her once more, before leaving Glimmer to her work and wandering toward a huge pile of armour that had the nurse earth pony sitting near it sat nearby.

Caduceus was leaning on the wall and organising his medical supplies into neat rows, organising and counting. Most apparently for his pack or into the armour he had pulled from the pile earlier for quick reaching. Bandages, small healing potions, and a couple syringes stood out to me. He brushed that thick blonde mane from his face to glance at me. Compared to most of the slave bucks, he seemed better fed, likely due to his specialised role, giving him a much more reassuring 'non-filthy slave' feel to permit him to check me over.

"Ah, Murk. How are you feeling after those healing potions?"

"Better. My shoulder and chest don't hurt really anymore. But I still feel..."

"Beaten? Unsettled?"

"Yeah. My ribs and eyes hurt, and my forehead..."

Caduceus motioned for me to sit as he checked me over, resting his hoof over my chest or examining my scar. The young buck was firm, professional, and oddly comforting. He'd proven his will to help out by putting himself in harm's way for us twice already and by helping heal me after Barb's raiders had their way.

"You are mostly fine. I believe it's mostly just the body knowing it's not quite right yet. Healing potions, for all their power, are pretty imprecise. We never can tell quite where most of their power is going to go if somepony has as many hurt parts as you did. But I can assure you, as far as such a hurt little pony as you can be, you've got nothing critical other than your lungs left over for this mission. Even your shrapnel wound closed up at last."

He was right. Although I'd tried to ignore the hideous mark the chunk of shrapnel had left on my lower leg, it had stopped bleeding since I'd stolen The Master's healing potions. That was worth smiling about, right? I tried to do so to Caduceus. Really, I'd given him too little credit.

"Caduceus, I, uh... thanks."

"It's alright, Murky. Just doing what I do. Or what I should be doing, anyway."

I must have raised an eyebrow in confusion, as he looked right at me and began to explain before I could even voice the question. Darn healers... always so perceptive.

Caduceus settled down, letting the armour barding fall before him lightly.

"See, Murky, like I was saying before, I've spent all my time in Helpinghoof Clinic or in Hearts and Hooves Hospital. I've had patients brought to me again and again, handing me nothing more than the instructions to take care of them. My only goal was to be an actual doctor, like Helpinghoof himself or Weathervane. But it was just... horrible, now that I think about it."

"Horrible?"

"Every day, ponies were being wheeled in to me, hurt or dying. Many we would save or help out, but there was always more. The wasteland or Fillydelphia, they just created more and more ponies with injuries, hurt so many that our job was nothing but just hour after hour of pain and seeing torment."

He stopped, shrugging.

"I guess... I guess meeting you guys, I've just realised I don't want that. I don't want to be the one who just sits in a clinic waiting for people to get hurt. I'm no grand healer, but I can't ignore this chance here, to use my skills in a way to prevent harm, not just cure it. If that includes offering my healing knowledge to you in your escape, I'm in."

That was pretty admirable, I had to admit. The thought of him accompanying us was very comforting. But the buck bashfully seemed to bite his lip.

"So, uh, I know Glimmer's fine with me but... if I may be as forward, would you accept me as one of your little group?"

The question surprised me. Me being given some sort of query for permission? But he deserved it. He really did.

"Um... sure?"

Much to my surprise, he leaned forward, quickly giving me a hug. I just sat in shock. What was he—

"Thank you. Sorry to sort of throw that on you, but really, I felt you needed to know Glimmer isn't the only one of us around you who feels you need a little hug now and again. You are a poor little thing."

That I guess I could be fine with. I could tell he was speaking the truth. Coughing into my hoof, still feeling a little awkward, I just mumbled a thank you. Having friends still felt so new. The idea that ponies could just be so nice and comforting to one another like this felt so strange.

"Now, I better get all this organised. I'd be lying if I said I wasn't scared witless, but a stand's a stand, right?"

"S-sure. I'll just get some armour or something."

He nodded, smiling and turning back to his own saddlebag and barding.

Trotting toward the pile of armour, I began piecing through it, carefully attempting to not make a noise that would disturb the dozen or so ponies around me that lay in wait for the time to move. Everything outside, the raider attacks, the desperate defence, and the cries of the slave hostages every so often as they were thrown and shoved into cells with each other for 'storage', it all seemed muted in here. Two ponies watched the window, training rifles through it that kept most raiders out of line of sight.

Somehow, I was more afraid of making a noise here than when trying to avoid most slavers out to get me, like I would disturb their peace.

Most of the armour was simply too big or heavy for me. Some plates of armour, stripped from combat barding, looked the right size, but upon lifting were immensely heavy, as though from a highly dense material. I dragged out a small vest. It seemed the right size; all nice and black, too! But a quick examination found the actual armour inside had been stripped out. Just my luck.

Digging through more, I found one that still had its armour plates inside. While not black, it was still dark blue and seemed about the right size I could sew down a little and fit into if I had time. It certainly seemed like a uniform of the ponies who worked here. I couldn't read, but even I could recognise the same shape of words. This one bore an emblazoned word in bright yellow upon its back, the same as above the door to this room's station, one all too easy to guess.

'SECURITY'

Immediately, I simply dropped it from my hooves, sighing at a lack of anything worthwhile. What kind of idiot would wear something like that? Anypony would see those bright yellow letters for miles! You couldn't hide and sneak around with them.

Eventually, I simply decided to forget anything big. Armour wasn't my thing, as I'd found in the past. It only slowed me down or made it harder to squeeze into little places. If I was being shot at, I was doing something wrong anyway. It'd be better to just stay light and as agile as my frail little body could ever manage, and avoid everything altogether. To that end, I simply took a few small pieces of thickened leather to shove inside my fleece around my torso. At the very least it'd stop it hurting so much when I hit the ground from diving or being thrown.

Pulling my fleece and battle saddle (Eee!) back on, I began to trot around, looking for someplace to curl up in and wait myself. I would sketch until the time to go, hopefully of good things to calm my mind that was quickly beginning to readjust, and remember what I'd agreed to do here. I'd have to draw something very nice to distract myself. Something that would make me smile and feel happy and warm inside and...

...and I could almost hear Glimmerlight teasing me in my mind for thinking of what my mind had defaulted to. Oh come on, now she was invading my own subconscious?

But trotting through the station, I instead spotted one pony standing separate from everypony else. Ragini was leaned against the cage I'd wanted to go into anyway, fiddling with the scope on her light flyer's rifle. But Protégé, he stood alone, apart from everypony else near an internal window that gave security guards of old a view into the plaza. It was pock marked with bullet impacts, clearly until somepony gave up trying to get him through it.

I could see his face reflected in it, looking more sombre and forlorn than I'd ever imagined he could. Without really knowing why, I began quietly trotting up towards my master. His revolver floated in the air beside him, reloading, unloading, and reloading again. A consistent and ongoing fidgeting from his telekinesis. Spotting me in the window, he turned just enough for his one visible eye to see me.

"I see you've acquired something you always longed for then, Murk? Good for you."

"Yes, master. Thank you."

Trotting up further, I hopped up to peer into the plaza. It was mostly empty, but clouds of smoke emerged from burning wood near the fountain. Clearly, most of them were all in the shop cells for cover or underneath us in the guardroom for defence from slaver assaults. I had to stifle my whine as I saw the horrific sight of two ponies hung from the balconies that connected either side of the higher levels above the floor. Their limp bodies, one buck and one mare, swayed gently.

We said nothing more for a few seconds, while I tried to pull myself together. Protégé seemed to gaze at everything and yet nothing in any detail. He didn't even turn to me as he finally broke the silence. Speaking softly and barely moving his lips.

"I had a dream once, you know? Still get it sometimes."

"Huh?"

He stared ahead, talking quietly.

"A dream of Equestria. Of green fields, bright sunlight, and vivid colours amongst a peaceful and safe world for everypony. Of a time in which there are no divisions between individuals, and no hatred of purpose and direction. A world in which we did not live in fear that we'd never get to be what we truly wanted. No masters, no slaves; simply a free nation of opportunity and optimism. As best I can, I pursue that dream, Murk. Master Red Eye gave me this chance to create a world which I might be prouder of than the one I was born into."

He lifted a hoof, placing it on the glass, and gazing intently past it into the plaza, at the atrocities committed within, at the bloodstained and wrecked shop fronts. I had seen this world Protégé spoke of in Aurora's memory orb. Had he done the same? He was a unicorn after all.

"But this... this just isn't what I ever wanted to happen."

I turned my head to look at him. I could see a look on his face I'd only once seen before atop a roof outside Fillydelphia. Pain. Pain, and sadness deep in his eyes. He wasn't a harsh taskmaster or cruel overseer. Right now all I saw was one pony who longed for something better than the hoof even he had been dealt.

"I'm sorry, master."

"No, Murk. It is I who is sorry. For everything you've been through as a part of all this whole mess in Fillydelphia. No pony deserves to be born a slave, to never even know or be allowed to choose their own life."

I shuffled on the spot, turning to the window again, feeling a little awkward to see my master express such emotion even through a simple look.

I barely muttered in response. "Uh, I meant, I'm sorry that all this has happened. In here."

Protégé glanced briefly at me, as though judging to see if I were truly meaning it. I was surprised to find I did. Even if I felt guilty inside at helping cause it.

"Thank you, Murk. I'm just glad you and your friends are safe at the very least. But I have let down those I swore to protect. If I had the resources or options to keep those raiders separate, I would have. Fillydelphia, for all its ideals, I sometimes wish could do more to help those who don't deserve such a life in here."

An awkward silence took over again. It was clear exactly who part of that last sentence was really meant to refer to. Resting my head on my hooves that were up on the window lip, I simply remained beside him for a while. But something began to bug me. From his journal I'd seen and from the things I'd heard every slaver say about him, he just felt so out of place amongst slavers.

"M-master, can I ask you, s-something, um... before we go in there?"

"Of course, Murk."

I scuffed a hoof, trying to build the courage to just ask. Finally, I took a breath and spoke.

"Why are you with Red Eye?"

My master still didn't turn round, his eye following one slave as she made a break for it below, trying with all her might to stand, gallop, and escape; before being dragged right back into her cage by a raider.

Eventually, his eyepiece clicked off, hovering around before his face where he simply stared at the little device as though it alone contained the answer.

"To find freedom."

Those were not the words I expected. Swivelling on the spot, I more properly faced him, finding both of those bright red eyes staring back at me. Only now did I begin to see how unkempt and clearly run-ragged he was amongst the riot that had shattered his work in the Mall apart. His mane had straggled, strands loose from being tied back falling across his face while his eyes were sullen.

"Freedom from more than just the chains that bind. Freedom from the wasteland entirely, from all these horrors that we all experience. But not just for myself, for all other ponies who seek it or deserve it too. Ponies like you."

He reached one hoof across, laying it on my shoulder with a weak smile that died immediately.

"Master Red Eye helped me, Murk. He found me when I had nothing left, no belief driving me or virtue to take heart in. He saved my life, offering a direction to pursue a better world with. The road was hard, harder than anything I had ever been told to do before, but I knew it was worth travelling. Now, I seek to do the same for others that he did to me. To find those who deserve a better life or who have more to offer, and help make that happen."

My eyes widened.

"You mean..." I gulped. "You mean you want me to join you? To find other ponies who aren't all bad to make things better in here?"

"I want to help you and those like you, Murk. To help them find their freedom from where they've been brought, through Fillydelphia's hardships, and to perhaps help Equestria along the way. That is why I brought you here, that I might try to keep you safer and on a more stable path to what it is you want in the end. Whether that be simply your freedom from all slavery, or to perhaps try and help me try to make this a better place. I can teach you, aid you, and protect you as best I can if you stick by my side."

I dropped my voice, looking away to the side.

"The freedom I want? I just want to be free, master. To one day know what it's like to be beyond the wall, no matter where that wall's ever been."

"That is your choice. But I promise Murk, when we come back from this, I will do more for you. Perhaps a chance to remain by my side more, away from those that may harm you when not serving your two years. Everypony deserves a fair chance to succeed."

"But what about Glimmerlight, master? What about Coral Eve and all the others? You don't give them half the attention or..."

I stammered on the word, afraid to say it.

"...or care that you give me."

He went quiet. I felt his hoof rest a little more firmly on my shoulder, before he lightly patted it instead.

"Some ponies have it worse than others. I've told you so many times that I understand what you're going through on these duties for two years, Murk. That I know what it's like to have such hardship. Perhaps the calm before the storm of battle has made me willing to reflect on life, but I have never once lied to you."

My mouth dropped open, drawing air sharply as some clouds in my mind cleared and put two and two together.

"Y-you went through..."

I saw his shoulders sink, as though remembering something unpleasant.

"Two years is a hard journey, Murk. It is filled with danger, hard choices, and the attentions of those who don't care about you reaching the end. Especially hard for somepony who was born into slavery."

Attaching the eyepiece to his barding, Protégé turned from the window to face in at the team making their final preparations. He stopped, turning his head back, but not looking directly at me. His eyes simply seemed to look at nothing in particular. I knew that look. I'd worn it many times when I'd been looking backward on my life. But he was once a... he'd been born a...

"It's not nice, is it Murk? Not knowing how to think for yourself or know what choices to make? Not understanding the emotions that flow through you after meeting the one pony who finally opens your eyes to something more?"

I couldn't speak, only stand with a mouth struggling to not just hang slightly open and quiver in an attempt to say anything. More than ever, I finally understood the link, the way that he always just 'got' how I was feeling or what I was thinking. The one element of life that connected us in a way only we could ever understand to ourselves.

Protégé looked more the striving lonely pony than I had ever truly seen before, as I saw him offer a thin smile and turn back to the teams as Ragini returned and strode over to him.

"Word from Shackles on the griffons. Sixty minutes, master! That's all they said they'd permit you to handle the matter internally before they make an example of everypony inside for rioting. Apparently a couple dozen slaves don't matter to them beside of making a proper showcase of why you don't riot. But Mosin reports all teams are ready for the false assault."

"Thank you, Ragini. Then I suppose we should get started. We don't have long."

Everypony looked over at the words. Stood in the centre of the team, under the gaze of Glimmerlight, Brimstone, Caduceus, Ragini, the four slavers accompanying us and of course, my own stunned look, he just spoke quietly.

"I shall not make a grand speech or shout words of encouragement. But our course is set in. Ponies require our aid in there. Whether we are simply following orders or pursuing something of greater idealism, we are one team seeking to save the lives of those who have no reason to die in a forgotten pain inside those walls."

He turned, eyeing each of them in turn. His gaze was sad, but not just for others. Now I knew the great truth behind why he cared so much about slaves. I saw Brimstone match it with that rock solid glare, saw Caduceus pull his saddlebag tighter, saw Glimmerlight show her support with a little wink.

"We do not stop. We do not leave them to this fate, in the same building with which we have been striving to create a better way than what we see every day out in the other worker dens."

Finally, his eyes stopped across mine.

"No pony deserves to just be a forgotten number."

My eyes felt like they'd turn damp, but I controlled it, forcing it all down and with great trepidation, nodded. In response, Protégé seemed to lift the corners of his mouth a little. Turning away, slowly, the eyepiece returned to his face.

"Luck be with you all. Let's go."

An artificial night blanketed Fillydelphia.

Storm clouds moved above us, rolling and swirling amongst the smog, creating a charcoal roof that darkened the normally red haze of Fillydelphia. Glows of the industry were the exception rather than the rule all too suddenly, as most ponies had rushed indoors or under cover from the trepidation of the oncoming thunderstorm.

With good reason. In Fillydelphia, the rain burned.

The wind whipped at me, whirling down the larger streets and howling in the alleyways, it was more like a siren of its own, warning everypony to get away from what the sky was about to unleash. On far streets, I could see the thin lights of a cordon keeping the Mall under watch for any raider break outs.

We waited around the back of the Mall, hiding in silence amongst ditches just away from the shop cell's metal stock entrance. Protégé and Ragini were up ahead, Glimmer and Brimstone behind them, then the four slavers, and finally Caduceus and myself bringing up the rear. The early warning and the medic. Behind us lay another couple dozen slavers, awaiting the chance to rush in and support our first push. Truth be told, part of me wanted to be upfront right now, with Protégé. My mind was whirling, confused, afraid, panicking, and absolutely curious now that I knew what he truly was.

Really, everything of how I saw him had been turned on its head. When we got back after all this... if we got back, I needed to have a long talk with him.

I sat amongst the dirt, crouching low and watching the door. I was tasked to hear the assault starting, but that meant I could also hear every gunshot, every scream from inside.

That was if I could hear it above all this wind. It actually hurt my ears, sending my big one flapping back and forth as it blew madly all over Fillydelphia and send small twisting dervishes along the dusty roads.

With any luck the primary storm would just miss us before—

The sky, all of it, flashed.

“Eek!”

I found myself wrapped around the nearest pony. Unfortunately for him, that turned out to be Caduceus. Half choking as my front legs crushed his windpipe in shock, holding onto him with wide eyes. The sky had lit up for half a second... lightning. I didn't like lightning. With luck like mine, I was always afraid it would just hit me wherever I was.

Almost lethargically, the storm brewing above let out a distant and deep rumble of thunder that made my mismatched ears throb and jitter above my head. The sound grew and went on far longer than any normal sky had a right doing. Without pegasi treating it, the Equestrian weather patterns could be downright ferocious.

The sky rumbled again, louder, more urgent and wild. Squeaking, I crushed tighter, barely even hearing Caduceus' gasps and frantic hoofing of me to stop it. I hated storms.

“...urk! Ca... breathe!”

I dropped off him, still shivering on the spot.

“Oh! I'm so sorry... sorry sorry sorry, I didn't mean to—”

“It's... phew...” He lay on his side for a moment, rubbing his throat. “It's alright, no harm, whew... done. When I said hugs were fine that wasn't quite what I meant, heh...”

He forced a smile, nodding that he was indeed fine, but I still sat back in my ditch nervously. This waiting was making me so nervous that I felt ready to leap and just run or dig into the earth any second. I felt so exposed out here, even with the rickety corrugated metal shelters above our positions short of the door. Just waiting, waiting for it all to start in the blowing wind and hoping this storm didn't get worse.

Then I heard a drip.

It was followed by another, and another, then three more in quick succession. A little warm plop on my head was followed by even more.

Without any more warning, the clouds opened and streams of water battered down from the sky. Blocking sight lines, covering all around us, and striking the ground so hard that it pinged back upwards by a good two feet. The wind sent it whirling under our shelter, washing across us every few seconds. The lightning wracked the sky once more, flaring the majestic shape of the Mall into stark relief before us. But its contents only made me nervous now. A raider stronghold.

Every exposed piece of skin began tingling, a prelude to burning pains if you were left out in the rain for too long. But we had to hold here. We couldn't go any closer without risking alerting the raiders by sound until we absolutely had the assault's noise cover. That meant we simply had to endure, ever the tale of the slave.

Already my brow was stinging, my mane flattened almost immediately across it. Puddles formed, and I almost lost myself in the oddly lukewarm water with my short legs. Caduceus was tossing his head, trying to flick it all off. He was blinking a lot, the same as me. The water was making my eyes sear and ache. Whimpering, trying not to scream in fear of making too much noise, I did my best to stay under the little shelter we had. Those around us were almost invisible through the deluge, some of the slavers cursing as exposed bodies felt their skin crawl with pain.

“Well, thanks for that, Celestia, you great big bitch,” muttered one of the slavers, the unicorn mare. She caught my shocked look, before just rolling her eyes and turning away.

Protégé just seemed to stand alone, watching the crater under the rain that was striking the ground so hard it bounced as high as my head, sometimes spitting up into my eyes.

Really, I knew this was an opportunity, but my courage to ask had failed me. Now I didn't even know if I was looking at a slave or a master anymore. He was both and yet neither, stuck between two worlds and choosing the one that set him apart from me. Even just watching him standing and staring into the distant crater, I felt nervous to even think about his life. But it explained so much about him.

Under the storm's blackness, the crater was an eerie sight. I'd been in it before. It had just seemed like a blasted ruin. But in such darkness, I could see an ominous light glow coming from the core, drifting in the dust that swayed on the wind between the irregular torrents of rainfall. There was no pony but the raid teams around, giving rise to an odd sense of isolation within the normally bustling city.

Tossing my head and whimpering at the growing pain from the rain as it blew into my face, I tried to shelter down in the ditch as best I could, but the ground was becoming muddy, dripping water down the sides to cluster below my hooves. Everypony was fidgeting, all except Brimstone in his fairly enclosed armour, and Protégé, who simply stood with his eyepiece off and staring deeply into it.

Already, my stomach was twisting over and over at the terror of what would happen once we went beyond that door. Fear kept building. We were uncomfortable, trapped in the humid and heavy air, in pain from the poisoned water, and just awaiting the signal to begin a brutal assault. Even my rampant curiosity and confused glances toward Protégé were not helping me to fight the urge to run and hide.

But I could hardly think on that now. My eyes kept returning to him standing just short of the rain.

But I really didn't know if I were staring at a fellow slave just like me or whether I simply saw my master.

When we got back, I needed a long talk with him. I had to—

In the distance, I heard a sound. A hollow 'Thoom!'

My ears perked before my face even reacted, was that thunder? But immediately after, there was a second, and a third.

My heart began to slow, like I wanted to ignore it, deny it.

It had been an explosion, dull and far off through many walls, muffled by the rain. But I had heard it.

I immediately reached over and clattered my hoof on a slab of metal, alerting Protégé without having to raise our voices. He turned, watching me intently.

"Murk?"

A roar of gunfire began to pick up. Those closer to the door were even beginning to look up now. I saw Ragini nod.

"The assault."

Protégé wasted no time in drawing his revolver and clipping the eyepiece back on.

"This is it, team! Brimstone, get the door! Everypony else, weapons at the ready and kill all noise. We infiltrate as far as we can before we have to open fire!"

Brimstone rushed up to the door, his great hooves wrapping around the bars to tug it open; the rain washing off his armour while he did so. He'd ditched the helmet. I guessed out of fear of what it brought out in him. Everypony else readied up, drawing weapons or tightening armour as we galloped up through the sodden ground. My skin stung under the rain, my mane flopped and my fleece soaked it up within seconds of moving into the thick deluge.

I flicked my leg, making the mouthpiece flip out for Rarity's Grace. I had its three shots and the two grenades I'd stolen from The Master's locker. It'd have to do in my protection. But a strange wave of calm overcame me. The waiting was over.

With a creak and groan, Brimstone threw the door open, heavy metal hinges sliding uneasily on rusted joints. Even above the thunderstorm and rain, the firefight was now audible at a ferocious level inside, punctuated by all sorts of explosions.

Protégé was first up, disappearing inside, followed by Ragini. Everypony else followed. Glimmer, with a last firm nod to me. Brimstone, with that grim expression. After them, the slavers, who warily trooped in.

Caduceus stopped, offering a hoof back as the other 'back end' pony.

"Just keep moving; we stall and I'll probably be too scared to move too. We'll just stick together Murky, the two of us. Okay?"

Standing in the harsh wind, I took a few breaths before nodding, reaching out to take his hoof, and disappearing inside.

Here we go.

We were home.

The back of our shop cell was decimated. The sofa torn up and the scrap pile tossed and scattered from raiders searching for anything. Shelves were toppled, and the stench of waste and blood drifted throughout.

Brimstone hauled the door closed as lightly as he could behind us, leaving one stone in the hinge to let the relief force behind us in when their time came. But he hadn't needed to be that quiet, for the assault was drowning everything out. Explosions every few seconds and the staccato report of gunfire pounded throughout the building. I could hear raiders galloping by the front of the cell, rushing to the guard rooms and returning fire with long bursts.

Protégé was up front, ready and edging closer to the door. Looking back, he motioned me over as the remainder of the raid team settled into the corners, staying silent. I crept over, hustling up beside him and feeling the unicorn lean close to my ear.

"We need to know what's out there. You have it?"

I did indeed. My new toy. A few minutes waiting had been spent making it. Pulling the little mirror I'd found from the containers out, it was now attached to a thin piece of metal and bound on with fabric. My master took it, his magic angling it just out to peer around the corner and into the main shop.

Both of us stared at it, oh-so-patiently angling it for the best viewpoint that would show us the front of the store and whether there were any guards. Occasional blurs of motion on the dirty mirror gave rise to them pushing past the front in twos or threes. We waited. Still, stay still...

I listened carefully. After a while, with no more movement on the mirror and no sounds nearby, I nodded. The responsibility of the decision weighed heavy, but with recent knowledge, I found myself eager to do as Protégé wished of me. Somehow, he felt closer, like I had to help him all the more.

Ragini went first, proving herself remarkably stealthy as she slid around the corner and behind the counter of the shop. She had followed me all night once without me ever spotting her, I supposed. Griffons were light on their feet.

Protégé went after her, followed by Glimmerlight. Two of the slavers were waved into the store, where I saw them roll behind a low shelving unit in the middle. Each stayed in cover, out of the way of the main open entrance. I just hung back in the stock room with Caduceus and Brimstone; the big raider would move with us, waiting for anything to kick off for his might to be unleashed.

As if we needed any more. The assault was ear shattering. Automatic gunfire and echoes reverberating everywhere, accompanied by frantic shouting about reloading or to cover each other crossed over whoops of frenzied delight. It may have all been out of the plaza and past the guard room, but to me, it was as though I was right in the middle of it.

This was the hard bit. We knew Barb was on the upper levels, but the only staircase was out of the shop front and then fifty metres to the right across ground that was visible from above. Most of the raiders would be out front, away in the corridors, but any that were above would likely spot us. The entire point was just to get as far as we could before that happened.

“Everypony ready?” Protégé’s voice hissed out, responded by a series of light taps. I didn’t tap. I wasn’t ready, but I knew I had no say in this.

It was just going to be a straight run. One brutal rush to get upstairs and kill Barb before bunkering down around any slaves we could find.

“Go!”

Protégé and Ragini swept out of the store front. Glimmerlight went right after them, followed by the slaver fireteam. Brimstone shoved Caduceus and myself out before him and we galloped across the shop into the plaza.

Into hell.

Under the storm, the plaza was leaking terribly. Water dripped from the skylight above or down from rusty pipes on the walls. Already the surging wind could be heard under the rumble of thunder. Lightning flared, lighting the entire grisly sight of a raider encampment. Fires had their smoke mixed with the rain, offering sight upon the mutilated bodies that were hung from balconies or horribly tortured unto death while lashed to wooden planks. Skins or bloodstained clothes were scattered everywhere. And the stench...

My stomach twisted all the more with revulsion, requiring Caduceus to grab my hoof and pull me on. We galloped right into it, hopping over the foul remnants as we stuck to the wall of shops and every shadow we could. Above us I could hear the raiders. If I turned my head, I could see one or two on the opposite side of the plaza, up above on the balcony. They weren’t looking down, instead distracted by the sounds coming from the guardroom.

“Cover!”

Protégé’s voice sounded just loud enough for me to relay the message by tugging the others. We dropped into the next shop alone, scrambling behind old jewellery stands to hide. Poking my head out just enough, I saw three more raiders run across the plaza from the stairs. We’d dodged all sight by sheer luck.

The next stretch of the plaza would cover us much better. The balconies didn’t exist this far back, as the entire level above stretched across the entire plaza, filling the whole gap above us. But that didn’t mean raiders couldn’t be anywhere.

Already, I could hear them trotting around above us through the lower roof. We would have to fight at the top of the stairs one way or another. Listening intently, I heard the door we came in open again, the second team of more slavers creeping in to await their backup assault. The stage was set.

“Move!” Protégé was curt and simple in his commands, avoiding too much noise. Ragini led this time, moving out around the shop to—

She walked right into a raider. The raider, a mare, reacted with shock at the griffon, before opening her mouth to cry out. Why hadn’t I heard her? Had she just been lying in the shadows out there sleeping!?

Ragini wasted no time. Before a single sound could be made, her talon wrapped around the mare’s mouth, using her superior size and strength to quickly wrench the raider’s neck hard enough that I heard a sickening pop. Shaking under both the tension and fear, I had to calm my stomach by looking away when I spotted the mare still living for a few seconds before the injury caught up with her brain.

I’d always thought that killed instantly.

Proving me tragically wrong, the mare’s eyes flickered, panicking, and finally going dead. Wrenching the neck once more to make sure, Protégé’s griffon bodyguard pulled the mare inside and dumped her in the corner. The griffon saw my horrified face, and just winked at me.

“Too much for you, flightless?” Her hushed whisper drifted into my ears. “Bet you just wish you had that pig sty back, right?”

I just looked away, leaving her to flick her wings with a grin and move back to the store front. Was she enjoying this?

We slipped out as one team, keeping to the wall. A low sound of moaning and pain entered my ears. Multiple voices alongside plenty of shuffling nearby. Slaves? I sped up, aiming to move over to Protégé and alert him that we were near the prisoners. This was going well, if we could just—

Protégé was blown clean off his hooves before I even heard the thumping sound of a gunshot reach us.

“SNIPER!”

The slavers spun, but Ragini was well ahead of them, taking to the air and raising her energy rifle. Across the plaza, in another shop cell, a second muzzle flare kicked up that took a chunk out of the concrete wall above Protégé’s head. With a flare and snap of discharged magic, Ragini melted the sniper’s head clean off with a green lance of light.

That was it. There was one brief moment of horrendous silence. I hoped that it might have been lost in the noise of the assault. But then one shout went out, calling ‘everypony up’, then another to get guns, then a half dozen hooves.

We were busted.

Caduceus ran forward to Protégé, as did I. The slave master was already trying to pull himself up, favouring his left side.

“Hold still! Hold still! Let me get a look at—”

“I’m just winded, the armour took it. We need to— ergh! We need to move! Go!”

Even so, Caduceus and I still helped him up. Around us, the raiders were realising they had been breached. Hooves on stairs sounded alongside the screams of slaves as they were presumably threatened to stay still. Carrying a limping Protégé, we let Ragini and the slave armed with a battle saddle lead. Simply rushing now, we reached the stairway.

It was not unguarded. Large and wide, the stairwell to the upper floors was thick enough to take eight ponies at a time, and not your scrawny post-bombs ponies either. But barricades were set up on it, one at the halfway point up where the stairway reversed and went back on itself to the upper level, and one at the bottom. A dozen raiders were spread out, immediately rushing down to meet us coming the other way. A large set of more barricades were right in front of us, clearly a fall back point for the raiders should they have lost the guard room.

Trapped between us and them were a great mass of slaves, all cowering at the sides or below the stairs.

Throwing ourselves behind the closer barricades, the gunfire began. I found myself trapped in a small bit of cover behind an overturned refrigerator, almost pressed into Caduceus' chest to keep all our hooves behind it.

"Kill em all! KILL!"

Shots made the fridge jar and shift on the spot. Shotgun slugs thudded deeply into it, so hard that the metal surface smacked me in the face. Protégé lifted his revolver above it with magic and let off three rounds blindly, relieving some of the pressure. But he was breathing hard, a hoof on his side. Yet still, he managed to raise his voice.

"Don't get bogged down! Fire and move! Fire and move! We have to keep going!"

Around us, the team had clustered into what cover they could. Glimmerlight was beside the female unicorn slaver, firing a few shots with her pistol around the side of the stripped metal plates they had to stay alive behind. Ragini was actually above us, using a thick metal sign hanging from the roof as a hiding spot to fire off snapshots that were above the raiders' own cover. Boy, flying was handy in a fight!

But the raiders were digging in hard. Made even worse by the slaves who were struggling to stay to the side, our line of fire was restricted. The barricade on the first stairwell platform was just pumping out too many shots from five or so raiders behind it.

We were pinned. Protégé hastily reloaded his revolver to open fire again, but we couldn't aim properly to get ahead. Nearby, I heard a cry of pain that only went on and on with horror. An armour piercing round had punched right through the barricade and sheared the leg off one of the earth pony slavers with us. Flailing and panicking, he was cut down out of cover. I heard Caduceus hiss in anger, unable to move over and aid the pony. The nurse was rattling off what shots he dared with that small submachine gun of his, but he was clearly not very accurate with it.

"Anypony got any bright ideas?" Protégé shouted out, quickly snapping a shot at a raider trying to push forward and get around us. The pony went down, nursing their shoulder, but pulled themselves into cover.

I wish I had, but I was useless here, just a bystander in a firefight. I just winced every time a shot spanked off our cover, whimpering with terror that an armour piercing shot might rip through it any moment...

"I got something, give me some cover!" Glimmerlight cried out, holding the long rifle tipped with the spark battery.

The command went out. Everypony leaned up and unleashed what firepower they had. All except me. I only had a few bullets in Rarity's Grace for self defence, but nothing for mass firing. But between Ragini, Caduceus, Protégé, three slavers, and even Brimstone with the fallen slaver's weapon, I actually screamed at the pain in my ears. So much gunfire going off so close to my head was like a crowbar being jammed in my ear. The torrent gave Glimmerlight an opportunity.

The Ranger Initiate leaned up, settling the rifle on the barricade with her hooves to get her eye right down and aim properly. What on Equestria was it going to—

She fired. With a loud crack and ping, the spark battery on the tip catapulted off, flying high and arcing down toward the barricade up ahead. Smashing into barrier itself, the spark battery flared, ignited, and exploded with a blue haze and arcing magical energies. Raiders screamed, diving away with their bodies burning and disintegrating. One in the middle I saw turned simply to ash under the full force of the explosion. She'd made an energy grenade to be fired from that rifle.

I wasn't sure whether to be horrified at the effect or proud of my sis' for breaking the deadlock. The slavers got their weapons back up, starting to make progress, now that the biggest source of incoming fire was down.

"Go! Get on their flanks! On their flanks, Ragini, move!"

Protégé shouted the order, falling back as the fridge lurched under a heavy rifle round to knock his likely heavily bruised side again. Caduceus caught him as he fell back, while I looked up. On their flanks? Why that? We weren't even anywhere close enough to—

Oh, right, that's what he meant. I really was useless at this fighting business.

Ragini swept down, her energy rifle flashing to the left. Slaves dived away from cover, trying to escape a raider who was using them as a hostage. Ragini's fire cut him down before the execution shots went in. On the other side, I saw Brimstone rush up, pulverising one piece of cover under the sheer weight of him and his armour to allow the slavers following him to move in. Protégé turned to me and Caduceus.

"You two, move up and follow Brimstone. They're going to start swinging more fire back here now that they've seen me leading them. I'll support Ragini's side while Muzzle Flare and Granite Hoof keep up fire from the centre! Go!"

But I didn't—

"GO!"

My master commanded, making me turn and gallop across the battle line towards Brimstone's cleared area. The big raider was now hiding behind a pillar until he could get a chance to push forward again. What if—

"Argh! Argh! Argh!"

Even while running, I screamed at the rushes of air. Shots were whizzing around me, pinging off the ground. They were firing at me! Where do I go? Where do I stop? What cover was good!?

Yelling, almost dancing on my hooves, a sudden weight slammed into me and pulled me to the floor. Kicking and scrambling toward a wide pillar, I found Caduceus was the one pulling me in, wrapping his hooves about me to tug me to safety. Behind me, I saw the fridge we'd been behind torn apart. If we'd stayed there...

Protégé hadn't gotten far. The ground was chewed up near where he must have run, but now he was beside Glimmerlight. Her hooves were struggling to attach another spark battery to her rifle. She was so intent, falling into a drill. I began to see the real Ranger Initiate in her, more than just the fun loving mare I knew. I often forgot she had been born into a militaristic upbringing.

"Shit!"

Caduceus swore. Turning my head, I almost joined him as I saw one raider coming down the opposite staircase on the other side of the plaza. He had a clean shot!

Caduceus sprayed his submachine gun. He was inaccurate, but dumping the entire magazine brought down the raider in a floundering, surprisingly anticlimactic heap. Breathing hard, the nurse just stared at the corpse.

“...do-no harm... do no harm! He was going to harm more...”

Breathing through clenched teeth, Caduceus hugged me for support, realising what he'd done.

This battle was escalating. Three more raiders ran down the stairwell from above. Protégé downed two, Ragini the last one, but another two followed, galloping to join their clan comrades. What if any more came behind us? We were too exposed, in real danger. I had two grenades. Maybe I could...

No! Any glance out showed me the slaves trapped on the edges and near the slavers. I couldn't throw explosives with them there, but I had to do something!

Reaching down, I picked up a rock in my mouth. Pushing Caduceus' hooves away, I leapt out and began sneaking along the edge of cover nearer Brimstone. Ducking down, scooting as best I could and trying to ignore the foul taste of the rock, I edged as close as I could.

“GRENADE!” I screamed, throwing the rock at them, and diving back behind the barricade.

Up ahead, the shout was echoed, before half a dozen raiders leapt out of cover, along with screaming slaves rushing away from the rock. One of the slavers, Muzzle Flare, I thought, raised her carbine in a telekinetic field and took three out with well placed snapshots. She was good. Ragini, swapping out for her lighter rifle, picked another one off.

Somehow, without even really meaning to, I had changed the momentum. There were only four raiders left now, after I spied the one Protégé had winged earlier now lying still. He'd bled out.

But the remaining ones were not giving out.

“Stop 'em getting higher! Come get some ya fuckers!”

I squealed as combined fire chewed at the wooden barricade I was hiding behind. Bullets flew through, spraying me with woodchips. I heard Caduceus scream for me to get back to the pillar, but I'd locked up with fear. If I left, they'd just shoot me in the open!

I heard a grinding, shrieking of metal on rock. Glancing up, I saw Protégé and Glimmerlight pushing an old metal rubbish bin, heavy and square, toward the last raider position. The pair were drawing fire, giving me time to leap back toward Caduceus. Protégé's revolver shot over the top, such close range pushing the raiders back to further away cover, but giving the others on the flanks a chance to move.

Brimstone and Ragini descended. The former charged, bellowing a warcry while hurling a stone the size of a boulder at one. His target's head cracked back, before Brimstone, their previous leader, crashed into a second, pulverizing the raiders head off the railing of the staircase with repeated crushing blows. Ragini swept down in a strafing run, blasting one in the rump, before descending in a dive with her rear legs outstretched. Between Brimstone and the griffon, they tore the remainder apart in close combat.

There was still a small war going on in the guardroom. Still another whole level to go, but somehow I felt a certain degree of pause and relief. Protégé set the slavers to guard the stairwell until we could properly regroup, before Ragini flew out to watch for anypony trying to come up behind us on another stairwell from the opposite side.

We gathered in the middle, Caduceus immediately running into the slaves. Protégé lay down against a barricade, breathing hard and clutching his side. I could see Glimmerlight busy searching for Coral Eve, while Brimstone I did not want to approach just post-battle. As such, I found myself trotting over to my master.

"Are... are you alright?"

"Well, if being shot and being alive counts, I s-suppose. Ergh... but the slaves here are safe. Too late for many though, damn raiders."

He cast his eyes around, mine following them. The atrocity was clear. Many of who I thought were simply tired slaves lying at the side simply were not. We'd secured the majority, but the raiders had done so much damage to them. I saw ponies weeping over lost ones, bloodstained rugs covering bodies, and those who simply lay in corners with wide eyes, nervous of anypony coming close. Caduceus was fighting to help one pony whose mouth had been cut at either side into some sort of grim smile. But she was consistently moving away from him, screaming and pushing herself closer to other mares. I didn't want to imagine.

We couldn't pause long. They would be fortifying the area above. At the very least, we controlled the stairwell, so they couldn't send anypony to summon their guard room defence backwards, but it was only a matter of time before we were overwhelmed. We had to push on and call the relief force once we had cleared the balcony above.

"Coral! Oh Celestia! Caduceus, over here!"

I spotted the nurse galloping before I even saw Glimmer trying to help the light grey unicorn up. She was a mess. Battered, bruised, and bleeding. Her coat, just off-white to a tinge of grey, was pockmarked with all a matter of beatings; while that long blue, white, and black mane had fallen out of its braiding to hang loose. But even with her exhausted strength, she was still trying to push Glimmer away.

"Get off me!"

"Coral, please, let me help you here!"

Caduceus took over for her, gently moving Glimmerlight to the side himself. Clearly, he figured that Coral would respond better to somepony different. Drawing some bandages and a healing salve, Caduceus set to work. Coral's eyes, however, seemed to focus on me.

"Y-you... Murk, you came in to h-help?"

Gulping, I nodded. "Yes, so did Caduceus and Glimmer. She wanted to help you."

"Great. Being helped back into the same slavery her actions put me within in the first place. That and—"

She stopped, her eyes focussing behind me. Coral shivered, a look of sudden fear and blinding hatred all at once in her eyes. Turning slowly, I simply found Brimstone Blitz nearby behind me. His own beady eyes matched Coral's now fierce glare.

"You! Glimmer, don't tell me you're working with this monster! Don't you remember what he did to us?!"

"He's changing, Coral! He's trying to be better and make up for things, just like I am to —"

"Shut up! SHUT UP! You say you're trying to seek my forgiveness, then you work with the beast that destroyed our village? That killed our families and friends? The one that brought us here!?"

My mind reeled. Sat amongst them, I found myself unknowing of even who to look at. Coral was showing nothing but sheer fury right now. Glimmerlight was pleading. Brimstone was just an impassive rock that simply stared back before finally looking away. He didn't say a word.

Brimstone had been the one to do that to them? To bring them in here? Sweet Celestia, why hadn't they told me!? I just paced on the spot, looking from pony to pony.

Glimmerlight stomped a hoof. "Brimstone's saved my life over and over again, Coral! He's saved Murky too! He's changed, Coral, becoming a better—

"Glimmer, that raider destroyed our lives! Your life! Even aside from what you did, he is a blight on this world! Nothing better than Barb and his lot, they're the same clan!"

"Brimstone's trying to help us stop Barb! Trying to redeem himself—"

"Stop right there!"

Coral pulled herself up, pointing a hoof accusingly at Glimmer.

"There is no redeeming yourself for an entire life of being what he is! How many ponies has he killed, Glimmer? How many children left homeless and orphaned because of what he did to their parents? Ponyville would still be around. We'd still have a home! But no, you betrayed us! He destroyed us! It'd be a mercy for him to just be killed!"

Throughout the exchange, Brimstone merely stood solemnly, eyes closed. The big earth pony seemed to show little emotion normally, but after knowing him for a while I could see the lack of an expression. The one that stated something had penetrated that thick hide of his.

I was still trying to get around it all, decipher it all in my head. I'd thought Glimmer and Brimstone had only first met in here. It cast a whole new immediate reality on just the sort of things Brimstone had been responsible for in his life.

"There's no fixing it, huh?" Glimmerlight spoke curtly, keeping her eyes everywhere but on Coral. "Well, forgive me for trying. But I'm going to go do that now."

"What are you—"

"Barb's up there. He's done all this now. We're going to stop him. You say they're all the same. Well here's where we prove Brim isn't. Because him and I are going up there. We're going to help Protégé in killing that bastard once and for all. We'll show you things aren't the same. Then afterwards..."

Coral scoffed. "Then what?"

"I'm going to remember, Coral."

That seemed to catch the bitter mare by surprise, she actually gave ground.

"Hm? You what?"

Glimmer's eyes narrowed. "I'm going to remember. If that's what it takes to understand, to know what I did. I'm going to work on it, go through my orbs, remember what it was I did. I can't promise I'll be quick... or easy. But I want to know what it was I did to you. Just so I can understand. You were my best friend, Coral..."

The pale grey unicorn seemed to bite back another bitter remark, but shifted on the spot, testing her bandaged hoof on the ground before returning the look.

"I just hope that someday I can be half the pony Brimstone is. He doesn't hide from his past like I do! He told me when we met and you know what? I still forgave him! Perhaps it was easier because I didn't remember. That it was nothing other than an unseen fact of history. So maybe you're right that my will to forgive anypony and anything is a lie! Maybe I'm not that beautiful pony who can bury any hatchet and just smile! But I can't change that now! All I can do is keep trying to make the best of what I have! Right now? That's by showing that I'm going to take steps."

Coral seemed a little stunned, as though she had never expected Glimmer to show that amount of sudden maturity or serious thought.

“Steps?”

Glimmer’s horn lit, pulling the long rifle toward her where she wracked the bolt.

“By going up there, and bringing down one of the ponies who destroyed our village. Brim’s going up too. Maybe once you see him try to end this, show he’s on the other side now, you’ll know I... we... mean it.”

There was an uneasy silence after that. I could see Protégé standing nearby, clearly only a few seconds off giving the order to keep pushing. We’d been stopped for a couple minutes to reload and get our breath back, what felt like an eternity when we were still exposed in this plaza. Finally, Coral looked away, snorting.

“You’ve got a long way to go, Glimmer. If you ever hope to even want to make me see you as ever really looking to properly apologise. When you finally remember, just be ready to accept who you really are. But do not ask me to see that raider as anything other than that. He’s done too much to me already. I’d still have my son with me if it weren’t for you two, not have him locked away with Red Eye.”

With that, she turned, limping away to the clusters of slaves again, stopping only briefly to turn her head and speak quietly.

“If you’re looking for Barb, he’s upstairs in the old restaurant. He’s been lording it up, having mock audiences and suchlike, as though it’s his fortress now.”

Then she was out of sight, behind the staircase. Silently, under Protégé’s nod of approval, we began cantering up the stairs. Above us, I could hear the raiders shout that we were coming. The real battle was about to begin.

But as I passed the lip of the stairwell, dodging the piles of ash from Glimmer’s energy grenade, I could only hear the faint sniffs of a sound from below it that I knew all too well from a thousand times of doing it myself.

The sound of somepony crying.

Battle had been joined before I even caught up to the top of the staircase. The others had pushed ahead, leaving myself and Caduceus to follow up in our own time. The young nurse was still in a state of half shock at his self defence earlier. I wished I could understand. I’d never killed anypony.

I began to feel I might have to the moment I saw what we approached.

The sound was catastrophic. Energy flares, bullet echoes, and pings surrounded by the chip and shatter of concrete and whipping fabric. Screams, shouts, taunts, and orders rung out alongside frantic scrambling and sliding.

When I finally saw it, I almost stopped just to stare.

The raid team had run forward, pushing off the stairs with sheer speed to get out of the choke point, but they had met a wall of resistance. Up ahead, behind more scrappy barricades, raiders were ducking and diving, throwing all sorts of fire out at Protégé and his team. Smoke and mist flew into the air as either side’s cover was chewed up or blown apart. Already I saw Protégé himself running out under fire to dive and roll on his side, crying out in pain from the impact just to take better cover. Three raiders lay dead in between where they had clearly charged.

Into this madness, I ran.

Leaping up and over a fallen concrete block riddled with holes, I passed by Ragini sniping from the back, the retort of her rifle dizzying me as we pushed onward. Three seconds of tense galloping later, I dropped beside Glimmer into heavier cover. Already, the thunderstorm was getting worse. Lightning lit the firefight, shattering the skies and the atmosphere with every thick white flare of illumination. Higher up to the skylight, the wind was even blowing down and in, carrying the burning rain inside to leak and fall upon the floor.

Between the shots, whipping dust, rain and storm, the entire thing was complete sensory overload, a madness of violence and chaos that swept across the entire second plaza level.

“Push in! Push in! We cannot stop!” Protégé’s voice carried out, followed by the pounding as I saw Brimstone charge right past us heedlessly, directly into the line of fire.

Using the chance, Glimmerlight leaned out, fired the rifle, and then charged after him. So much smoke was being kicked up from missed shots that we could almost move without being seen across the second level of the plaza. There was a rending crash up ahead, from Brimstone bucking a metal plate so hard it collided with the raiders behind it, before we all ducked behind it again. Opposite us, Protégé and the three slavers poured a huge amount of firepower ahead of them to force the raiders back.

Anything above two feet from the ground became a killing ground. One of the slaves was beheaded by the heavy round before they could even scatter, but their distraction allowed the slavers to run up, whooping as they decapitated a raider in appropriate response.

Glimmerlight forced me down as Brimstone took the bulk of the barricade’s metal plate and actually lifted it, similar to how he had done in the Stable. Acting as moving cover, he pushed onward with Glimmer, taking pot shots behind him. Keeping low, I ran to the side, screaming as I heard an energy blast sizzle close enough to char my tail until I dropped alongside Protégé.

“Clear the balconies for the relief force to push in and support us. They can flank beneath us on the other stairwell. Then it’s a straight shot with a cornered Barb.” He quickly turned to me. “You holding up?”

I wasn’t. It was an effort to barely stop myself from fleeing the brutal gunfight. But only the fear of being shot down really kept me in one spot. Only from my skin tingling did I realise that a leak in the skylight was dropping down. Glancing up, through the whizzing rounds and blasts, I could see the oddly skeletal shape of a platform below the skylight. Rain dripped around it, down upon me. Already, most of us were soaking again.

Seeing me clearly speechless, Protégé pushed me down with a hoof.

“Stay here! Just shout if you hear them flanking up behind us!”

Leaning out, he took a shot with his revolver before rushing forward, disappearing into the madness. Raiders were everywhere. Shots came from above, on the third level of the plaza, from either side in shop cells or directly ahead behind barricades. A scream went out, before I saw Muzzle Flare fall to the side, her neck punctured. Caduceus rushed to her, pressing hard on the wound while he dug out a potion.

But if I dared peer out, crying and whimpering as my ears threatened to deaden under the cacophony of chaos, I saw what Protégé meant. The balconies that overlooked where we'd come in were swarming. No relief force could come in that way under that watch! Around me, ponies, slaver and slave, pushed into it. Another of the six remaining slave volunteers went down, dropping just in front of my cover. Brimstone's advance was all that was keeping us going, along with Ragini diving from area to area, her wings carrying the journey while she sniped at those on the third level. I saw one fall from his balcony, wailing on his way down to impact in a growing puddle upon the floor. The thunder coincided with his impact.

Then the order came. We had no other choice.

"Everypony, charge! We need to clear the balcony! CHARGE! MOVE!"

I didn't know if that meant me or not, but his voice was commanding and definite. I saw raiders beginning to flank around us from the opposite stairwell. I had to move! Now!

As one, we broke cover, galloping into the maelstrom of incoming fire out of sheer need. One suicidal rush to clear the balcony and let the relief force in! Brimstone hurled the barricade, smashing asunder two raiders blocking the way with a captured tripod machine gun. Glimmerlight fired another energy grenade to the high level, ripping away a fence and blasting the two raider snipers away. I found myself behind Protégé and Caduceus. The latter was dragging the injured Muzzle with him, spraying fire from his mouth-held weapon. My master fired precise shots to all sides, but was limping and slowing down.

Rushing up, I forced myself alongside him, helping to keep him going. Terror gripped me so hard that I tunnel visioned ahead. Blood sprayed across me; Muzzle Flare inadvertently being the only thing keeping Caduceus from losing his head as her shoulder evaporated. Dropping the corpse, he joined our charge.

Everything became a blur, but before I knew it, we were on the balcony. Brimstone threw a raider off the edge, Ragini was fighting a raider with a knife, rolling across the floor with him. She had taken a bullet to a hind leg. Glimmerlight fell. My cry of shock stopped only as I saw she wasn't shot, but simply rolling under the balcony lip to stay in cover.

We were under fire from all heights and locations. Too much to take on. Most of us were wounded, the slaves were simply firing scared, but we had done it. We had cleared the balcony. Protégé leaned over, crying out so hard his voice broke.

"Relief team! Move in! MOVE IN!"

The slaver with the carbine battle saddle blasted a raider running up with a sledgehammer, making the buck catapult head over hooves. Another followed, and another. Brimstone intercepted them, engaging in combat with multiple attackers, his armour sparking from the rounds striking it. Their efforts were barely holding off the tide, a half dozen small combats as part of one greater whole to keep this one point clear. Below us, I saw movement at the shop cell. Reinforcements!

They spread out, getting ready to charge in toward the stairwells now the balcony wouldn't simply massacre them. About time too. We could barely hold this position any longer.

But then I had to wonder, why weren't they moving?

"Relief team! Stairwells! Now!" Protégé screamed, waving his revolver toward the ends we had moved up from. A bullet chipped off the balcony ledge, sending shrapnel to dig into both of us. I cried out, falling backward toward the fence around an already wrecked hole, clutching the side of my neck. My hoof came away bloody, and shaking horribly. Looking down, I saw the reinforcements just standing there, why were they—

Then I saw him.

Moving sideways through them, casually touring it and watching the brutal scene engaging the raid team above, The Master casually stepped to the leader and laid a hoof on his shoulder, before shaking his head.

Protégé gaped in astonishment.

“Shackles! Move in! Move in now!”

The Master merely turned, seeing the bleeding, wounded, and desperate Protégé trying to order the rest in... and shook his head. With that hideous grin, he simply stepped backwards, followed by the entire team that had been meant to support and reinforce us.

“SHACKLES!” Protégé’s voice barely seemed to carry now, as the reality sunk home.

We’d been abandoned... betrayed, left to die. Protégé had tried to keep him out of it, but he had come back. The slavers obeyed him.

“Where is the damned second team!? We can’t hold this!”

Glimmerlight ducked and swore. She was struggling to reload her rifle while dodging fire from a dozen sources. Ahead of us, emitting a blood curdling warcry, a wave of raiders, two dozen strong, erupted forth from the shop cells where they’d been hiding in the shadows, and charged us.

I flipped the mouthpiece of my battle saddle out, gripping it in my mouth. Protégé was already firing, his revolver slapping six shots toward the incoming mass. I saw Ragini blasted out of the air to crash onto the hard floor. Within seconds, she was firing with one arm on the ground with a steely look in her eyes.

Turning toward the raiders, driven by pure fear and desperation, I snapped the three shots I had off. One raider went down, the small bullet not even making him cry out before he struggled back up, nursing the dented armour plate he had stolen.

Brimstone Blitz hit them like a cannonball, crashing through them with a charge of his own. Even as he slowed under the impact, they swarmed him. Although gutted and crushed under his assault, they just kept piling on.

They had been hiding in here this whole time. They’d only left a few to defend the ‘fake assault.’ Like they’d known all along.

The slaves were torn apart, caught in the open behind us, and the snipers picked them off one by one. Screaming, I found myself chased by a raider wielding a knife. My shoulder felt cold and numb, images flickering into my mind as I saw his studded and pierced face bounding through the melee. Three shots landed beside me, making me fall on my back. The raider never got close, Glimmerlight, out of all ammo, swung her rifle into his muzzle. She swung her weapon to and fro, connecting with a couple heads, before being dragged down, screaming as a half dozen raiders piled onto her with clubs. My cry at that sight was never even heard.

Ragini tried to rise once again, but a gunshot snapped right into her chest, putting her on her back again, firing her rifle until the last shot with one hand at the oncoming raiders. Had her armour stopped the round? Oh Goddesses, was she...?

One by one, we were going down, overwhelmed and outflanked on all sides. I felt myself being picked up, thrown, and leapt upon. Yelling, begging, I lashed out and scrambled, but a hoof only slapped into my head, knocking me to the ground with a sharp pain and dizzied vision. A rifle went off near my head, almost deafening me. The battle saddle slaver was leapt upon, his throat torn apart until Brimstone’s ongoing brawl swept by him, taking the attacker off his back. He still fell, bleeding copiously.

Then, the unthinkable.

Throwing the last pony from his back, Brimstone rounded off... only for a shot to smash right into the front of his armour and penetrate. The big raider staggered, before a mass of other shots rattled against his armour. Heedless of friendly fire, they were shooting even while others rammed and attacked him. My throat was raw from screaming as I saw him fall.

Protégé, the last of us remaining on his hooves, spun, his revolver snapping off precise shots aimed via E.F.S. Raiders fell on every side, the last two shots even going high, bringing down two of the snipers. A series of clicks announced he was empty, leading to his backup pistol being drawn and blasting at those trying to close on him. That too ran dry. His face was a mask of fear, anger, hate, guilt, and yet he moved with absolute burning determination.

Screaming to the sky above through the skylight, whipping rain and lightning in the air around him, his magic lifted a half dozen fallen weapons, unloading in all directions, even as I saw him stagger from rounds striking off his armour. Raiders fell one after another, being knocked away or forced back. All weapons empty, he even smashed raiders in the face with his empty revolver, but for every one he struck, another two leapt forward, dragging, pulling, and finally striking. Finally, A club swung, and my master dropped.

Hoisting his, I hoped, unconscious body up, they cheered, yelling and laughing at their prize.

I had two grenades. I could... I could...

A brass hoof impacted on my head, and I could do no more but fall into the darkness that awaited.

An immense pressure was across me. A force, pulling me down and down. My legs wouldn't work, my neck felt sluggish to move.

A red glow washed across me, twisting and warping in abstract shapes to slowly come together.

I was in Fillydelphia, witnessing the shape of the great Wall before me, taller than ever. Dizzy, tired, and parched; I could only lethargically shift and moan toward it as the construct got higher and higher, growing from the ground while my own place of lying only got deeper. A monumental force around my torso, tugging and striving, holding me down and pulling me deeper into the crater. Across the lip and slipping further and further in.

I couldn't even scream. I couldn't cry out. My throat was burning, the radiation from the crater affecting me. Tasting blood, it dribbled from my mouth.

But there, ahead of me I saw a light. A shining beacon of hope that held itself amongst an aura of calming magic. It grew, rising and floating into the sky toward the top of the massive wall, now reaching the clouds and bending backward over me. Choking on blood, my lungs spasming and retching, I forced one leg to wave, to shout for help.

But the light only kept ascending, flying without wings toward the lip of the Wall and disappearing into the world beyond, never to be seen again.

The glowing heart of the crater only awaited me, every part of my body beginning to ache and shiver from radiation poisoning. My chest swelled up, the tainted lungs bulging and throbbing. I couldn't breathe. I was dro-dro... drowning...

The sickened last gurgling scream to leave my lips was only responded to by that one hated line, emanating from Fillydelphia as a whole.

...she didn't save you.

Everything began fading, a darkness beyond black creeping in at the edges of my vision, only being broken by one brief sight of somepony reaching out toward me, shining with an inner light. G-Glimmer? Coral? S-Sundial? Who was...

Every sense was brought into the horrid weight of reality by the slap across the face. My head twisted, coughing and spluttering on the taste of iron in my mouth. A sweet and sickly stench drifted into my nostrils. The back of my head felt wet.

"Wake up, filly. You've had your rest."

No. No, don't open my eyes. All a nightmare... all a nightmare... all a—

The second slap threw my head back down again. A thick lump on the back of my skull ached terribly, pounding on my brain.

"Oh no. No sleep any more for you, filly. Time to get up and face the music. Dreamland's too good for you."

I whimpered, curling my legs inward, striving to stay in the darkness, praying to wake up to somewhere else. Anywhere else.

"I said wake up!"

My head was lifted, pulling my entire body from the floor, shaken, slapped, and thrown back again. Two hooves clasped either side of my face, squeezing hard enough until I began to whinny and murmur in pain. My cheeks were being crushed. My jaw pushed too far to one side.

Finally, I opened my eyes to see my assailant. I knew who it was by voice alone, but seeing Barb's sick grin made me want to break down in tears on the spot. We were in darkness, an enclosed room. Around me were a few other ponies lying in various states of health. Some of them had died. One had been lying right next to me with open mouth and eyes, three curved knives embedded in his sternum. The gunfire had finally stopped, but other, more messy and sickening sounds had replaced it within the immediate vicinity.

Barb, however, gradually came into clarity. Upon witnessing him, I simply screamed.

The chieftain wore the carved skins of dark-coated ponies. Small lengths of flesh lay across his torso like crude barding, blending into the darkness. Draped across his shoulders, I could see the dark blood still sticking to the back of his neck. It settled across thin leather armour that bore carved designs of barbed wire running below the still wet skins. Held on his front hoof, a long blade seemed to pulse with dark magic. In the shadowy room, amongst corpses, I felt like I was staring at some sort of horrific, leering wraith.

Seeing my gaze flicker from side to side of his new sick attire, Barb chuckled, trotting forward, making my eyes go wide when the barding of skin rippled and flowed through the shadows around him.

"There we go. All awake at last. Like my latest fashion? Helps get the frenzy going, seeing their leader get 'dressed up'."

I was released from the telekinetic field, thrown to the ground and left to curl up in this macabre place. Barb's white teeth became clearer, as his grin widened.

"Actually, I was beginning to think we might have needed your little buckfriend to keep you alive for a while. Pity he's a little busy right now."

Another fleshy crunch sounded from outside, accompanied by a shocked gasp of pain and retching. Oh Caduceus...

"It really is quite lovely, you know? That satisfaction of seeing somepony rush blindly into your trap and just knowing you're going to have fun with them afterwards. Welcome to the kill room, little filly."

Glancing from side to side, shivering as each lifeless corpse stared back or was frozen in a horrified expression. They'd all died knowing...

"W-What do you want with me?"

"Oh, that question!" Barb seemed delighted, trotting in a circle waving his head with a smile. "I do so love that question, it always allows one of the better answers."

Backing away, I squeaked as I accidentally nudged into another of the multiple corpses in the darkened room. I could barely see, my vision wasn't adjusting in this odd half-light. Barb moved forward, his crisp white teeth showing with a mad grin.

"Which is simply... nothing."

"N-nothing?"

"Nothing at all. You aren't special to me, not anymore. You've done your part, stayed silent when I needed you to and got those keys. Oh no. Now you're simply the next in line for me to throw to my Shades. All bets are off now that you're here, filly. Must feel nice, knowing your life is about to become nothing more than a plaything to keep my Shades entertained. But that's what you get when you become our prisoner. Now get up, the game starts soon."

My only response was a wet cough and a weak of my head.

"Please, Barb, I... I..."

"If you're going to beg. Save it for the Shades." His eyes narrowed dangerously. "Begging won't help you now, but it will entertain them. Feel free to cry as much as you want then. They love that."

Already my eyes began to tear up, the stark horror playing its way into my head. We were trapped with raiders in a place nopony could get to, or wanted to get to. Betrayed and left to be captured. Feeling disbelief and horror threaten to overwhelm me, it took Barb actually pulling me with his magic to rip me from the ground and yank me outside, crying the entire way. When the light hit me, it became clear how little I had. I'd been stripped of everything. My saddlebag was gone, my battle saddle torn off and even my fleece had disappeared. I felt horribly exposed.

But what lay out of the room was so much worse.

That same hell I saw on my way in now lay around me within an old restaurant. Raiders screamed and whooped, laughing and savagely picking on the new influx of prisoners. They staggered or lay on the ground, their malnourished slave bodies unable to cope with the 'fun' the raiders were having. Others lay lifeless, just hunks of skinned meat hung over the balconies of the plaza. The remaining slaver who had charged with us was lying in a groaning, skinned heap, bloodied and stained atop the restaurant counter like some hideous, living trophy. A hideous cry went out, followed by a ripping sound of which I didn't want to guess the origin of. It had come from another backroom behind the restaurant's kitchen where blood now seeped out of the doorway. Knowing Barb's new 'armour', I began to feel distinctly sick as to what that rip and agonised cry was.

Yet as I sought them out immediately, I felt momentary relief at seeing each friend alive.

That was about where the good news ended. My eyes first saw Caduceus, dropping across the floor, his snout broken and leaking blood. Three raiders rushed around, laughing and picking him back up again. The nurse limply let his head drift from side to side, clearly nearing unconsciousness. Glimmerlight was here, but kept contained in an old rusted cage on the other side of the room. One of her eyes was swollen, closed over as she lay on her side, breathing very thinly. Brimstone and Ragini were near her, both kept chained to the ground on thick manacles that the raiders had hammered into the concrete floor. Even as I watched, raiders were taking it in turns to rush in and strike the trapped warlord, laughing as they dodged his return attacks, constrained by the chains. His fury was clear to see.

Protégé was nowhere to be seen.

“Eurgh!”

There was another hard crack, as a raider bucked Caduceus in the stomach. The buck doubled over, blood spraying from his mouth. I tried to run to him, attempting to help him up. I felt his hooves latch onto me, shivering and desperate, turning his face to exhaustedly look at me.

“Murk... run. Run, Murk...” He tried to gasp, now trying to push me somewhere, too beaten and dazed to think straight. But magic gripped my midsection, pulling me back. Our hooves separated as I tried to keep a hold of the pony who’d kept me alive in the battle. Barb sauntered among the entire scene, absent-mindedly tugging me with him. Below us, I could hear the slaves we had secured being rounded up and herded. Across the room, some of them were cowed in the corners, the light grey of Coral between two other mares was clear to see. She was unconscious.

“Welcome to our little playhouse, filly. Course that play only goes one way, not that we exactly care. Hey, boys! Filly’s up!”

My blood chilled as the raiders, bearing bleeding piercings and crude bloodied warpaint swung up, cheering and moving forward toward me. I saw Glimmerlight’s head rise sharply at my presence, before pushing her hooves against the cage.

“Just leave him be! He doesn’t deserve anything in here!”

They didn’t care. Reaching me, I found myself being shoved from raider to raider. One of them grabbed me, pointing at me.

“Leave him? He shot me in the fuckin’ chest! Big bruise there now, ruined me favourite plate! Who’s to say I dun get my revenge, eh?”

He shoved me to the ground, teeth clamping onto a wing. Hidden from Glimmerlight by the crowd, I heard her scream for me, only louder as my own shriek of terror echoed above it, high pitched and pleading.

“Leave them alone, for now.” Barb waved his subordinate away. My wing snapped back into its deadened held state, aching from the movement. I felt the stiff ligaments grind under my skin. “Get him in a chair, we’ve got a warm up to do first. Time for a little Six-Shooter Surprise while we wait for Shackles, boys!”

The bellowing roar momentarily deafened me. I was hoofed across the face, dizzied and dragged across the floor to be pressed against a small bench. Coarse rope was wound around me, cutting off circulation and rubbing at my skin. It was soaked in rainwater from lying under a leak. The storm was still raging, with more and more water beginning to trickle through the roof and puddle on floors or the plaza. I could hear the broken frame of the skylight banging in the wind, and hear thunder smashing its way across the sky, punctuated by lightning that gave the raiders a terrifying, demonic appearance.

“Murky! Murky! Are you alright? Did they do anything!?”

Glimmerlight’s voice shouted toward me; if I strained my neck I could just turn my head to see her cage. The mare was pressed against it, looking through one eye to check on me. They hadn’t, but there was another problem bubbling up inside me.

“I n-n-need my RadAway, Glimmer. It’s getting worse...”

I could feel my throat searing and aching from more than just swallowed rainwater. The cough I followed up with only helped prove it. I had two sachets in my saddlebag, but wherever that was I didn’t know.

“Oh, I’m so sorry, Murky... just stay strong. I’m here, alright?”

“HAH! Not for long!” One raider hoofed her cage, before leering in, his eyes clearly not on her face.

Hissing back, she struck the cage toward him with a fiery backlash of anger. The raider only laughed, trotting on to help with their set-up. Holding a hoof over her damaged eye, my dear friend just silently pleaded with her eyes to me. The words clear: we’ll get out somehow.

The raiders pulled a single small table out with two hard wooden chairs either side. All the rest were removed, thrown away or over the edge until they had an area left over. Cries went out for ‘the first two!’ Chants and bellows of choosing went. I heard “The filly!” a few times, or “The traitor!” Barb, presiding at the middle, waved his hooves to take it all in.

“You all know the rules! The leader gets first pick, then we’ll let you all vote on the lucky two! First round! I say...”

His eyes cast about, from me to Glimmer, then they rested on Brimstone before looking back at Glimmerlight. He grinned, before turning to point at the one surviving slaver.

“Let’s have him! Don’t we all remember him throwing food across old Rusty Nail? Let’s bring him in to see how brave he is now he’s in our world!”

A cheer went out, the Shades dragging the struggling and shouting slaver toward the table. Immediately they began chanting.

“Next! Next! Next!”

Barb’s eyes settled on the impassive Brimstone, then again on Glimmerlight, before grinning wickedly. Oh no. Oh no.

Then his hoof shot to the side, away from her. “The griffon!”

But Ragini would not be taken so easily. The moment they approached her, the griffon lashed out, scything her talons across one’s face and even beating her strong wings to slap them back. Laughing, Barb hopped down from his perch to look at her.

“Still so resistant, featherbrain. What? You think you’ve got a hope? You think someone’s coming to save you?”

“Stern’s wing are going to waste you all. I can grin knowing you’re going to be taking an anti-machine round to the head very soon.”

“Oh?” Barb chuckled, accompanied by the raiders. “But you see, dear griffon, they aren’t coming. I’m sure you’ve noticed that I’m no idiot. You think I’d have started this if it were anything but a completely controlled move? Do you not remember Shackles casting you and your beloved master to us? Oh no. Right now he’ll be out there telling the griffons that all is fine! That I’ve agreed to negotiate with him and end the violence. Sure we might get a little punishment, but we’re a tough lot. Only now, there won’t be any Protégé in power, he’ll be long dead by then.”

Ragini struck out, her claws whizzing inches from Barb's face. The raider didn't even move.

"Really, you all played your part so well in our plan to get Shackles in power, where ponies like me will benefit so much under his protection and interests. Poor Protégé, the prodigal 'son' of Red Eye, cut down while foolishly leading a suicidal mission against me. Only for Chainlink Shackles to show his worth by ending this with words. He'll be praised. Really, did you all honestly think I didn't know about that side door? Really?"

Fury swept Ragini, and with a loud cry, she leapt forward. One of her chains broke from the wall, her outstretched talons sweeping across Barb's face. Forced to dodge, he recovered his posturing as fast as he could, but everypony had seen him have to react quickly. It broke the spell of arrogance.

I knew his anger when he was forced to have to react. A dangerous tone cut into his voice.

"Oh, big mistake, griffon. Big mistake. No, you're not going in the game, you get to suffer. To suffer the worst thing any flyer could ever have."

His eyes looked to the side, finding me. Then he grinned, getting an idea.

"...pin her down. Break her wings. This bird won't fly ever again."

Ragini struggled immediately, pulling on the chains, slashing out. From nearby, I saw raiders pulling over an old iron block along with a sledgehammer. My sides felt like they had a phantom ache, tears springing into my eyes. The imagery of a slave master holding an anvil and a hammer ready, of being dragged toward it prime in my mind. I wanted someone to stop this. Anyone.

But nothing could. We were simply their toys now.

Even as it began, I struggled helplessly, trying to hide my own wings out of fear alone. Barb only sat beside me on the bench, holding my face toward Ragini as the raiders pinned the large creature down, pulled out her first wing, and swung.

I hadn't known griffons could scream that loud.

Hideous minutes passed. Each crunching impact making me cry out and try to look away. But he held me there, looking like some haunting demon overseeing his pit; one hoof despicably caressing my wings to just remind me. The piercing cries of the griffon echoed all around the plaza, going on and on. Barb only chuckled, delighting in the 'performance' before finally signalling them to stop. Each wing, pulverised and broken beyond repair, drooped at her sides. She was controlling her expression, holding back tears and refusing to give them the satisfaction, but I knew that look, that horrible realisation of what she had now lost. Ragini had never liked me, but I quickly began to feel only I would really understand her pain right now. Very quickly, I saw her seem to pass out on the spot, the agony overwhelming her.

"Well, well, well! A nice warm up! Now back to the event. We'll need some*pony* else now! How about..."

Scanning his eyes across, I saw him clearly tempted by Brimstone. The warlord just met his gaze, as though daring him for whatever sick game this was. Barb only grinned, changing his glare to Glimmerlight. His hoof shot out to the side again, just like before, like he knew it was taunting me.

"The mare's new little boy-toy! Bring him up here!"

Caduceus, held up by two raiders, reacted with shock, trying to push backward. But they closed around him, dragging the buck over to the table where the slaver was being forced into the seat and held at gunpoint. Glimmerlight bucked the cage, crying out to him. I did too, but all I received was a hoof to the skull. Crying out in pain, I only briefly saw them pushing Caduceus into the chair before Barb silenced them again.

“Six! Shooter! SURPRISE!”

Another resounding cheer.

“As I said, something to keep us all entertained while Shackles sorts out the talks with the griffons! So for those six-shooter virgins out there...”

A raucous laugh from the raiders.

“...the rules.”

Protégé’s revolver slammed down on the table between them. It had been horribly customised and ruined. There seemed to be a new metal sheath covering the back of the revolver itself, preventing anypony seeing the contents of the chambers. His magic, dark shadowy and whispering, picked it up before loading a single round into it.

“You may recognise the idea similar to one many gamblers play with if they’re feeling a little extreme, but we take it a step further.”

The revolver snapped shut, spinning the drum wildly. He then held it between the two. Caduceus glanced at it, nervously watching the gun. The slaver was breathing heavily, easily calmer than the nurse. Caduceus, looking toward me and Glimmer, just shook his head.

“I don’t want to play your game! Look, I can heal—”

“Tough! You stood against us, so it’s you or him now! This gun’s going to spin, right? Whoever it lands on takes the gun and pulls the trigger against their own head. End of the match, somepony’s going to be dead, so who will it be? Slaver or nurse? Calm or nervous? You look ready to piss yourself, healer!”

The raider’s laughed again. Caduceus was wounded, sweating and tired. I could see him shaking. Please Goddesses, pull him through this.

“Please!” Caduceus thumped a hoof on the table. “There’s no reason to do any of this!”

“Shut up! You’re playing!”

The revolver whipped him across his broken muzzle, drawing a sharp gasp, and leaving Caduceus leaning heavily to one side.

I could feel myself wanting to shout support, but my throat was raspy, and I wasn’t sure if it even felt right. Him winning meant somepony else dying. There was no happy end to this. It was a decided game. One death, one survivor to whatever else the raiders wanted to do. The inevitability of it was heartbreaking. We were trapped in their deluded world, abandoned by sanity.

“Round ONE!”

Now their sick games were beginning.

The gun span in Barb’s magic. The raiders began cheering, just as a roll of thunder made the room shake. The table overlooked the plaza, blowing the two duelling ponies’ manes in the wind. The revolver sped up and spun madly, before slowing... turning... aiming...

...right at Caduceus. The gathered ponies whooped, laughing as I saw Caduceus gasp in horror. The poor buck had only come to help ponies. He didn’t deserve this! Shaking, he reached out his hooves, taking the revolver so lightly he nearly dropped it.

“Look, we can—”

“DO IT! DO IT! DO IT!”

“They want you to pull that trigger! Best not upset them or it’s kneecaps for you, lad! Hahaha!”

Whipping his mane, Caduceus took the pistol. Shaking, he began holding it against the bottom of his muzzle, pointing upward through his skull. Glimmerlight was pressing her nose through the bars, soundlessly moving her lips.

Whimpering, Caduceus closed his eyes, a hoof resting on the enlarged trigger.

Click.

The gun slammed down, Caduceus gasping and breathing hard, shivering intently. The slaver met his glare harshly, staying silent and preparing should it ever land on him. I squirmed, trying to move. Caduceus needed support, somepony beside him!

“Round TWO!”

Spin, spin, spin. The revolver travelled even faster, blurring before finally slowing down. Caduceus slammed a hoof on the table.

“Please! Stop this madness, before somepon—”

His watcher behind his chair rocketed Caduceus’ head forward into the table. I screamed out loud, stopped only as my throat lurched and spat blood across the chair. It kept coming, slight spray after slight spray. Bound down, it hurt my body, unable to properly move with it. Caduceus was pushing himself up, but I could see his eyes on me.

“Somepony. Get him RadAway... he nee—”

Another hoof cracked into his skull. Recovering from my coughing fit, feeling myself flush with heat and shiver in fever, I was awestruck. Here he was in the middle of this fiendish game, still following his oath.

“Maybe if you win... hehe. We’ll say that if you win, you can get him what he needs to survive. Sound fair, everypony? Nurse wins and the filly gets his medicine! Pressure’s on now, ‘Caddy’, hehe...”

The gun was still spinning, sped up again during the distraction by Barb. But now it came to rest on the slaver. Growling, the slaver picked it up, holding the barrel in his mouth and pulled the trigger quickly while roaring in anger.

Click.

Slamming the gun back down, he shook out his black mane.

“Fucking game. Fucking raiders. Fucking sick bastards!”

The game did not stop. The gun spun. The gun stopped. Once again, it faced the slaver who swore, pounding the table with a hoof. Snarling and knocking back a raider who tried to force his hoof, he just picked up the gun and held it.

“Fuck... fuck... fuck...”

The gun was raised to his head.

“FUUUUU—”

Click.

“—UUCK!”

Crying out, punching a hoof up on sheer terror-filled adrenaline, the slaver celebrated in sheer relief.

“Half way down! We’re into the home run here, my friends!” Barb announced, waving a hoof in grand fashion. Lightning lit him from behind, flaring him into a mad silhouette, that skinned barding becoming beaded with raindrops that sizzled on the dead flesh. His magic pulled the gun from the slaver, leaving him to breathe out, snarling a sudden grin at his ‘opponent’.

“One in three, nurse. One in three...”

Caduceus just sat and stared at it, looking on the verge of breaking down completely. The gun began to speed up again, but I saw him only now turning to look toward Glimmerlight. The two just stared at one another, sharing unspoken support in the middle of this hellish nightmare we had been trapped in. I kept trying to think of ways out, But there weren't. Nopony was coming for us until we were already dead. We had no way out... no way out.

The gun stopped facing Caduceus again. I heard his near silent whimper of fear. He was putting on as brave a face as he could, but I could see his cheeks stained with stressful tears. Turning, he saw me looking, even though my building sickness, I made sure to keep my eyes on him, trying to offer what pitiful support a coward like me could.

But his face hardened upon seeing me. I could see the look in his eyes. Barb had promised him a chance to get me RadAway if he lived. That was just the little bit of hope we needed. Come on, Caduceus!

Steeling himself, the buck turned, sweeping up the gun and planting it under his head again. Breathing deeply, closing his eyes, he seemed to go utterly calm. Raiders were chanting, the slaver was thumping his hoof on the table, as though getting caught up in this.

He pulled the trigger. Ever so slowly I saw the gun move. react and—

Click.

The cheer was enough to make me whine in pain at the noise. Raiders were taking bets, bets of all things from caps to ‘turns’ with prisoners. One mare seemed particularly eager to get a hold of Caduceus if he won. I wasn’t sure he appreciated it much, falling to lie his head on the table, hyperventilating in shocked relief.

Suddenly, the slaver didn’t look so calm.

Glimmerlight was pressed against the bars, watching with a hurt look. We shared a glance. This was coming to its end. Caduceus had survived one more round. It felt like a fall into madness, praying that somepony else got the bullet, but he was our friend!

“Next round!” Barb announced, the gun spinning for an incredibly long time. Finally, it began slowing, twisting, and sometimes accelerating again to draw out more thunderous stomping from the raiders. Even the raiders below us watching the doorways were cheering as they waited to hear the bang.

Slowly, dreadfully, it pointed back at Caduceus again.

I heard Glimmerlight scream out. “You can do it! Trust! Trust in something! You can still win this, Caddy!”

He was shaking so much, hooves cradling the revolver, looking across at Glimmerlight. I could hear his voice stammering.

“One more... fifty percent chance. Oh no... ”

“Come on! Do it! DO IT!”

The raiders joined her, but for their own reasons.

“Go, ya coward!”

Finally, shakily, it went up to his jawline one again. His eyes looked sideways at me, before becoming determined, beginning to utter something, a healer’s oath...

“We pledge to the Princesses... to the Ministries as one... to Equestria as a whole...” He began reciting. “...we of the Ministry of Peace choose to suffer any hardship to bring healing to those who need it; who require our aid, be they pony or any creature. Kindness in all things, strength to carry through and let those in need know we have the courage to stand in the line of fire to save them!”

Raising his voice, shouting above the raiders, he took one last look at the slaver before him, who was already beginning to look nervous.

"I may have been born long after a time such an oath was meant for, but I see ponies in need of my skills. I will find the courage to stand up for them! Weathervane taught me that much; to go through fear to find the chance to heal!"

Glimmerlight could hardly look prouder, smiling, crying, nodding her support to him. He could do this. Come on, one last chance! One last—

BLAM!

Every sound ceased, other than the echo of the revolver going off slamming back and forth between the plaza walls.

Slumping forward and to the side, his body fell off the chair and collapsed lifelessly upon the ground.

Glimmer's voice reached my ears before I could even take a breath, a drawn out wail of horror and loss. My own cry strangled itself on my rough throat, the effort forcing me almost to unconsciousness and feverish fainting. My eyes were just locked on him on the floor. Just... b-but no warning or... or goodbye...

The raiders whooped, laughing and stomping. Bets changed hooves. The slaver cheered out, throwing his hooves in the air, slamming the table in jubilation. Brimstone merely lowered his head, snarling with barely repressed fury. Barb took centre stage, recovering the gun.

"And just like that it's over! What a round! What a surprise for the good doctor, eh?"

I'd lost a friend before I even got to properly know him, through the most unfair and random chance possible. The wastes claiming another good pony without regret or reason. He was gone.

Just... like... that.

"NEXT! ROUND!" Barb, loud and proud, was demonstrating all the presence of the leader now, the shadow left to lie silent. My tears wouldn't stop coming. I kept remembering the scant day or so around Caduceus, another pony who had been kind to me, torn away by some stupid reason! I'd been starting to really like him, with that polite and professional attitude, the way he wasn't afraid to just give me a hug or take care of me even when he knew he shouldn't be away from the hospital...

He'd risked his life to save us...

Now Fillyldelphia had left him as just another corpse. That same body that was now being heaved over the balcony to fall into the half flooded plaza below. Glimmerlight was calling them every name under the sun, banging the cage. Even Brimstone took a swipe at one raider who got too close, sending him smashing back into the others. They just laughed. They didn't care about anypony! Feral and sadistic, they just danced in the mania of their hellish world.

He couldn't be just gone like that. It wasn't right, it was too early! He was meant to survive! To escape with us!

"No..."

"Now who's next? How about I let you lot choose this time, eh?"

Immediately, the crowd began chanting. I saw Ragini wake up from the noise, moaning in pain as her ruined wings spasmed or tried to move. The raiders threw hooves in all directions, calling for who they wanted. Some pointed at slavers they hated, others at slaves who they thought would be funny. Many crowded to get Brimstone in there.

But there was one or two names meaning the same pony above all of it.

"FILLY! FILLY! FILLY!"

"PEGASUS! PEGASUS!"

Barb pretended not to hear them, amping them up like some troupe leader, before he finally rounded and pointed at me, his flesh cloak wavering around him.

"The little runt it is!"

Their cheer almost drowned out the thunder itself. The rain had only gotten harder, the ongoing thumping of it hitting the ground merging with my shivering and matching the sudden increase in terror I felt. Under the hiss of rainfall, I felt hooves clasp over me, tearing my bonds free. I heard Glimmerlight scream for them to let go of me and heard Brimstone bellow. They were not kind, not respectful, and filled with a frenzied mob mentality. I screamed again, feeling myself being born aloft by them and carried to the now bloodstained table and chair. Hooves grabbed or pushed me all over as they massed around to force me in. My wounds were grasped, making me shrilly plead and push back. Many of them imitated my high voice. One even spanked me with a hoof, getting a big laugh for my reaction. I felt so powerless.

My rump landed on the sticky seat. I tried to push away, but they were insistent. Then the barrel of a rifle was pointed against my cheek.

"You try to run, we don't kill you, filly." Barb spoke from behind the riflepony. "We'll only stop ya running. Trust me, we can do so much worse if entertainment isn't our business. I'm sure there's a few ponies in here would just love a pegasus. You know what they call wings? Handlebars!"

The sick joke made them roar in laughter Whining and curling up on the seat, trying to cover every part of myself I could, I could see Glimmerlight trying to buck open her cage again, with little luck. Brimstone was striving, pushing against the wall with all his might, but the chains were in deep. He fell to the ground, panting and trying to build his strength into aching muscles.

"Our next challenger! Now who shall we get to face him?" Barb swung around, brandishing the revolver. "I said I'd let you choose, but may I offer a recommendation?"

The raiders went quiet. They were too excited, too hyped up to worry about who got what now. This was their pay off, for weeks of waiting without opportunity to really cut loose, and I was in their sights. But who would they—

"What about... his master?"

My heart skipped a beat. Amongst a colossal cheer that shook the very roof with their stomping, one of the doors leading out of the restaurant onto the second floor of the plaza was knocked open, a sorry sight being dragged in. Protégé had been horrendously beaten, barely able to even trot as they shoved and pushed the normally so proud unicorn in. Seeing me sitting opposite the table, he just scowled at them.

"You won't achieve anything with this!"

Barb chuckled. "On the contrary. I don't want to. We just want a good time! Win or lose, one of you are not going back to your bed tonight! Now, get in the seat and we'll begin..."

"We can— URGH!"

One of the raiders, a sickly yellow mare with an old grenade pin through her nostrils, slammed a pipe into his back legs. My master went down, before they began pulling him across to the table. I wanted to run around it, to help him, but the rifle's cold muzzle still pressed against my neck.

"Now! Master or slave, which will survive Six Shooter Surprise?" Barb announced to the rest of the raiders. Protégé and I just looked at one another. This was... oh Goddesses lift me from this hell, this wasn't right.

Me or him. There was no way out of it.

One of us was going to die.

Barb spent some time building the raiders up into another frenzy of excitement. Many of the slaves were being forgotten, thrown in locked rooms or held down with chains and shackles. A huge portion of the gang had come up to view this match. Surrounding us on all sides, we were alone in a sea of raiders against the balcony of the plaza. Behind us, rain poured through the skylight, the wind making the Ministry Mare posters billow and whip around. Only through a small gap could I see Glimmerlight, Coral, and Brimstone at the back.

I couldn't stop crying, trying to not look at the gun, not wanting to imagine what we were going to actually do.

But Protégé would not be cowed so easily. He was unsteady on his hooves, but he still managed to summon a little strength to sit up straight and point a hoof.

"You're only allowing yourself time to end up dead, Barb! Talk with me. We can end this without any more blood!"

Barb simply leaned against the balcony, tossing his long dark blue mane out. Then he sneered.

"I've put up with this idealistic shit since the moment you woke up, kid. I'm a little sick of it by now. I know what you are. Shackles told me pretty clearly. I'm thinking that I can't stand to see one of Red Eye's nonces through this entire game. I'd rather look at the real pony behind the mask."

He nodded to four raiders.

"Strip him."

Without hesitation, they bounded forward, grabbing and pulling Protégé off the seat. He fought back, but the big burly earth ponies were far too strong. The eyepiece, something I was surprised he even still had on, was tossed aside, being taken by Barb. Then they began pulling, ripping at buckles, and forcefully tugging at his barding and clothing. Over the course of a minute, they pulled everything that signified his uniform I'd come to know from the poor unicorn, leaving me to watch in horror.

"I got it! I got it! Off ya come!"

There was a tear of fabric, and finally, the barding was torn away, ripping the last of his clothing off my master. Even the clasp for his ponytail was taken, letting his mane fall loose around his head. Shoving him over, Protégé landed in a puddle, wincing from the acidic liquid.

But he was no longer a slaver.

Before me, battered, dirtied, sleep deprived, and kept away from food by a combination of duty and captivity... I saw nothing but a slave. Those two deep red eyes just found mine, seeing my open mouth. He really was just like me.

Whipscars covered his body, even one old gunshot wound somewhere along his stomach line. Patches where his coat hadn't regrown properly were a lighter shade of black; the legacy of Fillydelphia's diseases. The large swelling from the sniper shot earlier was there too. He'd been through a life just like me. But one thing caught my eye, something I'd never seen before.

His cutie mark.

I saw a symbol that both hurt and inspired, that was both a dream and a trap. He bore upon his flank a brass coloured and simplified version of the symbol of Equestria itself, two arched shapes circling one another, while the red eye glowed at the centre between them.

To save Equestria. Under Red Eye. It was everything that he was, everything he dreamed, and everything that was controlling his life.

It was beautiful and yet covered in tragedy.

There was something off about it, though. That red eye in the middle didn't look like a normal cutie mark, it overlapped the circular shape, not quite in line with it.

I wasn't given time to think on why that was. What was now a slave before me was picked up, and hurled back into his seat. We were only a foot or two away from each other at this small table, almost like a staring contest. Barb chuckled, spinning the revolver absent-mindedly.

"There, there. Now isn't that better? Nothing between the two of you now. The one who hid his wings, and the one who hid his past, both out of shame. You can look right into their eyes, or even reach out for comfort if you aren't afraid to show it to all of us. We won't laugh... much. Now let's get to business. But, how about we up the stakes?"

The revolver's drum slid open, Barb inserting two bullets, one beside the other, before respinning.

"Two rounds, less free slots before somepony gets it. GAME ON!"

The revolver slammed down before us, before lifting and beginning to spin. I was quaking, looking to Protégé for help or advice or... or anything, really!

But he sat there, silent and as withdrawn as he could be. Stripped of his uniform and eyepiece, reduced back to a rougher and more hurt pony, he just didn't cast that same easy confidence anymore. Even so, he met my eyes, eventually speaking quietly.

"I'm sorry, Murk."

I gulped, nodding that I understood.

"I... I think it's... it's not you. The Master w-was going to d-do something anyway."

Barb rolled his eyes. "Oh... gag..."

The revolver started to slow. Protégé looked up at me, shivering in pain from the multitude of large bruising wounds on his side. "He what?"

Tears dripping, I fought to muster the courage. This could well be my last few minutes. I had to say, come clean at last, let Protégé know that he'd been assailed from every direction, not just by Shackles! To say that Grindstone was—

The revolver stopped spinning, pointed at me. My train of thought derailed immediately, making me shriek and fall backwards from the weapon. My watcher caught me, shoving me back toward it.

"No turning away! It's your turn, pick it up!" The raider forced my hoof forward, until I felt the heavy weapon pressed into my grip. How Protégé's magic fired this so reliably I'd never know. I held it, crying over it, feeling every wound throb and my sickness grow from the added stress. But Protégé kept staring at me, as though silently trying to offer any courage he could. No. He was still the pony I could look up to.

Slowly, I raised the gun, pushing the barrel into my mouth to help support its weight. I looked to Barb.

"P-please... d-don't do all this."

"Either beg louder so we can all hear and ignore or just get on with it, filly."

There was no negotiation. Whimpering, closing my eyes, my hooves graced the trigger, the feeling making me whimper. Around me, some raiders chuckled, beginning to exchange more bets. The intensity of the moment was making me sweat, an odd heavy heat in the air even amongst the storm whirling outside.

Please. Please Goddesses, please... please let me—

Click.

Dropping the weapon, I cried out, my hooves waving and holding my own face in shock. I hadn't even realised I'd pulled it! Oh Goddesses. Oh no... oh boy... I... I...

"The game begins! Round TWO! Five cylinders remaining, two of them loaded!"

"Murk!" Protégé spoke sharply as I lay my head on the table, crying profusely. My eyes actually hurt from tearing up so much in such a short time. My gasps were just raspy coughs. "Murk! Stay. Strong. The griffons might—"

"The griffons will do nothing, colt-cuddler. I told you when you woke up in the kill room! Shackles is having a little chat with them as we speak."

Protégé glared up, anger crossing his face, his surprisingly long mane waving around his head. "You trust Shackles? He saw fit to betray me, to betray somepony on the same side as him! What makes you think he won't just let Stern and her griffons go ahead with their raid to remove a troublesome lying raider as well!?"

"He fears me, boy. They can't catch me. He fears what I'd do if he tried. Everypony does —"

"Chainlink Shackles fears nopony! You don't ever consider yourself above him! That's his thing! He believes nopony is ever more controlling than he is! Your arrogance is blinding you to the— ARGH!"

The yellow raider mare made her presence known again, the pipe cracking against Protégé's damaged ribs. Barb nodded thankfully to her, before returning his gaze to the revolver. Slowly, it kept spinning, before finally settling on Protégé. My mas... or whatever he was to me, I didn't know, looked at it, before snatching it up in his own magic field. He took long breaths, hissing on each one, sucking the air in deeply. Simmering with frustration and nerves, he drew it up, turning the barrel against his own head before taking a breath.

"This will come to hurt you in the end, Barb."

I saw the trigger begin to pull... tightening... tightening. I didn't want him to die, he didn't deserve it! But-but I didn't want to either...

His face screwed up, gritting his teeth. The raiders cheered at seeing any sort of tension or fear on his face. Seeing the proud master they'd laboured under so worked up and working to stay strong at all. I hated this so much, this was wrong, twisted, humiliating and sick and wrong and terrible and... and—

Click.

Breathing out, sinking into the chair, Protégé let the revolver rest again, dropping it the last foot from his telekinesis. The crowd jeered the second round's failure to fire. Even Protégé was shaking on the spot, I could tell how much courage it took him to do that. The atmosphere was mentally straining on him as much as I, what with us backed against this wet and exposed balcony by a mass of raiders.

"One more down! Round THREE! Four cylinders left with two bullets! Half and half time until off it goes!”

It immediately began spinning again, making me shiver every time the barrel passed by me. I just tried to look at Protégé, to find the courage to speak up. But seeing that defeated look in his eyes, knowing he'd been abandoned to this with me. It hurt so badly. My own terror wasn't helping, of course. It was all I could do to not become a mewling heap on the ground.

The revolver began spinning harder. I heard the raiders pick up their bets, larger sums of cash or ponies being promised and exchanged. One wanted my wings when I died. It was going to happen even if I survived. The gut wrenching sickness of that was only held back as I saw Protégé's face staring at me.

“I'm really s-sorry, Protégé...” I began stammering. A feeling was building in me, one last thing I could do before we died.

“...Murk?” He seemed surprised, looking up.

“I lied to y-you.”

Barb's eyes met mine sharply before grinning. He knew it as much as I. We were both dead anyway, it wouldn't harm anything now.

“It... it was The Master who hurt me. I'm so sorry! I was just scared! Scared like I always am!” My head fell into my hooves upon the table, sobbing. “I... I knew this might happen... but he told me not to say! He threatened me! Scared me! I couldn't resist him! I could have made this not happen!”

It all came out, even as the revolver began to slow down, arcing past my eyes with its barrel, I just kept telling it all. About the Stable, about Grindstone, and about what The Master did to me. I saw Protégé just stare back, unable to tell if he was hurt or feeling pity.

Then finally, the revolver stopped moving... pointed at me. I broke down further, only to feel a hoof stretch out and rest upon the side of my head. Glancing up, I saw it was Protégé.

“You have nothing to apologise for, Murk.” His voice was quiet, soft, and shaky through the tension of the moment. “You know what I am now... what I was. To not know choice or a will of your own. I know that... I...”

His eyes closed, before I saw one single tear form.

“I've been through the same before I earned my freedom. Murk, do not feel guilty. I understand.”

Those two words, those two beautiful words that for the first time in my life really meant something. Friends had said it, masters had implied it, many had believed it. But for the absolute first time ever did I now see a pony, a born slave, who could truly know. I wanted to ask so many questions, to spend time and just... just share in that understanding.

But Barb's hoof slammed down, separating us and his magic tossing us both back into our seats.

“All well and disgusting to my eyes, doesn't matter now! Filly? It's your turn! Careful with that trigger this time.” He sneered, bringing me crashing back to the horrific reality we were stuck in. Fifty-fifty chance with this one, the same chances Caduceus had had. Oh Goddesses, if it were to happen now...

“Pick it up!”

“Please, I—”

“I said pick it up!”

“PLEASE! Don't do this! I don't want to d—”

“Pick it up!” The revolver slammed into my hooves, hard and stinging, tossed by his magic. Almost falling off my chair, my head twisting to avoid the impact; I saw Glimmer staring over, her eyes wet and a look of absolute horror on her face. She'd lost somepony already, we both had, but now she was watching another of her friends go through it.

"Do it!" Barb's hoof impacted on the table, making me shriek in shock, turning back to look at the gun. Crying openly, I began to pick it up properly, hearing the raiders chant to 'DO IT!' over and over. Protégé just looked on in despair, clearly frustrated and hurt beyond measure at the inability to escape this.

Slowly, tasting the metallic tang and residue from the last shot that killed Caduceus, I placed the barrel in my mouth. My heartbeat seemed to grow louder, thumping, growing faster as the panic set in. Whimpering, whining, I just sat and shook with my eyes closed. Part of me began to hope that I was even holding this right. The thought of not actually being killed outright made my entire body shiver in horror.

My hoof closed upon the trigger, the chant and beat of my heart only growing louder each time. Be brave. Be brave like Caduceus. My teeth chattered on the barrel, that loose one stinging even as I cried out and pulled the trigger, hoping it-

BLAM!

My head exploded into agony. My entire body fell away from the chair, and I landed surrounded by blood. Screaming, wailing, and thrashing at the immense searing pain that had blown through my head, as I clutched my hooves to my mouth and howled into them. The sound reverberated in the air, echoing and making my ears hurt even... even...

Quaking on the ground, the pain started to fade quickly, replaced with the harsh sound of my ears being assaulted by raider laughter. Above me, Barb stood with a second revolver that had gone off just behind my ears. The blood below me was from Caduceus.

He winked.

"Always gets them, every time!"

They simply laughed.

I broke down on the spot, the horror of the cruel joke and fake execution stretching my courage far past the breaking point. I didn't care if they even laughed at me any more. They would not let me lie however. Two raiders picked me up. I fought, trying to pull away. I cracked one in the shin, trying to pull myself nearer the balcony, but their magic gripped my mid-section tightly, pulling me back to the seat and returning the revolver to the table. My face felt sticky with Caduceus' blood from the floor. I could barely sit upright, crying and falling forward, my nose running and throat hiccuping painfully. Like a foal begging for something from their mother, I couldn't stop the simple wish from crying forth.

"Please just let me go!"

"Guess what? NO! HAHA!" The raider to my right knocked me in the head. Immediately before me, the revolver began spinning again. The game was still on.

"Round FOUR! Three cylinders left with two bullets! More bullets than not now, my friends! Get your intense bets in now for which one's gonna buy it first!"

"MURK!" Brimstone's voice bellowed above all of the raiders. "You can pull through this. Remember what I first said to you!"

The shout felt so rare, for Brimstone to offer any sort of cry amongst his old peers. But my memory, in a moment of strange accuracy, did remember the first line. I'd been a mess in the Pit, quivering on the spot in the presence of my icon herself. Terrified to die, in an inescapable position. What was it he had said?

"Put on a braver face there. Don't let them have the pleasure."

It wasn't the words that meant so much, it was the reminder. That one moment when I had been inspired beyond all others at the sight of the Stable Dweller escaping Fillydelphia before my eyes. A sobering thought, to face it with better dignity.

I could be braver... I could... I—

A knife descended into the table, narrowly missing my hoof. Broken from any recovery, I screamed, clutching my shoulder out of habit.

"Stop spacing out there, filly." Barb whispered into my ear, "I don't want my lot to have anything but you at your most terrified and pathetic. I know who you really are inside, so just let it out."

Whimpering, seeing Brimstone growl and stomp at his chains again, to absolutely no avail, I could sense his frustration. But Barb had me where he wanted me. The knife slid up my leg as he drew it away, causing another filly-like whine to emanate from my mouth. His audience was getting what they wanted, the absolute humiliation of two ponies. One of shattered pride, one of sadistic breaking.

The revolver was still spinning. Wavering in that shadowy grip. Finally, hauntingly, it came to rest upon Protégé. Breathing heavily and quickly, he just stared at it, his chest panting hard. Gripping it in his telekinesis again, the barrel raised.

"Barb. This won't end well for you. Shackles and Grindstone don't care for anypony but themselves! Even then they'll be in it for their individual benefit, I'll bet. You'll gain nothing from this in the end, that I—"

"Oh, get on with it!" Barb wickedly laughed, slapping the table. "Pull the trigger! Let's see how much of that big brain really can come out!"

Scowling, frustrated beyond measure, I saw his eyes return to me. Protégé still breathed quickly and harshly. Fighting to stop himself shaking, sweating enough that his mane was becoming bedraggled. He fixed me with a sad stare.

"If... if this is it, please, just one thing."

"...y-yes?"

He hesitated, his eyes momentarily avoiding mine.

"Then I... I hope my impression upon you was not that of a tyrant, Murk..."

It took me a few attempts to muster any words, my throat beginning to clam up. My vision was hazy, but I could still see those two pale red eyes sadly staring at me. Slowly, I shook my head, and I meant it.

"It wasn't."

Something softened in his expression. A sense of bittersweet relief.

"Then, perhaps that's one regret I can rest easy upon, should this be..."

Closing his eyes, gritting his teeth, the revolver pressed firmly on his temple, Protégé hissed deeply and took one great last breath.

"Don't lose sight. You can be free, Murk. I've never said it, but I know you can do it. My way or your own..."

I wanted to rush over, to grab hold of that gun and move it so badly, but a rifle barrel touched the back of my neck. I could only watch him, watch as he began seething at the mouth and pulling the trigger hard.

Click.

The entire gathering of raiders went stock still, before exploding in sheer excitement. Protégé simply sat, stunned. Every odd had been against the last empty chamber being next, but it had been. That meant... oh no... that meant—

"ROUND FIVE! SUDDEN DEATH! Two cylinders and two bullets! All bets up!"

This... this was it.

Behind me, knowing the stakes, I heard Brimstone lash at his chains. His legs were bleeding from the effort, harming himself in every effort to get free. Waving his raiders away, Barb gazed over at the massive figure.

"Oh don't even try, traitor. You couldn't break that metal in your prime fifteen years ago when we all had that big laugh, never mind as the washed up, old, and declining bastard you are now. What are you? Fifty five? Sixty? Hah, I made sure it's the same stuff we scavenged out of the yards. It goes right through the wall to hold on the other side too. You are not moving. Besides..."

He nodded to a nearby raider carrying a sledgehammer, the same they had used on the virtually unmoving Ragini. With a sick grin, the hammer swung around, impacting directly over the still bleeding bullet wound on his chest. Roaring loudly in anger more than pain, Brimstone still fell to the floor.

"Can't pull anything with a wound like that on your chest. Now, back to our game."

Barb grinned at me, seeing my look of horror.

"What? Oh, I'm sorry, was he your last hope here? That the big old Brim would swing into action? Forget it. Nopony's coming to help you. Now, time to spin the gun!"

Slamming it down again, the drama of thumping it before us never getting old with the raiders, I just gazed across at Protégé with tear filled eyes. I knew I was giving that pleading look to end this, to stop it all somehow, but I couldn't help it. It was the Pit all over again, the inevitable inescapability of it all crashing down on my emotions, turning me into a blubbing wreck.

For his part, my master just continued to stare at me, breathing hard from his wounded ribs and trying to keep my eyes focused on him rather than the gun as it moved achingly irregularly... side to side... spinning... spinning...

It began slowing.

"Murk, look at me."

I couldn't, the gun was—

"Look at me!" His authoritative tone returned, briefly.

My eyes snapped upwards to see Protégé with an intense look, ignoring all the raiders stomping around him, each trying to pry through for a better look.

"Pro-Protégé, I... I..."

"Just keep looking at me. Don't look at them. Don't let them get to you, Murk. Look at me."

The gun began to wind down, moving deathly slow in arcs to face either way. But my eyes avoided it at last, focussing on Protégé.

"You're a stronger pony than you know. You've come this far, Murk. Even if... even if something ends today, you can be proud. I'm proud of you."

"Please, I don't want to—"

The revolver barrel slowly moved just a bit further, achingly slow as it faced me...

...then Protégé.

...then back to me.

I didn't even move, I just stared at the inevitable conclusion. Murky Number Seven, that unlucky corruption of the number and victim to the life that had been nothing but toil and pain the entire way, all to end tonight at the barrel of a gun in my mouth.

To be born a slave, you know of only two endings. The quick execution that brings your life to a close, or the long sickness and exhaustion until you finally keel over on the job. I now knew which was to be mine. A life of slavery, given a flash of hope at the end, but finishing today.

Strangely, a form of clarity overcame me that... that I was somewhat okay with it. I'd screamed, wailing that I didn't want to die.

But the idea of a quick bullet to the brain, one flare and it all being finally over... all the pain, the starvation and sickness... finally peace...

My hooves lifted the gun. Slowly, I placed it in my mouth. Out of the corner of my eye, I could see Glimmerlight crying openly, battering the cage door in sheer despair. It hurt to leave her behind. Protégé too seemed pained that it was me and not him. Brimstone merely looked lost, like a part of what was helping him was about to disappear forever.

My hoof found the trigger. I didn't really want to go. Hope was still there, screaming in my breast to keep fighting, to look for some way out! I could escape still! I had... I had my friends all here! I couldn't leave them, I couldn't. I couldn't... but I had no say any more.

My wet eyes turned across all of my friends, imagining them all as much as seeing them. "...I'm sorry."

The barrel was pushed into my mouth more fully. I had to do this right.

'The mare, alone and searching for the one close to her, or hopefully having found him. They'd promised to come for me, they would be searching for the already dead...'

Slipping around the trigger, I began to push.

'Glimmerlight and Brimstone, the most unlikely pair of friends to ever grace the wasteland, their efforts to get out losing one of their number forever...'

With one last effort, screaming out as I did so, all the pain coming out, I pulled harder.

'Protégé, witnessing the one born slave who understood him killing himself before his eyes.'

Goodbye... goodbye all...

...and let it end.

Click.

Three seconds. That was how long it took my brain to process what had happened, but they lasted longer in my mind than I could bear to stand.

Nothing. It... it hadn't fired.

My scream faded, the gun dropping limply in my hooves. Protégé was awestruck, the raiders silent.

Then Barb revealed a bullet in his hoof, and grinned.

"Oops. Old habits die hard, hoofed the round when I last held the revolver, dumb filly. So..."

He narrowed his eyes, that mad grin spreading.

"How's it feel to have committed suicide and know you did it?"

I... there were no words. I just started shaking, realisation and horror beginning to take shape. My mouth quivered, eyes widening, unable to cry any more than I already was. Small, strangled sounds escaped my throat. I heard the revolver clatter to the floor from my shaking hooves.

I'd just... Oh Goddesses forgive me! I'd actually pulled the trigger.

It was the control tower all over again, only I'd gone over the edge. What had I just done? I felt anger bubble inside, at myself for knowing I'd been ok with it. To know that a part of me still saw that sort of thing as a nice, easy way out that I'd ever consider. Oh Celestia, that thought terrified me more than any raider.

What had I done?

Still shaking terribly, sniffing, and whimpering ever louder, I eventually just cried out, feeling a wash of self-hatred and shame come over me. I wanted to find somepony, to grab them and hold them, and just cry and cry. To curl up with Glimmerlight, or feel Caduceus' comforting grip or even just fall into Protégé's shoulder again, anypony.

"Aww, look at 'em! I think we upset the little thing, lads! Oh, I'm a bad pony." Barb cackled, relishing in the opportunity to just completely screw with my head and emotions. "But the game isn't over. We've still got one more cylinder, and I know there's still one in this time! You've got to keep playing little Murk. You don't get to cry and run away now!"

"I don't want to—"

"You will! Spin the gun!"

Following his own instruction, the shadowy magic began to pick up over the revolver again. Building speed, faster than ever before, the modified firearm began to whirl and blur on the spot.

"Round and round the revolver goes..." Barb chanted, the raiders joining in. "...who it'll kill, no pony knows! Last round! There's no tricks or jokes here. Just one bullet and a chosen pony!"

Even Protégé couldn't keep his eyes off the weapon, glancing up to me occasionally. From the look on his face, watching me pull that trigger had drawn harsh emotions from him too. But both of us were simply silent now, both knowing that the weapon would pick one of us.

Back and forth... round and round... barrel... grip... barrel... grip... barrel... grip...

Eventually, it began to slow. The barrel drifted more lazily, flying on the momentum of the spin and slowing after every turn. Heart in my mouth, tears and sweat dripping off my face onto the table, my eyes just stared unblinking at it. I couldn't do it again. If it picked me I knew I couldn't.

It was time, the barrel was stopping...

...pointed directly at me.

...before shifting, slowly, the last bits of energy to creep around one more half turn to point directly at my master.

I would have looked up, to gaze with apologies and words, fighting to know what I should say to him, whether I should thank him or just stay silent, or tell him that I was glad to have met him in here. That I'd try to remember him or do something for him.

But the barrel had one last tiny eek of momentum still. So slowly that it stretched every emotion to just see it gradually moving and juddering, before coming back to me and finally stopping.

It was me.

The raiders erupted into cheering and screaming. Bets were thrown back and forward already with the end result chosen. Arguments started, whooping and promises drifting between them. But I just sat and stared at the revolver. That same revolver that had stopped the closest bid for freedom I'd ever made.

Would ever make.

I felt myself shaken by the raider behind me, pointing a hoof at the gun. Shivering, I picked it up under duress of punishment, holding the weighty revolver in my hooves. This... this wasn't... no, it wasn't fair. I was supposed to escape...

Glancing upwards and unsteadily holding the gun, I saw Protégé only look sad; trying to maintain his posture under the oppressive atmosphere. The storm's wind circling in through the skylight whipped that mane across his face, sometimes hiding those pained eyes. He was a born slave, the one who sought freedom in, if anything, a differing story to my own. A grander story of the slave who rose out of the pits to be somepony more.

One I may have to now accept would go on while my own ended here, after finally having made a decision to come here to try and help ponies.

"We're all waiting, filly. Not going to show you're just a complete coward? Come on, you did it once. Let's see that brain matter fly! Probably the only flying you'll ever do!"

My master glanced angrily to Barb, taking the raider chieftain's glare without so much as flinching.

"You're nothing but a blight to all ponies, Barb. You think this is going to help Equestria at all? That there's some purpose?"

"On the contrary, I don't care. Equestria's dead and gone. Might as well get on board the fucked-up-train of the future, boy! I'm the conductor here and I say it ends here for him."

I had never seen my master scowl quite so much. Real, proper anger.

"I swear to you, raider, give me half a chance, and I wouldn't even care what your cronies did. That bullet would be for you."

Barb merely chuckled, patting Protégé's shoulder dismissively. "I think not."

He nodded to the clan, from where a dozen weapons pointed at Protégé immediately. Oddly, my master looked more to me than them, frowning.

"You so much as raise the gun to me, you'll be gone before you know it. We're rough and ready, but we aren't without our skill, y'see. Oh and filly?"

My hooves were still holding the gun, not wanting to move it to my mouth. I couldn't... but on the mention of his nickname, I looked up, quivering.

"Don't think about trying to hoof the bullet or something either. I can feel the weight of the round in it, or lack of, should you even try to remove it. Oh, that bullet's only going one place. Now come on kiddo. Get it done!"

The raider behind me began forcing my hooves upwards, ramming the barrel into my mouth and jarring against my loose tooth and swollen gums from their previous beating. Mumbling in pain through the heavy metal barrel almost choking me, I felt my hoof raised to the trigger and left to do the pushing on the strange, inverted customised grip. I was terrified my shaking would set it off, unwilling to apply pressure.

I didn't want to die.

I didn't want to die.

The well of emotion began surging up, hatred and shame that I'd pulled that trigger once, it only reminded me of that horrible voice deep down that always whispered, telling me about the one choice every slave always had to make it all end at last. To cast yourself into the oblivion and the embrace of the Goddesses and pray they'll forgive you for doing it. To even think it was still in there made me want to be... to be...

I did. Falling to the side, convulsing as my sickness crept up and left me in a fit of coughing and retching, my blood mixing with Caduceus'. I landed upon the floor, the revolver falling beneath me and clattering into the granite ground. Spitting red, struggling to breathe, my kicking hooves caught those trying to force me back up on the shins or knees. A wave of fresh terror approached as I felt myself almost go blind, eyes rolling back as the pain and tightness in my lungs and chest flared up. It lasted for some time, almost half a minute, before finally the convulsions passed, leaving me exhausted, bloody and dying.

was pulled up, my hooves fumbling below me with the revolver to keep it with me. They left me lying against the balcony, my back to the long drop and the storm above.

"I can't do it."

"Oh you will."

"I can't do it!" I screamed aloud. "I..."

Looking up with blood dripping from my lips, still shaking violently inside and liable to expire any minute without my RadAway, I caught Protégé's eye. I couldn't do this myself. I...

"I want... I want Protégé to do it. It's only one shot, he'd..." I sobbed. "He'll do it right..."

My master's mouth dropped open. "Murk, you—"

"Please!" I half shouted. "I... I can't do it. They'll only make it worse if... if I don't take the bullet. Please, just make it quick..."

The last words were nought but a whisper. But I saw him finally look at me, sigh, and nod. Barb chuckled again, trotting to grab the revolver from me. The raiders raised their guns the moment Protégé took it, guarding him.

"I think we'd all like to see this. The master forced to execute the one slave he really began to like? How wonderful! I almost wish I'd thought of it, filly. Now get to work my dear 'master.'"

Stepping aside, he waved a hoof for Protégé to approach me. Gripping the revolver in his telekinesis with a steady familiarity, the unicorn glared at the raider leader, before standing up. His eyes travelled to every raider there was, silently seeming to voice his disgust of them. Pointing their weapons back, they just grinned around the mouth grips. Slowly, keeping his head high, Protégé trotted toward me, and knelt down.

Everything other than the storm had gone silent. Each sharp sound of his hooves closing toward me like an individual movement closer to the end.

"Murk, I... I just don't know what to say."

Trying to calm my own shivering, I stared back toward him. The rain was dripping around us, itching and stinging, but that didn't matter now.

"S-sorry. I j-just couldn't do this... too scared of it... of it hurting. I never wanted to die badly."

"Nopony does. I... I'll make sure it won't hurt, I promise."

He pushed over, beside me. Without really knowing why, I felt myself leaning into him, and felt one of his hooves wrap around my shoulders tightly. I was so scared about what was going to happen, but it felt a little better knowing he was there when I couldn't even see my other friends through the crush of raiders, eagerly awaiting the sight they would be entertained by.

"Never wanted it to go like this. I regret I couldn't have, no... I wish I could have let you go, Murk. But, Master Red Eye—"

"I know."

Opening my eyes briefly, I saw him looking down, rainwater dripping from his mane.

"Born slave, remember?"

His mouth seemed to lightly curl up at my words. We were even... understanding. Slowly, I felt the barrel press lightly against my temple at a certain angle. Oh, so that was the better way then. I trusted him.

"I didn't want it to end this way, Murk. M-Master Red Eye gave me a chance. Stuck by me, kept me alive, and guided me to the freedom at the end. To make the choice for myself to go or stay. I... I wanted..."

Oh Goddesses. To see the pain in his eyes.

"...I wanted to do the same for you. I saw so much of myself from the moment we first met; when I told you that you needed to know freedom. I tried to give you what I could of it, give you choices. Allow you those reckless moments to roam free into the crater or the hospital because I knew it was teaching you the one thing that mattered. You impressed me so many times, more than anypony else. I won't forget you..."

Clutching tightly, I heard the trigger begin to move, shivering as the moment approached. I felt so sorry to put him through this. Oh, Protégé, but it just has to be you... I couldn't do this part myself.

The revolver's chamber began to move.

I closed my eyes, and clenched my teeth, gripping him tightly. And then...

Click.

Silence. Absolute silence. My eyes crept open, seeing the stunned look on Protégé's face as the gun did not fire. But even more was the look of abject shock from Barb. The leader stood among his raiders, where their jaws had dropped, some with their weapons drooping to the floor. They turned, looking away or between themselves as the reality of the moment finally landed home.

"...what?"

Barb looked from side to side, his dumbfounded slaves shaking their heads or murmuring. The guards were chattering to each other, did it misfire? A bad bullet?

"...WHAT!?"

Barb stormed forward two steps, fury overtaking his expression. Then he found my eyes, he saw my look. That cheeky look that meant I'd done something to the gun.

"You... you little! You did something when you had that gun below you on the ground! But the bullet was still in it! I felt the weight myself!"

Coughing once, I just glared back up, with a brief intense stare to Protégé.

"I didn't take it out..."

Barb's eyebrow raised, my eyes moving back to him.

"...I just moved it one chamber along."

Picking up on the momentum faster than any of the raiders, Protégé swept up, the confused guards rifles not immediately pointed at us. The barrel swept around, aiming as he spoke.

"Lucky number seven you sadistic son of a bitch!"

The revolver finally went off in an angry roar, lighting the entire darkened restaurant with the huge muzzle flare. Barb dove to the side. The bullet slapped into his shoulder, and hurled the chieftain back into the guard who had watched me. Dropping his rifle, Protégé's magic swept it up, dumping half the rounds into the ground with a painfully loud burst of echoing gunfire, sweeping just in front of the raiders on the floor. The sparking rounds made them lurch backward, clearing away from us. He began pointing it back and forward at them before they got their own ones up from their confusion.

"Don't move! Anyone wants a shot, you'll get one to the face before it kills me!"

Finally, their weapons were re-aimed, the wounded Barb hissing for them to keep us guarded. Protégé backed off to the balcony barrier, pulling me behind him. His eyes left none of the raiders, swinging the rifle back and forth rapidly.

"You stupid buck. You stupid, idiot colt-fondling little fucker!" Barb bellowed, limping forward, his shoulder bleeding rapidly. "You think you can pull something? We've got you covered! You two are fucking dead for this! You've got nowhere to go! Nothing but half a mag left and no plan worth a damn that won't have you caught and tortured till I make you scream like the filly!"

We were backed in, the raiders advancing till we were completely surrounded. Our backs to the wall, Protégé keeping me guarded behind him. I felt the wind behind us off the plaza balcony, the long drop, swirling banners, and lashing leaks of rain to our rear providing a violent backdrop to our shaky position from the perspective of the raider gang keeping us trapped. Protégé ground his teeth, valiantly keeping me defended before the thirty or so weapons aimed directly at our precarious little position.

My master's eyes glanced from side to side, the rifle following them, held close even in his magic field. Barb only sneered, but Protégé remained steadfast, working through with nothing but desperation. Then I caught him out of the corner of his eye, a little glance and curl of his mouth.

"Maybe you're right."

To my horror, he raised the gun upwards, the wind blowing at his mane ever more violently, as though giving up. But before Barb could even shout the command to take us, Protégé pulled the trigger. Half a magazine's rifle rounds soared upwards, shattering the skylight and punching toward the roof.

"Maybe we have nothing..." he began to speak softly, "...but maybe neither do you. I told you, Shackles isn't going to fear you like anypony sane would. You're wearing my eyepiece. I'm surprised you haven't been wondering what that little counter at the top is. The one that started counting down from sixty about fifty minutes ago when I set the timer."

I saw Barb's eye flick up, before scowling.

"What of it!?"

"Sixty minutes to end this before the griffons came in. I'd hoped we'd last the full sixty before now, so you've sort of forced my hoof a little."

Then he smiled.

"I'll bet those griffons are up there right now around the skylight, preparing to raid. And I just gave them a good reason to go ten minutes early."

Barb's mouth opened to bellow a command, but it was lost amongst the explosive chaos that Protégé had lit the fuse to.

A great roar of detonation bellowed through the plaza from above. One whole section of the skylight blasted in, sending millions of shards of glass cascading down amidst the rain and smoke. As one, a dozen griffons dropped in, firing as they came into the mass of raiders that had so conveniently gathered in such a tight cluster around Protégé and I.

We dived to the ground, Protégé dragging me below him as the massive anti-machine rounds tore through the raiders, two or even three in a line. Barb had disappeared almost instantly, his raiders falling to the ground in droves. The griffons whirled in the air, rounding off and dodging the little incoming fire to let their second wave divebomb in after them under the cover of the first.

Protégé grabbed a broken and fallen rifle, tugging the magazine off for his own before opening fire, knocking one raider off her feet while she galloped for us. Firing in short bursts, he held the raiders off me, keeping me safe behind the cover of the balcony. Even so,

I still managed to turn and buck one raider really hard (by my standards) in the only place I properly knew how. My little hooves got right in between the legs to deliver a satisfying crunch, the raider going down, his voice as high as mine. (Karma, for once!)

The incoming griffon fire was less now that the raiders had rushed off in all directions to take cover. Many griffons had landed on the opposite balconies to snipe across. Heavy rounds rocketed above us, decapitating raiders and chewing the restaurant to pieces. I hoped they knew to watch for us.

“Murk, careful!”

Two raiders turned their guns on me, hiding low themselves. One snapped back from Protégé’s last round, the second snapped away, before re-aiming, snarling.

An azure light overtook his weapon. Every pin, nut, bolt, and part coming apart in his mouth until he was left with nothing but a trigger (that he still pulled, in dejection). The barrel upturned, smacking him in the face. Behind him, Glimmerlight’s horn glowed from the cage, before she began screaming at me to get to cover. Both Ragini and Brimstone had grabbed whoever was nearest, talons or massive hooves ending their lives quickly.

Three others attempted to rush together. But a magical spark and crackling sounded out, before a blast of overpressure blew across the room. The three were sent spiralling through the air, along with multiple chairs, clean off the balcony edge to tumble to the ground. Coral Eve, exhausted, her horn blackened around the tip and barely able to stand, snarled at the results of her telekinetic wave blast.

The combination of griffon fire and our efforts within the restaurant had mostly cleared it of raiders in less than a minute. Most had fled or died in the initial barrage, but it was almost ours! One sniper shot missed a raider, making him duck down and scramble to two of his comrades behind a table. Continuing on its path, the shot snapped one of Brimstone’s chains. Free to bring more weight and strength to bear, the warlord began tugging, making the concrete crack behind him on the remaining chain across his foreleg. Pent up rage, anger and frenzy was oozing off him, so much so the big pony seemed able to ignore the wound upon his chest. It quickly became clear how he’d stayed at the top of the pack so damn long.

“Get him!”

Three raiders, dodging under the incoming fire that made everything above the thick balcony wall a killzone, took aim at the escaping Brimstone. Then, with a mighty roar, the last chain sprung free, swirling around as he pulled the entire thing from the wall, a massive chunk of concrete with it. The large rock pulverised the raiders, smashing one’s head and cannonballing through the other two. Bellowing his warcry, their old leader stormed into them, wielding the two chains in his forehooves like flails that snapped bones and tore at flesh.

With Brimstone free, even wounded, the battle swung so hard in our direction that it lasted little more than a few more seconds. Protégé signalled to the griffons, who raised their rifles in recognition before soaring off to hunt down the remaining raiders.

The restaurant was clear.

“We... we did it... we did it!” I fell to the floor, gasping from exhaustion before rampantly coughing. Springing free when Brimstone shattered the lock, Glimmerlight immediately galloped to the restaurant serving window. Throwing bags and satchels to the side, she seemed to know where they had kept their loot. Feeling my chest tighten, I only caught a brief glimpse of her charging across, her magic already ripping open a sachet. Grabbing and hugging me tightly, pushing the opening to my mouth, I grabbed it and let the rank orange taste fill my mouth. Faster than I'd ever done, I downed the liquid, simply leaning in and holding Glimmerlight in return.

Up close, I could see the marks, swellings, and bruises brought back fresh since the healing potions we'd found. Around us, Brimstone and Protégé began to scavenge our weapons back, while other griffons arrived to secure Ragini and free her. I could hear them gasp in horror, swearing revenge upon her attacker.

But Glimmerlight and I just held one another, unable to really say anything. We both knew the reason, who we were mourning together. Blinking open one eye, I saw Coral Eve watching us, seeming surprised, startled even at the way Glimmerlight was acting. But seeing me look back, she simply turned away, looking ready to collapse.

A streaked white griffon landed beside Protégé, scanning the doorways with his rifle.

"The slaves have moved further into the plaza. We'll take it from here, sir. They won't get out of here alive."

"No! The raiders have moved in, but they have taken slaves as living shields. Remember the difference! Your assault will only—"

Protégé argument was cut short. Gunfire broke out out on the plaza again, further back and around the corner, an area only used for simple slave living space. I hadn't even really been there before. I'd only seen it briefly from the stairs. But it was a dead end, a last stand the raiders had retreated to.

"No survivors! That's the orders from the top, Protégé! Stern's up on the roof if you want to check with her! They ruined a sister's wings. They will die for this!"

"Not every slave is—"

The griffon took off, leaving Protégé stamping in frustration.

"DAMN YOU!"

My master, bleeding, tired, and still shaking on sheer adrenaline, swung away from the griffon's as he began to grab what ammunition for his revolver as he could.

"Not on my watch. Nopony else innocent will die today! If Barb is taken down, the rest will likely surrender, right Brimstone?"

The gruff raider nodded curtly, fishing around the loot the raiders had acquired. His brass hooves were returned to him for now, as was my pack, fleece and battle saddle (Thank the Goddesses!). He also located a few healing potions, just enough to get everyone stabilised. Brimstone himself took one for his chest wound, stamping the ground as his strength returned.

"Not if. When. I'm going to crush that little upstart."

The name earned him an odd glance from Protégé. Somehow, I felt he had chosen it on purpose to wind up the slaver. But they nodded to one another, knowing that at least the two of them would go this extra mile.

No, not alone.

We both knew we had to. Slipping my fleece, weapon, and saddlebag back on, I joined Glimmerlight as we trotted forward as well. The unicorn was retrieving her rifle and some scavenged ammunition. A green magic energy pistol lying on the ground was added to her hoof holster in replacement of the sidearm she'd carried in and lost.

Barb had done too much, hurt too many. I wasn't any good in a fight, but I wasn't going to abandon my friends. If the most I did was simply listen for anypony flanking or distract them a little, it would be enough.

The slaves still trapped deserved it be done.

Caduceus deserved it to be finished for all he had given.

Together, the four of us galloped out and toward the end of the plaza. Behind us, I saw Coral Eve watching once more, before turning back to start helping the slaves fortify their position and wait for healers.

The griffons had been stalled. The dead end was a perfect defensive point from the main plaza, all the way at the back of the slave area. Raiders had left dozens of barricades across it, strewing the way in with sharpened metal shapes on the floor to prevent wild assault charges. It was no obstacle to griffons, but if they took to the air, they also lost all their cover and became bigger targets with extended wings. We found them ducked behind pillars and higher balconies, fighting on all levels in a vertical battle to push forward.

The raiders clearly had stockpiled the ammo they had stolen, most of it being down there. One large tripod gun (why had that been in the guardroom to be stolen?) had been set up and surrounded by thick plates to lay misery upon any who strayed into the middle. Its heavy death-rattle coincided with solid flooring and pillars being torn up and decimated. I could see two or three griffons lying mangled upon the floor, their armour buckled and shredded. One was being pulled back in, after a couple of Talons courageously rushed out and grabbed their wounded 'sister.'

We approached up the side, Protégé taking in their tactics at a glance.

"The griffons will be readying up a firestorm of heavy rounds to batter through those barricades, explosives, and everything. It'll kill every hostage and raider without care! Likely the heavy weapons are being brought up as we speak. We don't have much time."

The unicorn looked around, before settling on one of the shop cells on the side.

"In there!"

We followed his orders, respect as much as rank. The shop cell was dank, stinking of waste and filled with muddy looking mattresses. Suddenly I was very glad for the couch we had.

"The wall in here is cracked, probably weak."

Protégé tapped the wall closest to the direction of the raiders, looking up and down it.

"How do you know that in such detail? There's a hundred cells in here." Glimmerlight asked as we moved in. Indeed, it was cracked, just as he had said.

Protégé just turned, glancing at the mattresses with an oddly familiar gaze.

"Two years is a long time to remember every detail. Now, if we can get some explosives or some large metal object to wedge in we could—"

"COMING THROUGH!"

We dived aside, landing on the musty beds as Brimstone clattered past, charging the wall at full pelt. It didn't even slightly stop him. Only one cinderblock thick, and coated in the cracked plaster, the wall simply disappeared in a big, Brim-shaped, hole.

"...that works too." Protégé seemed a little bewildered, his elaborate plan suddenly becoming a little pointless.

"Don't worry, he does that a lot. You should see him and terminals." Glimmerlight winked to the unicorn as she cantered after Brim. I followed with a rather perplexed Protégé in tow.

Rarity's Grace felt snug at my side. With great effort, I'd reloaded it on the way, springing the top of the shielded three-shot drum open to carefully hoof the small rounds in. Flicking my front left hoof, the mouthpiece sprang out and around to the right position. The rooms beyond the shop cell were not open to the plaza, perhaps the back of another storage area that merely shared the same walls. Large crates and small cubicle offices passed us on all sides on the final run to find a way in behind the raider position.

Eventually, we found a doorway made of thick steel and heavily locked. Brimstone hammered on it, bucking with brass hooves and all. At most, it dented slightly. But by the side lay a terminal. Glimmerlight leapt to work, tip-tapping away madly. While she worked, Protégé turned back to us.

“Right. Barb will be in there somewhere. The sooner we kill him, the sooner this battle is over. I know we all want a shot at him, but remember those slaves need somepony to protect them.”

He dumped a small sack he’d been carrying. It had a dozen looted weapons from the restaurant.

“We get these to the slaves and do what we can to protect them while we get Barb, whoever spots and gets to him first. But no agendas. Who gets the chance takes it, but the slaves need protecting. Understood?”

The door clicked, the locks retracted. Glimmerlight spun off of it, leaning on her hind legs against the terminal. You’d never have thought she had just been through what we had been. I was still shaking at the mere thought of any gun right now. I didn’t want to see one up close for a long, long time.

Pausing for only a second, almost seeming to regard himself for a second, looking at his own cutie mark, Protégé nodded.

“We are.” He approached the door, took a breath...

...and went for it.

Piling through the doorway, we emerged behind the raiders. The door had been a staff entrance, exiting directly onto the plaza itself. The raiders were but ten feet away to our right, nestled at the very back of the plaza. Our first shots took a good half dozen off their feet. Or rather, Glimmer and Protégé’s shots. Brimstone leapt immediately into them from the rear, charging from barricade to barricade.

But I hung back, watching and waiting from the shadows. After a second, I realised I wasn’t alone. Where we’d emerged couldn’t have been luckier. The slaves were right here! Just off to the other side of the door I saw the vast majority of them cowering under gunfire. Some had been hit bad.

I galloped up to them, dragging Protégé’s bag while hoping against hope my three friends could hold off the raiders. I began tossing out pistols and sawn off shotguns to the ponies willing to take them. The injured I pointed to the doorway. Many of them were terrified, but they obeyed my hurried pointing and shouting, too afraid and hurt to argue. I couldn’t blame them. Without the others, I’d have been among them.

They were all that gave me the courage to go on.

Behind me, Brimstone’s warcry echoed amongst the plaza. He dove over the last barricade, charging directly for one pony.

Barb.

Amongst the confusion, the raiders’ position had shattered. Those on the balconies above were still holding the griffons back, and I could see more slaves being held around the barricades as cover. We'd gotten a large amount of them here, but Barb had to go down. It would be a massacre of innocents if not. The raiders on this level were too busy keeping the griffons at check to bring every gun to bear back on our flank attack, so Brimstone had a clear shot at their chieftain. The thin unicorn had been guiding them from the front, but upon seeing the rival raider rush him, drew a knife and leapt forward. He must have had healing too. The revolver wound had disappeared.

Tearing across their lines, Brimstone reared, swinging the chained blade upon his brass hoof to whip out. His opponent leapt, but had to duck from a griffon bullet whipping overhead. Feeling my hopes leap, Brimstone's chain snapped around Barb and slammed the side of the blade into his neck. I saw him yanked toward Brimstone with enough force I thought his spine would just snap! Half way into the air, Barb seemed to glide out of the chains with unnatural grace, sliding through the strong shadows and dust of battle to instead leap, knives bared, at my friend.

This was a whole new kind of fight. I'd seen Brim take on brute strength, but here I saw a clash between vastly differing raiders. Under the harsh light and strong shadows, Brimstone fought an enemy who was elusive and wily. His massive hooves swung fast and strong, but only ever seemed to catch Barb's faded edges as his shadow spells took effect. In return, the brass hooves deflected wicked knife strikes that launched from behind or the sides. It was taking all of Brimstone's experience and often forgotten intelligence to predict and react to Barb's sneak attacks. Clearly, Brimstone had long kept combating this menace in mind as the target for any leadership challenge.

But while he fought, Glimmerlight and Protégé were being pinned down. Protégé waved over to me.

"Murk! We need those grenades you've got! Try to get to me!"

The slaves behind me seemed to be able to hold their position, ranking way lower than the griffons for the attention of the raiders remaining on this level. I began trying to sneak as best I could, sticking to behind barricades and scooting along the back wall. Protégé wasn't far, but griffon anti-machine fire was slapping across this same area above my head. Eventually, rolling painfully across my wings, I came to be beside the unicorn. Digging in my saddlebag, I found the two apple shaped grenades we could—

The moment I even reached for them, Glimmer screamed.

"INCOMING! DOWN! GET DOWN!"

We hit the deck hard, the eerie whistle of a rocket tearing down the plaza. I saw it whip between Barb and Brimstone, separating them with the concussive blast that knocked both of them back and took out the heavy machine gun position. Shrapnel flew everywhere, savagely laying low both raiders and slaves.

Everyone, slave, slaver and raider, staggered to their hooves again. In the wide plaza, I saw various groups stare at one another, grabbing their weapons again, trying to find cover amongst the battlefield.

"Bloodletters! Shades! To me and kill the traitor!" Barb's voice hissed through the air, calling a dozen ponies from the shadows that flowed across the battleground, his elite core of the warband that now assailed Brimstone. Whirling the chains around his hooves, he took them head on, their melee half obscured at the far side of the plaza. Glimmerlight was pushed back, hiding behind a pillar at the side and trying to shove more clips into her rifle while snapping off flaring green shots with the pistol to keep the raiders not going at the griffons away from her.

Ahead of Protégé and I, Barb began galloping for the stairwell. He was getting away!

"Come on, Murk! We have to end this now! Too many ponies are dying from that assault.

He needs to go down right now!"

With me tagging behind, we galloped across the plaza, dodging fire that kicked up concrete below our hooves. Protégé shot down two raiders trying to block our path, while I slid underneath a fallen pillar to dodge one that aimed to chase me. He couldn't follow through such a space. The moment he went over, a griffon's shot took his head off. Part of me wanted to be sickened. So much blood and death would normally horrify me, but the stakes were too high, the violence too constant. If I stopped to worry, I'd be dead.

Barb turned, seeing Protégé and I gunning for him. The chieftain snarled, heading upstairs again the moment we reached the bottom of stairwell. Fear gripped me of following this deathly raider, but there was no turning back now. I'd just listen for him and let Protégé know. He could take Barb, right?

I hoped so.

The stairway led up much further than the one higher level I had expected. What was this? Some sort of maintenance staircase? The sound of the battle below, so painful to my hypersensitive ears, was beginning to dull the higher we went. The echoes of it beginning to become audible alongside the ongoing crashes of thunder. But even more worrying, the higher we went, the darker things got.

Finally, we emerged into a room. Barb was nowhere to be seen.

The entire room was in darkness. No lights were active here. Terror shot through me. This was Barb's ideal area. Looking like some sort of old ventilation room, large banks of machinery made the entire place a criss cross of hiding places. Normally I would have felt right at home and able to hide here, but now every shadow felt threatening. Even the small war below had become a distant thumping in this isolated and contained place.

"Come out, Barb! It's all over now!" Protégé shouted into the darkness, his revolver training around, watching piles of work tools, boxes of sand for spills, mops, small crates of wires, and a thousand other small hiding places while we trotted further in. Above us, the roof seemed to clatter with the wind beating at the building. We must have been right below the rooftop itself.

Slowly, a deliberate and dragging laugh emanated from the darkness.

"Ha... ha... ha... over? I believe differently, 'master.' You really think I couldn't just slip out of here? Start anew? Fillydelphia isn't a cage to me. The moment you two are dry on the floor, then I'll make my way from here. They won't even know I'm gone."

The voice came from everywhere. His magic was throwing the voice, no doubt. Protégé swung the revolver on every side, peering as best he could to see into the dark.

"You're in my world now. Not even your precious little E.F.S. to help you hunt me down. You won't leave this room alive. Dear filly? Take a seat. Watch the master of shadows at work."

A thud came from behind us. Protégé spun, firing a shot. The flare of the gun lit the entire room for a fraction of a second, showing nothing more than a crate that had tipped being blown to splinters. The laughter came again.

"So we're playing again then, hm? One shot down, five to go."

The door we had come through slammed shut, locking hard. Sticking side to side and facing opposite directions, I strove to let my eyesight work in here; but even with a vague idea of where we were, Barb was utterly impossible to locate. Small sounds came from every side, confusing us, misleading us.

Within the sounds I heard that of something hissing, spinning in the air.

“Knife!” I screamed, more of fear than warning; dropping and dodging frantically. Protégé dove to the side, rolling back to his hooves as the thin blade pinged off the large fan assembly we’d passed. Aiming quickly, two heavy shots battered into the darkness, the flares revealing a dark shadow flickering over the top of a conditioning unit and flowing away. He’d missed by miles.

“Oooohohoho... getting panicky now, are we? Two hasty shots? I thought you were Red Eye’s apprentice, boy! Trained by the pony who created a superpower with nothing but charisma and smarts! I must say I’m disappointed.”

Pausing on the spot, Protégé seemed to dial down any anger, before his horn lit up more than the usual telekinesis. A red aura sprang around us, lighting the area within twenty or so feet. I could see the reason. It gave us something, but Barb no doubt could have seen us anyway no matter how dark it was. I drew my PipBuck from my back, strapping it to my now healed leg and activating the light too. My vision began to settle, now that I had something to work as ambient light. But shadows danced in the room. Everywhere I looked, I saw small bits of movement. Circling around in our lonely island of light, we stuck together against the darkness that threatened to bring us low.

Then Protégé took the initiative. His magic grabbed two boxes of wires, the ease he had with multi-tasking sending bunches of them hurtling into the darkness at any slight sounds we heard. Then the crates went flying, and the tools; anything to try and gauge an impact.

Beep!

I glanced down at my PipBuck. Now!? Really!?

Another hissing sound, another knife. I heard Protégé grunt in pain as it skiffed him, drawing blood along his side before clattering into the floor. Not wanting to lose any momentum, he charged forward, trusting me to follow without distracting words. I dialled down the PipBuck volume. Oh Sundial, not now.

But I could still hear it.

Beep!

Click...

“I... hi... geez... oh Luna, sorry. Exhausted, want to get this before sleep.”

“Watch out, Murk!”

The warning came for a huge string of wires across the floor. We jumped over them, trying to chase him down and catch him in our aura of light around the maintenance room. Charging from corner to corner, I tried to keep up with the taller unicorn.

“Those zebras, they came back! They asked me again about the plans, about how I could make money, I don’t know who I should tell or what I should do! They just appeared from nowhere in the dark alleyway with those cloaks! Hidden in the darkness.”

Barb had been silent for a while now, the waiting was only making things worse. Our lights weren’t strong enough to properly cast across the room, he could be simply following us.

I spun, expecting to see a knife, but there was nothing.

“Getting to you, filly?”

“They scare me so much, just not knowing when they’ll pop out of hiding. No wonder the Ministry of Morale’s been so active. I tried to run from them, but they followed me, cornered me, asked the question again. To give up plans. What if their offer turns nasty?”

It was so scary, seeing the snow landing on something that isn't there and form a shape."

Wait...

"Protégé!"

My master spun around. I quickly flicked my eyes to the boxes of sand. Nodding briefly back to me, Protégé began backing us toward the boxes. He let out another shot into the darkness, lighting up a darting shape atop the machinery. Then he was gone again.

"Oh, come now, really? I thought you'd realised how pointless that was to waste a bullet? Well well... are you even sure that was me?"

We waited. Closing my eyes, I concentrated everything I could on my hearing. Sight was no use here. I crouched to the ground, trying to ignore the danger, ignore the fact my friends were fighting for their lives below me.

"But they're offering so much... it's tempting. But I saw a spritebot floating around my apartment a few times today. Are the Ministry onto me? Watching to see if I would slip up? I just need a sleep, but Sky needs something to help her live if this all goes bad! I feel paranoid, like any small sound at night makes me wake up and lock myself in the bathroom. Any small sound."

I heard the slide of a knife from a pocket.

"Now!"

Protégé's horn flared, launching the boxes of sand into the air and spinning wildly. The sand erupted into the air, coating everything, including us. But I heard a splutter amongst the darkness and immediately pointed my hoof. Two shots from Protégé's revolver rang out at the direction. Each flare revealed a freeze-frame of Barb charging us, dodging around the bullets. A knife flashed between us, both of us dodging to either side.

"The zebras are watching, I just know it! They knew who I was. What if they kill me?"

"A child's trick with sand? Oh my, but you've used up all your bullets my dear Protégé! Time for this to end!"

Rolling away, I turned to see Barb within our sphere of light, slashing and stabbing at Protégé. The unicorn was backing off furiously, throwing everything he could at the raider while he struggled to reload individual bullets. Box after bucket after tool kept Barb just out of knife range. After three bullets loaded he aimed, taking another shot that Barb ducked around a workbench to avoid. I tried to see if he came out the other side, but by the time we rushed him, he was gone. The sand wasn't staying on him. It had only bought us that one shot!

"They might get somepony else as their helper, if I only give them non-critical bits. I don't think I have a choice anymore. It's like they're always behind me. Just waiting..."

"Behind you!"

I saw Barb launch off the workbench and into our aura of light, two knives in his magic. A telekinetic duel began of sorts, as Protégé struggled to keep those knives away from him. I watched in horror as the pony I felt like I was only now beginning to understand fought for his life with the raider. The revolver fired, with Barb's own magic knocking the aim of, much the same as Protégé's telekinesis was grasping and wrestling with the knives.

Changing the stakes, Barb launched forward, going physical on Protégé as the two tussled, fighting both hoof to hoof and magic to magic, and Protégé was clearly losing. Barb was impossible to keep a grip of, sliding and slithering in ways no pony should be able to move, or letting Protégé's attempts to grapple him down slide off that sickeningly damp skin-armour. Already, my master had a half dozen knife slashes from near misses.

"All I know is, I need to make a decision. Take action."

I bit down on the mouthpiece, aiming Rarity's Grace. My one shot went wild, but the distraction made Barb break off and away. A knife hurtled toward me, making me scream and fall from the hissing metal passing so close overhead. I heard it embed into sheet metal beside my head. How many did he have?

But the distraction cost him dear. Unable to fight him head on, Protégé's magic changed purpose. Ripping the eyepiece from Barb's face, he aimed the revolver. Caught in front of the barrel, Barb threw himself Protégé, and dropped back into the shadows at a moment's notice.

Only now, Protégé had his E.F.S.

The revolver and its single shot tracked him, following the raider all around. I fell back again, the ferocity of their brutal duel becoming far too much for me. They weren't speaking, taunting, or boasting now. This was a fight. A life or death event that both of them had to win. Protégé sent spanners and hammers hurling after Barb, tracking him on the eyepiece. He ducked and dove, crying out as another knife sliced through his ear, almost taking it entirely off. Blood stained the side of his head. He staggered back, wincing and muttering in pain, the revolver drooping... no!

"But first, sleep, so tired. Goodnight..."

Click.

Barb launched from the shadows, almost stretching out amongst them as the knife descended.

Protégé was bluffing.

The wires spun up, his strong multi-tasking telekinetic skills sending dozen of them whipping around Barb on all sides. Wrapping up the raider, they tangled him roughly, before a box of heavy sand smashed against his head. Barb landed heavily on his back, face bleeding from the impact. The knives all dropped, falling as his spell broke, bringing his full body into sharp relief. Spinning, Protégé brought the last round he had on him to bear, pointing directly at his head. Barb glanced up, sudden immediate fear in his eyes.

The look on Protégé's face was stern, authoritative and confident. I'd only seen such a look on one pony before.

Red Eye.

"This is for Caduceus and everypony else you murdered."

Barb's hooves came up, but it was too late. Protégé's revolver blew his head clean apart... into a dark mist, as the rest of his body faded.

I gasped. I'd seen this!

"PROTÉGÉ, BEHIND YOU!"

Looking up in shock, he tried to spin, but the shadowed knife slammed home into his shoulder, diagonally lancing to pierce right through and out from his chest. Barb had dropped onto his back from above, before twisting it horribly and drawing a loud scream of pain from the unicorn.

"Hurts, doesn't it?" Barb whispered into his ear, another sick twist only giving another drawn out cry from his prey. I felt rooted to the spot, my mouth gaping.

They fell to the ground, the knife ripping free. leaving Barb straddled over the prone slave master. It was a wickedly black dagger, seeming to drift with shadows on the blade. Protégé fell limp with Barb on his back. The raider's magic grabbed Protégé's mane, yanking his head back to expose his neck, keeping Protégé head between him and I as cover. The blood soaked blade curled around it and began to pull slowly. I even saw the blood began to dribble forth to mix with the copious bleeding of his shoulder. He was slitting his neck wide open!

"Born slave to loyal slaver. Never truly your own pony, pathetic! Now... bye-bye!"

I saw him tense to pull Protégé's head right back, to rip the cut throat apart.

Without even really knowing what I was doing, I charged forward, galloping with all the force I could gather and hurling myself at Barb with a loud cry. Even my weight was enough, slamming the raider off of Protégé and beating at him with my hooves with every pent up feeling of frustration and anger I had at him for involving himself in my life!

The shadowblade flew away into the darkness. Rolling one over the other, I was picked up and hurled into the metal machinery like a rag doll. Trying to stand, I flipped the mouthpiece out again, the shot firing upward as his magic yanked Rarity's Grace away from aiming at him. Spinning around it, Barb bucked me again, knocking me another seven feet away with a crunching, sharp impact to my breast.

"Now what do we have here? The little filly got some spine, eh? Thought he could take on a raider chieftain at his own game before he got his kill? Gotta hand it to you, kid, didn't expect it."

He darted forward, blinking through my vision and appearing before me, his front hoof smashing me across the jawline. Falling to the side, I spat blood, my gums burst. But he wasn't done, his magic lifted me up to telekinetically throw me even further. Clattering off the ground, I felt my ribs jar and the wind crushed out of me on impact. Unable to even scream, I simply rolled over, moaning loudly as I clutched at myself.

"But he's dead one way or the other. Why, just take a look!"

Drawing my head up, he forced my glance back to Protégé, where I felt my eyes widen in horror. He was jittering on the ground, trying to hold his neck shut; bleeding out, unable to move at all.

"No. It's just you and I, filly. You... and I..."

I lashed out in desperation, my hoof trying to catch him by surprise. No such luck. I felt my hoof battered away, before I was thrown through a doorway.

Suddenly, light and sound.

The battle below us raged. A sense of vertigo overtook me as I realised what I'd been thrown onto.

The platform above the plaza I had seen, that skeletal frame that hung below the skylight. This had all led upward to it, above the long drop. The bottom was nothing but hard mesh to trot on, no solid floor at all. I could see right down. Struggling to stand, my body aching, I found myself crying in sheer terror. I couldn't win!

I screamed even more as I felt the terrible sensation of a knife slit across my back. Crawling away, I felt another slice, and dared to look back. But I yelled, feeling my back sear in pain. They weren't deep. He was taunting me, torturing me. My hooves scrambled, trying to crawl across the platform, away from him.

"You know, filly. You and I are pretty alike. Small amongst our peers. I couldn't do what they did, had to get my own way. But with you, oh, it all changes..."

I was kicked again, flung farther out onto the platform. The entire thing swung on its cords, wavering beneath the thunderstorm above. Rain lashed at us through the skylight, wind almost threatening to blow me off the edge. His long mane was whipping around as he strode toward me. Lit by a flare of lightning, that grin turned demonic, and those eyes predatory. Water dripped all around him from the storm around us.

I tried to turn, to shoot out the glass above his head and drop it all on him, but my mouthpiece was broken. That grin widened. He sensed easy blood.

“See, with you, I don’t need all that. I can, for once, enjoy a little physical superiority! You can’t hide or sneak better than I can, your peer. So it’s all useless to you! No, all you can do is lie there and cry while I do all the things I never could to anypony else!”

The thunder clashed above us, the skylight’s remaining fixtures shaking and making the entire platform unsteady. Seeing my blood on the ground behind me, I just tried to stay away from that knife. But his magic could reach me, flipping me over onto my front.

“Don’t think I don’t know your fears, filly. The terrors you hold from one of my crew.”

I felt the tip of a blade draw across my back, before resting above my shoulder and beginning to press.

“No... please!”

He licked his lips.

“Welcome back to hell.”

The piercing pain shot through me and pinned me to the ground, feeling a foot long blade punch through my body. The same shoulder.

Against the thundercrash above, almost lost in the sound, I screamed.

Kneeling down beside me, he pushed my head against the grated bottom of the platform, making me see the battle below through tear-stained eyes and a throat struggling to be able to scream as much as I wanted for help.

“You need your allies. Without them you’re nothing, filly. Nothing! You think they’re gonna save you now? Poor master’s bleeding out. The mare and the traitor are still down there, see them?”

I could. They didn’t even see me. They were just fighting for their lives, unable to move from bad cover for fear of the griffons hitting them. The slaves were backed into a corner, desperately struggling to survive from both raiders and griffon incoming fire.

“No, for once you’re all alone and there’s nothing you can do, filly! Nothing but scream and cry while you watch your friends die!”

My body was faltering from the stab wound. Barb withdrew the knife, making me cry out and curl up.

Everything seemed slow, the wind becoming lethargic and lazy, the gunshots taking longer.

“Only by sticking together can we truly save lives. Do not be afraid to fight if in defence of a better world. You will find your courage, Murky.”

Those voices in my memory, in my mind. They were what had inspired me to come here. To do all this, to this absolute end of all effort. To finish this and save lives, to help everypony make something better!

Just... just you watch, all of you. I’ll fail, but I won’t destroy everything you’ve given me!

It hurt. It hurt so badly, but remembering the faces of everypony who had been hurt more to get here, I began to push myself up, facing Barb. I had two grenades left. I began trying to dig for them, watching him, and—

His hoof caught me across the face.

“Applause for effort, filly! But you’re outmatched here! I’m stronger, faster, smarter, bigger, and stealthier than you’ll ever be!”

His other hoof slapped me again the other way. Dizzied, feeling a stinging after every slap, I staggered back again toward the edge.

“Every plan, every idea, every trick I’ve seen before! You’re nothing but the little pony nopony actually believes will do anything in the end! You wanted to escape? You!? You’ll never get out of here, kid!”

Pulling myself together, my body protesting, I readied up. My shoulder and front leg were useless. But one last effort... I just had to try!

Screaming, I charged him head on again, wrestling with the raider atop the platform, trying to hit him with my PipBuck like a club. He threw me everywhere, his knife drawing blood from slits and cuts. His hooves battered my face until I was swinging and missing entirely, but I pushed into him, hooves grabbing his disgusting clothing to tug and pull at his pockets, before he simply threw me off him.

Gravity disappeared. My hoof jarred as it caught around a pole at the edge, the rest of my body being flung over the edge of platform to now hang above the drop. The entire platform shuddered, leaning down to drop my weight. Panicking, I pedalled my hindlegs in the open air, feeling the sense of a long drop beneath me. From above, the rain was cascading down even harder across us, the stinging making my hoof go weak. I tried to grab with my other one, but all the efforts had made the stab wound become much worse, I couldn’t move it at all.

“Guess this is it, filly. You’ve been fun! But I told you. Nothing you can do, not one thing you can pull out on me that I don’t know better.”

Struggling, trying to keep attached, I propped my head back on the platform. Leaning up, I fixed him with a look before I spat out blood...

...along with two grenade pins.

“E-every trick? Ever heard of the reverse pickpocket?”

If I weren’t bleeding to death and hanging off such a ledge, the look on his face would have been satisfying. The raider stepped back, as though wondering if I were joking before frantically beginning to search his many pockets and hidden sections of clothing, realising the mistake he’d made; falling into the pride and rush of being a physically stronger pony.

“You... no, you couldn’t have! A reverse— NO! Not you! Damn you! DAMN YOU!”

My leg gave way. I couldn’t hold on any longer. Feeling darkness creep over me, I saw the horrified look on Barb’s face move farther and farther away as he felt the two bumps in his clothing even while I fell.

“NO! Not to a... stupid... fucking...filly! IT WON’T HELP! YOU’RE STUCK HERE! YOU’LL NEVER GET OU—”

The sharp crack and echoing boom rocked through the air, the blinding flash atop the platform throwing the broken and shredded form of Barb off the opposite side from myself. The concussive blast slapped across me. Then, seconds later, after everypony below looked skyward, the second explosion of the other grenade blasted the remains into ashes within the sight of his entire clan.

Barb was gone, and I simply fell to my death. A strange calm overtook me as I fell through the rain from on high. Only unlike before, this wasn’t from resignation. It was satisfaction. It was a sense of worth. I had... I had done something.

If that had to be—

Then I hit something, not the ground, but a heavy fabric. A vast pink face enveloped me, slowing my descend as my light weight was caught in the billowing banner that had blown out horizontally to catch me. But even so, I rolled down it, tumbling, grasping, spinning speeding up again for the last single storey yet to fall. I closed my eyes, the impact eventually coming amongst a rush of colour and wind in my ears.

Everything went out.

A warm light. That inner glow from before. It fell around me, fell across my broken and tired body. Slowly, I was lifted up. Helped to my hooves once again.

A... a pony! It was a pony! It turned that shimmering head with mine, ahead of us lying the Wall, as grand and imposing as ever.

Slowly, I felt a hoof clutch mine, as we began moving toward it, bolstered, braver, reminded of our potential...

"Together..."

Other words, another four drifting words that seemed so far... far... away...

I couldn't hear them. There was too much noise, too many other words, not beautiful... not as wondrous... they were foul... they were crude... they were-

"—before I push it there myself! Come on you fucking bunghole pipe experiment! There's too many casualties for you to sit around dicktickling some buck with a sprained leg all day!"

My eyes wouldn't see anything but vague blurs, but I was lying on cold ground. The rotten shape of a ghoul over me. Weathervane...

"—and while you're there get me some Celestia-damned Med-X! I don't give two fucks if the guard says it isn't for slaves!" A pause. "No I don't give a single fuck either! BLOODY MOVE! I can't move him till we know if his back's gone or not!"

Then the yellowed face turned back to me, seeing my hazed eyes drifting open. He gained in clarity as I slowly began to realise I was still alive. But I couldn't move. My shoulder was a mess of twisted pain, the feeling making me want to shiver.

"Fuck the eighteen generations of your ancestors, kid, you're lucky to be alive." Weathervane began re-strapping a thick wad of bandage around my shoulder, being careful to keep my back from moving. Behind him I could see dozens of healers galloping around the Mall's plaza floor, tending to so many ponies.

"I had to, the... the grenade..."

"Lucky about the grenade? Fuck the grenade, kid! You landed on Stern! Just hope she doesn't want compensation for the piece of armour you dented on your fall. Leastways she broke your impact a little. Better than can be said for some of the slaves those bastards got their hooves on."

My mind raced, sudden panic fighting through. Apparently, my back worked just fine, as I launched up, grabbing the ghoul.

"Protégé! Is he..."

Doctor Weathervane pressed me firmly back down, as the pain only then hit me from my sudden movement. Nearby, I saw ponies being wheeled out to the hospital, Glimmerlight, Coral... they both watched me as they passed, Glimmer offering a thin smile, clutching a bullet wound. But I could only await the answer.

"We found him upstairs..."

Oh no.

“...living, but in critical condition. He’s lost a lot of blood.”

“But you can help him! Potions and spells and—”

“Normally, yes. But we’re not sure what Barb did to that blade because those wounds just aren’t healing no matter how many potions we throw into him. We’ve got doctors keeping him alive by the thinnest of threads right now but, well, it’s not looking good. Even at the most optimistic, he’s out of the game for a while.”

Behind him, I saw one more stretcher pass out, surrounded by crowding healers, all of their horns flaring. I caught a few glances of a black coat. Please Celestia, please Luna, bring him through this arduous time and give him the strength to live.

Weathervane glanced at them, before sighing.

“They say Red Eye’s personal physician will take to him. They don’t like ‘outsiders’ like me working on Red Eye’s little prodigy there. Despite the fact I’m more from this city than any of those fuckers, Fillydelphia’s my fucking home. Now, we’re getting you to Hearts and Hooves, Murk. You’ve got a pass. Before he went under, Protégé muttered something about getting you all the care you needed. We’ll see that happens.”

It was over. The Mall was devastated, ruined, destroyed. Blood ran everywhere. Balconies had collapsed and there was enough battle damage to render it useless for a little while. But I could see the slaves cowering at the side. We’d saved them. Even now, healers moved among them, tending to them in their hour of need.

I’d known one who had done so before then. Even as I watched, for a second I thought I witnessed a blonde mane looking up quickly, smiling as he helped other ponies. Then he was gone, just another face to the memories.

The first chance I got, I was going to draw him. He deserved it.

I was wheeled out soon after, doped up on Med-X and lifted upon the stretchers as they returned for more. Weathervane returned with me, staying silent en-route. But as we left the Mall, I looked back into the war-torn destruction left behind and saw one pony standing among it.

The Master.

He looked up and around, casting his eyes over the Mall, over every cell and barrier with keen eyes, like somepony viewing a new home for the first time...

...and smiled.

ACT TWO MASTER AND SLAVE

The Mare in the Mirror

“Quite pleased to make your acquaintance actually. Let’s get the other bit of politeness taken care of, shall we? What the bloody, bloody, bloody hell are you doing here!?”

“What’s it like to look back on how far you’d come?”

You know, I guess I’d never even thought about it that way. Barb’s death was something of an end to one of the larger parts of my new life in Fillydelphia. Since I had made that first fateful escape attempt, he had been there in the background and somewhat involved in almost every facet of my struggles since.

But it’s more than that, isn’t it? This was the first time I’d ever really done something that mattered. That really changed everything. Sure there had been helping Protégé to get the sani-sanitoo...

“Sanitiser.”

Yeah, that. But that was almost all just a test, a ploy by him to get me to think outside the box and try making choices for myself. But taking on Barb was an event. Something big that I was involved with which ended in our success.

Well, if you could call it a success. We’d lost many innocent ponies in the battle, along with one who had been fast becoming somepony we’d expected to stick with us. We were all injured. Protégé was seriously hurt and taken from us into the machine of Red Eye’s city. We might have stopped Barb, but it had all just been part of a greater plan by somepony else... The Master. He wasn’t officially in command, but he was chosen to oversee the repairs. Protégé’s efforts to bring down Barb were likely the only thing that had stopped his absolute success. Even so, if Protégé didn’t return to service soon.

S-sorry, I’m getting off the question, aren’t I?

“Huh? Oh, look, don’t worry about it, we’re not in any rush. We’re going to be around one another a long time now, remember? Plenty of opportunity to go at your own pace.”

Yeah, true... ok, I’ll try.

So, I suppose that it's more than just since I tried to escape. It goes all the way back to when I first remember struggling to pull a sled weighed down with rocks near Shattered Hoof. That little skinny-legged colt with the mismatching ears, straining to move it even one inch. He'd never have thought he'd someday wrestle a raider chieftain atop a platform in a thunderstorm to save innocent ponies fighting for their lives below. He didn't see anything but just a future full of toil and sweat till eventually it all ended.

But now I was involved in the secret planning of a grand escape from the most inescapable slave fortress in the wastes. I had others around me, ponies who I had earned the trust and friendship of, ending over a decade of loneliness. Every good pony I had met had changed me, helped me move one step closer to true freedom of the mind. Really, it's their success more than mine. To think how short a time it had been, how much I'd been through, culminating on the battle against Barb's raiders. It's easy to forget, well, just how many of those small steps I'd taken amidst the mad rush.

But the game had changed. As much as we'd done our part, the true winner in the end had been The Master. His ambition, it... just terrifying. So much hate and sadistic will in one pony.

The stakes were growing, the need for escape becoming ever more important. That we had to just keep bounding forward, doing every little thing we could to swing the odds back in our favour. Every scrap of food, every drop of water, and every trinket, tool or tactic we could gather had to be taken in.

But as I said, even though I'd come so far so soon, there were still some things that I had to go back to. Some ponies that had been there in the very beginning. Before any of this, before even the Stable Dweller. Somepony who was still out there in Fillydelphia that mattered deeply to me and deserved escape. Somepony who didn't even know I was still alive.

But it all hinged on one fact. If Protégé didn't return to power soon, anypony I tried to help might simply end up being led into the clutches of The Master in the same way I was. I had to just trust he'd be alright. That the pony I had only just begun to see as a pony had not been taken from me forever.

It was still raining.

In this long neglected wing of Heart and Hooves Hospital, the windows had gone completely without repair since they were blown in by the Balefire megaspell. Allowing the rain to continue its foul lashing and spraying from a dark sky, and cast a chill wind through the empty frames. Alone in my hospital bed, I curled up with the meagre blanket and tried to keep as much of the cold away as possible.

At least the storm had passed over. I'd heard the slavers on guard inside the hospital saying that the rain should go soon as well. But until then I was stuck here, one of the last to leave. Glimmerlight and Brimstone had been returned to the Mall long ago, their less serious wounds 'permitting' them to return to work sooner. Given what Brimstone had endured, that thought was awe inspiring. He'd healed far faster than even Weathervane had predicted with the healing potions' magic.

I, however, had the privilege of getting to rest a while longer.

I'd been waking up multiple times screaming, leaving me hazy and heavy-eyed when awake. The pain of the wound when I tossed or turned only skewing my nightmares to remind me of the sick puncturing feeling that I'd had now felt twice. I'd heard others say you were meant to get used to hardship and become weathered to it. If only. I just felt more scared of knives than ever. The sick looks of that raider or Barb as they let the weapon plunge into my flesh simply left me a shivering wreck now. Weathervane had called it 'psychological scarring', a wound that persists in pain even if the body has entirely healed. Something that could easily flare up when in fear of the initial attack happening again. Likely another thing to live with throughout my life.

But after the fear and adrenaline, my body was beginning to 'remember' the other ailments. My eye infection was worse, itching and making my right eye swell all the more. Blackened rings surrounded them still from the torture Barb's raiders had given me after running from Slit, leaving my face sore and aching. My nose felt blocked, no doubt having caught something in the storm and due to my immunity to illness being so low, which made it all the harder to have to breathe through my mouth. This was never easy, given the raspy burning that I got in my throat from overuse. Weathervane had dropped off my one remaining RadAway with a promise to try and find more spare, but the stocks were being carefully monitored now. I was trying to let it last till I really needed it. As such, more than once I'd endured the spasm-inducing coughing fits while recovering. Clutching a thin pillow to my empty stomach, I'd simply squeezed it as tightly as I could, trying to put all the pain and fear of radiation and taint away, trying to forget about the clock that was slowly ticking down the seconds of my life.

It hadn't worked too well. I needed out of this city.

The wind blew in again from the craterside window, lifting the tails of my blanket until I could clamp it down and roll up, but I lost my page in my journal. I'd been drawing, gently easing the lines out upon parchment to uphold a promise and attempt to distract myself. This wasn't going to be just another picture though. This had to matter. Caduceus... he had barely gotten to know us, but in even just a short, almost criminally forgettable time, he had proven himself a brave and kind buck. Now I'd never know his quirks, likes, or thoughts on various things. Never get to go to him for help or do him a favour like friends did. But he'd risked himself for us in the hope of being our friend. In the end, he deserved that place in our hearts.

I hoofed the pages back against the wind, coming to the growing piece of art that I knew he had to be in. Myself and Glimmerlight were upon it already, me in the bottom middle left, her just across from me to the right of the middle. It brought a little grin to my face, seeing the extravagant and beaming face I'd drawn her with, cheekily lowering her eyebrows in that look only she could really do. I decided to place him beside her, where he'd have wanted to be. Just to her left and slightly behind her with that gentlecolt-like polite stance and warm smile he'd had.

Struggling to remember, I let my subconscious do the work for me, gently swishing the charcoal in little tight curves for his body as I imagined it would have been had he not been stuck here. Bold flicks, like those confident little motions he would exude to me, formed his mane. Big and fluffy, not trodden down from months without cleaning. In honour of his dedication, I gave his saddlebag the symbol of Fluttershy's medical teams. Were they a Ministry again? My memory wasn't too great on that.

But his eyes... the moment I finished them, the charcoal dipped in my mouth. Seeing that happy look from the paper, knowing the this drawing would be the only way I'd ever truly see him again forever, that felt harsh. Glimmerlight could bring up memories, but those were hers, not mine. Even if she extracted some of my own for me, it was still just the past. What lay before me in my style was the end.

Another blast of wind scattered the pages again, making me mutter in annoyance when the charcoal got messed up on a correction of his mane. Leaning down to correct it, the page only flew up in my face, flicking madly back to earlier images. I almost froze as I saw one of my first pictures I could remember, one of the mare. I'd drawn her as reality showed her that time, with that long mane, ruined and straggled into a mess by slavery, the cut tail and hard worked body. She was looking up at the Wall, as though wishing to leave herself. If only I could get to her. I'd spent less than ten minutes around her, never knowing her name or anything. I hadn't even seen her cutie mark. I couldn't just leave her behind, could I? In such a short time, she had helped change my life. She had stood up to The Master for me. I dearly hoped she was still safe, somewhere out there.

Whistling, the wind once again threw the page over, ruining the moment of reflection.

"Oh f... f... fairycakes." I slammed the journal shut. Sitting alone in this room while the healing magic slowly finalised its work wasn't doing me any favours. I felt lonely, miserable in the wet weather, and with only my own worried thoughts to really keep me company. As strange as it felt to a pony like me, who not long ago would have simply hidden and cried, I wanted somepony around. Anypony, just to feel a little safer. Even just a little trot through the corridors where others were might help better than dwelling in misery.

I wrapped the blanket loosely around my body, and carefully hopped off the bed. Keeping the hoof of my injured leg off the ground, I hobbled out of the ward; part of the blanket dragging behind me on the floor. Upon stepping into the busy corridors I saw ponies cantering to and fro on errands for chems, medicine or to find somepony who knew a certain spell. I stuck to the sides, avoiding any rush or hurrying doctor. I could hear the rasping voice of Weathervane far off, clearly fighting to save somepony's life. The hospital was dark, the unreliable lighting and magic power inside having gone offline from the storm earlier. Candles were lit or curtains pulled back to let the little light Fillydelphia had back in. Right now, it all just felt like the deepest, harshest hole in the world that I was stuck in, surrounded by all the others who now cried or moaned in pain from its tortures. Nothing but one little hurt pony wrapped in a once white blanket, limping past the horrors.

Backing into a room to avoid a stretcher bearing a lifeless and scrawny mare past, I saw the nurse from, when I had last visited. She glanced at me, nodding briefly, before sadly continuing to carry the body around back. I'd smelled smoke earlier. A proper burial wasn't something any slave could expect. Already, no doubt Caduceus had been-

"Murky?"

I squeaked, jumping on the spot and stumbling against the doorframe. Spinning to inside the room, there were three beds. Two had bucks out cold, while the third contained a mare sitting up and looking at me. Coral Eve.

Her horn seemed to carry an irregular magical haze in the gloom, an unhealthy pale version of the full light I'd seen it carry before. Seeing my glance, she raised a tired looking wasted hoof to it, rubbing her own horn gently.

"Old case of horn rot years ago, dear. The wastes isn't without its own diseases compared to Fillydelphia. Been unreliable and prone to sporadic power surges since. Hey, you don't need to stand in the doorway. Come closer, it's alright."

She patted the rather too large bed beside her, leading me to obey and wander forward.

She definitely used a somewhat maternal tone to her, probably because I was a lot younger. Hopping up, she grabbed my good hoof to help me sit in my blanket beside her.

“Now, how’re you doing?” Her voice was tender, mature, and pleasant; a far cry from the bitter mare I’d seen in the Mall. Was this what she was normally like?

I held my shoulder.

“It’s sore. Doctor Weathervane says it shouldn’t hurt since he healed it, but it still hurts... be-because my mind thinks it should.”

“Yeah, I’ve heard of that. You’ve been stabbed there before, dear?” Her hoof carefully moved the blanket aside to look at my shoulder, seeing the healed cut when I lifted the bandage up. It bore a tender red line, but otherwise was fine now.

A little bit of my coat had yet to regrow from where Weathervane had been doing his work. After glancing at it myself, I nodded, and motioned to the underside of my shoulder.

“One of Barb’s raiders outside the Stable. Just pinned me down and...”

The feelings washed over me all again. I tried to look away, instead looking toward the rainfall outside the (surprisingly intact) window in this room. Even so, the thought of that lashing shower out there made me shiver. My skin still tingled from the exposure while playing Barb’s sick games. It was nothing more than a constant battle now that the adrenaline was over. A battle to not remember the spinning revolver and nerve-crushing tension on each dead click.

In a word, I felt simply traumatised. Part of me doubted I’d ever be truly able to ‘get over’ the twisted experience Barb put me through.

Much to my surprise, I felt Coral’s hoof pass over me, tucking the blanket back around me. I guessed she had on account of me still shaking so much. The older mare tried to smile, but just sighed instead.

“You shouldn’t have been caught up in that. Not you. I’ve raised a colt, Murky. I know that look of innocence when I see it. That’s why I forgave you for that day in here when we first saw one another. I could see the look my son once had when I caught him trying to steal medicine off a trader, to help an injury one of his little friends had. The look of somepony who doesn’t deserve to be in such a place.”

Regardless, I still felt guilty, but I sensed an opportunity. She clearly didn’t mind me individually. Perhaps if it came from me.

“We’re all trying to get out, Coral. We’re gathering what we can, we’ve got a plan, and Glimmer really wants you and your son to come with us. She doesn’t care how you see her, but she just wants to save you.”

The mood swung, Coral’s face screwing up as she fought to control her emotions and clearly short temper.

“That mare doesn’t see anything past short-term satisfaction. A stiff drink, a quick rut or a splendidly overenthusiastic plan that’ll end up hurting us all by the end of this. Look at how her working with Barb turned out, hm? He told us how you three were involved. Now I don’t blame you. I know he’d have done it anyway, but she still agreed to it, believed in it. She never truly thinks about the consequences of her actions. She doesn’t know how to commit, how to choose and stick to something. Give it a few days. She’ll try something else with this ‘plan’, hell she’s already wanting it to go from you three, to including swiping a colt from under Red Eye’s nose and getting him and I out too?”

Coral snorted, tossing her ponytailed and braided mane, before wincing. Apparently some muscles along her back remaining injured.

"She's smart, brave and yes, even caring. But Glimmerlight isn't somepony you want to ever rely on for too long. It'll come down and hurt you in the end."

The question was far too simple. It felt almost wrong to ask, but I couldn't stop it. The query had been burning in my head for too long.

"Coral, what did she do?"

Her pale grey face glanced back at me, as though trying to spot if this were some sort of ploy. I quickly spoke again.

"I won't tell her. I don't think she wants to find out like that anyway. I promise?" My voice died away as I spoke, but Coral Eve only sighed, shifting her weight to lie on her side.

"You know we're both from Creaky Hollow village. Middle of nowhere, a little spot that had just enough to sustain a small population. Safe, secluded; about as good as you can get out in the wastes if you don't have the caps to live in the big towns. We had our occasional problems with the wildlife, but we lived in relative peace. Never so much as had seen a raider if you'd been born there. Sometimes we took ponies in if they had something to offer. Glimmerlight did."

The generator and other technical aspects. That I remembered from her projected memory.

"But she outed us, gave up where we were to Brimstone Blitz's clan. They'd been crawling around the dead forest we were in, so we just kept our heads down and covered any trails leading back. But it was no good. They came in the night. With fire and blade they sacked Creaky Hollow just like they'd done to the small resettlement in Ponyville. Turned out she'd snuck out in the night to meet one of them, led them right back to our village."

"No!"

"I watched our elder get cut down as she pleaded with them. Saw friends and ponies I considered my family torn apart. Some of us fought back, maybe held off their vanguard for a few minutes. But then he arrived. The Dragon, your 'Brim'. They fought like they were possessed the moment he was around, tore anyone who resisted down and put them to horrible deaths. The rest of us? Sold to Red Eye."

Coral sniffed sharply, just keeping a hard glare on my shocked face.

"She got what she deserved. They turned on her the moment they had what they wanted. Look at what just happened in the Mall. There's your proof of what I'm saying. If she feels she needs something, Glimmer won't think about the consequences. The only silver lining to it was the third betrayal, when Red Eye took in the raiders as well after trapping them in a minefield with snipers and alicorns. Serves them all right to be here."

There were no words, none at all. But... I knew with all my heart that Glimmerlight wouldn't do that. There had to be a reason, there had to be! I curled up, resting my chin on my front hooves through the blanket. Really, I wasn't sure if I felt comforted by Coral's hoof stroking the back of my neck as though to calm me down.

"Look, maybe... maybe she's right and being in here's made her want to change or face up to her past, Murky. But her rash thinking has already helped one more raider hurt ponies again, and I'll bet she'll be back at the Mall right now stripping out the worst bits from her mind."

Coral hesitated, then looked guilty, as though feeling bad for offloading so much on me. She gently squeezed around my shoulders.

"You can always come to me, I saw you fighting to save us, Murk. You're a good pony. But just be careful around Glimmerlight. You don't deserve to be hurt any more than you clearly already have been from Barb.”

It wasn't really helping. Glimmerlight was the best thing that had kept me going and staying happy. My big sister best friend forever. She'd been the first pony since I was a colt to hug me, one who had made me able to smile and laugh with her and helped make me more confident. To think that she'd... no, even if it were exactly how Coral said, that wasn't who she was now. I was sure of it.

“Murk!? Murk, where the bloody hell did you scamper off to?”

Weathervane's rasping tone shouted down the corridor, before his head poked in the door and saw us.

“There you are. They saw that eternal fucking rain's starting to let up out there. You're good enough to head back now, Mall's only on light duties, so they tell me you should be fine. Now come on, we'll need this room soon, so get back to your ward. We've got an accident from the FunFarm coming in within the hour. One of the old scaffolds fell. I told them they needed that ass-backward design tightened up two hundred and fifteen fucking years ago when I took Sundial there as a colt. I guess they didn't think this far ahead, but still. Tight-wadded cockwaffles.”

The ghoul wandered off, ranting and raving to anypony nearby that seemed willing to listen.

Biting my lip and trying to force down the feelings from even hearing the poor ghoul mention his son's name, I turned back to Coral and reluctantly pulled myself out of the blanket. I saw her eyes stare at my wings, bound up from Weathervane's attention. Clearly, the unicorn wasn't too used to the fact that I was a pegasus yet.

“S-sorry. I'll be careful, but I trust her, I really do. She's saved my life more than once, Coral. I wouldn't have been able to do what I did in there without her. She wants to make things better for you, so... will you come with us?”

It felt almost childish. To ‘make up’ for all this. But Coral Eve's eyes only remained hard, before losing the anger and just being replaced with exhaustion. She slumped back into the bed.

“Glimmerlight's actions put me, my son, and many of my friends in here, Murk. I'm sorry, but she's going to have to accept that I can't simply let that slide by easily or forgive her by words alone.”

I saw her wipe an eye.

“To have her be around the very pony I saw behead my friend. The one who dragged poor Jotter Note out and just pulled her head off, with her screaming, right in front of me. I'm surrounded by ponies that hurt me, betrayed me or punish me, Murky. I don't have a life any more.”

Her front hooves curled up her own blanket, clutching it as though it were a small foal inside it, almost out of habit.

“I was a mother. I had friends and family and a son and... a best friend. I had safety, and a peaceful life before I came here but now I... I don't have any of that. Now, I'm only surrounded by pain and bad memories. Everypony's been taken from me, even my best friend. Even my son.”

Not for the first time, I found myself at a complete loss as to what to do, what to say, or how to act in this circumstance. I'd seen the bitter and angry side of Coral but here, amidst the rain and darkness of a covered Fillydelphia, in the wake of barely getting away with our lives, I was seeing the pain that drove such a temper.

"I gave up on hope a long time ago, Murky. There's nothing left for me out there. My son is in here. He's all I care about seeing, my little boy... so I'm sorry if I don't seem more eager about you and Glimmer gathering an escape attempt. Especially with that raider. I want nothing to do with that beast."

Standing beside the bed, I hopped up on my front hooves, pushing one forward to rest on hers. It was all I could really offer, a little show that, well... I felt sorry for her. A few tears dripped from my eyes. Coral glanced down at my hoof, before forcing a smile on her pained face, albeit a thin one, and rested her other front hoof above mine.

"Thank you, Murky. Please, don't feel shy to come by and say hello sometimes, alright? I'd like that. And... and when you see Glimmer, I... tell her, um..."

She seemed to sigh again, clenching my hoof tightly.

"Tell her that for all that's happened, I-I'm thankful for what she did there in the Mall. To help us. I can't forgive her, not yet, but it's... it's a step."

"I will."

"Thank you."

I left the room slowly, dragging my blanket around me to make the journey back to my cold and lonely own ward. Casting one last look across to her, I just saw a forced small smile toward me. With a timid wave, I trotted into the corridor, feeling more than a little wretched as it began to hit home that virtually every slave in here would have a similar story.

To my elation, I saw my fleece still had the thin and light battle saddle strapped to it, albeit devoid of actual weaponry, back at my own bed. Weathervane must have dropped them off when he was trying to find me. Gently, I hobbled to the window and stared out at Fillydelphia. Two floors up in the hospital, I had a view of an absolutely hellish landscape, a skyline being drowned under the rain that was only slowly beginning to lighten off. I pulled the blanket tighter as the wind whipped through the empty window pane.

As such, I didn't even hear Weathervane enter over the sound of so many ponies outside.

"You're back here? Good, get into your things, Murk. It's time for you to go."

The order weighed heavy on me. To have to leave this place of rest. I wasn't in any mood for more bad news. I just wanted to go and think after meeting poor Coral.

But I couldn't not ask.

"D-Doctor, is there any word on Protégé?" I played with my fleece in my hooves nervously.

He seemed to bite his rotting lips briefly, exhaling for a long time. Then he just shook his head and stamped forward, his magic pulling the blanket from around me.

"Everything I've heard down the line's not been good, kid. Poison, magical damage, nerve cluster severance, slit windpipe. You name it, it's pretty much happened. That slippery raider bastard knew his work like a Celestia-damned surgeon. Now come on, get into your fleece."

I silently offered up a prayer for his recovery to Celestia, and Luna as well to see him through the nights. But the doctor's insistence was unnerving me. Surely they didn't need this place that urgently? Weathervane seemed to pace on the spot, as though eager to get going, before glancing out the window.

"I didn't call you back here for no reason, Murk. You need to be on your way, before he comes looking for you."

"H-he?"

Weathervane's eyes closed, amidst a gurgling raspy sigh. He led me away from the window, quickly as though in a hurry, directing me toward the bed as his magic firmly slammed the ward door shut. Sitting beside the bed as though about to doctor for me again, the old ghoul just dropped his file on the surface before leaning on a hoof.

“You were with young Caduceus in there. He spoke highly of you and your friends. Naïve little boy, far as I was concerned, but he had talent. Kind of buck I used to have a dozen of in the old Ministry. Now he’s gone, and fuck me if I don’t feel it in what remains of my heart. Paternal instinct or some shit, I don’t know.”

He was stroking his stringy beard, before glancing across to me.

“You were with him when he died, Murk. Glimmerlight told me about how you’d stepped up to help them at the last moment. Now it isn’t my place to blame her for what Caduceus wanted to do or not. But she said you and Caduceus stuck together through most of the fighting.”

Well, technically that was true. It was mostly him pulling me along or keeping me in cover.

“So I guess, as a means of thanks, I feel I ought to tell you the hard truth here ahead of time.”

Weathervane seemed unwilling to meet my face. I shifted forward on the bed, trying to get his attention back.

“H-hard truth? Who do you mean by ‘he?’ N-not...”

The ghoul finally turned back, groaning and seeming rather internally angry. His eyes kept glancing to the door.

“I’m sorry, Murk. It goes against everything I am as a doctor to knowingly send somepony to harm. But since you’ve been here, Chainlink Shackles has assumed command of the Mall and its entire stock.”

I bit my lip, feeling a chill shoot down my spine.

“...including you.”

Weathervane’s magic caught me before I fell off the bed, my limbs locking up and growing stiff under the pain of the drop. I’d imagined it, worried about it, had nightmares about it. But here was the confirmation that I’d dreaded since I saw that ambitious looking sick grin come across The Master’s face after the battle. Feeling myself being held upright and slowly pushed to sit again, I let my head fall into my hooves. Those chains around my heart, upon my flank, embedded in my very soul felt like they were tightening ever more.

“The jury is out on Protégé back at Red Eye’s headquarters, where they’re keeping him in an unstable condition. Trying to decide if he’s fit to continue after all of this. But until then, it’s Shackles’ call, and he’s making the most of his time already. We’ve had reports already coming back from his work teams repairing the Mall. He’s changing things, adding mesh fencing, digging isolation pits... turning it into a real nightmare.”

Oh Goddesses. Glimmer and Brimstone were already there.

“But he made it very clear to me last time I went to check the wounded. He wanted you back the moment you could walk or he’d come collect you himself soon once the rain stopped.”

He had me. He really had me now. I could tell it was hurting Weathervane to tell me this, but it was a warning. I felt him trot over, pulling bandages around my wings tightly, enough to make me squirm and squeak in pain. Any crying I had was cut off by his attentions and muttering. The damp bandages held firmly around my restored feathers.

“These are soaked in an old potion type we used to give pegasi with muscle problems in their wings. It’s part of the first few stages to trying to see if you’ve not permanently lost movement in them.”

Oh! I turned my head to look at one, as though expecting to try to move it any instant, but I felt Weathervane’s clipboard tap me on the head.

“Don’t go bloody trying! Let the medicine do its work and stay off of them if you can! No fucking rolling, no fucking falling, and most fucking definitely no fucking squeezing around! The ligaments on your bones still need a lot of work, but if this medicine does its job after being a hundred years out of date... well, maybe it’ll help reduce the pain in your muscles. Can’t promise anything, of course. They won’t flap, but we’ll see. Now get your damned fleece on, the weather’s easing off, you don’t have long to get going.”

He was already throwing my sodden fleece to me. I hopped and struggled to get myself into it as fast as possible, feeling my body ache from the movements. It was still disgustingly damp and thick from soaked up rainwater, making me shiver and groan from the horrible feeling.

“Please, is there any way I can get away?! H-he’ll...”

“I don’t think you heard me, Murk.” Weathervane’s voice was stern, gurgling away in his ruined throat. “I said you don’t have long to get going.”

Outside, I could hear slavers wandering past the door before I caught Weathervane’s milky eyes. Oh, that... that’s what he meant...

But another sound broke through the thin wooden walls in this older part of the hospital. The sound of the main door being thrown open, coinciding almost freakishly with a roll of thunder from far in the distance away from Fillydelphia. Hopping to my hooves, both Weathervane and I stared at the ward’s door, located almost right above the main entrance.

“You! The nurse, yes, you! Where’s the little pegasus?”

“Who? Um... y-you mean-”

“The only wretched winged pony in the city! Number. Seven. Take me to him!”

“Yes! Yes, sorry! I will!”

Slowly backing away toward the window, I caught myself filled with terror. He was here! Oh Goddesses, I could hear his hooves on the wooden flooring! Could I do this? Defying The Master, at least until Protégé was back to keep myself safe? If he caught me...

The sound of Fillydelphia’s balefire siren wailing amidst my last attempt to evade him was still too fresh. The feeling of pursuit brimmed with terror and a lack of real confidence in myself. All the same, what choice did I have? I couldn’t let him get me. I couldn’t.

He’d almost broken me forever in under an hour before. He’d brought a strong mare like Sunny Days to terror. I couldn’t last till Protégé got back, not under him.

Weathervane spun to me, shoving my saddlebag over me.

“Come on, kid! They won’t dare take him somewhere else, we’ve got to fucking move!”

I had to get going. He was right. This was my only chance to stay away from The Master. Grabbing everything I could, finishing putting on my fleece and strapping on the saddlebag, throwing my journal and goggles into the bag quickly, I hopped from the bed and almost fell from my shoulder aching terribly on the spot.

The Master’s heavy tread thumped within the creaky building.

“Hurry, you cretin! You think I have all day? Take me to my property.”

His hooves were coming upstairs! Pulled up by Weathervane, we moved into the corridor. The stairs were on the right, a large shadow forming around them. Quickly, Weathervane pushed me to go back down the corridor out of the ward. I couldn’t move like him. Limping, feeling my leg seize up and the cuts across my back sting under the damp fleece, I trailed badly. One large cough sent me staggering. Weathervane moved back to try and pull me, but every heaving step felt slow. I... I couldn't properly stand.

"Come on, Murky!" He rasped, "I told you, it's psychosomatic! It's just in your head, your leg works fine!"

I wasn't going to make it. I could hear him coming up! I had to do something, our line away had been cut.

Dropping, I tugged myself behind a filing cabinet in the hallway, pressing my back to it before The Master entered the ward's corridor. I could barely fit behind it, and waved Weathervane away.

"T-this is his ward, Master."

The door was slammed open again. I heard Weathervane trot into the ward three doors down. The Master would surely know to come to him if seen, so the Doctor wisely stayed hidden.

"Rest's over, Number Seven! Time to come play."

The horrid waiting that followed was punctuated only by a wretched silence. The Master was brutal, loud, and imposing. But when he was silent. Slowly, I only heard the growing, bubbling, and throaty scowl under his breath. He was in the room. I had a chance! Moving as quiet as I could, using everything I knew to stay unheard, I began to creep toward where Weathervane waited. If he came out now...

"Heard me coming, eh? Oh, I know you can hear me, Number Seven! You can't run forever, not from me! Now come out, your Master demands you come out!"

The words slapped across my mind, a life of instinctive response kicking in that led me to stop on the spot. The everlasting chain and the born slaver for the born slave. He was my rightful Master by birth and... and...

Weathervane grabbed me, dragging me with all his magical might down the corridor, a flare of his horn dulling much of the pain. I almost skidded my hooves before reality caught up. The Master's spell of mental trickery broken, I began to panic and run after the doctor. No time to sneak!

"I HEAR you!"

The horrid thumping of those massive hooves pervaded the crunch of the nurse being knocked aside. The chase was on! We tore down the wards, the sound of dragging chains and bellowed commands following in our wake. Weathervane threw a supply door open with his magic, pulling me inside and locking the door behind us.

"Come on! There's a back stairwell to the lower operating room below! Fuck sake he's determined... but no more. I'm not letting one more fucking pony get taken by him if I can help it!"

We were halfway down the thin stairwell when the door was smashed asunder. The ponies within the operating theatre were already in the middle of something, prompting many complaints and curses as their senior surgeon and myself galloped past. I fought to not let the edges of my vision blur from terrified and panicked tears, simply following Weathervane. Bursting out into the main corridor, he led me to a back supply room for the bedsheets. Knocking open the window, Weathervane began throwing piles of musty bedding out of it and down the large drop into the courtyard. We could hear The Master screaming and demanding the ponies tell him where we'd gone. I doubted they'd lie. Pushing me to the window, Weathervane knelt down, looking me eye to eye.

"Find who you can to help. Keep away till Protégé's back and this cuntknuckle's gone. I'll leave my basement open if you ever need me. Stay low, kid."

Hope was falling, but there was one little thing to hold onto for now. Weathervane was foul, rude, aggressive, and lacking in pleasant nature, but he'd done nothing but help since the day I'd met him. Even after everything he'd gone through over two hundred years of hell, after everypony he'd lost. A little spirit of goodwill emerged in me, potentially the last for a while. I hopped to all fours, facing him and trying to put on a smile, my mane flopping over my face.

"Th-thank you! For everything, I mean-you're... I mean, I really appreciate all you've done for me!"

A little look in his eye stood out to me, like he'd been shocked ever so briefly. Curious, I tilted my head. The doctor just shook his head and then nodded it toward the window.

"Nothing. Just a little deja fuckin'vu. Now scram, son. Stay off those wings and keep away from any trouble. Just hope your best that Protégé will be back soon. Stay safe till then."

Even as I clambered onto the windowsill and saw the looming drop, I glanced back at him. I could see a small photo clipped to the top of his patient records clamped to his decaying uniform.

Clearly Coral wasn't alone with that kind of pain.

"Number Seven! You know it's pointless!"

"Go!" Weathervane pushed me.

Yelping, I fell, tumbling the twenty feet until feeling the breathtaking slap of the mattresses under me. Saved by the cushioned landing, and fighting to try and gallop off the bouncy surface, I flopped my way to the gravel. I heard the sound of a doorway being thrown open above me.

"What are you fucking doing here? Have you no respect for a hos-"

The sound of somepony being smacked across the face hard echoed from the room. I galloped away, running through the hospital gates. Diving into the nearest old crater, I curled up, ignoring even the small puddle that stung and burned my coat.

"You can't run forever, Number Seven! You know who is meant to own you! It's all you're meant for! I'll find you! Oh, I'll find you!"

I whimpered, covering my ears, but bellowing from the window, knowing I was out here, close by but having escaped for now. But he knew...

"Leaving your friends with me now, eh? What a proud pony you must be, galloping off and leaving them! You'll be begging me to take you in someday, Number Seven! BEGGING!"

Crying loudly, sticking to the shadows, I simply ran away. Scared, guilty, and unable to even deny it, I just ran, alone, into the growing darkness of a storm-tossed Fillydelphia, The Master's cackling laughter at my back.

The area around me, although within a hundred feet of the refinery I'd worked so many days in, felt like an entirely different city.

Trotting on three legs, hobbling my way slowly on tired muscles, I stuck to the shadows as best I could in the darker areas of Fillydelphia, sweating and praying that I didn't hear the shout behind me. I needed somewhere quiet to go to ground.

The storm had passed, but the thick black clouds seemed to dominate the sky, leaving Fillydelphia in an almost perpetual night. I passed factories pulsing internally with an orange glow, pits that cast light around their mesh tops, and saw the burning barrels around where the guards stood in their roosts.

What now? I had ran into the night, but soon the hunt would be on. I needed somewhere to go.

No, not somewhere to go. Some*pony* to go to. Loneliness began to eat at me, the same I'd felt every time I'd been separated and left to fend on my own. But I had no-one. They were trapped, all of them within The Master's clutches. Guilt churned in my stomach, even though I knew they would want me to do this.

The area was deserted, likely due to the threat of continued rain, leaving me alone in a small park amongst blackened, long-dead trees. Shadows stretched like crooked fingers across the ground, enveloping and twisting upon the irregular breezes. I didn't want to linger in this strange, darkened side of Fillydelphia too long. Barb was gone, but the shadows still seemed to promise vengeance. The horrid wonder if I'd even killed the right Barb still taunted me. He'd cheated death at least twice before my eyes.

Hooves quaking, I picked up the pace, clattering back onto old roads that would, if I followed it, lead me back behind the pegasus airport I'd visited so long ago in a quest for my journal. I'd been alone then as well.

Eventually, feeling my shoulder aching, I stopped and dropped into hiding behind a series of large rubbish tips. I felt tired, but I couldn't stay here. The slavers would be looking for me. I was now a runaway trapped inside the Walls! I needed some place to stay! To be able to sleep, and to find food! Even in my hiding spot here, I could hear slavers galloping in the distance. Slavers always ran around, but how was I to know what they'd be hunting for? Was it me? Would every slaver know my face? Would slaves be offered a reward to turn me in?

Kneeling down, I did the only thing I knew I could to wish for help. Taking off my weighty saddlebag and calmly sitting my journal safely atop it, I gently set my front hooves before me. Lowering my head to them, I simply asked Luna for aid in this dark night, sniffing and having to repeat words lost as my voice began to heave amongst tears. To seek the strength from above that I could stand this rampantly lonely path I'd been set until Protégé was well again.

"Please. I just need somepony."

The wind picked up, just like in the hospital. Following a squeak of shock from me, the journal blew open, flickering madly from beginning to end. Reaching out a hoof, I stamped it down, stopping the pages, only to find the one pony I did have left staring back.

The mare, smiling so kindly off the page. The first pony I'd met in here who had been nice to me. Who had been there even before Littlepip. She was still out there. I didn't even remember doing this picture! Likely from my maddened rush of drawings from just before the Pit. At a loss for all direction or hope, about to be hunted by the entire city if they had to, I had been shown the one pony I could go to!

Picking up my materials, I immediately made tracks toward the place this had all began.

I had to return to the FunFarm, hopefully before The Master figured it out too.

There was a horrible suspicion in my mind that I wasn't the first one to think of it.

It took some degree of courage. I knew the way, the exact place to go to, and even remembered who to look for. But to actually take step after step and return to where it had all started held enough emotion for me that as I came closer, my mind ran with conflicting fears and apprehension.

To go back to the place I'd spent the most time in during my stay here. Whiplash had been the first I really remembered being around. Before that it had just become a blur. I didn't even remember where I'd been before that. Only that eventually I ended up in the pigsty so quickly that it had shocked me to wake up there after my first night under him.

I took the only route I remembered to that side of Fillydelphia. The same one The Master had dragged me down in humiliation after my grand failure. Trotting it in reverse, sticking in the darkness by the side of the better lit main roads, it felt painfully lonely. There were others, there always were. But compared to the crowds that had galloped from their places of rest, work, or defence to watch a pegasus be displayed as a prisoner, the few huddled groups still around made it feel empty. Clustered around burning barrels in the ruins of mills and shops, slaves shivered in the wind, or stared with lost and hopeless eyes at anypony passing by. A mare followed me with a deathly gaze, one eye long lost to a large and clearly infected scald across her face and muzzle. Whimpering and tearing my eyes away, I maintained my advance across Fillydelphia to find my destination. Not once while travelling this city did I ever fail to be stunned by the sheer scale of the suffering in here.

It was easy to believe. I was part of it.

The FunFarm was not particularly difficult to locate once in the area I recognised. Even at night, I spotted certain signs or buildings to guide me. I passed the last workshop the mare had been chained to, where she had stood up to The Master. Wicked Slit's factory loomed on the next street over, smoke belching from the one hastily patched chimney to join the thick black clouds above. After that it was easy. The road I had walked a hundred times to and from the places of work felt all too achingly familiar under my hooves. Even that one guard on the gantry above that ran from factory to housing where slavers stayed seemed to watch me as he always had. Staring at him, I almost blundered into an advancing caged wagon carrying a dozen ponies looking terrified beyond measure. Newly acquired ponies about to learn what it was to become slaves.

I tried to look neutral, not to look in a hurry or guilty of anything. I dearly hoped they hadn't been informed to look for me yet.

But then I was past, the guard turning away, and there it was. The giant barn, the helter-skelter's multi coloured top, a wrecked rollercoaster... the landmarks stood out above the houses as a clear direction. Soon enough, I found myself at the busy main entrance to the fenced FunFarm. Looking in from the main road, my eyes couldn't help but spot the Petting Zoo den near the entrance over the scrap wall. I wouldn't have to head there. If Moose or Lemon saw me I doubted they would welcome me all too well.

That thought was odd. I'd faced down a raider chieftain, why did they still scare me? Why was that feeling still in my breast and making my heart pump faster?

The answer, it seemed, was familiarity. I could feel my body falling into the same routines, the same consistent obedience. Even as I trotted forward, I found myself headed for the barrier gateway that made it easier to go right to the Petting Zoo, even though I had to head the other way.

Of course... it was still there. The one mocking imagery that had repeatedly unnerved me that sat near the mirror I had once gazed at my own body in. The waving form of Pinkie Pie was still going. Still noisily creaking that arm to wave its endless goodbye to anypony passing by the front of the FunFarm.

Shivering at the odd standee, I pushed into the FunFarm. This place had grown since I was last here, with slaves now taking cover under most of the carnival stands in groups of four or five. A wealth of accents gave rise to the very clear notion that Red Eye's reach was indeed expanding. But I had only one objective. I knew where she resided, and where I would find her. I even still knew the shifts for the FunFarm dens off by heart, back when I'd never dared miss a single one. The bumper plough den would be in a rest period right now.

Unable to stop myself, after testing my hoof on the ground and finding the confidence to use my shoulder again, I began to move at a canter toward it. Passing the Hall of Mirrors where I had once prepared my daring escape, I simply tunnel visioned myself to find her. Yet as I passed the Hall, a faint sound of crying began to eek into my ears from it. Some slave had run off to cry. I knew the feeling.

Trying my hoof on the ground a little more, I found that my shoulder didn't hurt that much now if I really thought about who I was going to see! Just remember, psy... cocolocorian scars, or whatever the fancy word he'd used was! Up ahead, the sheltered area began to appear. A simple shallow pit covered by a wooden roof lined with mesh. To think she'd been this close the whole time I'd been in the Petting Zoo!

Cantering up, I stuck to the side and ducked behind the game stands lining the wall toward the den. Sticking to shadows, passing by the half sleeping overseer was no problem provided I stick behind the stands, close to the outer wall of the FunFarm. I didn't dare allow anypony else to see me right now. With trepidation, I leaned forward, poking my head around. Oh please let her be here!

I saw the slaves lying upon pathetically thin rugs on the concrete floor, perhaps a couple dozen at most. Carefully, I scrutinised each one, not knowing how she might have changed since. Every boil-infested and half-choking slave I cast my eye across held no resemblance, a buck there, a mare too tall afterwards. Disappointment after disappointment. A group were mingled at the back, talking quietly in the far corner, leaving me unable to see them all. Well, one thing for it.

I advanced, slipping into the slave den as though I was one of them and limping (all too realistically) between those suffering nightmares in their sleep. Worry began to cross my mind. If the overseer woke up, I might end up trapped as one of his crew, simply for The Master to come pick me up.

Taking a sharp breath, I spotted someone. A cream mare! She looked up as I passed, but under the oil that stained her mane I saw a bright green. Backing away, apologising for staring profusely, I set another slave off swearing madly when I tripped over his slumbering form.

"Shit! Watch it, pal!"

"I'm sorry! I'm so-no, no!"

Despite my waving hooves, I was bucked off him, landing just short of the far group and clutching my shoulder. Okay... that was definitely real pain that time. Why was it always my poor shoulders and hooves? The group turned to me, revealing two ponies that had been hidden to my sight. The view of a light-orange mane grabbed my eyes, forcing me to stagger up. The wide, gentle, and hurt eyes stared from behind a mask of burns that had torn the features from their face.

Oh please no...

"Hey-uh-buddy, you alright? Never seen-uh, you before."

It was a stallion. The burns were so severe that I hadn't been able to tell by facial features alone. That meant she wasn't here.

But if she wasn't here that meant she'd been moved or somepony had got here first.

I remembered the ponies I'd heard running quickly by me.

"We often will meet people only briefly, know so little about them and never know the truth.

Fleeting glimpses and random luck to bring two ponies together, never to meet again."

Some of the last words she'd said to me after saving my life in this very FunFarm from that very rollercoaster were of how unlikely we were to ever meet again. The nameless mare, the first kind face I'd ever seen in Fillydelphia.

Gone...

Dropping into a small heap upon the floor of the Bumper Plough pit, I just curled up, feeling unable to avoid simply falling back into my old familiar emotional reaction I'd spent weeks in this very FunFarm doing. That same feeling of helpless loss and inability to change something that my masters had done, exuded through a few sobbing tears. Even as other slaves scoffed or offered confused queries, I just ignored them before eventually galloping off past the bewildered overseer, my eyes tightly closed.

She wasn't here.

I was still alone.

I'd hidden in an old food tent, ducking behind the counter until the moment had passed, simply staring at her picture before me, feeling like a piece of my newfound heart had simply been lost. A certain hope, just gone. I'd run away from my Master, seeking to avoid him for as long as possible within Fillydelphia until Protégé could protect me again. I'd had one pony that mattered I could go to! One pony I could take with me and hide with together! Once Protégé was around we could join him to keep her safe too!

But no... even as I drifted from the food tent, drained and feeling my hopes crushed, I just aimlessly wandered. Not wanting to just give up and retreat to whatever dark hole I could find to make my home, I kept trying to pretend that maybe she was just on an odd shift! Maybe she'd be back soon? Passing the helter-skelter, where I had learned to laugh and imagine better days, I eventually began to slowly and vaguely return to the gates; my eyes still wet. Even so, I took the long way, trotting in the slim hope she would return any minute.

Every mare I passed my eyes darted to, uncaring if they felt weirded out by me staring carefully for any familiar sign. Who was I kidding, I didn't know her name or even her cutie mark! I'd never looked or hadn't remembered. Even my drawings were just blank. With Glimmerlight, Brimstone, and soon to be even Coral out of reach; with the loss of Protégé and with the failure of my trip, I felt desperately lonely. The thought of going back to being on my own to deal with all of Fillydelphia's problems in a constant running battle to avoid everypony terrified me beyond compare.

Every so often I would spy a certain mane or hear a chime of a voice, prompting me to gallop backwards and try to find her. I even crept near the Petting Zoo once, before quickly departing the moment I heard Whiplash's commands start up. He wouldn't let a sighting of me go unknown.

I had travelled here for one reason and one reason only. To meet her. I couldn't just leave. I needed this to be true! She couldn't be gone! Not after Caduceus had just been taken like he was! Not somepony else! It wasn't fair! From place to place, den to den, and all the way from the ice rink in the Pit to the House of Mirrors beside me now, nothing but constant heartbreak as I began to gradually realise that Fillydelphia had claimed another victim.

The scream caught me so off guard that I felt myself join in.

Frozen on the spot in shock, I quickly pieced together the location of the sound; from the place of crying earlier.

The Hall of Mirrors.

But it had been a female scream! What if some slavers were trying to... oh dear. Somepony must have found that poor pony in there trying to hide! I felt my hooves wanting to flee, but in the wake of what I had been through, what I had seen other ponies give their lives to do, I could not run in shame, not now. That and one little hope still pervaded in my mind.

I couldn't fight. Even after Barb I knew I couldn't. But if I could maybe distract them and let somepony get away it would be enough. It had to be.

Steeling my heart and hopping into the main entrance, I found myself immediately surrounded by fractured shards of glass displaying twisted and broken sights of myself. Wooden ponies, carved to be like Pinkie Pie, giggled on the walls. The paint was peeling from her face, leaving a horrific, almost clown-like look... I trotted quietly on, advancing into the darkness that swelled within the abandoned building. Hearing loud crying, gasping, and a fading whimper; I began to highly regret not having Rarity's Grace any longer. What if I was too late? What had the attacker done? I had to speak, I reasoned, I had to startle them to stopping, then creep around them.

"H-hello?"

The whimpering ceased on the spot. Instead, I heard somepony breathing quietly, trying to stay quiet. Hooves began to fall as quietly as they could. They were trying to ambush me as well! Just hold on, whoever you are.

Around me, my reflected self expanded or shrunk to skeletal sizes (more than usual) while I crept across the broken glass that surrounded my hooves. The darkness seemed to warp with the strange mirrored surfaces everywhere, giving the distinctly odd feeling I'd found when Barb had stalked me.

What if a Shade had escaped? It might be one of them! I could still hear the crying near the centre, the hooves having stopped. Soon after, the crying stopped the moment my hoof scuffed a shard, making a small tinkle. I imagined a knife being held to their throat. No, they couldn't! I was going to help them. If I couldn't get the mare back I was going to help somepony! Be it her or not!

Emerging to the one spot I had once sat and prepared for the bravest act I had ever made in my life until then, I now couldn't even dare poke my head around. Instead, pulling my little mirror on a stick out, I lay it gently around to use the wall mirrors and try to spot any movements in the shadows.

Nothing. Nothing in the main room at all.

What had I gotten into? They weren't in the centre. That meant they were creeping around the corridors somewhere, hidden behind a mask of reflections. Stepping gently back, I turned to face out, moving past a wall of mirrors and-

The shape of a pony in shadows came directly at me from behind. I screamed, high-pitched and shocked as I kicked up glass in my rush to run from the shadowy figure. A great cry pierced my ears as I saw it suddenly move too. Charging backward, another pony ran directly at me. Immediately, we both skidded to a halt and dove to the left in perfect sync. Stopping to try and spot them again, I simply felt dizzy amongst this maze. Suddenly, another scrawny figure galloped across three surfaces around me, their hooves sounding from somewhere completely different.

I moved again, squealing in shock as that pony from before re-appeared beside me and dove away at the same moment I did. Which was the attacker? Wait, which was my reflection? Confusion and fear drove me to simply buck the glass until it broke and put my back to it. That other figure zipped past once more, a ghost shown only in the mirrors about me, leading me to head in the other direction to avoid whoever it was hunting me.

Galloping, I ran-

Directly into them behind me. Colliding heads, we both fell over. My vision whirled, seeing stars as my scar ached at the collision. Falling, I even felt shards of glass nip at my side through the thick fleece. But the pony dropped atop me, prompting me to thrash when their hooves pushed and struggled to pin me. Rolling end over end, we fell back into the main room before throwing one another apart. They weren't very strong, I realised! They had to be another-

-slave.

Eyes adjusting to the darkness quickly, I caught the whirling sight of somepony staggering backwards and tripping into the broken mirrors of a far wall, holding their head while they got up.

While she got up.

A dirty mane whipping round to reveal her eyes locked around at me, squinting to see me in the darkness.

"Who-who's there!? Who is that!? Leave me alone!"

It was her!

Oil-stained and ash-marked, I still recognised the long mane, light-orange and tinged with faint red streaks above a cream coat that had been soiled and dirtied by a life of slavery. Her golden-hazel eyes were wide, filled with terror, staring across the room without blinking from where she now leaned against the wall.

"It's alright! It's-it's me..."

Feeling my mouth gape and my heart both freeze and lift at the same time, with nerves and a desire of absolute elation and relief, I stepped out of the shadows that I had blended in with. Across the room, amongst mirrors that threw our reflections onto both floor and walls amongst the shards, I saw her simply stare in disbelief.

"Murky?"

A few hesitant trots and rubbing of eyelids took place, both of us almost unwilling to believe in the good fortune of another meeting, of us finally finding one another again after so long. After both believing the other had been gone for good.

Five seconds felt like five days in Fillydelphia, for how long it took our minds to catch up and realise.

Before we both simply ran forward, staggering and desperate for mutual comfort amongst the darkness, falling into one another's thankful and relieved embrace.

As much as I would have wanted to simply hold this moment and lose track of all the pain and nightmares the outside world held, we split soon after. Moreso for I could feel her shivers. She was terrified of something. Settling back, the mare gathered herself, holding a hoof across her opposite front leg.

"Are we safe? I heard you scream and-and I thought somepony was-"

"No, no I'm alone. Murky, I-what are you doing here? I thought you were... I mean I heard about the riot in the Mall and executions and..."

She stopped, wiping away the long mane from her face. The mare had shrunk since I last saw her, starvation beginning to set in as it did with everypony in here. We were just two weakened ponies together now.

"I got away from The Master. I had to find you, let you know I'm still here and-and to get you out of here. He'll be coming soon! I had to know you're still safe."

She smiled, apparently out of relief, reaching forward to take one of my hooves, as though seeking physical proof that it was indeed me before her. It quickly occurred to me that everything I'd learned about sneaking about to stay safe could frighten somepony who saw my vague shape creeping around. She must have seen my reflection too and run from it. In a weird way, it was almost funny. We'd both been scared of the others reflection. Now, settled with her proof, the mare sighed.

"It's so simple to say and easy to understate but, I'm so glad you're alive. Why are-what did you-oh, sorry I'm..."

Flustered was the word. Even without me saying anything she shivered, drawn and pale while her eyes kept glancing to the sides at the mirrors. Looking around, I moved closer and held her hoof. She'd helped me enough, I wasn't going to let this be one-sided any longer. She looked like absolute hell, her eyes drawn from lack of sleep and overwork. But more than any they had that same look I'd seen in a mirror so many times. The one I gave when I had been shocked or frightened more than normal.

"What happened to scare you? I heard you crying earlier I think, then a scream and just galloped in and I thought somepony had caught somepony else or something."

The mare felt quiet, eyes looking to the floor. We were absolutely alone in the empty halls, my ears would hear anypony on this messy floor. What had scared her?

"I come in here sometimes to get away sometimes, just to avoid the others who steal my food. I can't stop them so I just stay away from the fighting by creeping off here to let it out sometimes. Or to think about, well, you know. How I'm going to go about finding him"

It was clear who she meant, her lover. I even saw the sad look in her eyes that told all. She still hadn't been reunited with her special somepony, the one who meant so much to her.

"I'm sorry."

"They told me I'd see him again, Murky. The slave master who organised those of us being sent to the Pit even told me he'd make sure he was sent back to me afterwards! But... but that's not what scared me. I came in here to get away and I think I bumped one of the mirrors and..."

I'd never seen her this unsteady. She had always been so gentle and carefully held. But I followed her eyes to the side and felt a cold stab through my heart.

She was looking directly at the mirror that I had long tried to forget. The one that my tired and terrified mind had once seen something other than myself in. Hidden in here, preparing to make my escape, I had touched the same mirror she undoubtedly had now. It had shown me my own image as a little colt, wings outstretched and looking with naïve eyes yet to be burdened by the life he would lead.

“That mirror, Murky! That mirror! It shows us at our worst! Something unnatural that gets into your very soul; I can feel it! I saw myself with him, only he wasn’t there.”

The mare turned, a brief flare of a temper arising to scowl at the dark glass. Slowly, she began to trot toward it.

“It was just me, acting as though I had somepony I dearly cared about right beside me without any image of them there at all! Leaving me with just the horrid realisation that after so long in this city it’s all starting to blur together! I’ve forgotten so much, Murky, like they’re just beating it out of my mind through illness, starvation and-and just being locked into the same thing day after day after day!”

Stamping a hoof on each repeated term, she finally raised up, smacking a hoof against the mirror hard. The fragile looking glass shimmered but remained solid, knocking the mare back a foot. Gasping, like she’d just come up from drowning in cold water, her eyes returned to it, seeing herself standing to one side. While I didn’t know if she saw something I didn’t, the space to her left was utterly empty, as though somepony else could have been standing with her.

“But it’s starting to do that to my memories of him as well, Murky. It’s like everything I know about him is just fading and blurring before my eyes! What he looked like or his name, like my memories are just falling apart and getting harder to remember!”

Standing off to the side, I saw her face in the mirror, lines down her face where the tears had moved through the ash below her eyes. Her eyes were lit with anger, frustration, and outright heartbreak. Heedless of the cursed mirror, staring right at it, pacing on the spot, the mare continued letting out all the pain and anguish Fillydelphia had brought to her. One hoof on the frame, her face came to within inches of the surface, glaring as though in hatred at her own mirrored image.

“What have they done to me, Murky? Is it the work in here? Or has somepony taken my only memories of the buck I loved and made it so I don’t know it? Have I just forgotten? The mare I saw in that thing wasn’t who I am anymore, maybe a long time ago. Why can’t I just have him back? Why can’t I remember!?”

Almost resting her face on the mirror, I saw her shoulders quake. One mare, alone with her reflection, one she had apparently shared with somepony else dear to her long ago. Goddesses, how long had she been in Fillydelphia?

Meek and nervous, I stood nearby, out of the gaze of that mirror. But seeing her like this, every instinct led me to wander forward, trotting up, out of the shadows, to be by her left hand side and place a hoof on her shoulder before looking at ourselves in the mirror. Myself as the wasted slave in a threadbare fleece with a light utility saddle; and her, clad only in a thin short rag, beside me. Two slaves reflected upon the reality of themselves. We’d both been hurt, but at least I could understand what she saw. The mirror had shown the same thing for me. A pony I no longer was.

“Y-you’re not alone. I’m still here. I know what it’s like. I don’t remember my mother. They made me forget her too, long ago.”

I was shocked internally, to admit that to somepony I’d known so briefly. But it was the mare. Somehow I just knew she needed to hear it. Glancing to one another, we simply moved closer again, hugging lightly until she could stem her tears. Before, I had felt cared for by her. Now after knowing what friendship really was, I knew I had to care in return, give my share of comfort.

Share and care... okay, you win this round, Pinkie.

But I had not come here without reason. The Master knew about her, understood she was a way to force my hoof. We had to go, escape into the night together, and hide until somepony better was back in charge! I couldn't leave her to be just another victim in The Master's rampage to find me. Stepping back, I drew myself up, finding her not actually more than an inch or two taller than myself.

"Look, I've found other ponies, good ponies. I'm so sorry I failed and scared you but..."

I looked from side to side, before returning, conspiratorially to her tearstained face, placing a hardened look as best I could on mine.

"We're getting out of here. We have a plan! There's a nicer master. He'll take better care of all of us until we can do it! I want you to come with me. Please. I can't leave you behind. I don't think I'd be able to escape to safety and know you're still in here, but we need to get you away from the FunFarm. You. You and I. We'll go hide in the ruins!"

She seemed stunned, looking at me as though she was seeing an entirely new pony than the terrified wretch she'd met not so long ago, being dragged by The Master through the streets. But she still shook her head.

"I can't. Not without him. We were both going to escape, or neither of us was. That's what we said to one another. I'm so sorry, Murky. I need to learn who he was, and why I feel like he meant so much to me. He was strong, and dedicated to finding freedom before I lost him. We always looked out for one another, stole food together, or shared the punishments. I can't abandon him. I know you're trying but..."

"Then..." I felt awful interrupting her, trying to fight down that she had done the one thing I had been unable to less than an hour ago. "Then, we'll go get him first!"

The mare just blinked, silently repeating my words as though confused by the very meaning of them. I stood my ground, trying to keep what courage I had been lent by proving myself against Barb from faltering. I'd run through an underground ghoulish bunker, two Ministries and a Stable. I could do this... right?

"The big Fun Barn, the slaver headquarters. It's got all the details of slaves involved in stuff like the Pit, right? It has to! They're still repairing it since the Stable Dweller wrecked a whole bunch of it so we... we get in and find out where he is! And..."

Another thought crossed my mind. Her buck wasn't the only pony we could look for in there. One more I knew myself was inside.

"...and somepony that matters to me is inside there too, badly hurt. I need to see him."

"Another slave?"

I paused for a second, before nodding.

"Yes... yes he is. We can go together and find them both, then escape! Wait for a better time and get back to the others, and get ready to break out of Fillydelphia!"

Lightly stomping a hoof on the floor, carefully avoiding the glass, I felt the saddle's mouthpiece whip out rather by accident. My eyes glanced down at it, before retracting it slowly. Well, didn't that just ruin the grandeur of the moment.

But the mare seemed to not care for it. She simply stood before me. Finally, that wonderfully caring and kind smile drifted across her features, if a little weak. The hope returned to her expression.

"I don't know where you came from, Murky, but I'm so glad I met you. Remember what I said? That good attracts good in places of great evil? Well, you met me when you were at your worst and now here you are when I was in despair. They say that's harmony at its greatest; that there'll always be a friend willing to help you, no matter how dark it seems. Are-are we really going to try and do this?"

I had asked myself the same question a thousand times since I had first met her, in regards to everything. But here, now, back at the start with the mare that I hadn't stopped thinking about in some way to meet again. I knew I wouldn't abandon her to her plight. We were going to go in, find her lover, find Protégé to let him know that I was avoiding Shackles, and then see if he had anypony he knew who could help us. Yes! I had a direction again. A goal to chase after until we could get back on track! Oh yes, we were doing this...

"Yes... I guess we are... oh and-"

She glanced back at me properly, rather than just through the mirror's reflection.

"T-thank you. It's been so hard and I've been so scared since I saw you. Below the ground in the dark or having my dreams crushed but you helped me be able to do any of it. Things you said stayed with me. So, thank you."

She smiled gently, clearly trying to force her own fears back.

"It's not been easy for me either, Murky. I don't think I could have kept going on my own if you taking a run at that wall hadn't inspired me to want to show that same courage. The little brave pegasus who risked it all for just one impossible chance. But we're back together now, ready to help each other. Each the other's little light in the darkness right now, huh? Filly doesn't feel natural under this storm. It's like some dreamworld. A nightmare. Sometimes I just get this feeling like this city has something very wrong with it at its core."

That was true. Times had changed now. Amidst my new threat to stay away from the Mall as much as I could, the entire city suddenly felt lethal. For a second, the idea of going right into the lion's den simply felt insane. But both of us needed something in there, something bad. Without Protégé's protection, I was done for in the long term. Without closure on those she had lost, I doubted she would last much longer either.

"Y-yeah, it is. I think we should go, before anypony else comes looking. I'm not meant to be here, The Master wants me back."

"Oh, Murky. I'm so sorry. So yes, let's get moving and get this done. We'll properly catch up when we're all together and safe."

She began to move toward the exit, but I hesitated, casting one more look at the mirror as though expecting to see something else within it. But I only saw the mare trotting away from me. She was limping, clearly nursing some strain or wound, but despite all the terror knowing of the monster that would come pursuing me, knowing she was here with me just helped settle me enough to not break down again. I tried to smile, managing a thin grimace as I saw her briefly stop to look at another mirror.

I almost felt guilty, but I couldn't exactly not wonder how she might have looked had she not been in here. I could almost see it, past the tangled mane that would have been long and wavy, seeing past the shrunken stomach, or to mentally remove those red shackle marks and the filth of living in this city from her body. I wondered just how bright the cream, orange and red that made up her coat and mane might be. Trying to picture it made me wonder just how I could have looked had I not been trapped in slavery all my life...

But then my eyes caught something else, just as she turned, I saw it. I witnessed her cutie mark.

Three basic shapes, three golden yellow ponies. An earth pony, a unicorn... and a pegasus.

"W-wait!" I stammered out, turning to canter after her, stretching my hoof forward as the mare made to leave the building. We had planning to do, but the question couldn't wait any longer. I built all my courage, wondered for too long. Now that I saw her mark, the trio of ponies there as one image, I couldn't lose the chance this time. 'The Mare' wouldn't escape unknown this time.

Seeing those golden eyes turn around, raising an eyebrow in confusion, I stopped; shuffling a hoof and trying to fight the embarrassment that I even had to ask.

"What, um, what's your name? We never got a chance to..."

"Oh? Didn't I say?" She seemed shocked, that gentle and warm look passing through the hurt body of a poor slave to remind me of how she could look. Not awaiting a response other than a dull shake of my head, she smiled and gathered herself. Then, she spoke one word. One simple word that suddenly made so much sense between how she had been so important in my life and the imagery of her cutie mark. Of how she hadn't discriminated or hated me because I had wings, of how she saw such harmony filled potential in ponies as one great whole.

That one word... one beautiful word.

Unity.

Her name... was Unity.

The moment we exited the Hall of Mirrors, my heart nearly stopped on the spot.

"Gone!? What do you mean, gone?"

I didn't even look. I simply grabbed Unity and dragged her as fast as I could over the road and back into the food court opposite. There were dozens of tents, stalls, wagons, and small buildings crammed around one large eating area. The benched area had been turned into one of the worst slave dens in the FunFarm, utterly exposed to the elements. But beside it, amongst the slew of small food dispensaries, was a veritable maze of hiding spots I had used before.

"Murky? What is it-oh no!"

Poking our heads around, I could clearly see her overseer quivering in fear below the massive form of The Master. He was surrounded by half a dozen of his loyalists, twisted-looking slavers of all shapes and sizes. Stomping his hoof upon the tarmac, The Master leaned right over the slaver.

"So you're saying that you let a little pegasus come in and take her? Is that right?"

"No, no! I didn't!"

"So then you're saying you didn't let them. So you failed at your job, eh? It's one way or the other."

"She sometimes goes off! Old... Old Grizzly gets her jobs! Please, I don't know where she is right now!"

I could feel Unity's hoof tightening around my own, the immediacy of my warning clearly sinking in that The Master was after her as a link to me.

"Then I guess I better go pay him a visit. You stay here. I'll be back once I've decided what your punishment shall be."

"Please! I..."

“Quiet! A slaver who allows his stock to run wild and knows about it does not deserve to be a slaver at all! Report to the Mall tonight. Bring four of your stock that you... hehe... don’t mind missing. Maybe I’ll even let you have a chance to not become one yourself”

“Y-yes... Master...”

Seeing him turning, we dove backwards, hiding behind the food tent, clutching one another as The Master stomped not five feet from us. Suddenly, he stopped. Biting my lip, I just held my head down, feeling Unity quiver in fear just as much as I. The Master sniffed, before growling. Oh Goddesses, could he smell me?

“Hmph... stinking FunFarm. Land of the hopeless. Get the griffons to look for those two. They’re now officially runaways. Just make sure they’re brought to me.”

Allowing him time to put some distance between us and them, we hid and only moved when things had gone silent, finally daring to even breathe out. The hunt was on, but I hoped that our journey toward the FunBarn would be the last place The Master would expect.

Unity had proven apt at staying low and quiet, as any slave smaller or weaker than the average no doubt did. Sticking close, she followed me silently. All the way I found myself looking back, not because I lost track of her, but simply to remind me that she was there. That I had found her in time. It almost felt strange, knowing her name. ‘The Mare’ had been such a figure of my wishes and dreams to meet the mysterious pony again, but to now know her on a name-to-name basis felt almost bizarre. Sort of how it had felt to learn the Stable Dweller’s name from Protégé.

“So, how are we going to get in anyway, Murky? This is Red Eye’s fortress after all. Not exactly open for visitors.”

Stopping short of a main bypass toward the FunFarm’s children’s area, I hid behind a cardboard cutout of a giant toothless alligator and cast my eyes to the Barn. Still under repair, I saw ponies hanging from some sections on utility saddles similar to my own (In my mind it was still a battle saddle. No matter what anypony told me!) with grapple hooks and tools, mid-construction. I highly doubted they’d be getting slavers to do that. Maybe there was a way in.

Once again, Littlepip’s rampant destruction of Fillydelphia in her grand escape to the wastes was about to aid me. I just hoped news of a runaway slave wouldn’t be sent to the FunBarn yet.

“They’re taking slaves in to repair it with tool saddles. I’ve got one. Maybe we can just pose as workers once we get by the guards and sneak off?”

“Sounds like a plan. Safer to try it than just barging in, right?”

I nodded, feeling a little better. Just knowing she was safe and still alive made it all just feel... worth it. Unable to really know what to say to the unexpected compliment, I nodded to the far side of the road, leading us to begin trotting onwards again. Crawling beneath a wooden fence, we entered a section I’d once heard the others call ‘Foal Land.’

Masses of mouldy stuffed ponies and animals had fallen from overhanging wires or been burned into twisted hunks of nylon. This area was deserted. Slavers never came inside here past the outskirts like that one before. It was too small to do anything with and long stripped bare of worthwhile materials. ‘Foal Land’ had simply been left to rot. Beyond it, the colossal rollercoaster rose above the children’s play areas. Glancing back, Unity seemed to stop and gather an idea in her head.

“Hey! I just thought. I’ve been doing some jobs on the side for a slave master, the one that monster mentioned? Old Grizzly! Getting him stuff from the factories, running errands, that sort of thing. It's still slavery but, well I sometimes get a few perks for it. A healing potion for my ribs, extra food, stuff like that. I was hoping to save up enough offers to maybe get a transfer to someplace better than the FunFarm. It was Grizzly who promised to get us back together after the Pit. He's got an office in there!"

We stopped. I turned to her suddenly, looking around and perking my ears up.

"If he has a terminal or something, he'll have records. He seems like that sort of slaver. I think I heard him complaining once that they didn't get him an office in the more protected areas. We may not have to go too deep."

It felt wonderful to be impressed and reassured by the information she could provide. A sense of teamwork began to emerge as we continued trotting. She seemed to have let the hope get to her, that we could indeed find him.

"Funny how little things like that just matter, huh?" She grinned to me. "So I guess it's not all been a waste of time. Maybe that's how you have to think about it in places like this. That everything still matters. Hah. Sorry, I know I'm bad for running off on little rambling tangents when I talk..."

It took me a second to catch up with that she was apologising for talking to me. The thought surprised me.

"It's, well, okay. I kinda like them. I wish I was good with words too."

"And I wish I was as good with artwork as you are. Done anything nice lately?"

I caught that look in her eye below the nicer question. I'd seen it on Glimmerlight's face occasionally. Unity knew precisely what artwork she had asked about. I simply blushed, my ears drooping and my eyes taking a great interest in an immolated figure of a cow beside an old play park instead. She giggled a little, her eyes lying on my Fluttershy saddlebag as though hoping to see it. I wished we had time. Gathering a little courage, thinking of how Glimmerlight would want me to be more self confident, I turned back to face her rather than just avoiding her eyes like even more of a coward than I already was.

"Yeah. Yeah I guess so-um, nice stuff too!" Oh why did I say it like that? "Lots of things that mean a lot to me. I just draw whatever I feel... like what I choose on the spot. I don't really think about it ahead of time."

"You draw from the heart, escaping to your own little world of creation. That's just lovely. If we get a moment, can I have a look? Share in the dreams?"

"Um, sure? I mean, most of it's like that. Some is-uh, just poses or, um, something a friend asked for and-"

Her laugh cut me off, shaking her head. "Hey, come on, don't worry about it. I didn't laugh at you when we first met, did I? It's not something we see in the wasteland often. Any creation at all is good. You're a wonderful little artist, Murky. Don't forget that. Please?"

'Artist.' I'd honestly never thought about that title before. I just drew, just sketched what came to mind and didn't think about what looked good or not. It was bringing to life the thoughts and emotions of my mind, like a kind of therapy and outlet that wasn't simply crying. But artists were like ponies who knew how to make good art, weren't they? I couldn't do those amazing pictures. I didn't even know how to colour!

"I'll try, Unity. I'll try, I guess?"

Seemingly amused by my modesty, she winked.

"It's all we can ever do, Murky. Huh, hey, look!"

She pointed a hoof. Up ahead, past the end of Foal Land was the rollercoaster. Much of it had been stripped down now, used for metal in the factories after the structure had been made unsteady, and half-destroyed by rocket launcher fire during Littlepip's escape. For a second, I was curious about what Unity saw, before she began to canter ahead, looking not at the coaster itself, but toward a small area of benches below it. An old picnic area, I guessed, for ponies not brave enough to go on the rollercoaster. (Ponies like me, then.) They were kept away from the underside of the ride by a chainlink fence, beside a large map of the FunFarm and a long broken statue of Pinkie Pie. Even with the limbs missing and eyes showing no pupils in the cast brass, I found even more reason to keep my own glances away from it.

But beside it, next to a plaque, I noticed dozens... no, hundreds of little items attached to the fences. What in Equestria were they?

Unity galloped up to them, casting her eyes around. Trotting up beside her, I finally saw what it was as I wandered down the line of the fence.

Locks. Padlocks, with every one of them attached into the fence's chain mesh around where the plaque stood. A couple of containers were below, still filled with open padlocks. One of them had spilled around the foot of the fence. Yet my eyes were drawn to the locks on the fence themselves, closed in such thick patterns that I couldn't even see through in places. Every one of them bore scratchings upon their surfaces, often with little love hearts or sketches of cutie marks. Many of them on the fence had pink ribbons or the rotted remains of flowers attached to them. I saw one with a pair of dogtags.

"What in Equestria's name are these?" I breathed the words quietly, looking at the padlocks. They just kept going. All shapes and sizes, colours and designs.

"Lovelocks, Murky. Like the plaque says..."

She cleared her throat.

"In honour of Hearts and Hooves Day, for those ponies lucky enough to have that one special somepony in their lives, the one they may rest in harmony with until the end. The one they would never break the bond with, never leave behind, and trust in forever. Have our metalworker engrave your names to lock forever upon the fence."

As she spoke, I lifted a few with my hoof. Sure enough, upon them were scribbled words. Some engraved, others in faded pen. Some were just scratched on. Unity looked up, following me down the fence. Hundreds of couples, all lost to history. I remembered the Memorial Wall in the Stable, filled with memories. But here lay proof positive of the caring that had permeated Equestria a long time ago.

"Ponies in the old days declared their love to the ones they wouldn't ever part with by placing a lock up here, Murky. A symbol that even the balefire couldn't bring it down. They say that the tradition started just after some event showed just how strong the power of love could really be when things were at their darkest."

Across the ground, there lay not one padlock that had fallen from the fence itself. Not one that had lost its meaning. Standing before such a sight, backlit by the fires underneath the roller coaster and the dull smog of a storm ridden Fillydelphia ravaged by an event so long ago, I saw one thing that had not been broken by any effort of the wasteland.

"Love amongst the darkness, I like to think they're still together up there, Murky. Some slaves even do it today."

Stopping, her hoof rested upon one padlock. Dirty, rusted, and with merely scratched words, she glanced down and sighed.

"Just his initials, see?" Sadly, she held it toward me.

I bit my lip and nodded, as though pretending I understood the letters. She and her buckfriend had done this old tradition even now with the hope that no matter what happened to them, they'd be together through it all. I didn't dare sully the moment with the whole 'I can't read' speech.

"The day we put this on. I remember that, Murky. That was when we made the promise. We were escaping, together, or not at all. We locked it as one."

I could clearly see her fighting back some tears, but her horn sparkled a lush red and drew something from her ragged barding. A small length of thin pipe with a stamped end and what looked like a bobby pin.

"We aren't any more. Until I see him, remember everything about him, I don't deserve this. Once we get him, Murky, we'll come back here, relock it anew from whatever Red Eye's done to him."

Twisting the metal rod and the pin into the lock, I heard it ping, before the hook sprang out. Unity left it on the fence, swaying lightly on the locking hook.

"I swear, if it turns out to be old Grindstone that's taken him... I always did hear he wanted him back since he got transferred out." She sighed, resting her head on the fence. Her voice was very quiet. "Wherever they've trapped you, I'll find you."

She finally looked away from the lock, her long mane hiding her face when she lowered her head. Master Grindstone? Somehow, it almost felt likely. That donkey was in cahoots with The Master. But outside of their horrid betrayal of Protégé, something I could never hope to prove or kick up any fuss about, I could only feel the aching inevitability that they were up to something else in whatever great game the slavers had going. For now, the most I could understand to do was trot over and simply be there.

Turning, one half of Unity's face became visible from below her mane, looking ever so vulnerable and strained. She seemed to take at least a little comfort by somepony else being there, for I saw the side of her mouth raise.

"Y-you know, Murky, I can see you're a little nervous but... this'd be a real good time to give a mare a hug..."

I didn't need telling twice. Without hesitating, I slid forward to gently hold her. Feeling her lean against my own neck, I even dared to offer a firmer hold, squeezing her tightly against me. Sniffing, Unity seemed to quake a little. I felt her breathing quicken for a few seconds, before slowly calming down and gripping me back.

"Sorry you have to see me like this, Murky. You've got your own problems and mine are—"

"I-important!" The word stammered out my mouth, the first one I could quickly think of. Quickly, I rushed to try and think of others. Yeah, okay... words, here we go. "We're all getting out. Me and Glimmerlight, Brim and Coral... her son... we've all got little odd things we need sorted and help out each other for! I want you and your friend to come with us too. So I want to help you because you're nice and really helped me and-and, uh..."

I hesitated, before the words began spilling out on instinct, not really thinking about them in my haste.

"And when we're out we can all make a little village together and just be all out of the way, free to do what we want. You two can come with us. We'll all help you find him! Just like one, um, big happy family?"

For a second, I wasn't sure if the slight jerking convulsions I felt from her shoulders and head were from crying or laughter. But she leaned back, wiping her eyes and smiling. Was it both?

"I wish I had your imagination, Murky. Thanks. I don't know what somepony's done to him, or me if this isn't just Fillydelphia messing with my head about him, but I'm going to find out. I never even got to see him before the Pit. It's been so long since we were properly together. He was always talking about escape plans and stuff to me to get my input. We tried once, but that didn't go too well. If we can find one another again, we'll put everything we learned to helping your escape plan, Murky."

My escape plan? I figured it'd be best to let her stay hopeful and not say that it was more Glimmer's idea. She was the effective leader of our little group anyway. But another couple's information was a valuable asset, something we couldn't ignore for the eventual attempt.

"Sounds, um, good. Let's go get him?"

Glimmerlight made big emotional mission decisions sound so easy to come up with. A trait I obviously hadn't been born with. But it seemed to at least do the job for Unity, who nodded and stood alongside me for the final trek to the Barn.

"Yes, let's." She glanced at me once more. "I still remember what I told you the last time we met, when that nasty slaver had you in a collar. That you'd find what kept you going. To hold out until we could run into one another again. I said we'd come and help you, but now it's you coming to my aid. You sure found your courage, Murky."

"Y-yeah, but not in me. It's... I found it in wanting to help those I cared about more than anything."

"...like me?" She sounded surprised.

The question set my mind racing. I'd said it to Glimmer before just fine, but having just met Unity, saying that the answer was yes felt awkward.

Nervously, I nodded, slightly blushing. "Y-yeah. Like you."

"You changed my life. I drew the first thing I chose for myself because you said I could."

Unity's eyes widened, her mouth opening, but no reply forthcoming. As we moved down the line of padlocks on the fence, she looked away as though processing that, before giving me a rather bashful look.

"Wow, I didn't expect that. It really is the strangest little meetings of random chance that matter sometimes, isn't it?. The oddest things you say that somepony takes in a manner you never expected. I hadn't known that meant so much to you. From the look on your face, I don't think you expected what you did running for the Wall to mean as much to me either. I'd been ready to give up until I saw somepony willing to go that crazy distance. So let's do this together, Murky. Prove to each other, and everypony else that there's still hope left. We'll go find out where he is and get you to your friend at the same time."

We shared a little glance at the end of the fence, after the last padlock had passed. A little mutual matching of eyes and a nod, before we both galloped off toward the Barn.

The main fortress was still a little away, safe behind multiple layers of security. It was so much bigger than I'd ever imagined, so much more imposing up close. To think, Red Eye could be in there right now. What if we ran into him?

After dropping into a trench that had been dug out for underground wiring, we crouched low and watched the patrols ahead of us. I let my eyes drift around past them, observing the newly added wall that surrounded the Fun Barn ever since the riots. Security was tight.

Absolutely no way to 'sneak past' in the normal ways, and no overhanging material to jump from like the Ministry. The rollercoaster had been cut away from where it had once passed through the Barn, as though deliberately for that express purpose. There were a few gates, mostly for messengers and higher ranked members of Red Eye's inner circles. Others were for wagons that carried various supplies or spoils of war to the more advanced facilities Red Eye had built up inside. Those wagons were trundling along a newly cleared path that drifted between the rollercoaster's scaffolds.

That might work.

"Come on, Unity!" I took off, moving into the underside of the rollercoaster, an area filled with higher mounds of wreckage and piles of dull red scrap. Ruined coaster cars lay here and there, one of which I pulled us below.

"What are you-oooh..."

She seemed to get it the moment we saw one of the carts move inside the gates. We just had to wait for another one, then sneak into the back under the tarps that covered them! Even better, no chances of being stuck in a box this time!

Taking cover under the upturned coaster car to wait, we pulled some wooden beams across to keep us hidden. There were patrols around here, masked soldiers that were not slavers. Many of them recruited from the tougher gangs of the wastes to be given purpose and better equipment. Already I could see and hear a few groups nearer the walls, but our little hidey hole was almost undetectable. All the same, we would have to wait for another wagon we could use.

To pass the time and avoid our nerves shredding under the oppression and fear, I passed my journal to Unity. She glanced across it, taking in the new images I had done since. She seemed stunned to know that I'd drawn her and almost gave us away with a loud squeak of happiness.

"Oh that's wonderful! Thank you, Murky!"

"Oh, um, you're welcome! The one I promised though, we'll do it when we're out of here, okay? First picture I draw when we go." I smiled, feeling a little more confident. "Maybe you could even pose for it because we'll both be there!"

Only about two seconds after I spoke did I realise what that could be misconstrued as.

"I mean like, uh, like *nice*ly! Not, um..."

She turned the page and nodded her head at it.

"Not like her, you mean?" Unity slyly grinned like we had the first time she'd looked at it. I glanced at the drawing.

"Yeah! Yeah, not like that!"

"Mm... this one's really well done. Very realistic. Boy, Murky, you must have had your eye on her for a while, huh?"

My voicebox temporarily stopped working, producing only a strangled squeak of embarrassment, accompanied by a blush I was afraid would give us away by glow alone.

She just chuckled lightly. "Oh sorry, I'm terrible sometimes. I'm just making fun. But really, all the other ponies in here, your friends and... family?"

Gulping to regain the power of speech, glad she'd moved away from one of my more, well, personal pictures, I saw she was on the one of myself, Glimmer, and Caduceus. For once, we began to properly talk in hushed voices any time I could confirm there were no ponies nearby. Ten minutes or so passed, within which I took a great delight in explaining who Glimmerlight was ('My big sister best friend forever since two days after meeting her!') or took a comfort in feeling a gentle nuzzle from Unity against my cheek while I told her of Caduceus' loss.

"I'm so sorry to hear that. He sounded really nice."

Sniffing sharply, I wiped my eyes with a filthy hoof, just trying to keep myself from tearing up in front of her. Instead, I just felt her lean over slightly, sharing a tender little closeness. I hadn't been able to let it out with anypony yet, so I found a sense of immense thankfulness growing that Unity was willing to offer comfort. I hadn't realised how deeply he'd really settled in before it happened, the momentum of having friends stitching his presence into my soul in such a short time, only to have it ripped out. Somehow, feeling somepony else that I didn't know as well as Glimmer be the one to offer such a close and caring physical expression helped some of that emotion to finally come out.

Finally, like a spring suddenly snapping, I felt myself lean toward her myself, sniffing with my eyes closed and permitting her to be the one comforting me this time in a moment of rising emotion. Even these mere minutes we'd spent were like all the hurt we'd gone through separately were just being shared with the one pony we'd both met before any of it really started.

Wagons still failed to appear, so we shared stories, such as my trip to the Stable and the hoof-bitingly close run for freedom. Or me hearing of her surprisingly heroic little tales to steal items from Slit's very office! Things she had been hoarding from other overseers that had more of a care of their charges. She laughed as she heard about where my goggles came from and revealed a whetstone used for sharpening a knife in her own barding. My own story, it seemed, was not the only one of a slave trying to find their way to survive by aiding those that trapped them.

Suddenly, my ears pricked up. Unity dropped her sentence midway as she saw stark terror upon my face. I'd heard something very specific. We pressed low, and I listened to the sound every slave feared from above. The sound of wings, larger than a griffon, beating against the thick and heavy air.

Monsters. The purple, blue, and green ponies soared through the air toward our goal building. Alicorns. Red Eye's personal bodyguards and most lethal servants. I could hear my own teeth chattering from fear at their passing. They said they could read minds. If they thought we were up to anything, then we were done for! Even that one minute it took the six of them to pass was pregnant with my imagined outcomes of them dropping to rip the cart away and do whatever it was they did. Even fewer had seen them fight, but the legends were, well, legendary amongst slaves.

Watching them land upon the roof, I ducked back in, sighing. I needed to talk. Anything to distract myself from the fear. I had a thousand questions I wanted to ask Unity that had been building in my mind, but with a quick glance to her cutie mark, I knew the first on my list. With a mark like that, so grand, so much better than my own cursed flank.

"U-Unity? What's your special talent?" I tried to not make it look like I'd been staring. Oh please don't think I was staring!

She glanced back from staring up at the passing beasts above, drawing away the rags to show the three types of ponies again, before smiling sadly.

"Sort of a strange one. I guess you could say I bring ponies together."

"That sounds nice."

I saw her smile a little at that, before looking away wistfully.

I wanted to ask in what way, to find out what she meant, but Unity instead quickly glanced toward the edge of the road running under the rollercoaster. My eyes followed and widened; a cart was approaching! Alone too, as luck would have it. Perfect!

Stuffing my sketchbook into my saddlebag and readying up, I slipped my goggles down out of sheer habit for 'go time' and held myself ready. The cart's clattering iron reinforced wheels bounced and chipped off the harsh, unsteady concrete ground, carrying enough weight that to end up trapped beneath it would be a death sentence of a rather messy fashion. Nodding to Unity, we shared a quick glance before diving toward it the moment the cart passed by. The one weary slave pulling it didn't even turn his head away from the commands of 'faster!' to see us.

I went first, galloping low and quiet to get behind it. The back of the cart didn't have any cover, too high as well! Damn!

We were caught in the open behind it, a few heart-stopping seconds without cover. Already, I could see a trio of black-clad guards beginning another arc across the rollercoaster patrol route! In a panic, I pointed a hoof at the underside. We could hold onto the bottom and drop off when inside! Galloping after it again, hearing the beat of wings once more to set my heart pounding from whatever stopping it'd been doing, I scurried under, grabbing hold of the supports to haul myself onto, upside down. Unity was right behind me! Just running under and-

"HEY! You there, the mare! Stop right there!"

A guard's voice cut through the air from toward the walls into the FunBarn. I almost shrieked at the thought. Unity had been spotted before she'd got in! I waved at her, encouraging her to duck under or drop off myself to run! But she reached forward, keeping up just long enough to tap my mouth shut with a hoof and shoot me a serious look, before dropping back out.

"Sorry! Sorry I just dropped something under the cart and-"

Hooves clattered into view, a baton slapping down across her face. I saw Unity fall, and felt the wagon stop on the spot at the commotion. All I could see were the pairs of hooves from guards, surrounding her where she lay. Her cheek was bleeding, one eye closed with pain. The other caught my own eyes only briefly before she was dragged up. I could see the look on her face, the will for me to stay hidden. Groaning, Unity was picked to her hooves and pulled around the side.

"Dropped something my flank! Trying to sneak around to get some good shit to sell on the slave market, huh? Well that's just what we call a big offence around here! What were you after, our smokes?"

"N-nothing! I was-"

"Shut up, you'll answer to the big wigs inside. You wanted to see the FunBarn? Well you'll get to see its cell! Take her in. We'll get her overseer over later to send her to the sprite pits or something. Move, bitch!"

The mare's baton swung, catching Unity's rump with a humiliating smacking sound to force her to trot onward toward the FunBarn beside the very wagon I now hid alone in. My feelings were wrenching at my heart to see her being marched away, pulled from me again!

No... I'd just met her, led her into danger! This had been my idea, to help Unity get her buck and get back to Protégé with her where she might be safer with his advice and understanding! It was all falling apart before we'd even started. I just wished I had the courage to...

She'd been the one who told me I'd find it. Unity had stood up the The Master once. If she could do that, then it was worth the risk! Anything was better than knowing she was just rotting away and starving to death in the FunFarm. All this time, I'd been running away, protecting myself. I had just proven I could go to help others, but even then with major backup and help.

This was my test before me, a friend being taken to evil ends and knowing that I had to help her.

Nothing ventured, nothing gained. You have to dare.

As the wagon began rolling again, I clung tighter. After all this, everything I'd been through, I wasn't letting her get away this time! I was going to get her out, come rain or shine! Hang on, Unity.

As if to just dare me on, the clouds immediately cast their hissing rain down once more.

Finally, I let my tired hooves drop from the cart after ten minutes of agonising cramps and struggles to ensure nopony was in the area of the courtyard within the FunBarn's interior areas. Spittle from the lashing rain kicked up under the lip of the wagon, scathing my exposed coat. Now, however, I dropped into the mud, feeling the wool in my already damp fleece cake itself in wet slimy muck. Trying to keep my wings from slapping the ground, heeding Weathervane's instructions that they had to remain safe, I immediately darted out from under the wagon toward the nearest set of covered scaffolds. Squeezing behind it, I got my first good look at Red Eye's headquarters. My infected eye itched terribly, but I dared not remove my goggles to scratch with so much of this hissing rain springing off the ground. The Mall suddenly felt so inviting with that sofa we had under shelter.

Not much of the Barn was really visible through the rain. The storm was kicking up once again, restricting vision and making sure you couldn't open your eyes too wide for fear of them being burned by the toxic downpour. Some ponies in gas masks and full-body barding moved unfettered, but most had galloped back into the main building to wait out the torrential rain. The interior behind the wall was as rough as any place in Fillydelphia, really. Outside the doors it was simply a low stretch of ground that contained much of the materials to come and go. I saw heavy lead-laden wagons being dragged in as fast as they could, tugging through sodding mud, kicked up from old garden earth. They were filled with radioactive materials, some even glowing, for whatever mad science they were pulling in here. We all heard the rumours, but honestly, it was beyond my intelligence to remember what it all meant.

Unity was still visible, flanked by two guards in thick, black and red combat barding. I could see her trying not to glance toward the wagon I'd just left, feeling a surge of pride at her bravery to still think of me. I'd have been blubbering on the ground in her position. All the same, I could see her posture failing as the rain lashed across her, no doubt causing a hot burning sensation all down her face, neck, and back. Out of the Barn stepped a griffon, seemingly not caring for the rain under her thick coat of feathers. The massive armour didn't seem to hurt either.

"This the squirt you lot caught?"

"Please, I was—"

"Shut up!"

Gasping, I saw Unity struck across her already bleeding cheek, crying out and dropping to the floor. Magic pulled her up.

"Yes, Ma'am. She-"

"Get her inside. Cells are empty. You'll give that fatass jailor something to actually do for a change. She the one they're looking for?"

"Dunno, Ma'am. We were going to-"

"Then do it! I don't need to know what you're doing, only results!"

Even I could point out a thousand flaws with that logic. Wicked Slit would probably burst a blood vessel. But horribly, I saw Unity trooped away from me; forced, shoved, and slapped with a baton into the central section of the FunBarn before I had to duck back down behind the scaffolds. They knew. The Master had gotten the word out. I needed to get her out of that prison before he came to collect!

Right. Time to go, before my courage failed me from thinking about this madness for too long! Under this darkness, Luna lend me your blessing to remain unseen, please!

They trooped into a larger warehouse that had been built out of the huge ground floors of the barn. Heck, barn wasn't the right word, this place was huge! It was built around multiple levels all the way from the ground to the decimated higher sections the rollercoaster used to have pass through. Really, it towered, rather than sat where it was, deceptively large and more akin to a Ministry than a theme park prop building. The ground floor extended in every direction, with stairs even leading down underground. Who knew theme parks had such large basements? Whatever was really inside there was only disguised as a barn, for I could see concrete walls inside through the open warehouse doors lined with metal supports. Old buckets contained masses of those sprite-bots, long ruined. Up high, through the mist, I could see the lights on the roof still there. I could clearly see why it seemed appropriate for setting up a headquarters in. It had presence beyond compare. The barn that watched you forever.

The rain was seriously beginning to burn my hooves from standing still in puddles. I was already pacing on the spot, murmuring in pain. Intent to go soon, watching for a break in the guard's patrols, I hopped out and ran quietly alongside a wagon being noisily tugged by two slaves into the warehouse to keep them from spotting me. Gritting my teeth and fighting the urge to whinny as I felt my brow, neck, and rump sting from the rain, I ducked away the moment we passed under the cavernous doorways that Red Eye had demolished from the Barn walls. There was so much more cover inside, watched only by a few quartermasters and their entourages. Clearly, the idea of somepony penetrating in here hadn't much applied. After all, who would really want to come in here anyway?

The area was massive, filled with mechanical devices and enough conveyors that I began to wonder if it was a hidden factory. But most of it remained defunct, still bearing loads that hadn't fallen when the bombs shut down everything. But it was the contents that caught my eye while I ducked and rolled under a thick pallet.

The machines were pink. Upon them lay presents of all shapes and sizes, clad in shiny or colourful paper and wrapped with thick bows. Items like small foal's scooters and bouncy balls went in one end of a machine, and on the other they came out wrapped. Like one giant processing line for gifts. Old rusted carts lay ready to be loaded on the far side before the main doors to the Barn's production area. I presumed those doors had rusted shut, hence the alternate ones cut into the wooden construction.

The presents weren't alone, however. Other machines, still pink and splattered with yellow and light blue spirals of paint, seemed to have a dozen workers clambering over them. From their conveyors I saw piles of sprite-bots, lying non-operational upon the floor or in crates. Geez, what was this weird place?

But in the middle of it all, amongst the suspended walkways, the one sight atop the machines almost gave me a heart attack on the spot. A colossal pink sphere filling my vision, that grin stretching all around it with massive eyes that stared down upon me. A giant Pinkie Pie head decoration. Easily ten to twelve times the size of a pony in height, it sat as an eternal watcher upon the factory, cast from iron and riveted together. Honestly, was there anywhere in Equestria somepony could go without her just being... there?

“Hey! Flimsy Pack! Get that lot in out of the rain for now! We can’t move the talismans until it’s clear. That rain burns the stuff up!”

Perking up at the sound of many hooves beginning to rush for the doorways, I knew I had to move. This place was about to get a lot more crowded. Keeping near to the sides, I kept low, crawling beneath scaffold shelves and around-

I gasped, hearing hooves very suddenly just a few feet in front of me.

Stopping on the spot, I pulled back, hopped up, and dragged myself into a small and empty present box, right before a pony’s head peered down from the corner where I’d almost crawled out right in front of him. Curled up tightly, I just shivered, waiting for him to pass, hearing him right beside the present box.

“Huh... coulda’ sworn I heard somepony.”

The present was knocked. Oh no. He was climbing up to have a look in!

“Ah, shit!” I heard him slip on the wet floor, half-tripping on his hind legs to bump into the present. It wouldn’t have fallen, but I threw my weight to make it fall, before tumbling out on the opposite side of the shelving unit and scampering down the line of boxes before he peered over.

“Damn it. Hey, somepony get some slaves with mops over here soon enough, eh?”

He trotted off, and I finally took another breath. Following the line of conveyors, I moved for the back of the room, where numerous doors led further into the Barn. For once, a little luck aided me as the guards were distracted keeping the slaves tugging materials inside in line. As such, slipping into the building further was as simple as biding my time and then darting past them.

Beyond was a serried rank of doors on one side of the corridor, with the other beating open plan offices crammed with terminals. Many ponies sat at them, clip-clopping away upon their keyboards. Behind the small internal fence that separated them from the corridor, I carefully nuzzled my way through, briefly diving into one of the doors to dodge a guard cantering toward the warehouse. Edging the door open, I began to feel a sense of pride grow in me. That I really could start to do this whole sneaky thing well! In the past, I’d always failed dismally, but here I really was managing it, and without even the screw ups of the Ministry of Arcane whatever-it-was!

There were a few more guards coming, so I ducked back again, closing myself inside the small room and digging out my PipBuck to activate its light. As much as I loved wearing it, the little broken machine really was too much of an attention magnet. But under the light green hue, I found the cupboard a rather perplexing little place.

Party supplies surrounded me, as did posters of balloons, leaping Pinkies (yes, plural... how!?), and cardboard boxes of absolute junk. This had to be the storage areas for the party production line in the Barn’s side building! Hearing a great many ponies outside, I began to dig through them to spend the time until I could move again. Mostly party hats, balloons and-oooh...

Firecrackers!

Having to strain to not grin, I began pulling a row of them into my saddlebag. Sooner or later, I had a feeling they would come in handy as a distraction or, at worst, something to add to our growing escape-kit pile.

Alright, maybe I put in a few party hats too. A buck could dream, right?

The slavers outside weren't moving for some time it seemed. Their chatter was all complaints about the rain, length of shifts, or the price of ale at the Roamer. Crossed over behind them were the dozens of ponies working at terminals, likely doing all the grunt work to organise such a wasteland superpower as Fillydelphia. Gently pulling open another box, I found it filled with lots of little bottles of black dust. Lifting one out, staring carefully at the door as I heard somepony lean against it, I pulled my PipBuck closer to get a look.

It held words. Oh why did it have to be words? Spinning it around, to my delight I saw it had a little picture of a pony looking like she was blowing her nose really hard. Somepony was laughing behind her. Ooh! Medicine for ponies with colds! Feeling my own nose almost entirely blocked, I grinned, struggling with the foal-lock to pull it open in my teeth. Popping the top, I glanced down into it, praying I'd get the dosage right and taking as big a sniff as I could in order to try and gauge the flavour. The black dust drifted around the tip, light and moving even by the currents of my nose. Before I knew it, a small cluster of it was floating before me. This, uh, would help me?

Instead, I just felt my nose tingle... and itch... then itch badly... before I felt muscles quiver.

Before I even knew what was happening, splitting pain wracked through my face and black eyes all the way to my wicked scar as I convulsed and sneezed.

It was a high pitched sneeze, a squeaking with a shrill little snort alongside it. My body almost jumped under it. Eyes watering, clutching my pain and moaning, I heard the last thing I wanted.

"...somepony just sneeze in the cupboard?"

The slavers had heard me! There wasn't a way out! I had to find a place to hide, quickly! Then I could... I-

Sneezed. Again. Trying to ignore the throbbing pain all across my eyes and up the swollen red line that went up to my left ear, I staggered into the wall, attempting to hold my nose shut with my front hooves.

"I swear I heard somepony! Get it open! Sounded like a little filly or somethin'."

Oh come on!

Eyes watering from the sneezes, feeling another one building, I simply threw myself behind the door and tried not to scream in pain when it crushed me against the wall. Light streamed into the room, while I did my best to fumble for the PipBuck light.

"See? Nopony. Told you to lay off the damned Dash, mate. Now c'mon. Boss won't appreciate it if we're late back from break. If we take the shortcut through the prison we'll get there in time."

Flattened into the tiny space, my eyes widened. The prison! I had to follow them! The moment the door was loosened off, I simply stuffed the PipBuck and black dust powder stuff into my saddlebag, and poked my head around the moment I heard them depart. Two bucks, almost identical brothers it seemed, were trotting away. Still fighting the urge to cough or sneeze, I quickly slipped out after them, keeping low enough that the terminal ponies wouldn't see me. I didn't envy their job, having to just sit and type.

Following them was not especially difficult; there were thankfully few others around who were already travelling. Under the black sky, there was little indoors illumination in non-critical areas, so the FunBarn's interior was a stark contrast of hazed light and thick shadow. Unlike much of the buildings I'd been in, this one was much more open plan, with us crossing a large room that could look up to the next floor entirely via a large mezzanine. Above one side lay a massive window that let in what little light Fillydelphia possessed. It reminded me of the real barn back at the rock farm, only much much bigger and filled to the brim with an inventory of expensive looking items amidst a cube farm of desk areas and research tables. Upon the wide windowed side rooms, I saw ponies bubbling up chems or handling radioactive materials. In others, the hum of spark technology was prevalent, machinery in guarded labs or rooms doing jobs I couldn't comprehend. A full bank of screens showed various areas of Fillydelphia and even the wasteland, with three workers sitting watching them intently. Hearing the couple I was tailing, one of the observers turned to the door, making me duck across quickly. Really, this entire hub was just a huge and busy network of varied experiments and technologies. No wonder Red Eye kept it all so close.

What really worried me was the way that many of the research sections were hoisting weapons together.

Part of me felt tempted to find a way to smash or steal some of it. Maybe it would help out Littlepip! But I couldn't risk drawing attention, so I contented myself with stealing somepony's sandwich out of a small fridge beneath their desk while they were away.

For all the interest and potential though, this place was a nightmare of direction. Rooms went into the next at seemingly random intervals, as though a maniac designed it. Entire walls had been cut down by Red Eye's workers to expand working areas, and I could see holes in the roof above the main atrium where slaves hung on grapplehooks to bridge the gaps and repair it. I keenly remembered the sight of a gigantic shielded monster tearing through this place. Everything seemed to have been cobbled back together in a mish mash of placement since that epic demolishing operation that had gone on in the middle of the Pit Riot.

Altogether, if it weren't for these two being kindly oblivious, I'd have been lost long ago. The walls held poster after poster of Pinkie Pie while the furniture often had brightly painted design all over what would otherwise have been dull. The effect was something like a zany pony rushing through the place with ten tins of paint and no real forward artistic plan. Thankfully, it made it fairly easy to creep alongside the many desks and office dividers. The only real worry was anypony on the balconies above, but with the rain falling upon them, nopony was willing to cross below the gaps.

"Eh, mate, wait a 'mo. I gotta' check on the intel. Boss wanted an update, remember?"

Feeling my heart skip, I hopped backward, pushing myself into one of the open topped cube offices and squeezing so tightly behind a filing cabinet that one of my wings jerked and hurt. Biting my own lip to stifle the pained yelp, I heard them trot back my way and move into the room with all the monitors. I settled down to wait again, trying to briefly master the art of telepathy to apologise to Weathervane for breaking his instructions about my wings. I willed them to just move on, Unity needed me!

"Hey, egghead. Any signals back from the outer elements yet?"

A younger voice, female and nasal, piped up. "Please, I told you not to call me that!"

"Fits ya. Now I asked a question, we ain't got long."

"Fine, fine. Scouts got back earlier, dropped off a report but... eh, nothing huge to be honest. The Cathedral prep is coming along as the big guy predicted. That slave caravan we lost is confirmed to have been raiders, and there was a brief tussle at the Manehattan blockade force. The alicorns... um, 'took care' of it, was all he'd say. I think that one's late, though. Scout got delayed en route from sickness. Anything else Stern wants to know before you go get roasted?"

"Urgh. Yeah, she still ain't in a good mood after that fuck up at the Mall. She's either swearing about it happening at all or screaming about headaches from somepony dropping on her head."

Oops.

The stallion scratched his mane. "Talking of which, forgot to say. I'd stay away from taking anything to the main office for a few hours. The higher ranks are going to be starting their jury on what to do about the Mall. Old Grizzly said he'd take charge until Protégé's back on his hooves, but Grindstone's having none of it. Wants the little guy out of there completely, saying he isn't fit to lead. Expect it to explode in there."

"Duly noted. I won't trot near it. Isn't it Red Eye's call though? It was his student."

Oddly, her voice sounded a little more monotone than I'd have expected from the agreement to not get too close. I wondered why her voice changed, even as the stallion replied.

"All the more reason. You think Red Eye wants to look as though he's playing favourites? Nah, Red Eye might elect to have him retake power eventually, but for now the kid's on his own. Or rather, in Grizzly's hooves, given he's still in medical. Just keep away from all that, egghead. Too much politics for you or me and way too much danger of making big time enemies. Now, you got the list of factions we're looking into next for Stern? I really want to get there before the debate starts."

"Yeah, sure. Not much. We've scared off most of them or have deals already, but tell her she can look at the Gun Gallop Crew or Spark Suitors to see if they've got any good kit worth buying out. The Appleloosa train track remains unrepaired, but that ghoul's still doing her flying delivery. The Golden Cap Caravans are making moves lately too if we need to see about local transport. Want my advice though? We should just stick to our own supply lines. The ghoul wants nothing to do with us and the wasteland's like a ticking time bomb out there."

The stallion grumbled. I heard him shake out his mane.

"Well, that's why I'm here and not out on the excursions. Thanks, egghead. Now keep your head down."

"Not difficult in here..."

Only now remembering to open my mouth and let go of my lip, I gently peered around to see the pair of stallions leave. Exiting the atrium, they began to speed up, cantering downstairs. Simply praying they would assume my galloping sounds were somepony unimportant (most ponies had that by simply looking at me), I sped up after them, passing behind 'egghead's' chair without her so much as looking up.

But even as I followed the pair into the door, I cast a look back around the doorframe. Alongside several miserable looking ponies beside her on desks, I could see she was silently crying into her keyboard, chained to a thick weight upon the floor.

Below ground in the FunBarn was anything but fun.

Behind a set of thick doors designed like Canterlot castle gates (I'd seen pictures, I could know stuff too!) the light had drastically lowered, giving rise to the sheer opposite of above ground.

Dingy corridors that were higher than they were wide, lined with thin doorways of cast metal and bearing only a single low vision slit. Padlocks held many shut, while others lay slightly ajar. Allowing the pair time to get ahead, I gently pushed one open, before immediately darting away, breathing heavily.

A nightmare. They held... a nightmare. Just unlit black concrete rooms bearing a single wooden chair with straps. A sheer physical manifestation of my innermost fears of being trapped forever. The whiplash of design was still reeling in my mind, scaring me and driving my heartrate up to the point I almost felt like I was hyperventilating. What was this place?

The hellish thoughts in my mind only grew when I heard some ponies moaning or crying inside some of the locked cells.

Tip-tapping my way across the cobblestone floor toward the three way junction that the stallions had gone left at, I peered around to see them approach another such junction again. The undecorated and unmarked design down here was becoming all the more painfully monotone. One went to go right, until pulled left.

"Hey! I thought we were gonna go see the new one in the cells?"

"We don't have time for you to sit and stare at her rump, you weirdo. I'm not going into Stern's office alone! No, you're coming with me."

"Aww, I heard she was a good one."

"Oh shut up, she'll still be here."

The hell she will. Almost surprising myself with the inner determination (And cursing? I didn't actually say it, Celestia, honest! Honest!), I crept down after them the moment they departed left, before heading right. The rooms grew larger, sitting open. But they were not unlit, spewing small drifts of multicoloured light out of each doorway. Unable to contain my curiosity, I peeked in.

I had to bring Glimmerlight here.

Memory orbs. Hundreds of memory orbs! Of all colours imaginable, they lined the metal shelves that had been bolted into the very stone of the walls. Many were flickering on the floor, having fallen and become damaged. Could orbs be broken? Were they just bad extracts? There were so many.

Standing amongst them, I couldn't but feel more than a little apprehensive. Amongst this dungeon, such a sight only filled me with dread. Everything I had seen of memory left me confused on just what ponies should be playing with. Aurora Star and Twilight seemed to see a lot of good in them, but then I had seen the effect they'd had on Glimmer's life, and Unity's, depending on what had happened. It didn't take a smart pony to work out these were not willingly extracted.

Very quickly, the purpose of the chairs became very real indeed. A chill rolled from my neck to my hind legs, imagining the reality. Strapped in pitch black, being nothing but a resource of information that gradually lost more and more of yourself as it was torn out, forgetting ponies you knew and having no outside input to restore it!

I simply ran my eyes over each row of the orbs, the idea that in many cases, these might be all that remained of those ponies came to light.

"Whoever you all are, I'm so sorry," I whispered to myself.

"Bastards! Where's mah damn food!?"

Jumping on the spot, skittering around on my bad leg and tripping over various orbs, I staggered to the door, casting my head down the corridor. A light shone from one of the larger doors from where that shout had come from. Cautiously, I approached and used my mirror to take a quick peek without putting my head in a visible position.

My heart leapt. The cells!

Within, there were two large caged sections of a room, the rest made up of one huge desk and two cabinets. It was filthy. Mold grotted around the edges of tiles that made up both floor and walls, while a rank stench emerged that suddenly left me very glad for my cold. But it was the slaver inside that drew my eyes more. While Brimstone was tall, thick, and muscular; and The Master was wide and heavily built, this pony was simply overweight, a real rarity to the wastes. He lounged upon a large cushion, clad in rotten looking canvas with a foul yellow coat. In the corners, I saw bones and dozens of filthy bowls piled up, sticking out from a mount of pre-war packaging.

Very quickly, I realised he was the source of the stink.

But all my attention was drawn away the moment I panned over the cells. Huddled at the back of one, as far from the jailer as she could possibly be, I saw her! Unity! Yet as I stared in wonder at having found the cream coloured unicorn, I realised there wasn't any way I could sneak in, and I doubted this obese pony was going to get up to check too many things outside.

"OI! Little bastards, are ya there? You're late by twenty seconds!"

He slammed a hoof on the desk, making an array of random trinkets or sweetie tins hop up or fall off. Behind me, I heard the pitter patter of tiny hooves and a duller stumbling of thicker set hooves on the stone flooring, accompanied by a panicked breathing.

"I'm-phew-I'm coming, sir!"

"Yeah! We're on our way!"

I knew those voices. Recognition was pinging in my mind. But anypony seeing me hiding here would be bad. I began to creep back to the memory orb room to hide, just hoping I'd reach it before they did.

"Don't drop it, Pike! Watch out!"

"You watch out!"

"You!"

Pike? Pike and Cosh? The ponies that had given me trouble in the air terminal were in the FunBarn? Some of the few ponies I'd ever caught out through speech?

I had an idea.

I didn't hide. Instead, I ran toward them as fast as I could. Rounding the corner of the three way junction, I went twenty feet away from them on the third corridor, before running back as though approaching the area for the first time when they appeared. The lanky form of Pike with his vomit-coloured coat and dull orange mane alongside the stubbier shape of Cosh almost ran directly into me. They had plates balanced on their heads and backs, moving as quickly as they dared in rather haphazard fashion. I didn't even let them speak first.

"Hey! Hey!"

"Woah, it's the pega-"

I cut him off, rushing forward and pressing my front hooves to their chests.

"He changed the order! It's, uh, less!"

"You don't work for him! Stop trying to steal food! Hah! Thought you'd steal some from us? Haha, hey Pike, he thought he could steal some!"

"Shut up, Cosh! Get out of our way, shorty!"

Pike knocked me against the side of the tunnels with a hoof. After all I'd been through, I was almost surprised when the hit made me squirm inside at being thrown around. But I jumped forward, trying to get near the plates.

"No, no! Please, he told me to change it! That he wants me to take this and-"

"Get off, pegasus! Our boss still wants you! We'll tell him you're here!"

We were fighting in the small corridor... well, pushing and shoving mostly. We were all pretty small in some way, giving rise to perhaps the most pathetic scuffle in Equestrian history. Eventually, however, Cosh butted me on the side of the head, knocking me to the floor. I covered my head while they hoofed my body a few times.

"Little rat! You wait there. I want that shiny thing you had last time back!"

They galloped on, accompanied by another roar from the jailer about being late. Shivering, clutching my aching scar with one hoof, I slid the empty sneezing powder pot back into my saddlebag.

Oh, the fun was about to begin.

"You get away from me!"

The voice made me cringe, hearing Unity shout at whichever pony it was that had moved toward her cell. Watching carefully on my mirror, I held the next closest door open, ready to leap inside should anypony move for a quick exit. Pike and Cosh I could simply see looking at Unity like she was some sort of tourist attraction, while the jailer was pulling his bulk up to the desk, ready to eat.

Yet even as I peered in, I saw Pike's extended hoof snap back as Unity's magic hurled a stool at the bars.

"Huh! She's feisty!"

"Reeeel feisty!"

"Shut up, the pair of you." The jailer snapped at them. "I didn't borrow your services from that braided idiot for your wits! She's my prisoner until Shackles gets here. No touching."

Her magic swung up the stool again as she backed away from the bars, out of their reach again.

"Like I'd let one of you two near me."

The Jailer cackled.

"Try telling Shackles that."

A sick feeling shot through my stomach at the look upon her face, leading Pike and Cosh to snort with shrill laughter. Grinning at her, licking his lips, the jailer dug into his meal. I held my breath.

I had expected to wait for a few minutes, but apparently, the entire pot had more immediate effects.

The desk rattled, hopping as his hooves flailed and rose to his mouth. Choking, gasping and coughing, the jailer roared aloud, sucking in air and gurgling, attempting to wipe his tongue with a yellowed sheet of his clothing.

“Blurrgrh! Ya... yain... FUCKIN THRO-YAAAARGH!”

The desk rocketed up and flipped, sending food and tabletop items flying. I saw Unity’s eyes go wide in surprise, while Pike and Cosh moved closer, seeming to hug one another while their temporary master stomped and flailed to and fro, gagging and panting. Sneezing madly, his voice reaching higher pitches to more the powder burned the inside of his throat. I saw his eyes lock on them.

“Ya... YA TWO!”

“Run, Pike!”

“Way ahead of ya!”

I dove into the waiting doorway as they clattered out. Mere seconds later, a wobbling and rippling obese jailer staggered out after them, screaming from the powder in his throat, swearing loudly and chasing them off down the hallways. The moment he had passed, I dove into the jail, and ran up to Unity’s cell. She gasped and hurried up to the bars, pocketing a small bronze object.

“Murky? You came down here?”

“The M-Master is coming, we need to get you out!”

I glanced down at the lock, finding it to have a keyhole. Perfect!

“Can you pick it?”

“Yes! They took my lockpick rod, but I still have a bobby pin from my mane! Can you find anything in here to work with it?”

In the distance, I could still hear the jailer shouting. Damn it, he hadn’t gone far! I had to search quickly.

I took to the mess the jailer had left behind, tearing out drawers and looting the cabinets. The jailer’s voice was becoming louder again. He was coming back! Throwing open the second cabinet, I found a small cupboard filled with tools. Some of them were reddened. Stifling the sick realisation, I began digging through them, feeling the panic rise. Hammer? No. Spanner? No. Screwdriver? Damn it, no! A power drill? Just sick...

“Keep looking! Try his desk, maybe he has spare keys!”

Vaulting over the fallen desk, I started hunting through the mass of fallen items, tossing them aside. Heavy hoof treading accompanied by mass swearing and spluttering was echoing back down the tunnels already. We had to go now if we wanted to avoid him seeing us! I hoped he was further away and this place was just playing tricks on my ears.

“Come on, Murk!” Unity hissed, her eyes watching the doorway. “If there’s nothing there, just go...”

“Not again.” I muttered, striving to not let my mind get clouded by worry for my friends, before my hooves found a little tin box and opened it. Four labelled keys looked up at me. “I got them!”

“Good! It’s cell two, get the one for cell two! Hurry, Murky, I can hear him coming!”

A loud belch and sudden sneeze came seconds apart from outside. I looked down at the keys to grab the second along and threw it to Unity, who caught it in her magic. After a brief attempt, she raised it up.

“...Murky, this says cell three on it! How did you mess that up?”

She didn’t sound angry, just bewildered and strained from worry about us being caught. My mouth gaped as I looked down. They hadn’t been in order? Screwing my eyes shut, I just slid the entire box to her.

"I... I can't read, okay? I'm sorry..."

Unity even took a half second to just stare with wide eyes, before her shoulders sank. But her eyes rolled as her voice deadpanned.

"My hero..."

Looking down, evading my embarrassed blush, she whipped up the key, twisting it around in the lock and trying to force it in. I stood nearby, pacing in worry.

"Stupid... stupid fucking slaves. Damned pepper on a damned radroach stew? Oh they'll pa-OH!"

His hooves stopped on the spot, not too far from the cell area, and his deep voice rose in shock, as though surprised by something.

Another voice cut through the quiet of the cellar areas.

"I suggest you care less about your meal and more about why you're not at your post, lackey."

The Master. All sound other than that voice ceased. Oh... oh no, he was here! I spun to Unity, trying to help her with the lock.

"Murky, what?"

"We have to go! We have to go now!"

The jailer's thick tread was joined by that inevitably terrifying stomping. He must have come down the other passage! Wiggling the key through the rusted gate, I gave it one large shove to finally jam it in. Together, her magic and my weak strength, we tried to force the large lock around. To my horror, I felt the key bending, but we couldn't stop now!

A sudden ping was followed by the tink of metal on the floor.

I staggered back, mouth open as I saw the snapped key. But Unity stared at it, closed her eyes and strained. Seeing the deep red aura around the remains of the key, she shivered with the effort to turn it in her magic, before it finally clicked. Together, we struggled to pull the rusty gate open and be properly reunited.

"Come on!" I moved to pull her out, but Unity turned back, grabbing that little object. What was it? A shaped piece of metal? She simply tossed it into her rags, not giving me a chance to see it properly.

"Okay, done, now we go!"

Leaning forward, pulling her quickly, we galloped together out of the jail and down the corridor, charging around a corner the moment I heard The Master and one hell of an unfortunate jailer return. The odd thought that with all this nick of time running, I'd not actually seen The Master since Barb's death in the Mall. I'd always been too afraid to look back.

Forever chasing me. Something I couldn't ever look back because I dared not out of terror.

Terror of seeing what could close around my neck once again.

To that end, we didn't wait, we didn't judge. We simply galloped as fast as our tired bodies would carry us until we found stairs upwards. Hearing nothing behind us other than a spine-chilling roar of anger.

Doubling up to shove aside the thick dungeon doors, we found ourselves back in the atrium. Immediately, we ducked into the side of the room and began heading to avoid this main nexus of activity. Ponies were moving between the cubes or dragging small carts to the experimental areas and chemistry labs, giving us few exits. Most of the other doorways were blocked by old rubble, I guessed from the balefire or the riot destruction.

I felt Unity tugging me. There was one hole left, where a door had once stood at the opposite end from the large broken window. A thousand shards of glass still seemed to be embedded into the walls surrounding it. Amongst this mess of a central hub, it was only one more oddity. Perhaps a little recklessly, we galloped across the floor, trying to blend in like two ponies rushing to work. In a minute or so, I knew The Master would come tearing up after us and raise the alarm. If we wanted to find Old Grizzly's office, we had to move quickly, very quickly.

I just prayed we could somehow find Protégé amongst all of this.

Hopping through the hole, raising a few complaints from the slaves trying to work on picking out all the glass with tongs, we found a stairwell that had clearly only just been repaired from almost nothing. Even one more level up, it began to feel like this entire section had been repaired in a way that did not reflect the original style. Under all the patchwork, I could see a peeling pink wallpaper.

"Do you know the way to his office?"

"No! But I know where the higher rank offices are. We'll just look for the name on the door!"

Galloping out onto a floor, we shared a look, before Unity bit her lip and turned back to look ahead.

"...ok. I'll look for the name on the door."

Emerging onto a more traditional corridor with more of that horrible pink hue decorating it, Unity began to look at each door in turn. Behind us, I heard a great commotion going up in the main rebuilt atrium research labs. Clearly, The Master had emerged from the dungeon. Perhaps we could-

I heard trotting. Darting forward, I almost tackled Unity through the door she was checking, for us to land in a heap beyond it. Clamping a hoof to her mouth to avoid any sound of surprise, I gently let her go as another pony cantered past.

No. Not another pony. Grindstone. The old donkey was pushing his way down the corridor, grumbling and hissing with anger to himself. Remembering the stallion's warning, I figured that council jury chamber was about to get very heated once he arrived. Behind him trotted a young mare, desperately trying to get his attention.

"But, Master Grindstone! The machine can't be repaired if it becomes strained. We can't risk-"

"It was designed by Aurora Star herself, known for memory technology that functioned in great stress. You will carry out the orders! Now leave me alone, the hearing is in five minutes."

"I'm so sorry, but we can't! If we try to extract the memories too quickly, the pony you're inside could expire and-"

"One wretched life matters nothing to me! You think I care about that buck any longer? Now that that ridiculous robot is gone, you can do what you want with the machine, can't you? He knows where it is. That's the only bit of information that matters, everything else we can find down there. Now get away from me! This hearing is crucial. If I get it the way I want, that little buck will be back with the slaves, where he belongs."

"Y-yes, master."

They passed down the same rickety stairwell we'd came up. I pressed against the doorway, listening carefully while nervously chewing my lip. Good luck, Protégé.

Unity shifted up to me.

"Somepony that matters to you? If they're on Grindstone's bad side then I'm on their side." Unity had stood up again, moving back to the door herself. "What's his name? What did he mean about 'back' to the slaves?"

I only hesitated for a second, before mentally bucking myself for being so paranoid these days. It was Unity, of course I could tell her.

"...his name is Protégé. My master."

"What?"

Turning quickly, I lifted my hooves to her shoulders. "But he used to be a slave, like us! He's a good pony underneath, really! Just... converted."

Looking away, I dropped back down to all four hooves and glanced around as a means of trying to change the subject. But amongst the empty wall safes and a discarded cloak upon the floor there was nothing to give me the opportunity. Instead, I just sighed.

"But I swear, I sometimes see who he really is. It's like he just feels lonely and lost inside. Like he's been searching for somepony else without even realising it beneath what Red Eye's done to how he sees things. Somepony who understands or sees more to life. He was really hurt and I wanted to find him, tell him where I was going!"

To my surprise, she seemed to react a lot less than I'd expected, taking my words at face value to just smile and pat my (uninjured) shoulder.

"Then we'll go find him if we can, Murky. I trust you. Now, I think Grizzly's office is just down this corridor. We'll get there, then judge where we are, okay?"

"Right."

The corridor was empty again. No doubt all these higher ranks who deserved offices were moving off to the hearing on Protégé's future. I let Unity lead, checking each name plate in turn. Below us, there was rampant shouting and rushing around. I simply hoped they didn't presume our escape route to be deeper into this beehive of slavers.

"This one!"

Unity tapped a door emblazoned with three balloons. (Ones somepony had once tried to chisel off, it seemed.) Not hesitating, she simply shoved her way inside. Casting one more look back down the corridor, half-expecting The Master to be waiting, I trotted inside and closed the door. The sound of dozens of ponies beginning to gallop around was growing. We didn't have much longer. Turning back to the office I... woah...

This was no normal office. Tall and with a balcony that blew in hot stormy air, it indeed had a large pink desk and a chair, but that was where the 'normal' stopped. The walls were covered in small pigeonhole boxes, bearing hundreds... no, thousands, of letters. Large sacks had been tossed in a corner as part of a futile attempt to tidy up. Now they simply overflowed, dropping even more thin pink letters everywhere. Below my hooves was a thick carpet, also pink, that was strangely comfortable to stomp on. An odd brass tube seemed to run into the pigeon holes with wires connecting it to a terminal on the wall, for whatever use I couldn't even fathom. It had little highlights of... yup, pink.

Oh yeah. This room sure was pink.

Somehow, I didn't even need to read the little plaque upon the desk marked with three balloons to know who this office belonged to. Already I could feel eyes watching me from somewhere. Together, we wandered into one of Pinkie's rooms, finding both our pairs of eyes fixated on the letters.

"What are these?" I looked closely at one as Unity raised it with her magic.

"Well, not like anypony's going to shout at us for taking a little peek, huh?" Carefully, she began unfolding it. But what was it anyway? It didn't escape my ever active imagination that all these were meant for somepony who had died, though.

But each of them bore the same stamp alongside a wax seal of the Ministry itself. The stamp was shaped like a cake.

"It's a birthday card." Unity whispered quietly, raising the little white slip from the envelope. "Says, hmm. 'Hi, Pearly Swirl! Happy super-duper twirly twirl Birthday! You didn't think your old pal Pinkie would forget it, did you? Enjoy the gift and make this the bestest day ever until the next bestest day ever next year too! Signed, The Pinkiest of Pink Ponies, Pinkie Pie! PS. don't go near any doors today. Take it from your bestest friend Pinkie!'"

Finishing the short letter, we both just looked up, probably even more confused than before she'd read it.

"Uh, that was..."

"Weird?"

"Yeah, weird."

"Definitely weird."

Absolutely weird."

She gently placed it upon the desk, immediately cantering over to the (pink) table's (also pink) terminal on the desk and seating herself upon the (again, pink) chair. I just ran my eyes along the walls, finding a giant map of Equestria. Lines from Fillydelphia were drawn to every settlement. Trade routes.

I had no idea if this was the most endearing or terrifying thing I'd ever seen. No, surely my imagination was playing tricks on me. She couldn't have known the birthday of everypony in Equestria! It made no sense! There wasn't any automation or space for a large workforce. Just maybe a couple helpers and the mare herself. How was this possible?

Watching everypony... FOREVER.

Absent-mindedly needing some air, I wandered to the balcony and glanced out. From here, you could see the entire roller coaster on this side of the FunBarn. Below us lay the much longer and lower section of the Barn where I had seen all the machines creating presents. To my horror, I saw the guards rushing to cover every single exit around the wall.

"Unity, we need to go soon."

"In a second. He said he keeps lists of all their names on here for ponies who go on special assignments or get sent to the Pit. I will find him, Murky. He needs my help! This could be the only link I have! Okay, okay, there we go! I'm in! Let's see... 'Pony Database!'"

She kept typing away, furiously hammering the keys with her hooves, lacking Glimmer's natural duality of magic and physical interaction, but making it all up in determination.

"It doesn't search by initials! One second, I'll put my name in, see if anything comes up! There... we... go!"

A rush of air blew past us with a small thwip. The sound caught both our attentions, as the tube attached to the wall of letters sent a small envelope firing out of it to land upon the middle of the floor. Sharing glances, I moved to pick it up, while I saw Unity look back at the screen and scowl. The expression didn't seem to suit her.

"It's got info on him alright! I can see the request against my name that Grizzly put in that someone be sent back with me to the same assignment after the Pit! But it's got no name-wait!"

She almost hammered the keypads into submission with her hooves in excitement.

"There's something saying about a transfer to another role for Red Eye's empire after the Pit; they took him somewhere else in Fillydelphia but-but no record of where or with who!"

"Anything else?"

"NO!"

Her head lay in her hooves, staring at the insultingly bareboned descriptions on the screen.

"I was so close... I thought I had him! Murky, what happened to him? Was somepony giving me false memories? Was he not really in the Pit? I just don't know anymore! I just. Don't. Know!"

Her front hooves slammed on the keypad of the terminal with each word, before she slumped over it, sobbing through her own frustrated anger. That flattened dirty mane fell either side of her head. But then she stopped, as though realising something.

"Wait. Grindstone was talking about a buck back there... do you think he could have slipped him off there? I used to be with Grindstone, one of his stock. How am I meant to know what to pursue?" She quaked, holding back a scream of frustration. "Why does this world have to do this to us all?"

Picking up the envelop in my mouth, I dropped it on the desk before moving beside her.

"Maybe this?"

"Murky, that's just some stupid thing Pinkie used to do."

"But it came out when you put in your name so..."

"Look, Murky, I-huh?" She had looked up to knock down the idea, but I saw her eyes simply stare at the seal. "M-Murky..."

"What? What is it?" I leaned over, but the words were absolutely unreadable in the same writing style I had seen Pinkie use on the other letters. But Unity's face was one of abject shock, of a mixture between wonder and stark fear. "What does it say?"

Her mouth quivered, before she spoke slowly, gulping and forcing the words out.

"It's... it's addressed to-"

She took a breath.

"...to us."

To,

Murky and Unity.

So super super sorry that this letter took soooooo long to arrive, but when I knew I had to send it, I was just like 'Aaaaaaaaah!' for at least a minute! I mean, can you imagine?

I'm really really sorry that it missed your last few birthdays, Unity. That's why I want to make my gift to you really special! I just want to tell you that you don't need to panic. It's all going to be fine! I hate to say it, but there's a hard road to go first, before you see the buck you once knew. I wish I could just tell you, but I don't really know all the itty-bitty details. This isn't like one of Twilight's crazy organised experiments, y'know! I'm sure you'll work it out together. You're a smart pony. Smart ponies always figure things out! Except me. But then, I can't figure me out either! How crazy is that!?

Just trust me, Unity, it'll be alright. Together, or not at all, right?

Hey, Murky-Murk? You're what set off my Pinkie Sense so bad that I spilled somepony's sarsaparilla! I mean, a pony who never had a birthday party in his life? I will not, as Ministry Mare of Morale, let this happen! But it's a few days till your birthday yet, Murky. Be patient, okay?

Oh, and Murky? Listen very carefully to your Auntie Pinkie. Don't. Worry. When the time comes to make a choice, whether to leap or not, you'll know what to do.

I'll be watching out for you two, from wherever I am.

With hugs, (Give each other one for me! Hehe!)

Pinkie Pie!

PS – I'd leave the office right now if I were you.

Unity let the letter droop after finishing her read through.

Speechless... utterly, utterly speechless.

My mind didn't actually even know where to begin with the process of figuring out what I'd just heard.

"I'll see him again?" Unity spoke gently, lowering the letter back to the desk, her eyes still wet. But then her teeth gritted, with a smile that only somepony with their mind set on the daring could make. "Yes. Yes she's right, I will. I don't care how long the journey is, Murky, or how hard it is. I'll trot it if I have to. Whatever Grindstone's done to him!"

"There might be something. I was in Grindstone's place before. That machine he mentioned, it had a buck in it. I don't know him and some robot said he was there for a lot longer than recently. He was in some uniform. But maybe that has something to do with it? Maybe it's him!"

She was quivering on the spot, resting her hooves upon the desk. But her took my hoof, holding it tightly and nodding.

"Yes. I... I hope so. We'll get in there someday, Murky. If you're right, maybe that is him! Grindstone was always hunting us when he could, like that other beast that's after you."

We had something to go on and I knew I had an ally in the Ministry. It was decided. We had another objective after all this.

Yet I couldn't ignore that else I'd heard when she read it. My mind was reeling from a message to me. A birthday? What choice to make was Pinkie talking about?

They were details for later. Right now, I did the only thing I knew I could do immediately and gave Pinkie her only request. I hugged Unity amidst her shaken thoughts. Her hooves wrapped around me tightly enough that I felt my wings ache. We were both scared witless, not even trying to comprehend the truth of what we'd just found or how or why. But all I could think about were those eyes that seemed to follow me everywhere and the dungeon below. Was I right to trust a two hundred year dead pony with a dungeon?

A crash sounded through the hallway. The sound of a door being bucked in.

"Check every damned room. They have to be up here!"

Jolted back to the harsh reality of Fillydelphia from the voices of the past, our faces swivelled to the doorway. I could hear slavers smashing open every office door and storming the rooms. They were coming! Grabbing our things, Unity and I galloped back to the door, peering out to see a half dozen slavers armed with rifles barge into a room six doors down.

"Go now!" I hissed, before we moved into the corridor, moving away from the way we'd come up. Side by side, we sprinted for all our combined worth to reach the next corner.

"There they are! There they are!"

The shout behind us was followed by an ear-splitting crack from a rifle. The wall to my left splintered. A warning shot, no doubt. But there was no stopping me now. Unity and I had our ponies to find, the ones that mattered to us.

Another shot came much closer. I screamed as it tore through my saddlebag. My journal! Oh please be okay, please be okay!

We turned a corner, three shots slamming into the wall behind us, to see the balcony over the research areas up ahead. No going that way! Instead, we turned down a side corridor through a massive steel door.

"Look, Murky! That sign says 'Medical!' This way!"

Those chasing us were gaining, but passing through into the medical wing, our combined strength was just enough to shove the thick door shut and spin the lock. Pre-war ponies may not have known anything about safety railings, but they sure could make a big doorway! On the other side, I heard many attempts to spin the lock, before we pulled a pipe from the wall and jammed the doorway.

Now to hope there was another way out. But instead I just heard Unity shriek.

"Murky, you're bleeding! You've been shot!"

My hooves stumbled in terror. I was? But I hadn't felt it! Unity pushed me to the ground, her hooves becoming slick with...

...with orange liquid.

Unfortunately, that brought even greater fear. Dread realisation emerged as I began pulling open the saddlebag.

"No, no, no, NO!" I simply panicked, tussling around in the mass of stuff I'd acquired over time. I felt a sticky liquid as I drew out the one remaining RadAway sachet I had. It was leaking badly.

"NO!"

"Murky, what's wrong!?"

I didn't even answer, just trying to press the liquid back in, but hooves weren't meant for such a role. Crying, hyperventilating, and feeling my lungs flare up as though sensing the only lifeline I had left being drained away, I instead just crammed it toward my mouth, downing every bit of it that I could. I didn't have to take it for another twelve hours. It felt like such a waste, to be throwing away something I'd need. Clutching the empty packet, the realisation settled in.

I was dry of RadAway.

"I need it to live! My lungs they, uh, they get real bad and I don't understand it but the doctors say they can't fix it! They can't fix it, Unity! I cough and get blood and... oh Goddesses help me. I'm going to die in a day if I can't get more!"

Unity's face bore a mask of horror, before steeling herself.

"I didn't know, but Murky, we need to get out of here first. We're going to medical, we'll try and steal some! But we have to get moving!"

Allowing myself to be led, my limbs shaking in fear, I couldn't help but remember every time I'd been through this hell. In the air terminal, in the crater, in the pits, and in the Ministry. The one thing that I couldn't get rid of that lurked within my chest, eating away at my life. Through a mask of tears, I followed Unity. Yes. Yes, medical, we'd get some and-

Medical was heavily guarded. Very heavily guarded.

The corridor opened out onto a selection of small rooms, each walled by thick glass. Beds lay among them, sometimes with an unconscious slaver on them. But at the end I could see griffons surrounding a large door. Past that there were crowds of ponies. Unity and I ducked low, staying underneath the lowest height of the windows and moving around parts of the room the griffons couldn't see through too.

The ponies were arguing, one donkey too. I heard Grindstone's deep and rough voice.

"The boy is an embarrassment, garnering nothing but advancement through his association with our leader! It's bad enough that we be dragged down here by Master Grizzly to have to be doing this under some stuffy bureaucratic means to be in Protégé's presence, but to have any capability he has held up as good for Fillydelphia? Absolutely not!"

Many ponies cheered and roared their support. Another voice, stern and wise, barked back.

"You accuse our leader of permitting anypony to hold rank without proving themselves? Protégé spent two years proving himself to Red Eye and took on the responsibilities only after Red Eye's personal approval! In his duty, he has carried out numerous--"

"He failed, Grizzly! Did you not see the Stable débâcle? He let Steel Rangers destroy most of the workforce until Stern had to rescue them!"

I felt a personal objection and unthinkably frustrating well of emotion at that. That mad donkey had set that damn ambush up himself!

"Not only that, but he then proceeds to fail to control his own slaves, resulting in a riot that killed over twenty slavers and over forty slaves! It was his warmongering attitude to launch an all-out assault, with no tactics and without even attempting diplomatic negotiations that almost got him killed!"

The urge to scream and rant in response was almost overwhelming at the sheer gall of Grindstone to say such things as truth! Protégé hadn't done that! But hearing the amount of ponies hollering and agreeing made my painfully grind my remaining teeth to bite down the anger. I had to find Protégé in here.

The medical station held several windows in the far wall that looked in more secure rooms. It seemed likely they might be there. But to get there, I'd have to cross the primary 'path' through the centre. The griffons couldn't not see me then.

Sitting back, sweating, still afraid for my own health, I took a second to breathe and try to figure something out.

"You have no proof for any of those claims, Grindstone!" I heard Old Grizzly, the one voice shouting back for Protégé, speak up again. "You have yet to hear his side of the story!"

The donkey's voice was weaker in reply, but firm and authoritative.

"Chainlink Shackles has offered a witness' viewpoint. Many others who say it back him up, including Quartermaster Mosin. They report that Protégé ignored any advice in an apparent effort to attempt to impress Red Eye. He is not worthy to lead! He should be cast from our ranks! Thrown back into the pits!"

Another pony, rough voiced.

"I say we just let him die! I lost friends in that fuck up he caused! He deserves punishment! Shackles is the hero, trying to calm it, but then Protégé went and caused another mess up with friendly fire on the griffons!"

"Yeah!"

"Punishment!"

The urge to just run up and give a 'witness viewpoint' of my own was tempered only by the natural fear I had of Grindstone. Unity, having been sitting so quietly that I almost lost track of her, lay a hoof over mine, calming me. She spoke quietly, gently.

"Politics, Murky. They want him out. Old Grizzly's honest, he won't give up. But we can't change what's going on over there. I'm sorry."

"I know... j-just... he did so much! Gave so much of himself, saved my life so many times and put his life on the line to help slaves, and this is what happens! They make him into the fall pony. It's not fair!"

She patted my hoof. I knew she was right. Giving me a second to take a deep breath, she nodded to the opposite side of the room.

"Come on. We should get moving. We need to cross here anyway. When you dumped your bag, were those firecrackers I saw?"

Oh? Ooooh...

That improved my mood a little. I couldn't speak out on this horribly biased version of events, but I could interrupt them! Tearing them out, I ripped the ignition strip from the top of the line and passed them to Unity. Holding them in her magic, she threw them to a far corner of the medical chambers. I covered my ears.

But nothing happened.

"...did it fail? When's it going to-"

It went off. A mad burst of noise and fire cracking off in rapid succession. Like a gun on fully automatic, they sparked and blasted around the corner of one operating theatre. Clutching my ears, gritting my teeth, I tried to watch as the griffons immediately bounded forward, flanking around the room to check out the commotion. I heard the higher ranked masters scatter, some dropping to the ground. To my delight, even a few cries of fear. The moment the griffons soared past us, Unity and I ran into the next chamber of this wing and started pushing the next security door shut behind us.

We got it half way, when I saw Grindstone stagger forward and cast one beady eye at us. I saw his eyes go wide at the sight of me, like a surprise at seeing such a slave here.

"You..."

"Push, Murky!" Unity screamed, throwing her weight against the door as Grindstone called the griffons and charged the doorway.

"You trespassers! Thieves! Guards, get over here!"

The door slammed shut. Repeating the same trick, Unity jammed the wheel and dragged me further in.

"You've got a few minutes! I'll look for a way out, you find him!"

She took off, running into the facility while I began cantering around each window. The door shook from gunfire rattling against it, seeming to bulge in places. I could hear the zap and crackle of energy weaponry too. Knocking aside chairs and skittering about on the slippery tiled floor, I hopped up to the windows of every enclosed area and side room, checking for my master. Most were empty, a couple bore incredibly confused and sick slavers who merely let their eyes wander at all the noise. One had clearly been at the receiving end of an auto-axe, displaying a grisly sight indeed.

But then my sight fell to one side room at the far end, secured by a whole separate door and with a thick window looking in. Slowly, tentatively, I trotted forward and hopped up.

The fight to not explode into tears on the spot was one of the toughest I had ever faced.

He lay upon the bed, his shoulders, chest, and throat swamped in blooded gauze. Tubes ran into his nose and mouth, needles were inserted upon his left foreleg, and a machine in the corner fed liquids down the tubing in a watchful vigil. It marked his life by a small picture of a pony that flashed red around the neck area.

Protégé lay unconscious. They hadn't even covered him. His cutie mark was still before me, carrying with it his dreams and hopes, under the Red Eye or not. Every wound, whip scar, and burn on his body from years of slavery made it all too easy to see why they hated him. He wasn't one of them, not truly. He never could be in their eyes, yet for all his life it was what he wanted. To work beside his idol.

Hadn't I wished so often for the same? To travel with Littlepip and aspire to her goals?

Leaning on the glass, noticing it steam up from my breath, hearing the growing thumping on the door, I knew that he was in danger. They wanted to execute him or punish him! I had to get him out of here, get him safe with Unity and I! We could prepare together! Go back for Glimmer, Brim, and Coral, her son, and even Sunny! We'd all get out!

I galloped to the door, tugging on the same wheel lock the barrier between me and the griffons now had. Wrapping my hooves around, I tugged.

Two explosions rocked the room, the security door behind me bulging in the middle. Dust fell from the ceiling and instruments scattered. Patients cried out in fear. I simply pulled, dropping my pitiful weight on the wheel to try and force it to just MOVE!

A horrible creaking behind me gave rise to a new sound of ponies shouting. They'd made a small hole! Come on! COME ON! I couldn't let them take him! I couldn't!

My muscles strained, my tiny little strength causing me to cry in sheer anger at everything about being born a slave! From being here, here at all to even the horrible weakness of body it left you with! Even Protégé, better fed and trained, was still a little smaller than most ponies. But my light-boned body only made it worse.

"Come on! Come on, move, door! MOVE!"

A further explosion rocked the door, blasting air through a hole it was creating at the side.

Unity returned and ran over to me.

"Murky, we're out of time!"

"HE'S HERE! I have to get him!"

To her credit she, without even looking in the room, trusted and tugged with me. The wheel moved slightly, grinding around from whoever had locked it so tight! But two weak slaves just... we couldn't...

"It's jammed! Murky, we can't get this! They'll be in here within seconds!"

Another explosion rocked the door, making bolts fly out.

"I'm not leaving him! They... they're going to hurt him!"

The door rattled on its frame, before yet another detonation set it leaning inward...

"Almost! Get them! Two more hits!"

Unity looked around at it, before turning back to me.

"I'm sorry, Murky! I'm so so sorry! But you can't help him if you're dead!"

She tugged at me, but I only screamed and dove back at the door. Remembering every time he'd leapt in for me, begged me to let him help me, guarded me with his own body and fought in my defence! I couldn't turn away now!

A loud crunch announced the door's top joint breaking from the wall. Unity whirled me around, pinning me against the window and pushing her muzzle almost right against mine.

"MURKY! I know what you're feeling! I... I know it too! Someone I care for is out there somewhere too and Equestria knows how much I want to help him too! I want to search here for more information, to call out Grindstone and know for real if that's what it is! But the ponies we care about won't be helped by us getting killed!"

The metal groaned. They were bending the door inward! Staring right into her crying eyes, I realised what I hadn't even thought. She'd come here for the same reason as I. She was having to leave without him too. Deep in those hazel eyes, I recognised my own pain. We'd failed, but that didn't mean we had to give up.

Unity dropped back from me.

"Then come on, I found a way out! Fillydelphia wins today, Murky, but all the old stories from Old Equestria say ponies had to face the darkness before the dawn too. We'll have another chance. They won't do it right away if they've got him hooked up like this. We can try again."

She turned, leading the way. I hesitated only just for a second, turning to look back through the glass. Smoke was billowing in from the door now, whirling around this chamber. I simply gazed in at my master, at the only other born slave I'd ever known to share the pain with.

He opened one eye.

My gut wrenched. The first sight he'd seen of me, and I had to run into the smoke.

"I'm sorry..." I muttered, backing away. That one eye, tired and in pain, seemed to quiver. "I'm sorry! And... thank you."

I hoped, somehow, through that clearly soundproof glass, that he understood before I turned and ran to catch up.

We made it a good thirty feet down a side passage away from the medical wing before the door busted in. I heard it crash down, followed by the scathing sound of talons on tiles. Unity led the way, bringing us out to a section of unrepaired roofing. Scaffolds lay around us with many tools, all open to the sky. Unity quickly spun back to me, rushing over and starting to tug at my fleece.

"What are you doing!?" I was still reeling with emotion, but this genuinely caught me off guard.

"Helping you get your wings free! They'll spot us if we go too far, but if you can just fly us over the little wall here we can make a run for it!"

My face flushed. Feeling rather hollow, I gently brushed her off and looked away, screwing my eyes shut.

"I never told you but... I can't fly. My wings are broken."

Letting my eyes creak open a little, the look she gave me could only be described as absolute heartbreak, before she galloped up to nuzzle close for a second.

"Oh Murky... I'm so sorry, it's like if I lost my horn or something I wouldn't know what to do! But what do we do then!? That was my plan!"

Behind us, I could hear them approaching our dead end. Casting my eyes around, I spotted what could be our only way out. Near the tools, I located one of the utility saddle grapple launchers.

"Help me get this on my saddle!"

It took a few tense seconds of work, but Blunderbuck had done his work well. It was as easy as slotting on the tool, tightening the gear and hooking it up to the wires! Suitably equipped, I flexed my front hoof, springing the mouthpiece out. Trotting up to the edge, I cast my eye around, spotting the rungs of the rollercoaster above us. Below us lay the same wide factory level of the Barn I'd seen on my way in.

"Hold tight, Unity! I-I have no idea what I'm doing!"

"Aren't you reassuring. Well... geronimo?"

She fed her hooves around me, hugging tightly. Gripping the mouthpiece, squinting through the rain, I aimed for the rollercoaster and bit down.

My body jerked backward from the pneumatic force of the grapple rocketing from the launcher. Trailing a thin wire from the canister, I saw it, by some miracle, wrap around a rung of the rollercoaster. Well, now or, never!

"Y'know, Murky, about that whole geronimo thing? I really don't feel quite as confident about that as I first said it!"

"Neither do I!"

Someone shouted from behind us.

"There they are! Get them!"

I didn't even look back. I simply jumped forward. We both screamed and simply fell, plummeting off the side of the Barn, before the wire went taut! My entire torso twisted, making me cough loudly and cry out in pain, before I felt our weights being swung like a pendulum low over the roof of the factory segment. Picking up speed, an insane sense of adrenaline and surging motion blasted through my senses. Almost crazily, I felt my mouth widen into a mad smile. We... we were doing it! We were-

The hook came loose and pinged out of its target.

...falling! I felt the hook drop loose from the coaster, my eyes catching a brief glimpse of that rusty structure breaking under our weight. Barely feet from the factory, soaring through the burning rain and incoming fire from above, we hit the new corrugated roof and bounced, rolling over one another along the soft metal like a mad two-pony-shaped bowling ball. My body flared in pain, my wings screaming in agony before we finally came to a stop upon a clear plastic skylight. Breathing hard, eyes wide, hooves locked around one another in sheer panic. I didn't even move when the grapple zipped back in and returned to the launcher by my side.

"W-w-wow..."

"T-that w-was s-some ride..."

It wasn't over. To our combined screaming, the roof gave way beneath our weight, dropping us into the factory, right into the view of about forty slavers below. After a bone crunching landing on hard metal, they all stared up at us on our unstable platform of...

...huh? Up at us?

Getting a sense of my bearings, feeling my balance lurch beneath me and my body ache, I realised that we had landed on the giant Pinkie head I'd seen. Soon after that, I also realised that it now was beginning to topple very dangerously.

"Hey, that's those runaways! Get down from there!"

The slavers surrounded us while we got up, struggling to keep our balance.

"Uh... Murky, I think this is going to go!"

My life had been punctuated by moments of rebellious insanity in here. It seemed I was about to add another one. Looking down at the almost spherical shape of Pinkie's head, only one idea came to mind.

"Lean forward!" I didn't wait for her, pushing us both forward and feeling the unsteady massive ball beneath us lean.

"I said get off! GET OFF or we'll just gun ya down! Bosses want ya alive!"

They had us utterly encircled, weapons pointed. I just hoped for the element of surprise. With a creak and a moan of twisting metal, Pinkie Pie's head broke loose. Unity and I screamed, back-pedaling madly to stay atop the rolling metal ball as it fell the ten feet to the floor and delivered the headbutt of the millennium to one poor slaver who didn't get out the way fast enough.

Slowly, it began to build speed. The dull rumbling offset by the sudden bump and jerk every time Pinkie's muzzle hit the ground and made the entire thing hop like a mad bouncy ball.

My hooves quaked from the unsteady mad ride, like some crazy circus act as Pinkie's head rolled forward, gaining speed on the smooth floor and beginning to thunder across the factory with us atop it. Turning, we had to gallop for all we were worth in the opposite direction to not be pulled under it!

"This was your idea!?" Unity shrieked, panting and powering her hooves as fast as she could.

"It's all I could think of!"

Looking over my shoulder, gasping for breath, I saw slavers and even slaves scattering in all directions from the oncoming pink ball of devastation. Boxes were crushed, machines knocked aside, and shelves toppled. But at the end of it, we were approaching the main closed doorway. The one normally too rusted to open.

Well, we were going to help Red Eye in one way at least.

Behind a rending crash of thin metal, the entire door was torn from its hinges, propelling us back into the outside. Churning through the earth, our transport threw waves of pooled water to either side behind it. Almost immediately, the rain lashed upon Pinkie's head, picking up mud and dampening the surface. Our hooves skidded, slipped, and fell. In desperation, we dived to the side, freefalling once more before landing in the thick mud.

"Urgh! Get up! Get up, Murky! The way's clear! Come on!"

Groaning, I tried to roll to my hooves, finding my body complaining all the more. Unity was pulling me, hissing through her teeth at the burning rain on her back. Around us, slavers were galloping and slipping about, but the gate was clear! The guards had fled the ball that now careened out into the FunFarm! We could go. We could-

Around us, shimmering in the darkness, a colossal shield slammed down into the ground ten metres to either side. The rain ceased when it enclosed us, trapping us in one green hue. Staggering to a halt, I spun and shrieked. Just outside the shield, one of those beasts knelt.

A green alicorn! Its horn was glowing and sparking brightly, projecting the thick magic shield that had trapped us.

And that was that. The slavers closed in, surrounding us and ending the escape about as suddenly as it had begun.

Behind us, I heard one final crash as Pinkie's head rolled over and sat atop a rather recognisable looking den. I heard one familiar overseer's voice echo across the storm.

"OH FOR FUCKS SAKE!" Screamed Whiplash.

We waited together. Pressed against each other's side for support, we simply waited as slaver after slaver surrounded us back inside the factory. Weapons were loaded and aimed, and we were the centre of a dozen furious glances. Griffons watched from the rafters, all awaiting a master to come and judge us. One slaver was staggering around, groaning after being run over by the Pinkie head.

"Sorry, Unity... I-I didn't want you to be-"

"Shh... it's alright, Murky. I chose to come. We might still be alright, look!"

She pointed with a hoof toward the door that came from the main building, where a somewhat shaggy looking pony approached. A monotone colouring upon his mane and coat was tinged with light and dark grey, almost covering his eyes. He moved with a certain poise and harsh eyes that seemed to widen upon seeing us. Raising one unshorn hoof, he waved the guards to lower their weapons.

"Unity. I had dreaded it was you. What are you doing!? I told you to stay out of trouble for now!"

This had to be Old Grizzly. Wiping my soaking wet brow, I squinted my eyes to get a better look at him. A tightly worn jerkin covered his thick, earth pony body, loaded with small pockets that held extra magazines for a long barrelled pistol strapped onto his hoof.

"The pony I'm trying to find! I told you I wanted to know out about him, but you've been lying to me when you said there was nothing! You knew he was-"

"Silence!" Old Grizzly cut her off, his voice leaving the calm and wise demeanour to remind me that yes, he was still a slave master. "You are still the slave here, Unity! You will mind your tone to me. This is unacceptable. Many slavers are calling for you both to be thrown at Hive's teams until you're just eaten alive! I've half a mind to agree, with all the damage you've done in here! I cannot prevent a true punishment from arising here!"

I felt Unity quiver. That wasn't good. Old Grizzly certainly still seemed more intense than Protégé.

"But I saw the records! He was taken somewhere when you said he'd be brought back to me! Why!?"

I presumed she felt it best to not blame Grindstone in the presence of so many potential allies of the donkey. Old Grizzly's eyebrows raised, before sighing and wiping a hoof across his brow.

"I have told you all I knew, Unity. I placed the request for him to be returned to you after the Pit, which I believe he did survive. I never saw the name, but the request referenced the buck you were sentenced with before. Past that I do not know! Fillydelphia is a complex machine, sometimes ponies fall through the cracks."

"But it said he was carted off somewhere!"

"Standard procedure for most ponies..." I saw him eye me. "...after the Pit. To not let blood fuelled maniacs go axe-crazy on their cellmates. Past that I do not know, Unity. They were told to-"

"Oh, I can answer that one..."

The third voice, deep and hateful, rumbled across the factory floor. Half limping, pulling his old body along, Master Grindstone moved at the front of a dozen huge and imposing slavers. They all bore symbols of power or clear higher rank, but Grindstone was their figurehead, shuffling along to Old Grizzly. I felt Unity shake with anger, her eyes locking onto the old mule.

"Really, you're all fools for not spotting it. Makes an old vet like me fearful for the dejected upcoming generations in here! Haven't any of you figured it out yet?"

Unity and I exchanged glances. I saw that she looked to Grindstone with sheer hatred.

She'd mentioned me before. Had she spent time under him? The donkey looked at us both, scowling at me in particular. Meekly, I averted my eyes. Old Grizzly huffed, turning to his fellow slaver.

"If you have some revelation, do share, Grindstone. I've had enough of listening to your poisonous words today."

"You idiot ponies. Her name! The transfer, stated that this 'buck', by sentencing, was to be returned to her. To Unity. To be sent to Unity."

Against me, I felt Unity shiver, no doubt a shot of horror going right down her spine. Taking a few seconds longer to get it, I twisted to look at her. Unity's face was drawn, pale, and devoid of that warmth she normally possessed.

I caught her before the stagger led her to fall. My friend simply stood limply, staring at Old Grizzly. The big slaver seemed morose, Grindstone's harsh words finally settling in as to the reality of what had happened.

"You... you approved that, didn't you!?" Grizzly snarled at the donkey.

"What does it matter? I just did a little checking up behind you after seeing you get a little too close to the labour. Had a look for who this request was actually talking about. Just doesn't take a half-intelligent being to figure it out when you look at the logs! Some idiot just looked, saw your dumb demand, and took it at face value! Best place for them. We needed more back then anyway. She's just a slave, so why care anyway?"

"You watch your tongue, Grindstone."

"Oh, do give it up. I'm much too old to be sneered at. Now, deal with your rogue slave, get her to the pits, and get back to your workplace."

"No!"

Everypony turned. Unity had shouted the one word with such conviction that even Grindstone's head moved with surprise. She looked at me, remarkably holding back tears. Holding her head high, Unity looked at the slavers.

"I'm not going to the pits."

Grindstone grumbled, talking as though to a child.

"I'm afraid you are, slave. You don't get a say in-"

"Because I choose to go to Unity!"

An audible gasp passed around, mine included. Pulling her around, I tried to get her attention, whispering.

"No! Nopony comes back from there! I'm sorry he was sent but you don't have to g-"

"No... Murky..." She gently moved my hooves away, only now allowing small tears to form. "I do..."

She fixed me with a sad look.

"Together, or not at all. I promised him that. At least this way, whatever Unity really is, I'll have a... a chance. We'll face it as one. It's what Pinkie told us. A hard road, but that I'd find him at the end of it."

"This isn't right. I just found you!"

Unity shivered, trying to catch herself, before leaning forward to embrace me gently.

"You helped me so much, Murky. Got me this far, but it's all right. If it were your friends, you'd do it too, wouldn't you? You're a brave buck, and I'm sorry to leave you, but stay by those that matter to you, alright? I know that Protégé will need you before the end too. Thank you, Murky."

Letting go slightly, I felt her lean in and lightly kiss me on the cheek, before we nuzzled slightly. I couldn't prevent myself from crying, feeling like I was losing her forever. Nopony... nopony survived coming back from Unity.

"Oh, one thing."

Unity backed off, digging into her ragged barding. Finally, she drew out a small object, a brass item. It was the one I'd seen in the prison cell, a small statuette of a little pony carved from metals and small pieces of scrap. A tiny unicorn, held aloft by her own magic and bearing a PipBuck on her right hoof.

"I told you my special talent was bringing ponies together, Murky. This is how I do it. I can read a pony's unique magical signature, we all have one, and we're all different. It's what makes the magic of friendship so strong between ponies. I can imbue small objects, s-somepony holding it can feel like the other pony is still there with them, j-just a little."

She sniffed, and wiped her eyes.

"I made this one and imbued it with my own signature, hoping I'd see you again. I know what she means to you, Murky, about the hope she gave you. Well... you gave me the same today. So please, take it; so we'll never be completely apart now, even if the worst happens."

Gently, she let it drift to my hooves, before tucking it away in my saddlebag for me. I saw it to have a few words along the base, unreadable. I didn't dare spoil the moment to ask.

"Th-thank you."

"Thank you, Murky... just remember. The friendship between us all is what keeps us going, okay? It's what'll let me help him, and it's what'll keep you going with your friends. Stay strong, Murky... keep inspiring others, okay?"

She backed away, moving toward Old Grizzly. Every step wrenched my heart, seeing her move all the further away. The one beautiful mare, for all the hurt slavery had done to her, giving herself up to the darkest secret of Fillydelphia in pursuit of one pony she'd promised to not leave without. Somepony she couldn't even remember.

The tragedy of her bravery struck me hard, almost too hard as I saw Old Grizzly nod.

"The next shipment to Unity isn't for some time. You'll be waiting in containment till then. I'll... I'll try and see if there's anypony over there who's been asking for you."

"Thank you, Grizzly."

My tears dripped onto the ground as I saw her led away by two guards, back into the FunBarn. Most of the masters left, Grindstone casting me a harsh look before moving back inside too. Silence reigned around the factory. Even the slavers were stunned at her volunteering. Soon, I saw Old Grizzly turn back, but not directly look at me, speaking quietly.

"You're Protégé's little helper, aren't you?"

"Y-yes, master..."

His eyes glanced down through that thick mane. He seemed so much older, watching one of the slaves he somewhat cared for leave. Probably as old as Brimstone.

"You saw what happened in the Mall. He'll need ponies like you. Stay low and get going. I can protect him from punishment for now, Red Eye wouldn't allow it, but he will not be returning to power. They decided... damn, that decided that Chainlink Shackles is now the permanent master of the Mall."

"Oh no..."

"I know, Murk. I know. He offends me as much he did your now previous master. I was Protégé's tutor to the ways of our work here, the things Red Eye doesn't directly teach himself, like maintaining workforces and shift patterns. I would prefer it if you were not near Shackles, Murk. That pony. He's more than just a nasty basket case of sadism, much, much more. Believe me, he is entirely sane. One of the old timers that held power in Fillydelphia before Red Eye came along. Do not trifle with him, Murk. I don't want you to get involved in the madness of a pony forged in the fires of what this nightmare city used to be."

My mind reeled and filled with horror in equal amounts. The Master was a constant. A singular constant in my life now that he had become almost predictable and terrifying in his sheer weight of presence. But to know that there was more in there, a life when Fillydelphia was not as ordered, for all the modern horrors.

"So I'm going to let you go."

"H-huh!?"

"Be wary. I heard Grindstone sending somepony to fetch him, knowing you were here. So go. Run." His voice lowered. "Stay safe. I may need your witness account when Red Eye is told of this by Protégé upon his recovery. You've become suddenly very important in a great game of politics and intrigue, Murk. I need you to disappear for now. So play along."

Shivering, fearing Shackles would stomp out the door at any moment from wherever he was hunting, I nodded.

"Right..." He took a breath, increasing the volume of his voice. "Now get going, you stupid slave! Hive's waiting! MOVE!"

I shrieked. Turning, I skittered, tripped, and fell in my blind hurt and sadness to leave Unity with them. Finding my hooves, I galloped. It hurt my aching body, but I simply galloped and did not slow down.

Choking, retching, in pain and exhausted, I finally collapsed in the first safe place I could think of.

Foal Land. Hidden amongst the old stuffed toys, I fell to my side and hoarsely took in what air I could.

But my eyes still moved, and they found one thing nearby. Upon a chainlink fence, sitting amongst a thousand others of its type, only detached, separated, without union.

Pulling myself over, I gently reached out and clicked Unity's lovelock back together once again, before collapsing at the bottom of the fence.

Hours later, I dropped into my hiding hole amongst the residential areas of Fillydelphia, a basement long abandoned. Hiding in the dark, fearing every hoofstep and wingbeat above, I simply curled up, clutching the Littlepip Statuette. Somehow, just by holding it, I felt better, like Unity's calming influence was crossed with the strength of my beloved legend.

Somehow, somehow, I wasn't going to let them have her. The impossible escape in my mind was a quickly growing list, to escape, to free Sunny from The Master...

And now to bring two ponies dear to one another back from the brink of Unity itself.

But I was alone. Without weapons other than a grappling hook on my saddle. Without food bar one solitary sandwich. No RadAway to speak of and only twenty four hours to live in a city that desperately sought to ruin me in every way possible.

I needed help, I needed strength. Holding the statuette close, I drew my PipBuck and curled up around it, switching on to the DJ's news slot. Let his tales of Littlepip bring me to bravery, as always!

"Good evening, wasteland..."

If there's one job that a DJ can often learn to get a little bit feisty about, it's repeating stuff now and again in the times when we have no new information. It gets a little boring sometimes to have to repeat tales that I know all of you ponies have heard time and time again.

But sometimes... just sometimes, the truth of the matter is those stories that no DJ wants to keep repeating just have to be done for the benefit of those who miss other slots. So it is with great regret that I tell those of you who missed it, the news from the town of Arbu..."

The Lost Virtue of Legends

"I know who you are. You are walking death, a plague in pony form. Where you trot, blood flows like a river."

"What's it like to lose faith?"

A downward spiral.

Like... like I'd been low before, right? I'd been really low in my life up till now. Most of the nights I knew I could remember were spent curled up in a corner or under the harsh wasteland weather, crying myself to sleep and failing to dream as any pony should.

But the last while had been building me up, filling me with sources of strength, the ones that any other pony has to some degree. Friends, advice, self decision, and even small victories amongst the darkness. Reunions with those that mattered. I was waking up for the first time in my life.

At my core, however, I had one pushing urge greater than any. One that had been with me since the moment I had witnessed her soar above the Pit I had lain stricken in, rising from the stagnant horrors into the light. My belief in the Stable Dweller, in her legend. They had been telling me that she was not the hero I believed, but I thought I knew better. Every day on the radio I listened to her exploits, old and new, like the tales of some mythical being that had once crossed my path. She was my absolute. The one thing I could hold to, believe in and trust the efforts of. To know, through efforts of her and those like her that the outside world was a better place than Fillydelphia. That Red Eye was wrong.

I'd put all my hopes in creating this implausibly perfect icon of a pony in my mind.

But... but...

"But then Arbu..."

Yes...

I think I just lay and... and clutched that PipBuck until I was forced to move by hunger. I didn't believe it. I didn't want to believe it! The Stable Dweller was my hero! I'd insisted she was perfect and strong and brave and kind and modest and lovely and... and... and everything! Every minute I just felt my chest ache as I waited for the broadcast that would tell me it was all a horrible mistake!

“You’re shaking... are you gonna be—”

No! I’m not fine, all right? Because I had to sit alone, away from everypony and listen to that broadcast! I didn’t have anyone around me to offer words of comfort! No one to tell me if it was all just a big mistake!

My mind only knew one way to cope. To fall back on mere belief. I had my faith in her and it had to remain strong! Heroes didn’t just change like that! Ponies who do so much for others and Equestria couldn’t be corrupted like that. Living legends that I’d believe protected and inspired us and... and...

Sorry... I didn’t mean to shout, and, well, this part’s difficult. I’m just scared.

“Of what?”

I was alone. Alone and more outcast than ever before when I had a crisis of belief. My very innermost inspirations my life began to take a downward spiral. A fall that I couldn’t turn back from no matter how hard I tried. One that just kept going and hurting and forcing me down. I still feel it.

The legends of Equestria were beginning to fall around me.

Without them I was defenceless, unable to feel the hope.

If they could fall, if those mighty titans of wonder could fall, how could somepony like me rise up? That’s all I could think about. That I would be better off just staying a slave and realising the truth, that there never was any great and inspired ‘better’ world to escape to in the first place.

That message was what started the descent into the darkest period of my entire life.

Lines... lines became... a line...

Shivering, I spat out the charcoal, before ripping the page from my journal entirely. Throwing it to the side, it landed within the damp corner of my hideout. I began staring at the blank page... taking the charcoal up once again and lowering my head to... to place a single dot and...

And draw a... a line...

It squiggled, juddering from side to side. Then... then it could be her tail! I’ll just move it to the side and fit her in the corner then! Lifting the charcoal, I repositioned and gently drew an arc. Yes... yes, curves! Curves came next! Draw a c-curve...

The line ground across the paper much harder than it needed, chipping the charcoal. Her head! Yes... round it up and flick for the ear... just... flick and—

NO! Too much! My hooves wiped across my straggled mane, biting my lower lip so hard I tasted blood. My hoof scraped at the paper, trying to rub a little bit out. It just smudged. Wait... wait maybe if I smudged it all I could redo the main bits in sharper lines!

My hoof rubbed, harshly ripping away at all I had drawn to turn it to nothing but a black mist. Quaking, I took up the charcoal and attempted to start again. She’d just be darker than normal, not as bright as I’d once seen her in the sky. Just... just like they s-said...

Lines... lines...

I looked upon the lines I had drawn, like a crude foal’s stick figure.

Crying out in frustration, I took up the journal and tore another page out...

“Get that little rat! Somepony grab him! Thief!”

I burst from the back door of the old supermarket, skidding across the mud and falling onto my side. My wing stinging madly, I staggered to my hooves, hearing the clatter of hooves behind me. Breathing quickly around the clasp I held in my mouth, I fled. Behind me, the stout quartermaster from one of Red Eye’s supply depots in this supermarket knocked the door open again so hard it smacked against the wall. Brandishing a cleaver in his magic, the bearded unicorn swivelled his eyes, spotting me clambering out of the mud and galloping off.

“There he is! Guards! Guards!”

A chainlink fence surrounded the supermarket. The only gate in was immediately swarmed by six slavers in masks, kicking their battle saddles into gear to take aim. Panicking, breathing hard, I instead ran around the opposite side of the building to where a dozen large rubbish containers sat awaiting somepony to ever arrive to empty them. Screams to circle around the building permeated the air, guards pursued behind me.

Diving between two of the garbage containers, I began stuffing my saddlebag and the package through the small hole I’d dug under the fence. Immediately after, I pushed my head through and started kicking furiously at the dirt.

“Get those containers out the way! Grab his legs!”

Shrieking at them being so close, I bucked out of habit, only striking the solid metal surface of a container, before yanking myself through the slick and searing mud. The rain had come and gone in Fillydelphia, keeping it drenched and dark amidst occasional electrical storms. Yelping when the sharp underside of the fence tore along my back and rump, I felt my body finally slip through and—

“Ah! Gotcha!”

My body jarred to a halt, feeling a pain shoot right from the top of my rump. Turning, sweating and pulling at the ground, I saw a slaver with his head right down at the hole, grasping my tail between his teeth. A gas mask was pushed up over his head.

“Go roun’! I ’ot ’im!” he snarled through my filthy tail, fixing me with a look. Behind him, I saw the slavers going back for the entranceway, aiming to properly get me.

Panic overtook me, before I lashed out with a back hoof onto the fence. The impact didn’t hit him, but the sharp impact on the metal near his face distracted him enough that my tail slipped out, tearing a few strands along with it. Crying out loud again at the sharp twang, I fell forward. No, I couldn’t stop now! I had too much to lose right now!

Either side, slavers were coming around the fences, galloping toward me. Scrambling to retrieve the package I’d stolen, I simply took off toward the closest group of buildings that I could. I needed cover! Somewhere to hide and wait them out! Immediately, in my rush, I slipped and fell upon the mud. I was caked in it, from the time spent crawling or falling in it during desperate efforts to escape everypony who had heeded the word of the slavers, that the one who brought in the pegasus would immediately win a reprieve from work for a week.

My limbs were tired already. How long had I been on the run? Was it just hours? Had it been days? My eyes felt heavy, my limbs leaden, and my mind drawn thin with exhaustion. I hadn't slept since the hospital over a day ago. My one sandwich had lasted one short meal to recover from the efforts in the FunBarn with Unity.

It could have only been a couple hours, but to me it simply felt like an unending rush to survive.

Up ahead, a group of slavers heard the calls of those skidding across the mud behind me and began rushing to cut me off. I was standing on a road between the supermarket and a housing estate. To my right lay busy factories, to my left a large soiled field filled in wet slop that in better days had once been a grassy expanse.

"Come on... come on, Murky. Ideas... ideas..."

Feeling tears running down my face as the slavers closed in, I paced rapidly on the spot, before simply screaming and running away from them all, no matter whether I knew the way or not. Finding myself heading toward the factories, I pushed my legs to gallop madly, trying to lengthen the time before they caught me. Glancing back, I saw the horror of six slavers catching up at a frightening pace. Why did everypony else have to be so tall or have such long strides!?

Slaves looked up as they saw the chase pass by. Many of them recognised me, but few dared interrupt the slavers (who, naturally, had a much greater reward for catching me than any mere slave) in their efforts—other than some who stood up, considering joining the chase. At their head was the quartermaster, that cleaver following him the entire way. Ducking around groups of slaves, trying to put as many tight corners between me and them as possible, I simply tried to break line of sight amidst the construction materials and large stockpiles of bar iron outside the main factory building.

Ahead of me there was a huge ditch that fell away by a good fifteen feet into what seemed to be a small quarry or deep storage basin. A storm drain ran along the bottom, filled with a green gunk. Striving to reach the ledge to slide down, I found my way blocked by a mesh fence that had been crudely stamped into the ground. The top was lined with razorwire. Above it, a massive crane loomed between the factory ground and the quarry. Its stairway was blocked off. Crashing against the fence, I spun to look behind me, finding confused slaves looking up at me. In the distance, I saw the slavers searching around the buildings. I had a little space! Time to dig! Then I could—YARGH!

"Hold him! Hold him! They'll like us if we just slow him down!"

Two slaves had grabbed my hind legs. Hooves were not the greatest for holding, I lashed out, bucking and trying to stop one stinking tar coated slave from lying over me to pin me down. Her hooves knocked my bandaged shoulder, drawing a squeal from me.

"Over here! He's here!"

"Please! Let me go! I'm like you! I'm like you!"

"Shut up, featherbrain! I'm getting a break for you!"

The slavers closed in, finding me held down by the slaves. Slowing, breathing hard, the quartermaster grinned and cackled.

"Think you can steal from Pony Moe's market, huh? I'm gonna have you strung up by your balls for this! Right outside my storehouse so nopony will ever think about that again, you little thieving rat! We got you red-hoofed."

I struggled, pulling my hooves in vain against the slaves who kept me on my back and spread-eagled before the slaver. My eyes couldn't leave that huge bloodstained cleaver.

Wailing, I paused for just a second before letting loose what desperation I could muster and simply biting the muzzle of the slave atop me with savagery I could only draw from sheer terror. The sprung back, howling as I felt a chunk of skin come out. Lashing out, crying, panicking and pushing myself against the fence with at least one part of my body free, I flicked my hoof to deploy my battle saddle's mouthpiece and looked skyward before pulling the trigger.

With a jolt, the grappling hook rocketed vertically toward the crane with a burst of pressurised air. Above me, I heard the clang of impact. Kicking at the slaves trying to hold my back hooves down, I bit hard on the mouthpiece, pressing my tongue onto the trigger to make the device start retracting.

The rope went taut, before I bucked once again at my captors and swung free into the air, pulled almost vertically upwards by the gun winding in the rope. Pulling my legs up, the cleaver whizzed below me, narrowly skiffing the hairs of my tail before the winding gears in my saddle got into their stride and whisked me upwards. Bouncing off the fence, pulling my legs up and away from them, I only barely missed the razorwire before whizzing off to a good height about them all. The storm's wind spun me until my stomach churned, blowing me back and forth like a pendulum. I had to get this right...

Unable to properly see where I was, hanging twenty feet from the ground by a rope attached to a crane and spinning madly like some wretched and well beaten piñata, I tried to gauge the right moment and bit down on the mouthpiece to release the hook from the crane.

Suddenly, gravity took over rather harshly.

I fell, tumbling through the air, dull red horizon after grey earth after black stormclouds in a whirling spiral before the wind was bludgeoned from my body. Gasping in shock as much as pain, I felt my body roll and fall further, sliding down a steep embankment of rough rocks and loose gravel. Shouting, whimpering and struggling to get upright, my hooves skittered out before I simply fell again onto my side, bouncing off the uneven ground to slam down again and again. Bones ground in my wings and I felt my muzzle's rad-sore savagely tore at before everything thudded to a halt upon an earth level surface. My balance was shot, the instinctive effort to get up and run leading onto to a dizzied fall and pathetic pedalling of my rear hooves. My front hooves simply clutched my own torso, breathing through gritted teeth until the pain subsided.

"Don't stop, Murky, don't stop, they'll be coming! Get the package and go! You need it!"

Growling the words to myself, and forcing all the pain into a howl of frustration and determination, I slowly pulled myself to my feet, finding the grapple lying nearby. I bit the mouthpiece again, drawing the last length of it back into the saddle. Turning my head, my muzzle now seeping infected looking fluids from the sores, I glanced toward the fence at the top of the large embankment I'd just fallen down. Slavers were tearing at the fencing, drawing bolt cutters from the tool chests nearby to start cutting through. Even as I watched, that cleaver flashed and separated an entire set of links. His eyes met mine, before they started trying to force through. They promised a lot more than just being handed over to The Master.

Groaning, I began limping, then trotting, then a painful canter toward my goal: the drainpipe of the storm trench. I could see a small gap just large enough for me in the thick bars that covered it. It would take me back to my hideout! Dragging the messenger bag package behind me from my teeth, I heard the scuffling of hooves on gravel.

"Stop there, slave!"

Don't listen, you'll obey... don't listen, you'll obey... don't listen!

“I said, STOP!”

I half tripped, my hooves juddering and trying to halt on the spot out of fear of offending my masters further. But I kept going, sloshing through liquid waste and pus-yellow slop around the drain entrance to drag my shrivelled body through a gap nopony else could hope to get through. Behind me, the slavers and even a few slaves rushed the drainage ditch, clambering down the sides and surging forward. With one more striving push, I popped through, scant feet ahead of them. The quartermaster slammed against the bars, his cleaver flying between them in his magic to swing at me. Screaming, I backed off, pushing myself into the huge pipeline of Fillydelphia’s sewer system to get out of his magical reach. The slaver beat against the bars, laughing maniacally and hollering at me.

“You can’t run forever, runt! We’ll get you eventually! Shackles wants ya! SHACKLES WANTS YA! YOU CAN’T RUN!”

Knee deep in sewage, I turned the first corner I could see before lying against the sewer wall to get my breath back. My nose was still blocked, unable to take any smells in, but I could still taste the rank atmosphere and feel the stuffy heat of Fillydelphia trapped down here. My eyes felt too dry to cry, so I simply huddled down and quivered, clutching the package closely. My body was failing, the hunt for RadAway not going well. Everything felt hot, the sprint from the supermarket had left me dizzy and my lungs burning. Biting a leg to stop the coughing, I searched inside the package for them.

My hoof drew out three small dry biscuits, almost crushed completely. Feeling my stomach twist and cramp, I guzzled the biscuit shrapnel as best I could.

That was it.

Still desperately hungry, my dry throat crying out for water that wasn’t simply taken from the brown sludge in puddles that seared my throat from the acidity, I lay back to let my legs recover. While doing so, I felt the little jab in my chest before drawing out the newest valuable I’d acquired and kept close to my heart.

The little statuette of the Stable Dweller that Unity had made for me.

I should have taken comfort in it, strength in it...

But with one sentence from a radio, half its meaning had been taken away before I’d even gotten the chance to enjoy having it.

No! No! No!

Scrunching up the paper, I hurled it behind me, landing amongst the few others that now slowly dissolved on the wet cobblestone floor of the sewer maintenance room. Her neck had been way too long and... and stupid... argh! Come on, Murky! Just draw her right this time!

“You know what she looks like. Draw her all... all heroic and...”

My charcoal stick lowered, shivering, and tentatively drew one long curve. Yes... yes that’s her back, now flick it upward and make a small circle to rough out the head... a... a shape! The curve becomes a shape and then the shape...

I stopped, before letting out a foal-like whine and whinny of sheer annoyance and frustration. Her head was too big! I started adding new lines, the old ones I could work into her mane, I could save this! I could save her! Save how I saw her!

The charcoal stick scribbled, making one new curve for the head... too small! Another... too long! Another! Another! Another and another and—

That was too many! I... I couldn't fix it.

"PLEASE!" I cried at the paper itself, breathing hard and hearing my lungs wheeze. I was sweating, both from sickness and the frantic worry. I... I couldn't draw any more! Everything I did just... just turned to a mess!

No, I had to keep trying! Drawing was how I saw the world, viewed it, judged it; how I believed in it! Why couldn't I make her look good again?

Why couldn't I make her look good again?!

"You didn't do it... you didn't do it, Pip. I know you didn't... it's all a lie... all a lie!"

The horrible mess of lines and awful curves was torn away, joining the growing pile behind me where all my charcoal attempts of the Stable Dweller slowly darkened until they almost seemed to gel with the black stone itself.

Panting, my entire body jittering and stinging, I skidded around the corner of the hallway and dove into the bathroom. Three sets of hooves thudded and rumbled across the teak wooden flooring in pursuit, rounding off at the top of the stairs and locking onto me like fervent predators. Whimpering, shouting my pleas and begs to them, I slammed the door shut, pushing my back against it.

The first impact nearly knocked me clean away, the doorway burst open by a few inches. Catching my hooves, I threw myself back against it again, holding it shut.

"He won't give you anything! Leave me alone! Please!"

"Push it! Push the door! Harder!"

The slaves rushed it, bucking and ramming the doorway. My little hooves struggled, being bashed and bruised upon the door that let its fragile nature be known when it kept smashing back in my face. Weeping openly, I just kept pushing my hooves against the slippery tiled floor to try and keep it shut between each impact. Eyes flickering, I saw this was a dead end. I'd run here simply to put a door between myself and the three slaves who'd spotted me. I hadn't even thought about what I was trapping myself in!

I fumbled for the lock, but the rusted latch fell right off, being knocked away as the door was forced inwards by a good couple of feet. A hoof appeared around it, being pulled back sharply as I knocked it back and jammed them in the door.

"Argh! You little fucker! You're getting it! GET HIM!"

Again, again, and again, the door was assaulted, starting to chip in places but all too horrifyingly being forced open against my pitiful strength. I couldn't shut it fully, I just couldn't compete with their power! A body wedged itself into the gap, a hoof swinging to grab or strike me. Knocked onto my back, I braced myself against the wall behind the door and just shoved my back hooves against the bottom, frantically trying to keep it shut just a few seconds longer by using my own full body. Each crushing blow sent a jarring pain through my spine, giving me more than enough reason to keep shouting for them to stop.

One more charge and forcing wrench from the wedged stallion knocked me clean away from it. My back hit the far wall of light wood, shattering much of it to fall down the gap between the outer and inner walls of the house. My assailants were in. Nursing my neck, I held one hoof up to the first one bearing a nasty cut on her hoof, the one I'd jammed in.

Looking up from behind it, I saw them come to claim their prize. Noose, Lemon, and presumably their new stallion member of the gang.

“No, no! I’ll come! I’ll come, just don’t-”

Her hoof whipped across my face, dropping me to my side amongst a splitting and searing wash of pain in my cheek. Curling up, I felt another three or four stamps upon my ribs, clearly held back or they would have been pulverised. Noose was angered enough to hurt me, not frenzied enough to ruin The Master’s prize. But it drove all the fight from me, leaving me a groaning heap before them. Hissing through her teeth, Noose shook her patchwork mane and snarled. Her ganglife colleagues flanked her, the rough form of Lemon and the new and very large stallion.

“Ya gotta do anythin’ you can in here to survive. So if that means giving you up, runt, I’m happy! You thought we wouldn’t recognise you in the crowd? Trying to blend in, huh? Well I remember your fucking face!”

Even as I had tried to sit up again, she struck me once more, right across the jawline. I felt my head whiplash around and strike against the porcelain of the toilet. Stars spun, my vision turning hazy. I simply rolled onto my back, moaning. The blurry shape of Noose stood up more fully, before heaving and hawking a wad of spit onto my face.

“A damned pegasus. Wish I’d just beat you to death in the airport for what you brought on one of our gang. Well now you’re going back to him. Lemon! Get that rope, tie him up!”

Both my eyes were throbbing, still blackened from but a couple of days ago with Barb’s raiders. But squinting them open, I saw Noose toss a length of rope to Lemon, the same rope she used to tie me up in for fun, to make me miss shifts so that she could watch the results.

My body wouldn’t move to stand, but las I pushed my hoof against the wall to try and get some leverage, I felt it pass through.

My collision from her striking me had knocked a small hole on the wall. The rotten wood had splintered away.

Feeling the trundle of Lemon’s approach, I did all I knew I could. With a deep breath, I threw my whole weight into the wall itself, and crashed through the weak surface into the gap between the walls of the house.

Immediately falling, I felt the gap, far too thin to properly accommodate even a pony of my size, splinter and scrape at my sides. Thick cobwebs broke beneath me, coating my face and hooves in them. But the fragile wood was also slowing me down, ensuring I never simply tumbled to the ground floor and crushed myself from the height of the fall.

Not that it made it any easier.

A sudden impact marked the ground floor, void of any further injury. My head ached terribly, the close darkness and complete blindness not helping any. Only then did I realise the real horror.

The ground floor walls had been made of two layers of brickwork that were either side of me.

I was trapped.

My breathing accelerated, the gap was so thin I felt my sides being crushed in, unable to move forward or backwards due to the tightening width. I couldn’t pull myself upwards and the floor was beneath me. In complete darkness, covered in thick web, I could barely even struggle while my limbs burned, full of small splinters. My hind leg was wedged awkwardly backward at an angle that was already beginning to cramp. Above me, the curses of the gang echoed downward, but I couldn't turn my head to see upward.

The thought of being stuck here, unable to escape, and slowly dying of starvation hit me. I'd be nothing but a lost soul, nopony would know what had happened to me! I'd just be a skeleton in a wall to scare somepony else in the far-off future...

I began simply struggling and stamping my hooves. The only movement I could, just to make some vain effort to feel like I hadn't consigned myself to a few days of a lingering death. Below me, I heard a crack. Fixating on it entirely, ignoring the shouts of the gang that they were dropping a rope if I would prefer to go with them, I kept slamming my little hooves on the dry flooring. It was wood! Maybe I could... I could...

I heard a creak, and took a sharp breath, this wasn't going to be good.

The floor splintered and shattered below me, drawing a long shriek as my sides once again ripped against the walls. I prayed my wings weren't damaged further, as I dropped another ten feet into darkness before striking concrete. Landing on my hooves before simply falling to the side, my hooves cradled my injured head before it slapped against the concrete I now lay on. Under my mane, I could feel the welt of my scar, red and angry as it ever had been. But I breathed in the rotten and trapped air like it was a saving grace. I had fallen into a full room.

"Oh, thank you..." I muttered to whatever luck had let me get out of there.

Finally, blinking, I let my eyes adjust to the dark down here. (I didn't dare use my PipBuck's light.) Small wooden pillars held up the ceiling but the rest of it was just like an old antique store. Everything from cabinets to tables and chairs were littered amongst packing crates and dressing boards. Massive cobwebs hung on the diagonals, off the pillars, or between the furniture. I could see two wooden staircases rising to differing doorways. Trotting up, I found one that seemed open, but far too heavy for me to push while injured.

Above me, dust dropped from the ceiling, dislodged by a rampant clatter of hooves on the floors above. They were coming down, and I didn't have the time to force any doors.

"Right, plenty of hiding spots, plenty..."

Dragging myself up, I staggered over to a thick collection of furniture. The door to the basement slammed open only just as I tugged away some of the larger webs and reluctantly forced myself into the sticky confines behind a musty old couch. Noose and her gang galloped down the stairway.

"We know you're in here! Better to come out and let me beat your head in than me getting angry looking for you and letting Barbell do his thing! I hear he likes little bucks. They squeal louder!"

I dreaded to think. But I simply huddled close. The sofa was buried beneath a few upturned tables and bore dozens of old bags stuffed with long lost possessions, so I simply prayed they considered it too thickly buried to be a hiding spot. As such, I just waited.

It took a lot of willpower, by my standards, to ignore that odd feeling of something creeping up my left hind leg. My skin crawled.

The sound of furniture being thrown and bags torn open reverberated around the basement. They moved nearer and further away in apparently random decisions to ransack the entire place. I heard Lemon holler upon pulling away something.

"SHIT! SHIT! SHIT!"

"What!? What is it? You got 'im?" Noose screamed over to him.

"NO!" Lemon sounded strung out. "Fucking spider nest just crawled from this bag! Just... FUCK!"

"Shut up, you pussy. An' keep looking."

"Pretty rich, that coming from you."

"I said shut up! It means coward. Not 'female,' you stupid lunk! Hey, runt! I said come out! You still hiding? Hoping? You got nothing to hope for, kid! Word's spreading about that bitch in the wastes killin' our gangers and all that. We know you always liked her! Ha! You've lost her, runt! She turned! One of us now! Never gonna go pork her now, are you? She's one of us! So just give up!"

Every shiver, every smash that neared me just bore a new wave of terror. I tried to blank her out. To not listen. She... she wasn't! I couldn't just stop and start believing that there was nothing worth fighting for! Heroes didn't fall like that!

"You'll learn... wasteland's fucked up worse in places out there than here... you'll learn..."

I wanted to move, to jump, as I felt whatever it was move up around my rump and over my cutie mark. Rapid, light touches, like many legs. I tried to shift a front hoof back to swat at it, or use my tail. But that only gave way to a rapid movement that skittered across my back. Biting my lip as hard as I dared, I whined into my hoof.

"Ere', there's a second door up there." That must have been the new pony, Barbell. His voice was richer than the other two. In fact it would have been almost oddly relaxing, if I hadn't already known his allegiance.

"So?"

"Just thinkin', maybe he went and ran off up it. Might not be here, little buck seemed in a rush."

"Shit, you're right. Go!"

Luck, it seemed, felt good in these times. The three of them darted off, rushing up the stairs. One of them seemed to hesitate, snorting and smashing something made of glass before they all departed. No sooner had the door shut than I immediately pushed and tugged myself free from behind the sofa. Rolling, I swatted and flailed at my hindquarters until I was sure nothing was on me. In the darkness, I saw something the size of somepony's hoof skitter off under the sofa again.

Then, I collapsed.

I had wanted to run upstairs, hide in a room till they went further, but the fear, adrenaline, and emotional pain just slammed down, driving me to simply fall on my side upon the floor. The dusty air here was giving my throat hell. My excursion to try and steal from a supply cart had gone so badly when they'd spotted me. I'd seen RadAway on it, something I desperately needed. Coughing fits were becoming more common. My spit had a metallic tang to it, while the pressure in my head and chest was growing. Even past my cold, I was definitely feeling the initial effects of radiation poisoning. Breathing lightly, holding my head and feeling the lump growing from my cheek, I simply did my best to keep believing.

There was still something out there... it wasn't true. There was more to life than slavery, she'd shown me that!

Opening my eyes, I almost jumped as I saw what had been broken on their retreat. An old dusty mirror, now in shards upon the floor. It showed everything that I now felt.

In one shard, I saw my PipBuck. But in another, the scar upon my forehead. A third held my eyes, a fourth the weltering rad-sores that began to swell on my muzzle as my deadline neared for death. Another held my cutie mark.

All separate, all meaning different things now.

Water was flowing.

From the waste tunnels in roaring cascades that broke upon the brickwork and let steam rise from the algae and sewage that it ate and dissolved in its path. The spray washed over the sides, flowing its bitter burning taste into the old sewer workshop.

It flowed from the ceiling, centuries of neglect leaving fractures and leaks to allow water to trickle and gush from corners and down the walls, pooling amongst the cobblestone. It soaked and destroyed the bottom layers of the growing pile of scrap paper into a mushy mess that stank and shifted.

But it also flowed from my eyes. Streaming and unending, it came from puffy injured eyes and clung to my face before dripping constantly upon the failures beneath my head. Tears fell onto lines of charcoal that were already obsolete and forgotten, my desperate efforts concentrating elsewhere on a page.

Another page was torn and thrown. Then another. And another. All began to lie in corners, all around me or upon the slowly dampening pile.

Lines... remember lines... they lead to curves... make shapes from the curves and it comes to life! It always worked that way! Why wasn't it working now? I had been awoken to draw by inspiration and love, given the soul of the artist by the emotions I felt and wanted to release upon paper rather than simply through all too common tears. But it was being pulled away from me, a skill lost. Had I not practised enough? I hadn't drawn properly in a little while. Had I been too lazy and not done as much as I should have?

Wiping the tears and wet spray from my damp coat over my face, I took up the charcoal and tried again. Draw just any normal pony, make it basic, make it simple!

The stick slid, gaining momentum. Yes... yes, yes! It flowed, her back and spinal shape. Then curve up into her neck... yes! A circle! Her head! I had her head! Two ears flicked over it, careful smooth triangles in just the right place. I even went back to the other end of her back, curving it around and down to her hind legs. I went over it a couple times, make it just right.

I sat back, wiping my brow with a hoof, breathing heavily with worry. Telling myself constantly how to draw, to not worry about what— yes, that was it! I saw her in many ways, how I felt, no matter how stupid it was, could be a part of it!

Now... now her face. I could see her face again. Determined and of goodwill, telling me through her eyes alone that everything would be fine. That she was still the good pony I had come to believe in and feel more than a little liking of after seeing. I was trapped in a stinking sewer under Fillydelphia, a million miles from any knowing home, while she was out saving Equestria. But I could still have faith to meet my own ends.

If I could... just... get her face right...

Gently, I began placing her muzzle in, using a cross across the circle I'd drawn to shape it all out. I could always erase that later! I just needed one drawing, one little sketch to prove I could still do this! I could still save her in my eyes, prove to myself she was good.

Muzzle... bring it out... a little line for the mouth for now. Back to her eyes... please let her eyes work, they would make it complete! Slowly... tentatively, I let two circles of charcoal form, shaped around her head... and... and...

A ridiculous wannabe of a pony stared back at me. The muzzle was at completely the wrong angle, her eyes not even shaped right in the perspective.

"No... please! Don't do this!"

My charcoal stick flew back down. I could fix this! Frantic, rushed fixes, add the proper mouth, I could work from its perspective instead! Add her mane, that was easy, right? But it covered her eyes. I tried redrawing them, again and again. The charcoal pressed harder each time, scraping and zigzagging across the paper in mad strokes born of utmost need and panic.

"Why can't I draw? Why can't I draw!"

I sat back, panting, looking at the mad mess of shapes and incredibly stupid-looking face that could have been drawn by a foal that looked back at me.

I had no words. Nothing but a wailing screech of sheer frustration and a welt of tears burst from me as I fell down on the journal, pressing the side of my face upon it and beating upon the hard cobblestone with my hoof. Savage coughing broke through, making my little skeleton-like body spasm and shake. Filled with anger at myself, the page was torn and ripped in half, tearing the perfectly finely drawn middle of her body down the centre, before they were thrown to the water.

Around it, the water just kept flowing. From the tunnels, the walls, and my eyes.

The shelves rattled as I hopped up and clambered all over them to reach my goal. Living as an outlaw in Fillydelphia, even for the short amount of time I had done, was proving to be a nightmare all unto itself. Everypony, from slave to slaver, could recognise me. Anypony might be a threat like Noose and her cronies had been. Merely finding enough food to see me by a few more hours had been an adventure unto itself.

My balance almost went, perched on the little ladder (Why ladders? We had hooves!) I felt my head spin and blur. The light panels above me seemed to burn like the sun, hurting my eyes and making my headache worse. But I kept searching.

I'd finally remembered that I'd dug into the container storage yard when I'd last been here and been seen by Slit. The moment I'd found a break in the rain, I'd galloped out to retrace my steps and enter through the hole she'd cut in the fence. One of these containers had to have something! Any RadAway would have been taken, but the ingredients might still be around! Weathervane could make some, he knew how!

The horror had struck my mind that I didn't remember what the fluid used to create it even looked like. I cursed my memory, along with my inability to read. The container I'd slunk into had been filled with row upon row of liquids and stored gels.

I had no idea what was what. I'd hoped that I might remember what it looked like, after fetching some for Weathervane in the crater before, but now I only realised they were like so many other things in the industrial cities of old Equestria. They were all standardised and brain-achingly similar to one another. In frustration, pushing my way around the shelves, I eventually just jumped off to land in the crowded mess that was the floor of the liquids container. Well, I only needed one RadAway to survive for now. The logical thing would be to take one of everything and let Weathervane figure it out! I could always come back for more once I knew.

Pausing, I heard somepony shift past the outside of the container. A heavy pallet was being dragged behind them. Holding my breath, I simply prayed they didn't come inside this one. Gradually, after a moment of tension, the sound faded off. Assured that nopony was outside, I grabbed bag after bag of the gel-like fluids and stuffed them into my saddlebag. Grumbling, I found I had to take a lot out and store them in the many pockets of my fleece. My journal went underneath me in my belly pocket, various papers and plans that Protégé had given me of the Ministry were folded up and placed in my front leg pockets. The remaining pepper canister and a few scraps of old parchment found spots on my leg pockets too. Finally, gingerly, with the utmost respect, I lifted Twilight's visual memory orb out to very carefully store on the left of my torso. I had so many questions about that thing, mostly why such a personal item had still been in Aurora's office. Twilight had seemed to trust her to a certain extent as a colleague, but it hadn't seemed like a message anypony in power would want heard.

A mystery for another time, no doubt.

But it made enough space in the end that I could fit just about every sachet of the clear fluid in. Hopefully, it would be enough to give Weathervane a way to make things up with what ingredients he had left.

"Right, time to go, Murky. Just keep pushing."

Muttering to myself, feeling the mental and physical strain of being on the run, I took a slow breath. The rain could come back on any moment, with the storm lingering above for so long. I was hurt enough, limping and feeling my entire skull burn with rad-fever, without body burns from acidic rain to compete with too. I'd get out of here, get to Hearts and Hooves, and hide out in Weathervane's basement lab until he next came in.

It wasn't difficult to make my way out of the container area. The hole in the fence from Slit's pursuit was, of course, still there. I wrapped a piece of wafting cloth from the container around my head like a shawl. I'd taken to using such a tactic lately; griffon spotters were everywhere.

Before I even contemplated moving out of the container yard itself, I held myself low near the fence, watching the road that led between it and the industrial skyport Slit had chased me into. A few carts passed, mostly pulled by slaves. A column trudged by on the opposite side, whips cracking as some faltered on cracked hooves. Nothing massive, nothing that I couldn't wander with under my shawl. All the same, the sight of so many ponies being led to whatever form of work there was made even me in my battered state wince. Finally pushing myself through, I began to trot in the same direction as them, slowly working my way into the crush of sick and coughing ponies. I fitted right in with my own blood-spate coughs to—

"Get moving, worms!"

I was ducked between two ponies before my mind could even begin to think. Though all my illness, my medical condition, my injuries and even my crisis of faith, I felt it all overruled by an immediacy of terror that locked my muscles in place, giving me an awkward stumbling gait.

"You there! You! Three seconds to get up. One! Two! Three!"

A whip cracked, accompanied by the meaty slap of hard leather on flesh. A mare screamed out loud. She must have fallen. I heard him again.

"One! Two! Three!"

The scream came again... and again... and again... every time she failed to get up. I recognised the punishment all too clearly. Struck by overwhelming curiosity and worry, I raised up my cowl, quinting out between the ponies I was travelling with.

The Master stood in the middle of the road, commanding the long line of slaves through the city. My eyes widened at the sight of him. He stood taller than that crazed hunch he'd once had, with a straighter neck, and outstretched legs telling of an authority he was born into now finally being handed to him. Around him, slaves cowered, obeying his every glance to look away or go on. I saw ponies with crippling injuries, burns, and festering infections cantering far faster than any hurt pony should be able to. The line went on for a long way. If this was for the Mall, he must have brought more in.

The same line I'd wandered into. Oh, this was bad.

I was seeing The Master in his real element at last. No longer just the overseer known for being harsh, he truly was his own Master now. It made sense why he was kept around, if this was the sort of brutal short term efficiency and result he could drive from ponies that Fillydelphia couldn't properly feed anyway. I thought of what Grizzly had said... that he had come from before Red Eye in Fillydelphia. What kind of life had he grown up with, to become this bastion of symbolic slavery?

Below him, the target of his attentions lay in a shivering heap, her back bleeding rapidly.

All the attention I might have had held to The Master was removed if but for a few seconds. In horror, saw that the mare that had been whipped was Sunny Days.

She was bucked from the ground a good four feet back into the line. A few bucks pulled her up as roughly as any slaver would. The fear on their faces was clear. If they didn't get her back on her feet, aggressive as it was, it would only be worse for her. But my once-saviour was in a very poor way. Even below the fresh blood, I could see long welts that would scar by the night's end. The Master's whip skills were a whole new world beyond what I'd ever seen before.

I'd felt them once. Never again... never again.

"Don't you all go get ideas of lazing off! You've got work to do, if we don't get another twenty feet today in the mines, you're all losing food rations."

The Master's whip slapped against the ground, sending pebbles pinging in every direction. One of them struck amidst the ponies I hid behind, giving me reason to squeak and drop back down.

"Master! Master!"

A galloping pony came up the road. I heard his sharp clip-clop above the low rumble of three dozen ponies in the column. Just keep moving, wait your chance, don't make eye contact with him. I was sweating, and breathing quickly.

"What is it?"

The galloping stopped. I poked my head around the side, close to the ground, to see that scrawny assistant, burdened down in scrolls and messenger bags. He bowed before The Master, before offering one scroll up.

"Master Grindstone reports that they may have discovered some of the blueprints for Aurora Star's projection orbs and—"

"This matters to me, how?" The Master glowered at the messenger. "Grindstone can chase side projects from his home in that Ministry all he wants."

"Well... you... you see, Master. In those blueprints there was a note. It mentioned something that he... he wants to tell all of you. He's called a meeting, later on tomorrow at the Ministry of Arcane Science. He... um... requests that you attend."

I saw The Master grin. "Good choice of wording to replace his message with, you're learning. I'll speak with the ass later. For now, I want you to go back to the Mall. Keep those slaves working, the repairs aren't done nearly as fast as I'd like. Cancel the food supply for today. They'll survive till it's done, but it'll give them the shake up they need to work faster."

My heart leapt into my mouth. Glimmer, Brimstone, and Coral were still there... I hadn't seen them in the column. If the food was being cut out... oh no...

"In fact, tell the biggest slaver to start running the competition, I know he enjoys that. That'll get some unwarranted shifts out of 'em... heh."

"Y-yes, Master! Right away, Master!"

He didn't overstay his welcome, galloping off, despite his own tiredness. Biting my lip in worry, I looked back to The Master, shivering and trying to remain as still and quiet as I could. We were headed away from the Hospital, but I just needed to get to the other side of the road and use the mass of supply yards behind the skyport for cover. I could lose even a griffon in there. Up ahead I could see the long hill that moved down to the skyport, the one leading to that workshop I'd ran to before Barb caught me. If I could just get near it...

"Keep the pace up!" His voice bellowed forth, leading me to jump at the command and start cantering. I'd reacted before any of them...

That wasn't a very good sign...

But we advanced all the quicker. So much so, I hoped that we might pass right by him and turn a corner. The moment he couldn't see me, I'd go.

Something held me back from going all-out though. Just ahead of me through the crush, I could see Sunny pushing herself in the travel line with a pained look. Just a few words to let her know we were coming for her eventually, I had to try!

"Sunny!" I hissed, whispering as loudly as I dared. The Master was casting his eyes over the line. "Sunny!"

I saw her ear twitch. I pressed closer.

"Sunny... it's me. Murky."

Now wandering right beside her, almost using her for cover from The Master's sightline, I tapped her side to get her attention.

"M-Murk?" Her dry voice was breathless, like somepony talking in their sleep.

Pushing my shawl away slightly, I nodded lightly. Her pupils seemed to just shake as she saw me, somewhat disbelieving, and contracted until they were little more than just dots.

"Y... you have t-to... run. Stay away..." She gasped, and I recognised the signs of her being dehydrated.

"I'm on the run, he's after me, I know. But... but I had to let you know. We're going to get out. Me and a few others, my friends you saw, we're putting together a plan. Just hold on in there, we won't leave without you."

"He's a monster, Murky..."

"I know, but we will be coming for you! I pro—"

"Halt right there! All of you!"

The column juddered to a stop so quickly I ran into the rump of the mare in front of me. Silence fell. Some ponies looked over toward The Master. I joined them, peering around Sunny to see what he was doing.

"Now, something isn't right here. Whoever you are that slipped in, you think that a born slaver wouldn't spot a discrepancy in his stock? Somepony who doesn't belong?"

Pain flared on my forehead, that throbbing warning. My loose tooth quaked and stung. My cutie mark itched. Every sign of slavery and reminder in my mindset rang the warning bells as the fear set in. Looking to every direction, there was at least twenty feet from any cover on either side, either the skyport or back to the container yard. Any attempt to gallop away would be noticed.

Behind me, The Master shoved into the column, throwing ponies out left and right, storming his way through it and pulling back shawls or staring into eyes deeply. Had he been counting his slaves or something? Oh this was bad... very, very bad. The cries of injured ponies being stallion-handled so roughly were just getting closer as he worked his way up. My covers may have hid me from his general perception, but he'd spot my size the moment he got close enough.

"Listen, Sunny, please. Just keep it together. Just hang in there..."

Unity's own advice to me days ago was all that rung to mind. The sting of guilt and fear as I began to feel the weight of impossibility to rescue her too only slammed home again and again. Oh... Unity...

"Feels like there's no escaping him..." Sunny's voice was strained.

"There is. Just find something or somepony to believe in. I did, I found—"

I stalled, my heart in my throat. Had I really anymore? Did I truly believe I could do this? It all felt so impossible now, we could plan and talk about it, but what had we really done yet? What if there truly wasn't a way out?

"Aha... up here, eh?"

I spun, keeping my shawl tightly over my face. The Master was barging his way through, that immense bulk towering over all the rest as he stomped directly toward me. With one horrible moment he stopped dead about twenty feet away down the column.

His eyes were fixed directly on mine.

Then he grinned.

I began to back away; to move as far as I could before the commands came.

"I'm sorry, Sunny..."

The Master advanced, stomping slowly.

"Knew I'd recognise my own eyes... like father..."

"I'm so sorry, Sunny... I didn't mean this for you..."

"...like son!"

"I'M SORRY!"

I broke off the moment The Master moved directly for me. Ducking beneath the other slaves, I galloped down the embankment toward the skyport.

"Get him! Everypony! Bring the born slave home!"

To my absolute horror, the thundering sound that was dozens of hooves galloping quickly built. A huge mass of ponies, driven by an indomitable will and terror of refusing an order, turned and commenced a grand charge down the slope after me like a wartime attack formation. Simply screaming, I pushed my hooves harder and harder, dashing over the broken metal and pipes that littered the edges of the runway. Turning my head back, my shawl flying off from the wind, I wasn't sure what horrified me more.

That The Master was leading the charge by some distance and still grinning.

Or the fact that Sunny was with them. I hoped with all my heart she was simply protecting herself by not being the one to refuse.

Already, exhaustion was kicking in. I was no sprinter, a lifetime of day long activities and toils had built a slow burn stamina into me (and even that was lower than most ponies) rather than the ability to quickly explode and run hell for leather. The sound only got louder, the swarm of slaves closing in. Already, faster ponies at the flanks were beginning to arc ahead, as though seeking to enclose me entirely. The ground itself shook as they began to near, the thick thuds of The Master's hooves always audible over it all. I heard the clank of chains around his neck, the jingle of a collar dragging. There was nowhere to go! Any cover was way too far away!

I had... I had nothing... literally nothing!

My eyes misted up, finding it hard to see. I began to stumble, fall and trip over rocks and slippery sections of mud. Going around behind the runway, still littered with old sky chariots lashed to cracking bones, I finally collapsed. A harsh metal clang impacted on my side against the grapplegun.

Taking the first breath I had since I ran, I saw that I'd landed on a drain cover to wash rainwater from the runway. They lined both sides all the way down!

I'd already been trapped in a small hole once today. If this went wrong...

"That's it, Number Seven! You know it's worthless trying, you'll always be mine in the end."

I glared up, The Master had stopped, bringing the clatter of the slaves to circle around. I saw Sunny looking conflicted and pale. Only now I noticed that her back leg was bleeding terribly. Then, The Master began to trot forward.

"You've led me a merry chase, slave. Don't think you won't pay for that insult. You know there's nowhere for you to go. I know about your little hero, not anymore is she? You know the truth, just accept it. A slave is all you've ever been, it's all you ever will be! She didn't save you, and now you're seeing the reason why!"

Trying not to listen, I slowly let my hooves rest on the hinge of the drain cover. I'd only get one quick chance at this. He was wrong. One of the few things I could genuinely hear from his mouth and know in my heart was that he was wrong! Why couldn't ponies just see that she was right? That to be like her could help us! Why did they have to make up lies? Heroes didn't do that!

"Don't even think of pulling that!"

My hoof froze. Of course he'd spot it, he wasn't stupid! But I still tried to keep my muscles tensed... no, more than tensed. I had to do this! I couldn't get caught now! I... I had to escape, for Unity, for Sunny. To somehow find a way to prove to everypony that Littlepip was still worth believing in! I couldn't get caught now!

I pulled.

The drain cover lifted. The five seconds it took to pull it, to watch him break forward and bellow an order, to try and throw myself down, it felt like five minutes of constant worry and tension. Head first, I simply dived, the dark hole barely fitting my body before—

Stopping.

My back leg jarred in pain, something catching it. Crying out at the shock and harsh pull upon it, I twisted, but being unable to turn my head far enough in the thin pipe. Below me was nothing but a black void and the sound of rushing water. I had stopped...

He had grabbed my hind leg, pressing it under his hoof against the floor.

"You don't get away, Number Seven! Not this time!"

With crushing power, I felt my leg being dragged. The rainwater still draining in sloshed past my face and body, making it tough to breathe, the more I came out, the more it washed into my eyes and mouth, stinging and hissing. I was being dragged free, bit by bit. I couldn't even struggle, the hole was too small. I was terrified that if I did fall I would simply get stuck upside down in a small pipe underground, but if I didn't...

"I got him! I got him for you!"

Sunny? I felt her bite my tail, pushing in to help pull me out, but knocking the others aside. Even The Master's hoof seemed to lessen off, just enough that my weight and a careful release from her mouth on my tail dropped me into the darkness.

In those scant half seconds before my descent, I only heard the rage filled roar of The Master.

Thank you, Sunny. You did it again for me. I wasn't without heroes around me in here after all. I hoped dearly that she wasn't punished for it, but I knew The Master all too well.

But there was little time to think on anything, as my life became nothing more than a painful scraping hell, falling vertically in a space that any normal sized pony would have been jammed in instantly. My skull bounced, my legs grazed, and my torso thudded from side to side. I felt it all closing in, becoming a thinner pipe as it went down. Panic set in, that this might grow too thin and I'd drown upside down, before finally, mercifully, I was thrown from it, falling blind.

In pitch darkness, I hit water. I kicked out, thrashing, my inability to swim at all leading me to simply flail. I hadn't gotten a breath in, there was no surface. I could only feel the pipe on all sides of me.

A current picked me up, swirling me onward and away. Over and over, tumbling, and feeling my sick lungs burn with the effort of holding my breath. My whole body juddered, lack of oxygen making me lose all sense of up and down as I was thrown this way and that by the current. A steady roar began to drift to my ears through the darkness, an accelerating speed before the sudden shock of being thrown free.

Above water, in the air, I tumbled. I tried to grab what breaths I could. The waterfall threw me out and forced me down. A hard wet slap across my belly dragging me underwater once again, and forcing the air from my lungs. A mouthful of water gulped down my throat, kicking off a coughing fit. Sucking down more and more water, drowning on the spot. I felt myself being spun over and over, unable to force my way up. I kicked out, throwing every effort to simply save my life. Yes, I was moving, I was...

...pushing my way to the bottom.

Disorientation was kicking in bad. My head throbbed, loss of consciousness beginning to become a very real danger. I pushed off the ground, feeling the force of the waterfall crushing down upon my head above. Moaning and fighting the urge to take one breath, I let it carry me further along before then trying again. I fought up... up... all four limbs wildly surging in the filthy water. My saddlebag dragged me down, the weight of my fleece soaking it all up making it hard to move. My lungs were empty, filled with dead air, my throat in agony as I held a full radiation-driven fever fit at bay to not take in more water. I considered dropping my saddlebag or my fleece, but I didn't have the time to even do that. I just kept kicking and kicking and—

The surface! I broke it and fell down again, lacking the ability to tread water. Again and again I broke the water, gulping air and feeling my entire inside body ache from the water intake. My eyes adjusted quickly; I could see bricks nearby! A ledge!

Fighting the current, my muscles heavy and sore, I kept pushing. Underwater, on the surface, underwater again, again, and again, a pathetic struggle against drowning until I finally felt the cold wet brick under my hooves. Surprising myself, the adrenaline and terror forced me to push myself up and roll onto it, finally out.

Retching, spinning onto my hooves, I threw up more water than I thought possible. Sucking air in between the convulsions, I felt my eyes stinging from the the water, and the tingle all over my body from the shivering fever that now wracked me. Finally, restlessly, I fell to my side, pausing only to draw out my items to let them dry on the higher brickwork. I could see a door, and some sort of workshop, but that could wait.

That was too close... too close... he had almost got me that time. If it hadn't been for Sunny...

All the worries... lies... guilt... it all just faded. I could do nothing but just concentrate on breathing.

To concentrate on not believing those same four words that echoed again and again...

She didn't save you.

But I could still save her.

So many ponies not believing in her, readily insulting her with all these lies on the radio! I could... I could show them! I'd draw her good, draw her heroic, and show them all how good she was!

I couldn't.

Every drawing, every sketch, rough draft and vague attempt turned to nothing but a pitiful mess. It never looked right! I'd tried everything I knew how. Everything. I must have used up a whole quarter of the thick journal, ripping page after page out to throw them across the room. I'd tried the walls, drawing over damp cobblestone, surrounding me in the failed attempts that stared back with their unreal proportions, messy outlines, and mismatched scales. None of them looked right.

The artist's nightmare. My mane had collapsed around my head in the damp environment, still soaking from dragging myself out of the water earlier.

I was livid. Terrified and in anguish of the mind, frenziedly tearing the charcoal across the paper so hard it sometimes tore. My shaky tooth ached, my entire face bulged from Noose's strike and made the very act of drawing hurt. But I couldn't stop. I couldn't... I couldn't!

It all came to one horrid lashing of my hooves in an explosion of feelings that I simply couldn't comprehend. The charcoal stick went flying as I simply sat and screamed at the blank pages, at why this had to happen to me. Why something as simple as a legend to believe in could be torn away. Everything felt conflicted. I wanted to believe, but everypony kept telling me otherwise. I wanted to be the one strong pony who didn't lose hope, who denied it all and believed that the truth would emerge later. But I couldn't deny that it had taken grip of me too.

The Stable Dweller had fallen to the wasteland like so many had before.

Simply sitting still, I closed my eyes, trying to remember her. To remember that look on her face as she defied Red Eye, and climbed from the Pit.

I could still see it, still believe in that memory. But why couldn't I draw it? My body began shaking, building with the frustration and sheer self anger at my inability to save her memories, back to the hero I once thought I knew. To fall in love with a legend and then have it shattered... it was just so... so...

"UNFAIR!"

Screeching the word, I picked up the journal, hurling it across the room to clatter against the wall. It bounced, rolling on the spine back within reach. Simply furious, feeling the red mist of a cruel life and corrupting wasteland fall across my belief in heroes, I picked it up. If they weren't true then nothing was! What was life without ponies who could be better?

I carried it outside the workshop, near the frothing waterline that I'd come down. If I'd lost my ability to draw, then what was the point of owning this thing that would only serve to remind me of a lost hero? I'd just be rid of it. Lifting the journal, I drew back my front legs and... and...

Slowly, my hooves descended, and I hugged it to my chest. I couldn't bring myself to do it, to lose it all forever. As the anger faded, I realised that I never had really wanted to do it at all.

"Why won't you let me draw you?" I sniffled and spoke quietly, opening it to flick through them. "What's wrong?"

The pictures offered no response. Eventually reaching the latest, scrawled and pitiful attempt, I just scowled and yelled at nothing in particular, just from sheer frustration. Eventually, the hardship and tiredness of my body caught up to me, twisting the anger and bile in a hot fevered episode of retching and clutching my stomach. Blood speckled from my mouth, landing across the drawing. I just couldn't stop trying to fight some dreaded realisation that perhaps I was just a dying slave in Fillydelphia, desperately trying to end his life with some sort of hope by believing a lie.

Shivering, tightly hugging myself, I slowly drew my head up and pulled my mane from my eyes. Above me, a noise had ceased, the slow thudding of the rain above ground had eased off. It was time to move. I needed to get to Weathervane and have my ingredients mixed up into RadAway. Moving slowly, carefully, I simply packed and left, leaving all the ruined paper to slowly mould and dissolve behind me forever.

Keep moving... just keep moving and believing. They were wrong, even if I was worried... they were wrong. I'd show them all someday. I would.

Flowerpot greeted me in his usual fashion. The lack of the oncoming tirade of cursing to shut him up gave rise to the thought that Weathervane wasn't down here at the moment. As such, I let myself in, the radiation of the trip into the basement had already made my chest feel swollen and painful. Flowerpot's howling screams and slams on the reinforced door only made my head hurt worse.

His lab was much barer than I had last seen it. Presumably Weathervane had to have used his supplies to aid ponies from the Mall. I searched in vain for any RadAway or even RadPurge, but none were kept down here any longer. Just a mass of beakers and glasses filled with liquids I didn't dare touch. The silver magic orb was still sat upon the research table, sparkling and gently glowing with barely contained medical power. If only it could have healed me...

My legs were weakening. I'd had to gallop twice on the way over to avoid groups of ponies who'd heard me and come to investigate. They hadn't spotted me, but it'd been terrifying enough. As such, I simply pulled myself onto the main stretcher and lay down on my side, wheezing hard on an enclosed throat. Still dripping wet, I felt the blanket soak under me and drip off the sides onto the vinyl flooring.

My eyes spotted the photoframe of Sundial and his father on Weathervane's desk. I tried to just focus on that, on better times. He looked so happy, innocent under that overgrown blonde mane, a lot like Caduceus' had been, only bushier, and clean. It was enough to make me want to forget everything. Forget I was sick and dying in slave labour two hundred years into his future amidst a ruined damn wasteland. Why couldn't I have had his life?

My eyes felt heavy, the dizziness kicking in even worse. Even as I felt my exhaustion and injuries catching up, I just kept looking at him. At least for now I could believe in his fun times and pretend that when I woke up, I'd be just awakening from this whole nightmare once and for all.

Instead, I had a sharp pain in my front left leg to startle me away from sleep.

Colour and light flashed back to me so quickly I actually jerked and choked on a bit of saliva that went down the wrong way. Firm hooves kept me pinned down.

"Fucking calm it! Stay down!" The raspy tone was recognisable, oddly comforting and expected by now. I took a deep breath, before settling down and raising my leg.

"Had to put you on intravenous RadAway drip from that stuff you brought in, it'll do more for you than just ingesting the drinkable version, but it won't be as comfortable. You needed the rest, so just take it. Stay lying there till the drip's done. Now roll over and let me get a look at those wings."

Wiping the sweat of fear from my brow, I nodded, lethargically pulling myself onto my front. The drip feed was injected into my leg all right, giving an uncomfortably painful swelling in my veins as the liquid passed into me. Weathervane trotted around to where I could see him. The doctor looked haggard, no doubt run off his hooves. Rubbing my eyes, I blinked and focused on him.

"T-thank you... for before and... and for now." I wasn't sure what else to bring up. Really, I still felt empty and rotten at my failed drawing attempts.

"In the job description when I signed on to that Ministry in the first place, kid. You've done me good bringing that stuff though, and that swamp donkey in the stores told me they had none of it fucking left either. I'll go crack some heads up their own arses later about it. Now, how are you coping?"

I sniffed. "N-not well. I can barely get food, they keep it so locked up! Every slave wants me, The Master almost caught me, I lost a friend, and the high ranking slavers got me involved in some big game of theirs now. I can't do this! I can't live like a rat in a sewer from day to day, perpetually running away!"

One of my wings was painfully yanked out. Squeaking loudly, I looked around to see Weathervane moving each feather in turn, swivelling it in the base joint. The wing was dead, I couldn't do anything with its movement. That said, it didn't hurt as much as it once might have.

"Well, for all that activity, these have settled the atrophied muscles pretty damn well."

He quickly jerked it to one side, making me yell. I shot him a harsh glance.

"Apparently not completely yet. Well, this sort of shitty injury so early will take a lot of effort to heal up. That bastard must have really done a number on you. Speaking of, you aren't the only winged one I've treated recently..."

I felt confused for a second. Another pegasus? The thought quickly settled, as I realised who he meant.

"Ragini?"

"That's her. Those fucknuggets in the Mall didn't mess around. I could repair the damage, similar to yours. But, I'm sorry to say she'll never fly again. Too much trauma in too short a time, plus one of the fuckers actually struck her wing base and tore it apart so badly the only thing connecting it to her body was her skin.”

I felt my torso shiver. Ragini was a foul creature who clearly hated me, but anyone with wings could relate to that sort of hurt. I certainly could. The feeling of being held down and my wing stretched over a cold anvil still was far too icy and real for comfort.

I spent the next half hour under Weathervane’s care; telling him, often through tears, about what had happened to me and just letting it all out. The doctor didn’t often seem to care, but he at least listened. He gave me something that made me throw up again and again, ejecting dull water into a pan and making my lungs feel a little clearer. An ointment-smothered cloth was rubbed against my bruises, taking the edge off the injury. To my surprise, he even permitted me a small healing potion to keep my ribs from bruising over.

Eventually, I found myself explaining about Unity. That caught his attention more.

“Mm, well, I can certainly relate there, kid. Sending Sundial off to that Stable was one of the hardest things I’ve ever done. Watching him go and knowing that it was the last time. It’s not easy, but at least you got to say goodbye.”

The double impact of discussing Unity and hearing him referring to Sundial hit me hard. I wanted to tell him how I’d not given up on her yet, but I simply couldn’t find it in myself to continue that line of questioning. Instead, I just sighed and lay down, finding any way to change the subject from a potentially dangerous one about his son.

“Doctor... have... have you ever believed in somepony really really strongly... and then just had it taken away from you?”

The ghoul had been moving back to his desk to wait out my drip feed. But he stopped, turning his head and lowering his eyes.

“You heard that one, huh?” His voice was, for once, oddly soft and caring. I simply nodded.

Sighing, Weathervane turned and sat in his chair.

“Yes, you could say that. Most ponies like me could. Two hundred fucking years and you’ll see a lot of ponies rise and fall, see the wasteland corrupt them or force them to do things that no good pony would ever dare. But that’s not the ones I mean, for me it came long before.”

His horn lit, dragging a cabinet open and pulling from it an old rotted piece of paper on a wooden backboard, bearing a pink ribbon. I couldn’t read any of it, but I saw the symbol of three butterflies emblazoned upon it.

“My certificate to become one of the leads at the Fillydelphia Ministry of Peace. Signed by one of them. Means a lot, to go up and shake the hoof of somepony who looks just as nervous, just as real as anypony you’ll ever meet. To see a hero face to face and hear them thank you for what you’ve done. To see two of her friends, two other heroes of Equestria, waiting in the background and attending the ceremony. Makes you really start to think you can make a difference if you just keep believing in them. Not just those three either...”

His milky eyes seemed to waver in their sockets, before he blinked and reasserted them.

was, at least from what I saw, the most determined of them all to do better. You know, one day she brought us into this hall in Canterlot's Ministry of Peace hub, stood up and told such a speech that if anypony who cared today heard it... it'd change their entire fucking life. About how we had to do better. To be the good ponies in a world turning bad. We believed it. We strived for years believing it, taking comfort in that they were always doing the right thing."

Weathervane turned, looking at the certificate for a long time. Before, without warning, he simply hurled it across the room to clatter into the darkness.

"Bunch of piss damned nonsense. In the end, one of them turned our lives into a non-stop worry over who was watching. One built even more weapons. One banned books and learning from our schools if they didn't fit the 'image' they wanted. One did near enough fucking nothing. Even Twilight Sparkle got involved in some serious shit nopony wanted to be a part of. When my colleagues and I got calls to rush out and help somepony with 'unidentified alterations' at the Arcane Ministry then told to keep quiet about the shit that we saw, that was bad enough. But there were always rumours, stuff to make you wanna go feral to just forget it. But Fluttershy..."

He stopped, as though realising something he was about to say. Then he just shook his head and inclined a hoof to the silver orb, the healing megaspell we'd recovered from the crater.

"I helped work on the spells to amplify magic for healing. We all knew it could be used for other things. Let's just say, even if I wasn't one of the core team and even if I'm not sure who exactly created the megaspells, I know my own projects when I see them."

The ghoul glanced in the mirror.

"And I saw it pretty fucking well. Point is, kid, legends don't last. They're only legendary for the time it takes for people to see the shit that comes with being that important. We all had to endure the downfall of six great ponies, ones I'd watched save my world numerous times before. If you want my advice, put the girl out your mind, son. It'll only come back again and again to clamp down on your ass until it drives you insane. Learn to let go, believe in what you have around you."

His magic pulled the drip from my leg. I hadn't even noticed it finished, so the sudden stinging made me squeak. Wandering over, Weathervane wrapped the bleeding hole in gauze.

"I've seen it enough times in these wastes. Take it from somepony who's seen a dozen bright sparks turn into bastards, a hundred believers become ruined fucking shells. If you're proven right about believing in her, then it happens, but don't hold hope for the impossible. You're trying for enough insane shit with your life as it is."

"But I—"

"Murk."

His steely gaze met mine as I twisted painfully off the stretcher. My complaint was lost in my throat.

"Six of the greatest mares in Equestrian history, ones who saved the world more than once... they fell, made mistakes, became what they weren't. If they couldn't maintain what they were, what hope does one little mare from a Stable stand? Legends have to end eventually. Take comfort in what she gave you, no more. Rely on those still with you. Now, speaking of them, there are ponies close to you who need your presence."

"H-huh?"

"Your friend, Glimmerlight. She asked if I could send you to her at the Mall if I ever saw you. Shackles has them all camping outside till it's repaired, so you should be able to get in to her no problem."

"The Master said he would be seeing Grindstone or something..."

"Even better. I think it's about your plan. I imagine you'll want to see her anyway."

Yes! I really did. She would know what to say to help me! Glimmerlight always knew the best things to keep us all optimistic and happy, even if I'd likely have to be embarrassed to make it happen. That at least brought a small surge of hope to me.

"I'll... I'll go right now! Before the rain starts!"

Weathervane nodded gently. Wandering into the corner, I saw him lift the certificate and unbend the crease. The pink ribbon had fallen off.

"Harmony fell... Harmony failed. The faith of an entire realm destroyed. Don't make the same mistake we did by staking everything on idols, Murk. I don't want to see that pain hit you hard if it turns out to be true in the same way it did for me. Even now I feel it at the back of my mind, making me angrier than I used to be, more... feral. An animal inside trying to make me remember it all and fall into the darkness, to get angry enough that I'll just stop caring about anything and become one of them."

I didn't move. It was the first time I'd ever heard him talk of any real danger of falling to the feral mindset. I just bit my lip, unsure what to say. The way he spoke, it was like even just one more horrid event or truth could drive him over that edge. That caring and sticking to his goals was all that kept him going these days. I couldn't ever tell him. It hurt, but I couldn't let him know. It would break him.

"Now get the hell out of here, much less radiation in the lab but that doesn't mean you should stay here any longer than you should with that nap earlier. And you don't want Shackles coming back to the Mall on you."

I was about to leave, but one thing came to my mind, making me turn back and start digging in my pockets. Weathervane, sat amongst his picture frames, almost looked angry at my insistence to stay. But I kept digging, before I brought out the Twilight orb, placing it upon its stand. The ghoul's eyes widened as the sparkling illuminations forming in the air intertwined and shifted together into star shapes, and projected the form of one of the ponies he had once believed in.

"I don't know who you are or where you found this, nor how long has passed since I recorded it. Aurora Star has promised that they do not break easily, so this could be as far as I might imagine into the future. So please, allow me to introduce myself..."

I backed away as I saw the old father stand and lower his head a little in respect. I left him to the message, praying that it might do something, anything to help him find some way to push back the fall into a feral a little more...

Around the Mall lay a hasty mesh fence and shanty town of tents and old shacks. Apparently, everypony was living out here now that the inside was under repairs to prevent entire floors from collapsing or ensure better security. I could see work teams on the roof edges, hoisting up materials via shackled groups on the ground pulling as beasts of burden. Others dragged slates of rubble out the front doors. Many others simply lay under flimsy cover, shivering and sniffing after the drenching they no doubt had to endure. They had wrapped themselves in anything they could to stave off the burning rain. The guards observed the new perimeter, observing from quick built towers above the slave grounds. The new slave camp seemed to extend right around the Mall.

But the Mall itself... it had already changed. From the dull yet grand scale of concrete and sheet metal, it had now been repaired and rebuilt using all a manner of rusted metals that now covered the holes. Multiple layers of pipes formed barriers to the scaffold walks that ran around the entire building, topped with mesh as a crude roof. Pits had been dug in the earth surrounding it, covered over with corrugated steel and weighed down by thick slabs of rock. I could hear the cries of those who had been left in them. Solitary confinement, I guessed. From many of the holes in the Mall, red ash belched forth from incinerators, and I dreaded to think why The Master needed those. I hadn't really thought about how much the Mall had begun to mean something to me as a better place under Protégé, with its shelter and more regular food. But now to see it becoming the same red hell of steel, pipe, ash, and chainlink fencing as the rest of Fillydelphia made the city feel all the more cramped than it already was.

It quickly became clear to me, viewing from a nearby second floor of a building, that The Master had brought his own hidden stock out to join the Mall. There were far more slaves here than had survived the riots. At least it afforded me better cover. It wasn't a difficult matter to get in, now I had my battle saddle's grappling hook.

Glimmerlight wasn't hard to spot in such a slave containment, sitting towards a corner of the enclosed area. I could see two tents, one large beside her and the other much smaller, set up just beside it where she now rested, fiddling with something in her hooves. Hobbling for all I was worth through the stodgy remains of the Mall's decorative garden, I moved toward her.

The huge cheer, however, grabbed my attention.

Off toward the Mall, closer to the entrance, there was a large congregation of slaves and slavers. The cheer had been preceded by a sharp tunk of something striking a wooden surface hard. I noticed it was only the slavers whooping. What was going on over there?

I saw The Master's assistant, that wiry pony. A group of burly earth pony slavers had many of the slaves lined up beside him near a small table. The slaver sitting beside it in tattered green barding was grinning like a lunatic. A rather exhausted looking earth pony slave wandered away from him, dejected.

"Who's next?" His voice rattled out, loud and tinged with malicious glee. The slaves seemed to look at one another, before one of them gulped and moved forward to sit opposite the slaver. Oh Goddesses, please tell me the guards hadn't gotten a taste for Six Shooter Surprise! With a thump, I saw him rest one hoof on the table to...

...hoof wrestle?

"Well, all right then..." I muttered softly, feeling a sense of relief.

As far as slavers went, that seemed fairly benign, which of course only gave rise to me feeling like I'd missed something here. I continued toward Glimmerlight, aiming to duck into the tent and hide from them as soon as I could.

My friend was sat alone, her initiate robes pulled close. Her head wasn't up as I approached, instead it just hung low, toying with a clear little sphere between her hooves. Beside her, hooked to an old sign was an odd contraption made out of some rubber hose, rusted piping and what seemed to be a few layers of cloth. Water still dripped into a small mug below it. Had Glimmer managed to rig up something to purify the rain of its acid? She still didn't seem too happy though, occasionally lifting the sphere before sighing and letting it drop again. Even from here, I could hear her stomach growling and see the weary look of a pony been thrown through the grind far too many times in too short a period.

"Hey, sis?" I used our little shared acknowledgement, feeling a surge of delight when she sharply looked up and smiled at me approaching. It didn't take long for me to rush forward into her embrace, before she pulled me inside the tent to hide. Holding me by the shoulders, her tired face lit up a little as she glanced me over.

"A grapplegun and a disguise. You really are coming into your own, Murky. It's such a relief to know you're all right. You know I don't like to act all... well, nervous, but I've been worried sick! I heard they were hunting you. Hell, even when I saw you fall in the Mall I swear my heart stopped. I didn't even know you'd gone up to fight Barb with Protégé."

She hesitated, before kissing me on the forehead.

"I'm so proud of you, taking him out probably saved all our lives."

I flushed a little, but gladly accepted the happiness in knowing that merely visiting her from my outlaw status was something to help cheer her up too. But the more I looked at her, the more it began to settle in. Her stomach was drawn, her limbs thin, and small flecks around her lips betrayed a lack of proper sustenance and aid. After a moment, I could see she was clearly thinking the same about me.

Somehow, it made us both chuckle and lie together once again. Just having her here, knowing that for these few minutes we could be reassured the other was, broadly, fine, made things seem a little better. We spent a little time talking, letting me get out a lot of what I wouldn't dare tell Weathervane or feel he'd understand. I told her about Unity and The Master. About Sunny and my desperate attempts to survive. Glimmerlight seemed interested in Unity being unable to remember, suggesting if it was anything like her own problems. But I shook my head, Unity didn't seem to know those spells.

Something wasn't right with Glimmer's voice as she talked, though. It lacked that spark the moment we crossed onto the issue of memory. Where were the embarrassing jokes? The old stories of rampant casual pleasure? Shifting around, I tried to force a little assertiveness into me, I couldn't let friendship be a one way thing here. I watched her sit back, toying with that orb again in her hooves and occasionally staring at it, biting her lip as though fighting some temptation.

Then it struck me, something that in such a rush and having Unity to talk to about it had slowly lessened for me. She hadn't had anypony to really talk about losing Caduceus with yet...

"Sis? I... I'm sorry about—"

She interrupted me, her eyes not leaving the orb.

"I know, I know. I've just been trying to think on it, well, a little peripherally. I don't think I'm ready to really talk about it yet. Trying to avoid the orbs."

I just nodded slowly, feeling a little upset that I'd asked something she didn't want to discuss. Instead, I heard her sigh and look across to me.

"There's a bit of a giant elephant in the room here, Murky. You... you heard the radio?"

Gradually, she began to catch my eye and clearly see the sadness within. I nodded, clutching my belly, feeling both the journal and my Littlepip Statuette in their pockets.

"It's not the end of you believing in her, y'know? Like the DJ said, they still don't know quite what happened."

Sighing, I lowered my head onto my front hooves and nodded. If I could get through this without crying, I'd be happy.

"I know, but nopony else does. They keep saying that she's turned bad! That the wasteland got to her and really messed her up, and that she slaughtered an entire settlement! I keep telling myself that it's a lie and I try to draw her and make it all better but I j-just... just can't..."

Well, so much for getting through it without crying. I felt her hoof wrap around me.

"We've still got each other, Murky. You can trust in us. If it's worth anything, I don't think she's gone yet. It's too... sudden, y'know? I'd rather wait and know everything."

Her hoof lifted my head up gently, she leaned in, forehead to forehead and speaking quietly.

"No matter what, you saw her escape that Pit. You saw her defy Red Eye and escape Fillydelphia. That's the bit that matters to you and no one will ever take that away from you."

Just as I'd hoped, Glimmerlight always knew what to say. Feeling a smile creep onto my face, my tears were more of relief and a little happiness than outright mental anguish anymore. I pressed my head against her neck, hugging her briefly.

"Thank you..." I simply murmured it. The pain wasn't gone, the worry and turmoil the news report had stirred in my heart was still present. But Glimmer's words had taken the edge off it for now.

"Now, we've got other stuff to worry about. Get comfy at the back and I'll explain. We've not got any food. Shackles took all of it and I can't get to our hidden stash inside yet, but I've got some purified water from the little doodad I hooked up. You look like you need some..."

She wandered to the entrance, humming to herself. The transition from somber pony trying to help me to the swaggering mare I knew seemed almost shocking, like she was just shoving everything to the back of her mind briefly. Either that, or looking at some of the memory orbs hanging from her bags, I began to worry over what details of the Mall might already have been put away for good. I remembered what Coral had said, that I would come back here to find Glimmer doing the same things all over again...

"Took a little work to get it going, really. You wouldn't believe how hard it is to get a hold of a rubber hose in this place. First person I asked said I could have one if he could use a rubber with me, if you know what I mean."

I really didn't.

"Well, all he got for that was a hoof across the cheek! Had to frame him and steal it from behind his back later. Anyway, so! While we get this thing working, I've been looking through those metro plans and comparing them to the map we found in Protégé's office. That station that Aurora bought out for the Ministry to keep underground? Turns out it's actually a bit of a weird one, not really in the inner or outer circles. It's sort of between them, hence why I thought it was in the, uh, inner. Doesn't change the plan though, that we need to get down there, find the place this unfinished station was placed, dig through to it from the inner, then dig into the outer from the Ministry Station and escape! Simple, eh?"

"I hope so..."

"I know so. Just perfect, even gives us a staging post, y'know? We could get you, me, Brim, Coral and her son; Unity and her buck, even Sunny. Hell, you can even bring Protégé if you seduce him in time."

The metal mug I'd been fetching to give to her dropped from my hooves and clattered off the rocks upon the ground.

"I... I... but... what... huh?"

"Oh don't worry, I can give you all the advice you'll need on just where bucks like to be —"

"But... but I don't... I like mares..."

The look she gave me was very homely. Unspoken. 'I know, just go with the humour, stay bright.' Picking up the mug in her magic, she began squeezing the filthy looking water into it. I guess 'purified' was all a matter of scale in this place. All the same, I eagerly accepted a chance to get some real fluid into me. Even the metallic and sickly taste wasn't enough to keep the lukewarm water from settling a lot of the dryness in my throat. Rejoining me, Glimmer pulled over the metro map and pointed to a symbol a little distance away, toward the edges of the industrial zone.

"You know where this is in Fillydelphia?"

"Mhm..."

"Well," she began, "this is what I needed you here for. I can't be sure, but I think this is perhaps the closest metro station to what I guess we'll call 'The Ministry Station.' You being an outlaw actually works out for us, keeps you out of harm's way underground and gives you a chance to scout out our route ahead of time. I was hoping you could use your sneaky-sneakiness to sneak into the metro and sneak around a bit, real sneaky like, see?"

Glancing my eyes along the map, I could see that the station was the closest to the Ministry itself. No wonder Glimmer had chosen it. It did seem the most likely place that Aurora would have chosen, if there was anything at all. Already I felt a little scared, but I'd done worse by now. Underground, where it was all dark, seemed much my sort of place to sneak around in. Not to mention, the feeling of actively preparing for our escape was beginning to come back.

We'd get out—get everypony out—then I'd go find Littlepip and prove it was all wrong.

My attention however, was drawn to another slam of hoof on wood and the rowdy cheer of the slavers.

"Next victim!" The slaver's voice bellowed above it all. Another pony wandered off with a despairing face.

"What are they doing over there?" I poked my head out to look at them, seeing the ponies involved looking wretched, drawn out and staggering. Glimmerlight sighed, shaking her head.

"Hoof wrestling with stakes. If they win they get a free break from a shift and an extra meal; something many of us need to survive right now. Shackles has thrown us on triple shifts, I just got off an eight hour one and I'm back on in another twenty minutes. Trying to win at their little game is his way of taunting us to try and get slapped down again..."

She clutched her own stomach with a hoof. I could heard the gurgling quite clearly, if the ragged expression on her face wasn't obvious enough. Indeed, Glimmer looked a little weak on her hooves.

"If they lose...?"

Glimmerlight bit her lip, as though pondering whether to tell me or not. Eventually, watching the one pony drop under his corrugated shelter after losing, she looked down to me.

"The losers have to pull an extra shift under somepony else, chosen by Shackles of all ponies. He sometimes mentions mining. The ones that return just looked wasted, more than most of us, but a lot of them seem to stay there. I knew I wanted a slim waistline, but even I'm starting to want to put on a few pounds, Murky."

The joke fell a little flat between us, but took the edge off the extortion The Master had going through his teams.

Glimmerlight filled another mug for herself, before telekinetically drawing it across. The teasing of sustenance was only making my own drawn underside groan in need, though. Pressing a hoof to it, feeling my own ribs far more than anypony should, I just fell to the side. Oh, what I'd do for another apple stew from Protégé right about now...

I looked up at Glimmer, toying with her scrap-built filter again. Her eyes were focused, as though trying to forget her own hunger and deteriorating body by stint of just getting on with it. How could this mare have sold out a village to raiders? I had to ask Brimstone on the side sometime. He'd know something about it if he'd led the clan. Had somepony lied to Coral about what she'd done? But then why did she erase the memory?

Moreover, I began to worry if the same light that she was in my life would remain the same without her coping mechanism. To imagine her falling from being anything other than an energetic radiance of goodness in my life hurt terribly to imagine. She saw me looking up as she had her front hooves above her with the filter. Trying to force a smile on, she leaned down to ruffle my head once more.

"You get any news on Protégé? Rather have him in charge than, well, you know."

I nodded gently. "He's lost command of the Mall. Weathervane says he's really badly hurt..."

"So I saw when they wheeled him out. I guess he really is a nicer guy than I maybe gave credit. The way he tried to keep you in the game or defend you once he made his move. He seems like he has this absolute determination to protect slaves, you in particular. Reminds me, he said something about spending two years to know about that breaking wall? Any idea? You think he was—"

Again, I nodded curtly, cutting her off. Quietly, I explained what I now knew, much to Glimmerlight's surprise. Clearly, she hadn't anticipated much from the chances of actually succeeding in the two year task. To think how much Protégé had pushed through it and judging by the way he seemed only slightly older than me, he must have been a little younger when it started too.

Glimmer sat mystified, but oddly relaxed. Finally, rubbing her chin, she shrugged a little, looking down at me.

"Well, if anything... good sign, right? He knows the problems we have. Makes it a little easier to want him back in power. Heck, part of me even wonders if he'd even be willing to offer what inside help he could. We've got more ponies than we thought to get out now."

That was true. Coral had said as much as well. Herself and her son. There were at least two other ponies I knew I needed to fetch at some point too. Clearly Glimmerlight was still building water supplies for us here, and I'd have been surprised if Brimstone wasn't up to something, but we'd need much more supplies the more ponies we brought into this.

"I think I'd like Protégé on top of the Mall operations again. At least he got us food inside our stomachs, you agree?" She clutched her stomach again.

Sadly, I just nodded, sighing. "Mhm... yeah, I'd like him on top, so I can get something inside me too."

There was a rather sudden pause from Glimmerlight. Curious, I looked up to find her straining to clearly not erupt into laughter, snorting gently and biting her lip while looking at me. Eventually, she could hold it no longer, falling to the side and roaring with laughter.

"Oh, you are too easy sometimes! Haha! Oh, that's just classic!"

"What!? WHAT!?" I stood up in the tent, protesting. What? It was about food! What had I—

Oh. Very quickly, I found myself blushing fiercely.

Under the almost ear-splitting sound of my friend at least acting a little more joyful again, I took refuge in the mug of water instead. Still snorting to herself, thanking me for helping her to at least laugh properly for the first time since the battle, she went back to work on her contraption.

"Just finish your drink before you go anywhere, Murky. Truth be told, I'd rather you be here for all you could be while he's away. I hate thinking of you all alone out there."

For the next few minutes, accompanied only by the cheers of those slaves desperate for food, trying to take on The Master, we were left to ourselves.

The thick stomping of somepony very big was all that eventually brought us up to take notice when Brimstone Blitz returned from his shift hauling the pulley systems to the roof.

Trotting toward the larger tent, he dumped a bag of large tools from his back and thumped the ground with his four hooves, stretching them out. Dour faced, he just gruffly nodded to me about my return. Apparently, that was all I'd get from him. But by now I knew even an acknowledgement meant a lot from the big guy. I nodded back, a little hesitantly. Smiling thinly to her hulking protector, Glimmerlight came back into the tent to tinker with a piece of machinery. Carefully watching around, I crept over to Brimstone's tent a few feet away instead.

I was pretty sure Brimstone spotted me wanting to talk, shaking the dust and ash out of his tent flooring by tossing the ragged thin cotton blanket around, he just glanced back over again. Clearly, he read something on my face about some apprehension to ask this.

"Somethin' got you skittish about me, kid?"

Squeaking on the spot, prompting a confused little glance from Glimmer, I shook my head frantically.

"No! No, no... nothing! Just..."

My head wandered over to Glimmerlight, still humming away to herself and working on the filter to eek out whatever liquid she could from it. Her eyes, I noticed, kept glancing down to that one empty orb beside her pack. I dearly wanted to talk about it with her, but I couldn't force the subject. She may not have loved Caduceus, but those two had been, as far as newly met friends could be, close. In here, that counted for a lot. Shaking my head, I looked back at Brimstone again.

"Just... you... you destroyed her village."

"My clan did that. I just turned up to get the best loot. Clan was bloody big, kid, hundred-plus ponies, and other folks too. Not to mention any raider groups we knocked into line. That village was one of half a dozen places in the area we turned over that day, wasn't my raid to lead. Recognised her only after I'd saved her the first time. Didn't know her name before that. Just another lass in a cage far as I cared in the wastes."

His words slowed, a little more painful as he reminisced on how he had seen her before Fillydelphia.

"So if you're wondering if I know what that other unicorn means about her betraying them, I'm not the one to go to. All I heard was they found the place, not how. That was enough for me to tell them to go nut it over."

"Hey, you two done swapping stories of drunken adventures over there?" Glimmerlight dropped from the filter, turning back to us. “Cos you know, I’m not exactly excluded from that club, remember? I’ve still to tell you the time I climbed Friendship City’s spires, drunk off my ass and singing the Carol of Hearth’s Warming Eve!”

I prayed my face didn’t look too suspicious. She likely would understand, but I couldn’t bring it up for her. Not now.

“No! No, uh... I was just asking Brimstone about the past!” There, that was still kinda true. “Like, um, how he lost his ear!”

The look Brimstone gave me spoke volumes.

“Oh? Huh, I’ve not heard that one either. Well, come on, out with it big guy!”

He shrugged, turning away from me and sitting down with a dull thump, apparently consigned to tell the story to pass the time.

“Good while back now... bunch of the clan and I were off teaching a small gang a lesson for claiming they owned a part of our territory near Ponyville. Dealt with those wee arseholes easy enough, but on the way back, the dozen of us on the trip thought we’d make a run at a settlement, see what we could pick off. New Appleloosa, that was it.”

“That’s a bit out of your way...” Glimmer cocked his head, making her still damp mane slide over her face. “New Appleloosa’s a fair distance from Ponyville.”

“Not for us. Could gallop for a whole day and still pound somepony into red paste. Anyway, we never went near it, but we did spy this one little caravan coming from the town over a gulley, figured we’d just take it. Well, that was a mistake.”

“Oh?” I couldn’t help but feel curious... any story of the wastes interested me. The place I always wanted to be free in...

“Sniper. Some little arse with a dual shot rifle, probably a saddle, playing hero from on high, higher than any hill I can tell you that. Never did see nopony, but the first bullet went right between my armour plates, the second took off my ear. Two hits at long range, damn’ good shot. Put me right down, scared off the rest of them when I went to the ground. We pulled back. Was fightin’ off challengers for leadership for a whole damned month after that.”

“Damn, Brim...” Glimmer muttered, whistling lightly, “can’t say I particularly feel the sympathy, but sniping with a twin-gunned battle saddle? Impressive stuff.”

Brimstone just grunted. “Guess it’s good they kept me from doing something I’d regret today. Just not sure if I want to shake his hoof for stopping me or nut the bastard into oblivion for giving me hearing problems the rest of my life.”

I tilted my head, speaking up. “I didn’t know you had hearing problems...”

“What?”

“I said, I didn’t know you had... oh.”

Spotting Brimstone grinning and winking down at me as well, I just rolled my eyes and dropped onto my knees, realisation setting in. Oh come on, why couldn’t I be smart and witty too?

Only then did I spot Glimmerlight snorting, mouthing ‘too easy’ once again.

Thunk! “Ha! Next up!”

The slaver’s voice echoed up, accompanied by another of the regular cheers from the slavers. Their game was still going. I saw Brimstone raise his head to watch them, before grinning and getting up.

Trotting his way down the gentle slope toward the walls of the Mall, I found

Glimmerlight and I watching each other. A slow grin came over her face before we both upped and began following at a fair distance. She followed Brim, while I lightly hopped between tents, eventually settling in an unoccupied one close by to the commotion. Pulling the cover over, I held my eyes up to a small gap left over, with Glimmerlight just outside the entrance. Really, I felt a little proud. I could really do this sneaky stuff sometimes...

They were still cheering, slapping hooves on the burly slaver's back while he grinned around. Others had joined, forcing some slaves forward who were meekly determined to try for the food that would keep them in a healthier state. Many were crying in the queue, knowing that the obvious hope of the slaver being tired out by the time they arrived for their turn was looking unlikely. But the moment Brimstone stomped in, the cheering fell to simple silence. In a moment of satisfaction, I saw the slaver turn a little pale. Without even waiting a turn, Brimstone sat himself down at the table.

"Hold it right there!"

Any positive hope I'd had jarred in my mind. The Master's voice cracked across the yard, before I saw him approach from the main gate, his immense bulk flanked by numerous weedy looking assistants that dragged checklists. Moving around the hoof wrestling table, he let his gaze fall to Brimstone. Shivering, I backed into the tent a little more. Oh Goddesses, he was meant to be somewhere! Or was that tomorrow? I couldn't remember... oh dear... oh dear...

"The great heroes of the Mall come try their luck at the food-hoof wrestle, eh? Big guy still think he's got it? Good for you. Oh, and don't think I can't see you standing at the back there, Ranger. Don't you worry, I'll find something for you to do soon enough. Could always use a personal assistant while I'm hunting for my pet... hehe..."

No! Even I could feel the shot of fear go through Glimmerlight. Imagining what he'd done to Sunny, but to my best friend! To my sis'!

"Hold on one second."

Brimstone's voice slid right in, effortlessly sharing the authority of the scene. I saw at least a dozen ponies step back from the two of them, the two largest ponies in the area when one had defied the other.

"You set this up, this gamble for a free shift and food. I'm not doing this for me." Brimstone cast a glance back, right toward my friend. "I'm doing it for her. I win and she stays away from you for a day longer."

Brimstone's glance threw a stare back at Shackles behind the wrestling slaver.

The Master didn't even stop grinning, a hoof tapping the slaver before him on the shoulder. "And if she loses she gets the shift too, I think you conveniently forgot to mention. I know all too well you'd work as many as you need without caring. Win or lose is on her. Could say that's bending the rules there, eh? In that case let us make a substitution..."

The hoof hurled the slaver off the chair as though it weighed nothing, along with the chair. With a sharp thump, he moved his own massive body into the space instead.

"Me."

That was it. Around us, dozens of slaves and slavers were even dropping their work to cluster around. Very soon, I felt trapped. Masses of ponies were crowding around the tent to see the table where the two largest ponies I'd ever seen stared each other down. Was he really doing this? I had every confidence in Brimstone's strength, but The Master would abuse every ounce of the winnings if he came out on top. Oh Brim, please know what you're doing...

Glimmerlight trotted forward to Brimstone.

"Brim... are you sure? Look, you know how Shackles works, he'll have something planned or you know he would—"

"Glim." The syllable didn't even include his eyes moving from the light green of his opponent. "Back off. You're hiding it well, but I know the first signs of starvation when I see it. You need the food and the time off after your injuries in the riots. Besides..."

His eyes squinted.

"I've wanted to do this for a long time..."

"Sure you still have what it takes, old stallion? Hehe..." The Master cackled.

One of the slavers stepped up, signalling them to move their hooves forward. The Master did so first, slamming one front leg on the table with a sick grin. Brim's slapped into his to make a savage and tight grip immediately, accompanied by a sharp crack from their large bony hooves meeting. After Barb, I'd had enough of games to decide my friend's futures, even with it being Brim, part of me couldn't help but worry. Above, some slavers swung their searchlights from the scaffolding down onto the table, highlighting them under the hot rays. Cast in contrast, the crowd of slaves and slavers equally beginning to build up a frenzy for the expectant match were blacked out in the darkness of post-storm Fillydelphia, me amongst their horrid, singular, moving black shadows.

"First hoof to hit the table loses! You go on three, no other limb movement and any interdiction from outside seen by me disqualifies the one benefiting! Take the strain!"

Muscles crunched, the judder of movement between the two set the tight strain prior to the start. Brimstone looked like an unmoving rock, his entire body still and staring from a blank face. The Master just licked his pock marked lips with his tongue, grinning through yellowed teeth while shaking off his shoulders. The chain around his neck jingled... that metal collar he had attached to it swinging loosely to the side. As though sensing me watching, his other hoof just stroked it gently. I felt my stomach turn.

"One!" The crowd joined in. "Two!" The pair matched a hard glance.

"...THREE!"

The table actually shook from the sudden rush of power going under their legs up to the hooves on their ends. The crowd began screaming out, every slaver for The Master, most slaves just a general cheer. They didn't dare support The Master's opponent directly. I saw Glimmerlight stomp a hoof and smile as Brimstone's hoof gained the immediate advantage, getting the first push in to knock The Master's back a good few inches already. But it had stopped there, where they now strained and matched strengths.

"Come on raider, is a cheap first push all you have? Perhaps you're still wounded?"

Brimstone gave no reaction, simply keeping up the pressure. Despite his boast, The Master's hoof was slowly being pushed down. Shaking and gradual, Brimstone was like an advancing unstoppable wall of power that gave no ground. Muscles and veins bulged on both their legs as Brimstone brought him halfway to the table, forcing on the advantage.

"Hgn... not bad... not bad..." To my horror, The Master just grinned. "...for a pony long past his prime. You're just an old stallion now, 'warlord,' a relic of your own... sssh... history! Me? I'm still part of the present, headed to a future you can't stop!"

Their hooves ceased, before with a warping of his face and twitching of an eyebrow in strain, The Master began exerting his power. My mouth slowly began falling open as I saw him actually resist, match, and then push backward, returning the battle closer to the middle. The slavers were deafening, stomping the thick mud up to splash my eyes and coat, my... well... coat, with wet muck that flew in through the tent entrance. Squinting, I felt Glimmerlight wrap her hoof around mine in silent support under the flap. Brimstone wouldn't want us distracting him with cheers... but come on...

No... no... the denial entered my head as I saw Brimstone's hoof move past the centre, slowly losing ground. The Master's shoulders and body seemed larger than I'd ever imagined, bringing forth far more power than I'd ever thought that wide body ever possessed. Brimstone was taller and ripped upon every muscle on his body, while The Master was simply broad and had a certain squat power that belied his own large height and thickset torso. It dawned on me that though Brimstone was clearly stronger, The Master's physical stature may actually place him at a huge advantage in this particular game.

He knew that going in, of course, he never did anything without absolutely knowing. Whimpering, I just watched as Brimstone's huge muscles shook and strained to try and stop the gradual pressure of The Master's hoof pressing him past the halfway point to losing.

"You're trying to protect the little whore with this, warlord?" The Master eyed Brimstone, receiving a harsh look in response. "Oh, I'm going to enjoy having her all to myself the moment I'm done here. I'm sure you know the feeling... raider. Hehehe..."

Oh boy, that did it. That did it.

Brimstone's hoof stopped on the spot, six inches from the table. Brimstone's eyes widened, baring his teeth as he reversed the momentum, stopping just short of the point of no return.

"She won't be yours, nor will he, not while I can change anything to try and keep anypony away from you, Shackles."

A growing strength began building in his body. It became clear how much more he still had left to give as he began to lift The Master's hoof up, round past the halfway point with apparent ease as he threw what seemed to be every bit of power he had into the game. Two of the biggest and strongest ponies together, but one showing just how outrageously powerful he could suddenly be. The Master seemed to be cut short of a comeback, sweat beading off of his head when his hoof was bent over, being forced down toward the table on the other side. Around me, the cheering had wisely stopped from the slaves, the slavers decrying Brimstone and stomping for their leader to up his game. To 'crush the raider.'

I began to feel a little elation, Brimstone was doing it! Glimmerlight was fearlessly cheering for him, hopping up on her hind legs to stomp with both front hooves.

Then I saw The Master's eyes once more, and I saw the truth.

He wasn't desperate and losing, not at all. He'd wanted to give us hope.

"Not... bad... warlord..." His eyes remained on mine, grinning wider and wider as he struggled to keep Brimstone's power back. The raider was almost leaning over, snorting to finish this now. "Not... bad... at all... pity I've been holding back... nopony beats me at this..."

The tables turned on the spot. His back seemed to arch, those massive shoulders under the plate armour twisting, and bellowing out loud, The Master threw every ounce of his real untapped strength behind the game. Under the cheering of the slaves, Brimstone's hoof came back, back, and back at a horrible rate. Struggling, I saw a drop of sweat actually drip from his forehead. The Master's new assault stalled, stammered, but then crushed down with unceasing power. Laughing out loud, he brought Brimstone's hoof over to the other side of the table... holding it above it...

"Last chance to win out, warlord! How's it feel to know you're past your time? All downhill from here!"

I saw Brimstone offer one last push... but The Master's hoof slammed down, dropping his weight and strength to throw Brimstone's hoof right down.

There was a sound of a hoof on wood.

The crowd exploded in cheering. Bets that had been made changed hooves upon that one sound of the table being struck. I saw Glimmerlight stagger backward, feeling myself already trying to pull her away into the tent... to get her away from the Master before he came to claim my sister. She was... she was... his... for the day. No... no, how could Brimstone have lost?

"Hey, wait, what the fuck?"

The shout of the slaver overseeing the match sent a jolt of silence around, as everypony looked back at the pair. The Master was still straining, frowning, sweating and giving it his all.

Brimstone's hoof had simply ceased to move a half inch from the table. The noise had been his other hoof, tapping on the tabletop as though bored. Letting my eyes glance up, I saw him just staring with calm eyes. Had he just been toying with The Master? Then, he cleared his throat.

"So, we done warming up? You ready to play for real, Shackles?"

"What... you..."

"Three, two, one, go." Brimstone deadpanned, before actually trying for the first time all along.

The muscles along his leg swelled, bulging like I'd never seen as the legendary warlord let a life's worth of grown strength and raw power flow. Snarling, letting that primal instinct take over to reach heights of irresistible energy combined with that massive earth pony spirit, he let fly with his real strength. Their hooves snapped over almost too fast for me to even follow, slamming down on the table hard enough to snap the entire thing in half and shatter pieces of wood across the crowd. Shackles was flung from his protesting chair, dumped on his side below Brimstone to collapse in the mud.

That... oh... that made the crowd go silent. The Master had just been defied. In public.

He swirled, roaring with rage to get to his hooves and stamp the floor, shoving a slaver who tried to help him away. I could hear him muttering below his breath as dozens of ponies decided to make themselves scarce, both slavers and slaves.

"Oh, you fool... daring to do that... to try embarrassing your Master!?"

Rounding off to stare at Brimstone, he found the raider's steely gaze simply looking him in the eye. No pony was near them, anticipating the outbreak of a serious incident. The Master looked ready to simply destroy him, but Brimstone didn't even blink. I saw my friend lean closer, almost whispering.

"You're going to what then? Punish me? You just lost, Shackles. Take it from a veteran... you don't hold your end of the bargain, you throw the toy out the pram? You'll lose more respect of your position than you'll ever recover with anger and fear alone."

The Master met his eyes, glowering.

"So you 'protected' the mare. Grand job, but I still have you to order around. Don't think you're free of 'repercussions' here, raider!"

I doubted many could hear them. I stood rock still, watching two of the most lethal ponies I knew in the middle of a heated argument. Oh this could be bad, this could be very bad...

"Give me extra shifts? I welcome them, Shackles! Execute me? I deserve it. You want to damage my body? Go ahead, you'll get nothing out of me. Make me work and I'll get the job done happily. Face it, Shackles."

Their faces came close together.

"I'm the one pony you'll never be able to hurt. So you're going to have to just accept that. Back off... and get the order to get Glim some food and a free day if you want to claw back any respect from your underlings."

The Master was seething with an underlying rage I'd never seen him exude. This was no mere show of force, for once he was truly and utterly angry. But Brimstone merely met it with a cold glare. Slowly, against all my belief, I saw The Master step to the side, snarling at Brimstone before barking to one of his subordinates to fetch some oatmeal for their tent. Sensing the real entertainment had passed, many of the ponies around had returned to work or shoving others to work. No pony dared go near him.

Brimstone turned, trotting back toward us with his eyes firmly (smartly, I presumed) set on the departing slaver. The Master simply continued to growl in response, his eyes occasionally glancing to the pale Glimmer, like she was a toy denied.

"Only until I find a way to hurt you, slave... hurt you bad. Oh I'll find a way. Just you wait, you've made a mistake that will cost you someday with this..."

With that, he turned his thick bulk around, stomping off. I highly pitied whoever was next on his schedule. But what he'd said. That sounded like a threat, but The Master didn't make threats. Slit had told me as much.

Somehow, that only made it worse.

We were left alone until the food came, past a quick attempt to congratulate Brimstone from Glimmer. The moment we had some much needed sustenance to share, even if it was sloppy and milky out of date oatmeal, we began to make plans. Brimstone and Glimmerlight detailed what we still had. The stashes inside were allegedly safe, just too important to risk bringing to the outdoor temporary camp. That meant we still had some food and drink, plus whatever Glimmerlight's filter could make from the last rainfall. Added into that were three spell-orbs that Glimmer had stolen from Protégé's desk and hidden deep in her own robes between the seams. In the rush for medical support, no pony had really searched us. That, and we'd been seen to be helping the slavers, so I guessed that afforded some trust.

Including Barb's death and the pacification of the raiders, we might have called this a complete success, now that we ended with more materials than we'd gone in with. But the looming depression of having lost somepony who said they'd help us kept reality in firm check. We were slaves, prone to punishment, labour, and accident more than anypony.

But we did come to one conclusion: I still had a little space to work in, being on the run. Before too long had passed, it became clear I needed to make myself scarce. I couldn't hide in their tents forever before somepony came to fetch them for a shift.

"You remember the way? Just look for anything you can in that metro, Murky. Be it hiding spots, loose walls, locked doors... scout anything, draw it out, if you can, to a map."

A pang of hurt shot down my spine. I couldn't draw anything right now, but I nodded, allowing Glimmer to saddle me up for leaving. But even as I approached the wall to grapple over it into the darkness, I felt her lunge forward to embrace me once more. I returned it, holding it for just a little while longer. I could see her pushing the tragic events of late down hard. It was so obvious.

"You going to be okay, sis?"

I could see she appreciated that, and nodded.

"Maybe... maybe when you're back I can talk, Murky. Just give me time, we can start on trying to help me remember then, perhaps. I think that'd help. Thanks for coming back."

"I'll help you. I promised. Cross my heart."

"Hope to fly." She finished for me, leaning back to smile lightly, before ruffling my mane. "We'll see you around, Murky. Stay safe out there."

Stepping back, I separated from her. Brimstone gave another curt nod, as impassive as ever.

I looked behind me at Glimmer, before whispering to Brimstone.

"Take care of her, please?"

I regretted asking, expecting him to chide me for stating the obvious. But the big earth pony just nodded.

"Always. We'll get by. You just concentrate on finding us a path to escape."

It took a lot of effort to turn around, fire that grapple, and leave them behind under The Master's rule. But yet conversely, I felt the trust they had in me now.

Especially now, in what felt like our darkest hours, I had to live up to that.

The metro station lay before me. The journey across had been fairly easy, what with most slaves and slavers inside out of the rain earlier. Now, I hid in an overturned food cart across the street and cast my eyes to the metro itself. A skeleton of metal and rotted wood, it had clearly once been a building made almost entirely of glass that had been blown out. The street and floor were covered in shards that had been broken time and time again. It left behind a strangely empty looking shell of a cover for the metro station entrance. I could hear ponies inside, mostly chatting calmly, likely slavers then. Two more patrolled outside, just calmly keeping an eye on the street. They wouldn't be any trouble to avoid; even from here I could see a building by the side that would let me creep in, now that the windows were all gone.

I thought while I made my way around, trying to avoid splashing through puddles and making a noise. Protégé had told me that the inner metro circle was simply used as a shelter for some slaves now, or to house supplies where they might be more preserved. It was all too likely I was wandering my way into a slaver den. That would explain the low security...

Why couldn't I ever go any place nice?

Carefully pulling my (still rather sore) body around tumbled furniture, I dropped into the alley through a window of the adjoining building. Glass tinkled below me, leading me to freeze on the spot. Had they heard me?

They hadn't. Sticking around, a few minutes later I heard no change in their patrols.

Sticking to hopping between fallen rocks to avoid the glass covered floor, I made my way into the metro station from the side. I emerged into a small cafeteria, surrounded by a low wall bearing dead plant life atop it. Immediately, it became apparent how new this place must have been before the balefire hit. Many of the chromed metal turnstyles and benches were still somewhat shiny; whatever process that had created them preserving their coat. Beside the wooden slots for small kiosks and rotted plants, it created a very strange duality of old and new. I saw closed shutters on the windows for tickets, a higher level with offices (probably management), and a few tunnels leading to overground railroads near the back of this area. In the middle of the hub was a large opening with long and shallow steps that led underground. That had to be it.

Unfortunately, there were plenty enough slavers lazing around on the benches that to try and get by would be an exercise in futility. A couple were playing an odd game on a checkered board while others cleaned some rather unclean looking weapons. One snoozed off even as I watched her. There was no going down from the normal route. There had to be a way! This station was likely our best bet to find the Ministry Station and our ticket to the outer circle. Glimmer and Brimstone were relying on me to scout this out and find us a way to sneak past all this! Ducking back into the cafeteria, I had a thought.

Metro lines were underground. This had been a world that lived in perpetual fear of zebra strikes. Even if it wasn't a megaspell, even I'd heard tales of zebra terror attacks upon Equestria. A cramped metro seemed, to me, a likely target. If I could figure that out, likely so could the architects of old. If I were designing this place, I'd want to have alternate entrances and exits to the underground to help give ponies a way out should the worst happen.

Taking my time, emboldened by the thought, I began to sneak around the edge. Sticking to the cafeteria, I hopped out of it and hid behind a large marble square that had once housed an interior tree. Bit by bit, I jumped from square to square, heading for the ticket kiosk. If there were any way down, surely the staff would have control of it? One of the toughened glass windows lay around the corner from the sight of the slavers, so I rolled toward it instead. Tugging my saddlebag off, I pushed it through the thin gap where caps would have been exchanged. (Pre-war used caps too, right? I would have. They were so shiny and colourful!) After that, I squeezed my own body through, trying not to let the obvious worry about how thin I had to be to even permit that take hold in my mind. I didn't get stuck, but it was a bit of a tug, before I finally popped out and landed on the other side, knocking the revolving chair flying. I landed with a grunt of pain, failing to stop the chair before it fell.

"You hear that?"

Immediately, the sound of trotting emerged. I stuffed myself into the shelves below the counter, pulling my saddlebag into my belly as tightly as I could. The trotting came closer, followed by another. A vibration went through the counter as they tapped on the glass of the kiosk.

"The hell are you doin'?"

"Makin' noise. Scares radroaches off if it's them."

An argument about what radroaches were really scared of or not took place, followed by more tapping on the window. I really wished they'd stop; every 'thunk' was only making my hypersensitive ears twitch and my head pound from the noise. After a while, I heard somepony sniffing at the gap.

"Urgh... yeah, radroaches. Stinks in there..."

Oh come on...

"Well, I ain't getting it. They'll just come back anyway. C'mon, it's your move. By the way, you hear that on the radio? 'Bout the Dweller?"

"Shit, man! Quiet! You want them to know you've been listening to that banned station? Yes, I heard. About fucking time she realised there's not any point after giving us such a hard time."

They trotted away slowly. Trying to force the insults they laid at her hooves out of my mind, I dropped back out of the shelf and stretched my legs. Almost to my shock, the mouthpiece of my saddle sprung out the moment I did. Grumbling, I flicked it away again. Someday I'd get used to this thing. Not that it made me any less gleeful to have it. Sometimes, I found myself just looking back at it around me and smiling like a foal with a present. It had helped keep my mind off the pressures of being an outlaw.

A little quiet exploration found a back office. I'd feared for any remains, but there was nothing but someplace that had clearly been left in a hurry. Well, if you have a metro nearby, of course you'd run there the moment those deathly sirens had started. There were, surprisingly, no desks (a first for everything...) but rather just one long work surface that ran around the edge of the room, covered in old tickets and a few faulty looking terminals. I spotted another holstered set of audio diaries beside one. A single diary lay on the floor, a little red light still blinking. Glancing around me, I pulled out my PipBuck and adjusted the volume to low before picking up the diary and clipping it on. It took a few seconds of fiddling and remembering which buttons did what, but I eventually got it to play, hearing the busy sounds of an office behind a mare's voice.

"End of day list for Friday, assistant manager Creamy Pop. Hey, Bulb? When you get this tomorrow, I'm real sorry, but the terminals went down today so the cash up hasn't been sent to HQ yet. That's about it, other than that there may be a complaint coming into you tomorrow too. Nothing big, just some idiot who can't read the rules. Oh, and... I know you had family in Manehattan, so... lemme know how it all is, okay? Everyone's talking about the rumours that they got hit a few minutes ago by some sort of terror strike. Just let me know, okay? We're going to head to the news desks to wait for information, hopefully we won't—"

I felt my entire body clench tightly. In the background of the diary, a low and wailing note was beginning to pick up and gain in volume. Ever-present and immediately controlling the atmosphere, the siren began to sound.

"Oh Goddesses, is that... is that a drill? Hey, everypony, you heard of any drills? Please tell me it's just a drill!"

"Terminal doesn't say, but they were planning on having a surprise one this month. My brother works at Stable-Tec; says they keep requesting them for Stable ticket holders. Hey, listen!"

The sound in the background didn't change, what were they listening for...?

"It's still going..."

"So?"

"Don't you read the brochures, Creamy? A long one that doesn't change is 'alert,' one that warbles and goes up and down is 'attack.' It'll be the drill, they wouldn't dare use 'attack' for one. We should treat it like it's real though, you know what Bulb's like for following Ministry Law for drill practice..."

"All right, we'll go by the book. Everypony! Pack up and get underground now! Get the PA system to the public and move to the service stairs at the back! Oh horseapples, those sirens creep me out, that's the third time this year already..."

"I think that's the point, boss. Let's go."

The diary hit the desk before falling to the ground, I could hear the clacks as it was dropped.

"Ah, damn! Broke the record button... well that's this one done in. C'mon! Move it! I don't want to be up here with those things longer than I have to. Chills down my spine, you'd think they could make a nicer—"

Click.

"End of day recording limit reached."

My entire body was shivering. Drill or not, that noise had elicited a reaction in me. Like in my escape attempt when they had sounded it as an alarm. As though the knowledge that it had actually happened was enough to biologically condition all newborns of the pony race with the same blood-freezing terror of that deathly wail. Those same ponies in the drill would have heard the real thing, the 'attack' variant. They knew the difference. They'd have known on the spot their world was over.

But it had at least confirmed what I sought. That there were some alternate ways down back here. Still trying to fight that sound from my memory, I limped on. It wasn't far, just through past some old toilets and down into the back area for all the shops and staff members. A spiral stairway, almost too short for four legged ponies, was built into the corner. Glancing around, I could see each of the shop back doors had been flung open, items strewn everywhere from the last rush for the real siren. Very quickly, I began to fear what I might find below ground. As though unwilling, I spent a little time hunting around the debris. I located a few old plastic bottles for Glimmer to fill up inside a long non-functional fridge as well as, to my delight, a single can of unopened food.

It took a little working with one of my grappling gun's hooks, but I finally managed to break open the seal. Inside, I found a thick white mush. Potato!

Sticking my muzzle in as far as I could to lap it all out, I found it to be powdery, dry, and lacking in any real taste. But it was sustenance. It was something, and my growling stomach was all the more grateful. Pulling the tin off, feeling my muzzle's rad sores stinging from the rub, I let out as much of a satisfied breath as I could. Unfortunately, this seemed to just have been somepony's old lunch. Everything else was rotted or long spilled. Without venturing too close to the shop windows, (I could still hear the slavers outside) I took one last look around and pocketed an old mouth-torch before finally moving to the stairs. Casting a glance down, I saw a rather shocking drop beneath me. My eyes turned briefly to my PipBuck. Likely I would be hearing from Sundial soon, as well.

"Well, here goes."

I took a slow breath. Time to find the next steps of my way home.

Taking my time, I began to realise that underground was not perhaps what I was expecting. Things had been fine and isolated upon my descent, but I had stopped now.

I'd heard something.

A low noise, like background hum and ambience that rippled up the long vertical walls of the service stairwell. Unpredictable, bereft of any pattern, it continued its low and undulating groan that picked up the deeper I went. Remembering Protégé's tales of the metro, I could only bite my lip and almost hope that this was something as simple as a slaver den. Occasionally, louder sounds would spike up, higher pitched and sharper. But it was, all of it, simply cast into an unidentifiable drifting mess by the shape of the tunnels and height that I was hearing it from.

Gradually, I began to continue, my ears twitching and my mind worrying. The noise kept eating away at my already frayed nerves, growing and then dropping. Always there in the background, just waiting to—

Beep!

My hooves scrambled, falling against the wall and covering my head with a squeal that dropped off into a whimper.

Beep!

Quickly, I began to realise. I'd been so high strung that even Sundial's messages startled me. Quickly digging the PipBuck out and tying it to my hoof to listen, I continued. At least he could keep me distracted from the growing volume.

Click.

Instead, I got a mare's voice, fast talking and playful, one I recognised from before.

"Hi there, Sundial's nightly update! So sorry he can't do it himself, so I guess I'll do it for him. I just know he'd have wanted to say, 'Hi there! I'm Sundial and I have the greatest marefriend in history, she's so perfect in every way! She is soooo understanding that she even saw the magazines I had under my bed and didn't mind a—"

"H-hey! Are you recording on that!?"

"Oh, hello sweetie! Just offering the 'Sky-eye-view' on your life!"

"Aw, come on, Sky! They don't need to hear about... oh..."

"Just realised what I said, huh?"

"Yeah..."

I heard Skydancer giggle, before a soft sound of somepony kissing another was heard.

"You are so cute when you blush, you know that? Fiiiine, I'll let you have your little toy back, I've got to head home to get ready anyway. So, bye-bye, ponies of the future!"

"You really are crazy, Sky..."

"You know you love it. If the feisty looks in those photos of the magazine are anything to go by—"

"Hey! Gimme that, please, Sky!"

"Gotta take iiit!"

A little playful scuffle broke out, in which I could hear the PipBuck being tugged away behind Skydancer, giggling madly, and Sundial's pleading. Sometimes his words were interrupted with the altogether more loving sound of a quick peck on the lips. Finally, with a little exhale of air, I heard somepony pinned down.

"Hah! Some earth pony! Pinned by a little pegasus like me? Here you go, hun. I'll see you tomorrow after work, flying the night shift tonight."

"Phew... yeah... okay. I'll see you then."

They said their goodbyes, the wonderful sound of them interacting as buck and mare with such a light hearted fun to their relationship making me both feel warmed inside as much as it hit home like a sharp envy in my heart.

Sundial seemed to dust himself off, muttering about 'that crazy mare' and laughing to himself, before sitting down again (I presumed) with the PipBuck.

"Uh, sorry about all that. I might delete it... dunno. Anyway, for the proper update. I've made a choice. I can't let her go, I can't even risk having to let her go again. There are more and more drills, like somepony up top's beginning to fear we need the practice. I... I'm going to sell something to the zebras. The money they're offering is just too large to ignore—with it, I could afford another ticket in under a few months! I... I've decided to try something that seems important... an old design of armour we abandoned before the current project. They'll think it's all high tech, but it was way over-designed and barely worked at all, so it won't hurt Equestria, right?"

Beneath me, the sound was only getting louder. I felt I recognised the sounds... what were they? Everything was so distorted in this strange spiral shaft.

"So long as somepony else doesn't give up the good stuff, they won't ever know I'm feeding them long out of date info. Maybe... maybe this could work for Equestria in the end, huh? Like, counter espionage or something. Oh I don't know, the Ministry of Morale's gonna take me away if they ever find out! But the meeting's tonight, I've already got the blueprints copied to hand over. This entire city just feels lethal now. We've all heard the reports of ponies being taken from the refugee camps, disappearing into the night with no trace. The Ministry of Peace has been running all over the place trying to find them, even investigating a few workers who went missing from our factory last month. I figure they just bailed and went to the country. The cities aren't what they once were."

Suddenly, one of the noises from below me got much louder, more clarity coming to it as I neared the bottom.

Oh Goddesses, I knew what that sound was. I'd heard it a million times in my life.

"I best be going. The zebras were very specific. Ten at night, around the back of the factory complex. I have to admit, them being here and a bunch of refugees going missing? Seems way too much of a coincidence. It'd be just like the stripes to kill off a few defenceless refugees to keep them spreading fear and worry amongst another populace. Urgh. Right, they're getting their plans, I'm getting my money, and then Sky and I will be off to a Stable to be safe forever. That's all that matters now to me. Wish me luck..."

"Good luck..."

"Heh, I guess I'll get around to telling this thing about how I got my cutie mark someday, huh? Goodnight."

"Night, Sundial..."

Click.

Biting my lip, I wanted to sit and think for a pony that was quickly, through all of time, becoming like another friend to me. But the noise was too great, far too great now, and I knew what it was.

It was the sound of ponies in misery.

Slowly, like the reveal of a grand hall upon entering the gates, the metro came to light before me through a fallen section of wall near the bottom of the shaft. Massive, spreading in all directions, the opening into the main trainstop filled my gaze. Dual layered, with the platforms beneath and an open plan suspended waiting area at the top, it almost felt like an outdoor site. An old and chipped mosaic lined the roof, depicting the great cycle of night and day between the great Goddesses. In the middle, lined along the twilight between times, lay the six symbols of the Ministries.

But it was no longer a metro station.

It was a gate into hell.

Under the symbols of the past, lay the horror of the future laid bare. Opposite the entranceway, had I taken the normal route, there lay a large doorway from which a dull red light pulsed and radiated. Outside it lay lines of slaves in neck-chains, kept standing by a will seeking to dominate their life. Many of them were tugging full converted metro trains that were laid low on their suspensions with thick rock and wreckage. Others advanced into the tunnels bearing tools across their backs, pickaxes, auto axes, and spades. Those coming in off their work were dragged ruthlessly into the gate, disappearing into the red light to join the commotion that seemed to drift out of it and up the shaft I had descended. The looks on their faces... I knew it from my own, the day I had been put in that collar.

Below Fillydelphia itself, the slavery only went on, even more brutal than on the surface...

It all flowed outward from a central point that explained everything, absolutely everything, as to why this was such a nightmare made real for ponies like me. At the centre of the raised platform, I could see one pony overseeing everything, standing before it all.

The Master.

This was the entrance to The Master's personal slave camp.

Fear told me to go back, to report that this was not a way out.

Hope told me that this was the only known link we had to find evidence of a way out.

Courage was silent. In the wake of the Mall riots, I had proven myself to at least have some. But it had been drawn from examples and determination to protect. The last day had already proven one of those examples had been corrupted in my mind.

But loyalty, that still drove me. Loyalty to find a way home for my friends. The same loyalty that Protégé had proven and shown to me.

I had to go on.

At least an element of logic comforted me. I wouldn't have to go into his camp. The tunnels left in many more directions than that, with enough of a crowd and large trains being carted down them that being able to sneak along wouldn't be impossible.

But even with all of that, it was tough to keep going and descend those stairs knowing that he was observing the area. Everywhere I had gone today, he'd been waiting, like something was keeping us within a hundred metres or one another.

Thankfully, the service stairwell I'd descended opened out into the metro tunnels from the very side, deep in shadows. I had a little space to choose my chance to exit.

Pressing my front hooves against the stairwell's door, the rusting locks almost seemed to crust apart under being moved at all. But all the sounds here were reverberating off the walls, pounding into my head far worse than they should. A mare's cries shot above it all amongst the crack of a whip. A buck weeping openly in the chain gang had the sound of sobbing echoing back and forward. They were, all of them, like the ponies I'd seen earlier around Sunny. Blackened, choking, sick, and covered in burns or crudely healed injuries. I'd seen such things on many slaves above ground, but it was everypony down here.

I fell back inside the door for a second to get my bearings, drawing the map to think about directions and which tunnel would go closest to the Ministry.

"Why are you lying down? You will stand, slave! Stand and await your cart!"

Everypony around who even was slightly kneeling shot to their hooves, whether or not they were the ones being called out. I did too.

That wasn't a good sign. Why was I obeying? Why was I obeying!?

"The second shift of the night shall begin! Slavers! Take them back to their cages, their third shift will begin in one hour."

A chorus of slavers chanted out in agreement, as willingly obedient as the slaves. Forcing my legs to crouch again in the service room, I used my PipBuck light on the map. If I was reading it right (something I highly doubted), the closest tunnel to the Ministry was the one on the same side as my stairwell, but the one on the other side of the platform from the way the door opened. I'd need to briefly go out there to make it in...

Folding up the map, I bit my lip. The Master could spot me in a crowd instantly. He knew my every movement, shape and size. He was far too observant to just hide in a box or something either. If I moved, I'd have to do it with absolute stealth. Why was he even here anyway? Didn't he have the Mall to take care of? It was like he knew where to just wait and terrify me from. I wondered if he knew I'd been so close, if he was just messing with me, screwing up my head by always being in the right place to make me scared before the collar would suddenly clamp around my neck when I least expected it.

Right... Murky... be brave. Just be brave, you can do this. Be brave like Brim and Glimmer and Protégé and Littlepi—

My train of thought jarred, feeling a welling of emotion that I had to almost beat back down. I couldn't let it affect me now.

It was perhaps the most terrifying twenty feet of my entire life up till now.

Sticking low to the ground, I slid around the corner and into the main station itself. Immediately, I rushed up and crouched behind a series of seats. Drawing my mirror, I angled it to watch for The Master to look away each time. The rest of the slavers I'd just have to pray didn't care as much to look. Slaves glanced at me with dead and hopeless eyes, their mouths hanging open like mentally damaged patients who had been stripped of all personality. Oh, look away! You'll give me away!

"Eyes front! Back in line!"

Their heads snapped around. Please don't look at what they saw. The mirror showed his head turning to snap at some others while speaking to another of his seemingly many assistants. Over the cacophony, I couldn't detect the individual words, just his rumbling and scraggly voice. Taking the opportunity, I leapt forward to behind an old advertisement board. Pinkie Pie stared down at me from the other side of it, seemingly advertising a new brand of singing party sprite-bot, judging by the little song notes coming out of it. I recognised the design; I'd seen those odd ones with video screens now and again around Fillydelphia.

Part of me found a little respite in thinking about them. Anything other than concentrating on the ongoing, never-screams of anguish emerging from that hateful gateway...

I made the jump to the next one, catching The Master's face whipping around the moment I did. Pulling my tail in quickly, I sat and huddled up behind the next bench, the last one before the next tunnel! I didn't even dare put my mirror around the corner, but I could feel his gaze witheringly directed at this one spot, feel it chilling my body more than any siren could.

"Get off the bench! Not your place! Now get back to work, I expect to see another ten feet by the time I'm back!"

He was leaving. I could hear his stomping coming down, passing by the entrance to his den and across the platforms toward the stairs. Then he stopped.

"Somepony close that door, who opened it?"

I heard chains clatter as he drove toward the area. Figuring his attention was away, I dashed forward and hopped around the corner. Behind me, glancing out, I saw a group of slaves point my way.

“S-slave...”

The Master’s hoof crunched upon the buck’s face, throwing him back in line.

“Wrong answer, wretch. What. Slave?”

The buck pointed this way. I leapt back and immediately began galloping down the tunnel, not even caring about the other slaves that looked up, surprised at one of their number moving as fast. But I could hear the thumping sound of The Master approaching, seeking out the rebellious one of his number. If he even got a clue it was me, the entire place would go on lockdown! The tunnel was uneven, hard to run down with the rail tracks overlapping one another and interspersed with debris and old slippery puddles. I ran alongside a huge metro-train cart that was loaded up with tools to go back in. The sides were barricaded up with scrap metal, making it impossible to leap up and hide! So I ran on, into the darkness. Down the tunnel, the groans and sniffs of dozens of ponies echoed and solidified even more. Crimson hazes washed down from behind us, giving the darkness a thick quality that mixed with the bloodstained slaves. Behind me I could see the massive silhouette against his den’s red light standing at the entranceway.

Praying that the darkness hid me enough, I spotted one indent into the side wall of the cramped metro tunnel. Hopping between lines of automaton-like slaves, I tripped over their chains, landing face down on the tracks. The solid impact on my chin dizzied me, making the remainder of my stagger into the gap all the more haphazard. My teeth shook, my loose one wobbling in the gums from the impact. The gap was fairly large, surrounded with wire fencing, probably an old maintenance cubby hole. Jamming myself against the nearest side of the wall I could, I listened for The Master approaching.

Nothing...

Eventually, I dared to risk peeking my head out. Focusing my eyes past the procession of slaves heading into the same tunnel on part of his ongoing operations down here, I saw no silhouette in the tunnel entrance forty feet back at the station itself. Phew...

Turning back into the cubby hole, I took a second to rest. Allowing my eyes to move around. Yet as I saw what was there, I had to cover my mouth to stop the scream.

It was a dumping ground for slaves. Piled high, those that had passed out in the tunnels had simply been thrown in here to be dealt with later. Still ‘fresh,’ many lay with open eyes or mouths, every one of them simply looking tired and drawn. I could see ribs, leg joints and pelvises protruding through threadbare coats and thin skin. They had simply been worked to death.

Backing off, I fell into the main tunnel again, my eyes not leaving the grotesque heap. Amongst the smells of rancid slaves and thick dust I could still smell that sweet sickly flavour in the air, the one I’d so wretchedly had to be immersed in once long ago.

Why... just...just why? What was the purpose of all this? Why did he want to do this to ponies?

Behind me, the slaves offered no answer, trudging onward on the commands that they had been given, not willing to look or see for anything better for fear of being singled out. Unable to take it all on board, I merely continued galloping into the tunnel, sticking to the edges and ignoring every one of the foul stinking corpse dens from then on...

The sound of rock chipping and the whine of auto axes began to waft up the tunnels. I had slowed down to take the next hundred metres carefully. Occasionally having to join the slaves or hide behind a moving cart as a slaver trotted past, I nervously kept advancing. So far, this wasn't looking much like a good route to the Ministry Station, even if it were down here. The proximity of The Master's own personal den just behind me was a threat enough, but the tunnels were active and seemingly in constant use. This one workforce that was down here seemed to be perpetually on the job. Those coming back down the tunnel were dust covered and choking, staggering by sheer exhaustion. The ones going in bore a look that could only be described as harsh acceptance of their place in life. For the first time, I began to get a sense of what it was like to look at me from the outside sometimes...

I reached a junction, where the tunnels split off into about four others. No doubt service tunnels or older routes. Some of them bore shattered wooden planks along the ground like they'd been reopened. In the hazy darkness, the heavy dust, and strong heat down here, slavers washed dim torches back and forth, lighting the reality of work down here.

They were mining.

Along every stretch of wall, slaves were chipping and picking away at the solid rock or concrete. Swung by weary heads or flickering weak magic, the axes seemed to only graze a little off at a time. Clearly, The Master preferred to work by a 'slow but constant' method down here. Moving away from the entrance, I ducked behind one of the many waiting carts where slaves were heaving scraps of rock in for removal. In this darkness it was easy to simply lie low.

Something still made me itch though. The Master never just 'gave up' like before. Had I really given him the slip again or was he just waiting back there at my way out?

Shaking my head, I tried to clear the horrid thoughts that being so close to (or within) his den were giving me. I could still hear the sounds from back there, the low moan drifting through the metro from his own little corner of depraved practice. I could see many of the slaves here bearing obvious scars. No way were that buck's lash scars from just a mistake... that mare was likely walking with a limp for another reason...

This was... sick, even by Fillydelphia's standards. These ponies were literally working themselves to death down here, trapped in whatever horrors went on behind those gates. The stench of rancid sweat and the horrid conditions around their own filth while not being allowed to cease mining gave a reason to why the slavers trotted with their gas masks firmly on. Catching a draft down one tunnel in a bad way almost made me throw up on the spot. Ponies had to work in this...

But really, my other thought was what they were doing here anyway. What was there to mine in a metro?

The thought slapped me across like a leather whip. It was so obvious.

They knew about the Ministry Station.

The Master was in league with Grindstone. No doubt the old donkey had seen the same things I did in Aurora's office and made the same conclusions as Glimmer. He had wanted Aurora's research from Stable Ninety-Three. He was trying to make her inventions work. Now he and The Master wanted her hidden stash of whatever it was they were putting together down here. I began to wonder if even Red Eye knew of their real intentions, outside of trying to locate Ministry secrets. Would they 'do a Sundial' and perhaps only give him the things they didn't want to keep secret? Grizzly had mentioned some great political game going on. Was I seeing one of the more covert large operations?

Even as I watched, one slave collapsed from the wall. Falling backward, she landed on the tracks and seemed to have a spasm on the spot. A filthy yellow infection on her belly looked distended, weeping pus across the floor. Slavers immediately galloped over, hauling the poor mare to her feet. To my horror, they simply set her, at gunpoint, to work again. She cried even as she kept striking the wall, her stomach visibly weeping infectious fluids still. Across the junction, another mare was set upon by a second slaver for pausing. A baton cracked across her neck, leaving thick lumps after only a few seconds. Her screams of pain only joined the others echoing in the air. Along the walls, occasionally I saw whole groups of ponies lying together? Dead? No, resting. They weren't even allowed to leave the mining wall to sleep. Many twitched, clearly in the throes of the same nightmare they would soon be woken to again.

Shivering, I pulled myself tighter. This really was a truly proper hell for slaves down here. Trapped in the dark, forced to work at a blank face, seemingly almost all day.

Carefully, I began to pull myself through the busy intersections in the middle. Carts were being pulled along the rails and swivelled on some large turntable (pulled by slaves, of course) until they faced down another tunnel where other teams worked. Trying the old trick of getting under one of them, I managed to make it to the far side fairly easily. Really, the hardest thing was trying to not let my emotions and fears get the better of my tearducts. This was such an atrocity against ponies.

The further I crept down the tunnels, the more I got a sense of just how long this had lasted. Wall after wall had been chipped away at for a few feet, before being given up on. This entire tunnel past a certain point bore the markings. They had to have been at this for months!

No... I needed somewhere to hide for a moment. This was just too much.

Checking around me, I slid into the nearest maintenance room, noting an odd scrawled sign by the door. Immediately inside, I gagged. Coughing out hard enough that I had to kneel down, I dropped to my side and dug out a section of cloth to cover my mouth with. There was nothing in here but the sad sight of a great many dead ponies, long rotting. By now, it almost felt routine in this place. I was filled with all sorts of sudden emotion. Sadness at their plight, fury and anger at the same, and a heavy frustration that I could do nothing to help them mixed in with the terror of being trapped within it all myself. That I had kept going down here in the darkness to blend in and sneak well was a testament to that I really still wanted out. I still had some courage to work with.

"Still... still able..." I breathed out.

"Still able to what, hairball?"

The rough voice made me scream, spinning to see the corpses standing up! Memories of a janitor in the Mall almost made me run madly for the door, before I saw the light of intelligence in their eyes. Ghouls! It was just ghouls.

Looking at the chains that linked them all together, it became apparent to me that they were slaves.

"Asked you a question, hairball, still able to what?"

"Answer him, come on. Not like we get much talk down here..."

"Mm..."

"Yes..."

Talking almost like a committee, the ghouls formed an arc around me, all staring with yellowed or bleeding eyes over their blackened and rotten skin or muscle. Whimpering, I looked up at them.

"Still able to go on. To keep hopeful that I... I'll get out..."

They laughed. Ghouls laughing were rather unsettling sounds, filled with a dry and cracked wheeze of air.

"Get out of Shackles' tunnels? You don't get out! You just keep workin' till you drop. Pity for us we can't."

"W-who are you?"

The lead ghoul glanced at his comrades. Most of them wandered back to the rear wall to settle down again. Clearly they didn't get to rest much, but four remained. Looking back at me, I was told to lie down. I obeyed rather immediately. They settled, weariness showing in their movements. Many were carrying injuries that seeped oddly coloured blood.

He indicated a mare to his left with a few very long strands of hair left in her mane and tail.

"Nurse Splint. She keeps us going best she can, worked for the last few hundred years..."

Another mare on the same side, bearing a wrap around where her eyes, I guessed, used to be.

"Nurse Bedlay Bloom, bastards took her eyes for looking at them wrong."

He then indicated a buck on the other side of him, the last one.

"Lastly, the rookie, if you could call him that these days. Windtail Breeze was the student doctor when the bombs hit. And I'm Baton Round, was head of security at Hearts and Hooves Hospital; we all worked there."

Hearts and Hooves! I sprang up, finding a middle subject we might all know! Perhaps these ghouls had some good information if I could get on their side!

"Hearts and Hooves Hospital? You must know Doctor Weathervane!"

There was a sudden silence, before Baton Round finally stopped blinking. His chipped horn lit with a wavy yellow to close the door behind me.

"Weathervane... been a long time since I last heard of that cranky old bastard. Been a long time under Shackles... too long. Yes, we know him. Was a friend of mine, actually. I took care of a war trauma patient about to gut him and he healed the gutting that I got given instead. Sort of forges a bond, that sort of thing. The rest worked under him. Good terms, right?"

There was a murmuring. Nurse Bedlay Bloom looked up, her face not even looking directly at me, the wrap around her eyes staring at the wall instead.

"He helped me deliver my first foal when there were complications. I was so proud to work under him."

Splint nodded and smiled. "Deliver your child? He delivered me. Good stallion, he is... good stallion. He really liked us being around... good days... good days..."

Very quickly, I sensed the scale of this conversation flying way beyond my ability to relate. These ponies had all worked with Weathervane back before the bombs. Hell, they'd seen old Equestria in the same way Weathervane had. Now they were slaves in their own city.

But something didn't make sense.

"If... if you're all ghouls. Why don't you sign onto the crater duty? A few months and you're free, no way The Master could stop you, that's Red Eye's rules!"

Windtail Breeze shook his head sadly.

"You think Shackles plays by the rules? Well, you're right in this case, that he couldn't stop us. But... this is our city. We were all born here, worked here... died here. We rose again together and we survived together. Now we're rebuilding it together. We won't abandon Fillydelphia to the balefire. We'll do what we can to repair it before we go. Even if it means this... it's what kept us sane. That thought that we could one day see it proper again before we let go and fall to the feral..."

"You... chose to stay!?"

"Yes," muttered Baton Round, "we did. It's our home. Means a lot to a ghoul, that does... out there? We wouldn't recognise it. Never left Filly even before the megaspells. I'd just be in a place where I'd fall to the feral all the faster. Here at least I got something to cling to, to keep me alive and going. Just wish it weren't in here though. Shackles wouldn't let us get any word out to join somethin' else if we tried. No pony else comes down here, either..."

"What keeps you going, little one?" Bedlam Bloom turned vaguely in my direction. "Your voice sounds so small... weak. You are scared..."

"I... I am. It's terrible down here..."

"It's terrible everywhere. Here... worse, yes. I try... I try to forget what they are doing to us. The last few months have been bad. Even many of the unlife ponies like us are passing. Their games, their experiments killing us gradually off. Behind those gates lies nothing but pain, young one. Your words betray that you do not know it yet. I am sorry that you are here with us now."

I considered she must have been an incredible nurse with such a calming tone. I could see the horrid injuries across her body. Deep cuts, infections to her very body visible without her skin and a mangled back right hoof. I wondered just how long these ghouls had left. They all looked about ready to fall apart in a few days. It probably explained their rather drifting nostalgia about the past.

"I'm not a slave down here. I'm... I'm on the run. Trying to find a way out. C-can you help me? I could, well, see about helping you too..."

"How, murky pony?"

"My name's Murky Number Seven..."

"Appropriate and scary..." muttered Windtail.

"How could you help us then, Murky Number Seven?" Baton Round cut in.

I took a slow breath, then regretted it instantly in the cramped room with so many ghouls. Outside, I could hear the slavers moving around. But this was sort of what I'd hoped for, some inside intelligence on the tunnels!

"Some of us, we're planning to use the tunnels to get out. To find the Ministry Station and get to the outer circle. If we can, we could maybe get you away from The Master at least. Somewhere you could do proper work to help repair your city. We... um... we just need help down here. It's too heavily guarded to get lots of ponies down."

They seemed to glance at one another, before Baton Round, their obvious leader by stint of (apparent) maturity, nodded.

"We are nearing our end down here, Murky. I'd... I'd quite like to see old Weathervane again before it comes to my time. Please, if you could get us topside in your escape... we will give you all the help you want. We're all scared, Murky. We try to deny it, but we're terrified. Two hundred years is a long time to feel wasted with death down here. Please, Weathervane needs us back too. Before we were sent down here, I was fearing he was turning. Getting angrier..."

"He told me to 'shut the Goddesses damned hell the fucking shit fuck up' last time..." Windtail murmured off to the side. "But I don't wanna die down here... so much left to do. Lots of bad fates for ghouls below ground when they become useless. Please, if you can get us out, get us to Weathervane. He knows how to treat ghouls. He could save us, I know it. We're his friends, Murk. We need him to live, he needs us to help him through his pain. Please..."

It took all my effort to control my emotions for these tragic figures, gulping in the musty atmosphere, before nodding.

"I'll try!"

Baton Round seemed pleased, he turned me toward the doorway.

"Shackles has us all mining down here, looking for something in the walls. But these tunnels go on for a long way. I don't know where this Ministry Station is, but I can tell you that you don't need to use the entrance you did through this hellhole. Along this tunnel is another service shaft that leads to the surface. It's shaky... unstable, but a few ponies could go up or down it with a little effort. You can use it to get back out. The mining never stops, but we're here about this time each day between our shifts. There's a radioactive water leak at the back of this room we use to heal up as best we can."

He indicated further down the tunnel, where he'd mentioned.

"Plenty of hiding spots down here. Why, if we weren't in chains, we'd break for them. Just keep following the inner circle service line and you'll avoid most of Red Eye's storage areas in the metro. Nopony really uses the service line since it was collapsed away from the outer circle."

I tried to keep all this information in my mind. This was crucial. Our way out could very well depend on being able to survive down here for a few days. Baton Round and the help of his ghouls could make this go a lot faster if we could figure out just where to mine that The Master hadn't. Frankly, I trusted Glimmer's ability to read memory orbs and the past a lot more than I did Grindstone's.

"Th-thank you, sir. I'll make sure to try and come back. I'll... I'll tell Weathervane about you. Let him know you're still alive. I hope you can come with us. We all have our reasons to want to go. Like one of my friends, she wants to get her son free. Another wants to help repair her life and get back to her parents."

Splint nodded, as though feeling the sting of long lost parents herself, but then she looked closely at me.

"What about you, young Murky? What's your reason?"

The question caught me by surprise, making me hesitate. Gulping, I lowered my voice.

"I... I've never been free..."

The ghouls seemed to share a moment of sadness for me. No doubt their medically driven mindsets still at work, somewhere deep inside those broken bodies. Even as I watched, I could see Baton Round's muzzle seem to slip and move in ways no muzzle should be able to. Had it been... snapped? Splint sighed, patting my fleece lightly.

"Oh, I'm so sorry..."

Taking a deeper breath, I felt it deserved a little explanation.

"I want to be though, it's all I've tried for since the Pit. Since the Stable Dweller escaped. She's like my inspiration!"

There was an odd silence amongst the ghouls. They cast looks to one another. In the background, many of the other ghouls looked over at the group speaking to me. I could see one of them held a radio.

"The fallen mare..."

Bedlay Bloom frowned, shivering and sitting down. Baton Round lay a hoof over her back before turning to me.

"I despair to be the one to bring you foul news, young slave. But—"

"It's not true!" I blurted forth, interrupting them long before they could speak the lies I had been dealing with since that one report. "She didn't do that! It's... it's somepony just using her name to ruin her reputation! She would never!"

The ghouls glanced to one another, I could feel the unspoken conversation. Baton looked back at me, like one might look at an idiot child barely grown.

"You have a rather frighteningly short-sighted faith in her, Murky Number Seven. This is how the wastelands go. If you've never been free to know, then I don't blame you for—"

"I know! All right? I know it's not her! She saved... she saved me from the Pit! Showed me what it meant to be free! I don't care what you say, she's a good pony! A good pony! Why can't anypony but me see that?"

I settled down, turning my head away. These were good ponies, these ghouls, but they actually bought into this stuff?

"Murk, allow me to tell you a story..." Baton sat down. "You know, I know how it feels to watch your hero be taken by the morality and horror of the wastes like this. I really do. Remember, I've been in Fillydelphia since it happened. It used to be even worse, no order at all. We hid from gangs who wanted to commit genocide on ghouls. We watched ponies nailed to beams and held skyward for all to see and fear from. There was no authority, no organisation, just an unending war between gangs and slave traders. Slaves themselves were handed guns and forced into the fires that raged uncontrollably. Some blazes normal, some balefire. Horrors emerged from the metro and found a lush hunting ground. Hellhounds came in from the wastes. It was the culmination of everything the wasteland had to offer. Murk, we lived within a nightmare. An inferno of violence, depravity and pointless agony on anypony still within the borders."

He glanced at his friends.

"We lost most of those who survived with us, either early on, or as ghouls. Falls to the feral side were regular, consumed by the hate rising from that crater. It seemed Fillydelphia would extinguish itself in the brutality that wracked every street and tunnel. Chainlink Shackles was born into this, Murk. Why do you think he turned out like he did? I watched him go from a commanding infant to a brutal up-and-coming slaver who has believed since birth that those his family owned were his property. That everypony was just another waiting addition to his collection. Raised by hate and living in the flames bred a pony the likes of which terrifies me to the core, Murk. But he wasn't the only pony of note..."

The mentions of The Master made me shiver. I couldn't imagine him as a young pony, but it was such a perfect duality, like The Master had said. I had been born an accident... a tribute to slavery's demands on a young mare. He had been born on the other side of the fence, forever the symbol against what innocence I possessed.

"Th-then who else?"

Baton smiled.

"A pony from across the wastes. He came to Fillydelphia and we laughed at him. He didn't shoot or hurt ponies, he just talked to them. But oh, when he talked. I remember he approached our shelter, calmly drawing us out with a helping of his own supplies and food.

We sat with him and he told us of how things could be better. This stallion aided us, providing us with other allies he had found amongst the madness. What a pony! Kind, generous, and a great dreamer, he set about organising us to help work and create safe zones. Under his direction, we fought to defend those he cared for. He led us, even pulled me from a burning building once. Together, we saved lives. Eventually, we realised that a greater Equestria to come about, if only we would all pull together and work for it. He had inspired us. He was our hero."

The smile vanished. I sat with an open mouth, beginning to catch up to what he was gearing toward.

"His name was Red Eye. We were the first 'workers,' Murk. Don't place all your hope in legends. You never know what they'll become. At least you weren't around to be hurt by what yours did."

I simply huddled my front legs close to my body, sniffing. No, she was different from him. She was different.

"She wouldn't..."

"Legends don't last. Somepony wiser than me told me that hundreds of years ago. Don't let it get to you. These things happen to ponies in the wasteland."

How could they be so flippant and disillusioned about it? Was being alive that long what made them so willing to forget the good? Maybe even Red Eye could be good again! Or his ideals picked up by somepony else like Protégé! Was I really being too naïve? Believing in heroes and legends in a world that adamantly believed they didn't exist?

Any answer wasn't given a chance to be said. The slavers were shouting from the tunnels.

"All right, you slags! Next section of wall! Come on! Where's the rots? Get them out here now, they've had enough rest in their little rad-den!"

The ghouls began to get up. Baton looked toward the door and immediately moved over to me.

"Don't give up hope, but trust in who's around you. Not in who's out there. But all the same, I hope that you'll come back. I don't wanna rot down here until I die. That's my city up there needs rebuilding. Get going, Murky Number Seven. We'll wait for you."

The ghouls began to filter past in their chained up order. Baton Round and Bedlay Bloom shimmied forward first, Windtail and Splint a little afterward. The 'younger' Windtail looked at me almost pleadingly. The massive metal collar far too large for his neck, where it left weighty marks from years of servitude...

"We'll wait for you..."

The ghouls trooped past the door and toward the mining tunnels. Keeping back, I hid in the darkness before making off to find the service shaft. But I kept watching backward as they disappeared around the corner, limping and slowly dying. I wondered how many times they'd let their hope rise, and whether I was simply giving them another last hope before I too would turn out to let them down.

Leaving the metro was difficult. Not in the physical sense, for my grappling hook let me climb the stairwell Baton had mentioned with ease, suffering only a few squealing falls onto my rump. (To be fair, I hadn't had much chance to practice with this thing yet...)

No, it was difficult because I remembered everything The Master had said before. About wanting twenty feet ‘done’ while marching Sunny’s column in this direction.

I was knowingly leaving my twice hero behind to the metro.

Rather slowly, it began to dawn on me that any hope she saw in me was as likely misplaced as many found in their own heroes throughout time.

The Mall was quiet. Or rather, the camp around it was. No doubt in The Master’s absence to the tunnels, the slaves not on shifts took what time they could to rest and relax. Those on the job were still clambering across the Mall, sliding new twisting lengths of razorwire onto the window ledges and scaffold tops. Using the same method as before, I dropped down behind the fence and immediately took cover. My eyes found Glimmerlight’s rather pitiful looking and leaky tent. Brimstone wasn’t present, but I could see a shadow on Glimmer’s tent of somepony inside. She was here. Oh thank Celestia...

Quietly hoofing it over, I ducked behind crude shelters and hid in old craters to close the distance. Oh, how I wanted to simply gallop to her side again and report that we had a potential way out if we could rig climbing equipment to get down that shaft again. Moving up to the area, I started creeping from cover to move into the—

Somepony quickly looked up from nearby toward me. Were they a slaver? I couldn’t take the chance, I rushed forward and dove into Glimmerlight’s tent. Tumbling through the flap, I fell against somepony, hearing a feminine yelp of surprise. Then a second feminine cry. Then a third.

Oh, wait... the last one had been me.

Covers tussled, I felt two ponies struggling out from under them on either side of me in the cramped little tent. I’d fallen between two resting ponies. Lying on my back, I now found Glimmerlight to one side of me and her... new friend, on the other. An earth pony mare with a lavender mane and soft blue coat sat up in shock out of the blanket. If it weren’t for Glimmerlight seeming at ease (if surprised) I figured she might have been out of the tent. Instead, Glimmer reached over to gently stroke her mane and look down at me lying half snuggled (by accident, I swear) between them.

“Oh, hello there!” Glimmer was entirely too cheery. I could only imagine why.

“You... you invited a buck too?” The mare leaned over me to speak to my friend, glancing down at me on my back with my hooves in the air. She seemed uncertain of my presence. “So, who’s your friend?”

“Oh, this is Murky!” Glimmerlight shimmied in, pressing herself against me in a little half hug. I felt my face turn a hasty shade of beetroot as I felt Glimmer’s ‘bed buddy’ do the same.

“Nah, didn’t invite him, not in that sense. He’s just back way earlier than I thought!” Glimmerlight continued, winking at me as she ruffled my mane. “He’s also just the most adorably little innocent buck around, just look at that blush, Leafshine! Just can’t resist a little hug for him, can you?”

They giggled together. Clearly of the same type of humour to embarrass me shamelessly by snuggling in on either side.

“I... I... I scouted...”

“Ah, business later, Murky. Comfy rest time now. Good thing you weren’t five minutes earlier. Leafshine and I were just, hmm, taking the edge off developments.”

"You're lucky to have Glimmerlight, Murk." Leafshine chuckled in her clipped accent, stroking a hoof around Glimmer's jawline. "Just a wonderful pony who knows how to make things seem nicer."

"Y-y-yes... s-s-she d-does..." I could feel my ears burning with embarrassment as I saw Leafshine lean over to lightly kiss my, uh... friend. "In other ways, mostly..."

"Mhm! Like my little bro, you are, Murky! Hey, Leafshine! You wanna take a peek at his journal? Come on, Murky, let's all have a look. We're all somewhat mature ponies here!"

"Ooooh... the one you said you got that pose from? Yes, lets!"

The pair leaned in, grinning eagerly.

I just covered my face with my hooves. Why, oh why, did it always have to be me?

Oh my...

Leafshine departed soon after the monolithically embarrassing art showcase. I might have taken at least some pride in it... but looking at the imagery I had once drawn so fluidly, it only reminded me of my inability to do the same now.

Another part of me felt somewhat annoyed at myself after Leafshine had offered to pose for me. Not in any sort of improper manner; instead, she had wanted to see herself drawn to look like she wasn't a bedraggled slave. I wished I could have, but I had only politely declined, citing that I didn't want to do her an injustice with my skills. The words seemed to make Glimmerlight look at me with a worried expression.

It raised my curiosity, that somepony as in grief over Caduceus' death would find another mare so fast to help cheer herself up with. I guessed it was just one way of her coping.

I forced it to the back of my mind, concentrating instead on explaining everything about the tunnels, den, and the ghouls to Glimmerlight. The news that The Master had knowledge of Ministry Station was bad enough, leading her to think for some time. She concluded that we could still go ahead, but that we needed to find some sort of edge to locate the Ministry Station first, and then be able to hide our progress. We would make a little den of our own inside it and slowly smuggle ponies inside to hiding before making our break into the lethal outer circle.

But right now, plans updated, I heard the report from Glimmerlight's side of things. The first news wasn't great.

"Brim's gone."

"What!?" I almost dropped the blanket I'd been forced to cover myself with in my short visit to here. The tent wasn't very warm and the rain threatened to tear it off. When was this storm going to end!?

"The Master... his revenge, I guess. He couldn't hurt Brimstone, but he could still send him away. He's been sent on a temporary posting to the mustering yards to haul heavy weaponry onto the trains and caravans. Brute work to keep him busy and away from The Master, I guess. He'll be back in a while, Shackles wouldn't dare lose him and he can't make such a prize too Red Eye disappear, but we're on our own again for now, Murky."

The thought just struck up every annoyance in my mind. Every single one of them. Every time we made a hoof forward, we were knocked back by something stupid like this. Why was The Master even doing that? Petty revenge wasn't his thing, even I knew that! Brimstone would likely enjoy the work.

"B-but you... will you be alright without him?"

"I'll get by, lil'bro. I managed for a while before Brimstone too, and most of the worst ponies were taken out with the riots. Sure wish Caduceus was here to help, though..."

The atmosphere seemed to chill a little. I edged forward, looking at her azure eyes as seriously as I could.

"You... you want to talk about him, now?"

"I guess so." Glimmer's face went a little void. "I've gotta talk sometime. Just... just wish he was still here. Poor Caddy... he didn't deserve that. I just... I keep feeling temptations..."

"Temptations to what?"

She glanced to me, before her horn lit and carried a small orb to me, the one I'd seen her toying with earlier. It was unspoken, we both knew what she meant. Again and again, I heard Coral's warning and words from the hospital. Glimmer didn't know how to deal with consequence, how to commit to her actions.

"Please, you can't. You said—"

"I know what I said, Murky! But I've been doing everything I can to just try and not think about it! To shut it out, to immerse myself in research, to build gemlights and purifiers. Hell, I even spent half an hour with Leafshine to get my mind off losing somepony like that! I just keep seeing him, Murky... keep seeing him putting that revolver in his mouth and blowing his own fucking face off! I can't handle that. I'm remembering why I kept forgetting things."

She wasn't crying, but it wasn't far off. Feeling a little pushing influence to my mind, I moved forward, wrapping the blanket around her as well as myself.

"It'll... it'll, um, get better..."

"So I keep telling myself. I could just take those few seconds. The moment where he pulled the trigger and get rid of that, couldn't I? But that's how this all started. Just a few horrible minutes... then maybe an afternoon I didn't like... a day isn't too much, right? It all builds like some sort of ridiculous addiction to chipping and smoothing my life into the one I want. The one where I'm just happy... maybe Coral's right..."

"She... she said—"

Glimmerlight looked up, almost falling out our blanket as she spun to face me.

"You talked to her?"

Her eyes seemed desperate, her hooves grabbing me around the shoulders.

"You spoke to Coral? I... I probably shouldn't ask this, but what about?"

Nervously, I bit my lip before replying. "A-about you, mostly. She wanted me to pass on a message. That she's..."

I paused.

"Grateful. She's grateful that you saved her. She... she said that you did it, proved you are willing t-to do something about your life. You did it, you got her interest, Glimmer. She's... she's wanting you to know that she does want you to try to be better. To be the friend you used to be to her..."

I was taking liberties a little, but Glimmerlight needed this. I couldn't let her fall back into her 'orb addictions,' Caduceus didn't die to be forgotten piece by piece until he was nothing but a series of chosen moments! I knew Coral needed it too, she hadn't said it, but I could see the need for somepony to be there for her too. She was truly alone without her family, friends, or even her own son.

Glimmerlight simply sat still, before tears started draining from her eyes. I'd seen her cry, seen her upset, but now I simply saw an empty pony really needing others around.

"Murky..."

"Yes, sis?"

"Help me. I... I want to do it. I want to remember. Will you help me do it? Before you go?"

I could barely survive. I couldn't save all the ponies I wanted. Sunny, Weathervane's sanity, his friends in the tunnels, Unity... they had all been taken or were in danger of being lost. But here, in this moment, I could do this. I would help Glimmerlight repair her life.

"I will."

Glimmerlight pulled the blanket around us tighter, before her magic started pulling her bag across to dig through the mounds of orbs. She slowly examined each at a time, speaking slowly and lowly. The mood had gone dark, neither of us knew what we'd find.

"Coral is a better pony than I ever can be, Murky. She didn't forget any of what happened to her. Whatever they did to her, whatever they did to her family in front of her eyes. Her son being dragged away. She remembers it, and she's still got it together enough to be a strong pony and... and look to offer me at least a chance to prove myself by facing what I did. If any pony deserves to be known for forgiveness... it's her, Murky. Not me."

Eventually, one dull blue orb hung out of the mass she had placed down around us. We were surrounded in the windswept tent by glittering memories... the chosen one hanging in the air.

"This... this is older. Maybe before it all happened but... but I'll need to start slow, okay? I don't know what this'll contain..."

I laid my hoof over hers.

"I... I'm here."

Her horn lit. I felt her tense up. She was so fragile right now. I could feel her ready to shout at me, tell me to stop agreeing with her to do this. But then the sparkles flew from her horn, the orb glowed, and we drifted away.

The world spun, my 'self' quickly faded to be replaced by foreign feelings. A sense of stretching, of being taller, better built, and healthier. Before I knew it, I was in the wasteland again. That unsettling sense of being trapped within my own body settled home hard. I tried to ignore it, to simply watch what was happening.

I was Glimmerlight. Her mane still felt much longer than it was these days. She was trotting under a forest of dead trees, the same one I'd seen surrounding her new home, Creaky Hollow. The light wasteland wind drifted and made her long pink mane flow and blow across her face, while the light seemed almost blinding compared to the storm-swept Fillydelphia.

She wasn't alone. Beside her I could see somepony else. A wasteland weathered and tattooed stallion. He had a slightly dopey expression under a face that held a few scars below his eyes. His voice seemed relatively informal.

"Thanks fer walkin' me out, Glim. Always means a lot to get a chance to see you in between caravan trips. Sure you can't take me home? We'd make a good trade for you lot, wherever you are in these woods."

I... sorry... Glimmer laughed. She shook her head.

"Sorry, hun. Village rules and all. We stay out the way. Hell, I don't think I'm even meant to be out here seeing you, never mind take you back to meet the town. You know I'm always gonna bring a few caps to get stuff with you. Try to come back this way again soon, huh?"

She stepped forward, hugging him tightly. I could feel his coat was rough, but thick and the sort of one I wished I could possess.

"You betcha, Glim. S'all I think about on the road, getting back to my little pink dreamer for a couple days out in the woods."

"Don't I look forward to it? Never gonna take me to see the caravan, though? I could trade on the village's behalf..."

The stallion shook his head. As he stepped back, I got a better look at him. Clad in tied leather armour with a heavy fabric undershirt. His body looked a lot like a rougher, darker coloured version of Caduceus, with the same proportions. Briefly, it occurred to me that Glimmer's preferences were looking pretty clear. On his flanks I could see a cutie mark of a marred, dirty and chipped diamond beside a small pickaxe. Wait, I was looking at his flanks? No, that meant she was! Oh, come on, Glimmer, the guy's trying to say goodbye here.

"Fraid not, Glim. They don't like dealing like that. Please, it's best if you don't come to them. We'll just stick one to one, okay? I got your needs for gems and orbs anyway. I'll see you later, pink dream."

"See you later, Diamond. Take care out there in the wastes, all right? I don't want to have to come save your flank."

They shared a giggle, before Glimmer cut it short with a rather aggressively assertive kiss right to his lips. My mind barely had a moment to think before the reality hit home that I was kissing a stallion. Oh, please, Glimmer! Have a little restraint, don't use your—

She did. Ooooh boy...

With her eyes thankfully closed, I just kept trying to distract myself by thinking about the situation. Thus far, this memory didn't seem to hold anything particularly traumatic, (by her standards, anyway) so why get rid of this?

I could feel myself—rather her—beginning to blush as they shared the ongoing intimacy of their mouths. Glimmer really didn't hold back. It took him to gasp for air and lightly push her off to stop it. I felt her grin cheekily and lower her eyes. That look. He seemed to flush.

"Oh don't tempt me..."

Please, sis. Don't.

"...cause I've gotta get on the way. See ya roun', Glim!"

She waved as he trotted off into the dry bushes and away, licking her lips and grinning to herself. He was quiet on his hooves, or was that just the dull hearing of ponies other than me?

Apparently not, I heard a crack behind her from a twig breaking. Swinging, I felt her mane wash around. I wished could see her mane like this. She would look amazing. But her eyes now found the newcomer now emerging up a path through bracken, pushing it away with a hoof.

"Glimmer, was that him again?"

Her voice was a world apart. I saw her better fed and kept. Coral Eve was dressed in a light dress stitched from wool, a basket over her back. Most surprisingly, she had none of the bitter resentment and anger that I saw in her eyes.

"Yeah, I figure you saw him anyway. Don't worry, we just met out in the woods."

"I know Glimmer, I know. Here, c'mon, we need to get back before the elder comes looking. You do remember what I said, right?"

The pair began to trot home. I saw Glimmer's eyes focus on the thicker innards of the forest. I couldn't even vaguely see the village. It really was well hidden.

"To be careful? Don't worry, I got a couple in my shack! Brought them from Bucklyn, the Rangers don't like unintentional reproduction in a low population bridge base after—"

"I don't mean that!" Coral laughed, knocking Glimmer's side. "I mean about him. Did you see those tattoos? The scars? He's had a rough life in the wastes. I don't want you to get hurt, dear. Caravanner types lead harsh lives, lots of inter-company rivalries and stuff."

"Aw, c'mon, he's not like that! You should meet him, then you'll see. He's really lovely! Look what he brought me?"

Glimmer pulled a small bag from her own saddle. Opening it, I saw a luminous shine that seemed to glow on its own accord. It was full of gemstones of all types! Despite her worry, I could see Coral's eyes go wide at the sight.

"Wow... generous for a wastelander..."

"I know, right? Plus, he's a real sweet one in the throes of the moment, I'll tell you that."

She leaned close, whispering something I really wished I hadn't heard. They shared a friendly chuckle, holding one another over the shoulders at the cheeky bit of gossip. They had stopped briefly, leaning on a seemingly random part of fence still standing. I could see the rest fallen through the browned bushes around them. Their laughter grew, but Coral stifled hers first, patting her friend on the shoulders.

"That's all lovely, Glim. Just take care, all right? You know I love you like family. And that means I just don't want anything to happen to you. You've been a world of good to the village, even if you are a little..."

"Friendly?"

"...I was going to say naive. Look, if this stallion gives you someone to commit to, I'm happy for you. But just take care. Maybe we'll bring it up to the elder at the next meeting, okay? Now, let's get going. I don't wanna leave Chirpy too long alone."

Glimmerlight breathed a sigh of relief, I imagined this had been worrying her as to what Coral might think. She leaned forward, giving her friend a quick, friendly peck on the cheek. I felt it returned.

"Thanks, Coral. Love you."

They shared a hug, before cantering on down the trail. They raced, laughing as they went, running into the darkness that began to surround my viewpoint from Glimmer's eyes... the darkness that...

...faded into the black tent. The light had gone out while we were under. The calm wasteland day was replaced with the howling wind that seared through the open flaps and washed over our bodies hidden beneath the blanket. Rubbing my eyes, dizzy and groaning, I sat up. Glimmer seemed less affected than I, already crouched over, holding the orb carefully.

"Diamond..." She barely whispered it. "I... I don't remember a Diamond, but it was like

I really liked him. He's the only thing I'd want to forget from that, nothing else was out of place! But he seemed nice..."

She hugged the orb close.

"It's something about him, it has to be. What did I do? Did... did I break the rules? Did I sell them out to him for something? Was he really not nice? Coral seemed wary, and I know I was always a bit reckless."

She sighed.

"Oh Murky, what have I done? What if I was the one who led those who destroyed Creaky Hollow in? If he was a raider. I lay down with a fucking raider and sold them out to him!"

"Maybe it's not that!"

"What else could it be, Murky?"

Her voice snapped, swivelling her head around at me. I recoiled, seeing the hard stare. Glimmer's voice turned self deprecative, ranting about herself.

"Glimmerlight! Slapping flanks with a torturing and raping beast because he wanted to get her home out of her! I'm an idiot, Murky. A naive idiot! Coral's got every reason to hate me for... for not hearing her warning. Oh... oh, Murky, I'm sorry..."

She clearly saw the shock in my eyes from her outburst. Really, it had been seeing my friend hurting herself so much with her own words. Moving over, she hugged me tightly.

"I'm sorry... it's just..."

"It's... it's okay. You knew it'd be hard. But... but maybe there's still a lot to see, we'll take our time, okay? I'm... I'm with you. Always."

Glimmerlight sniffed, squeezing me once and not letting go. We simply sat and shook, both our minds running over theories and ideas. But it all kept coming back to the one horrid fact over just who this Diamond really was...

"A toast!"

"A TOAST! YEAH!"

Only now, the ambient sound was beginning to come to my mind. We could hear a lot more commotion outside from the slaves. Hooves pounded on the ground. Voices roared. We looked at each other, before immediately moving to poke our heads out.

A congregation of slaves had gathered. Weak, diseased, yet still showing a sudden surge of strength together. They had brought what water they could from the rain, many of them trying to copy Glimmer's purifier (with varying success, I saw one with a sock), to get what they could into mugs and waterskins. Some even just held bowls in their telekinesis. But they were clustered around a fallen trolley rack, surrounding a fire barrel. The wind blew the sooty smoke through the tents as they chanted and stomped. What was going on?

"What do we toast to?"

"THE FALLEN!"

"To WHAT?"

"THE FALLEN!"

Many of them swilled the foul water. What did they mean by the fallen? What was...

Oh... no they did not.

A slave raised a hoof, aiming for silence.

"We got the shit end of the stick, but what did we get then? Some pony galloping around, thinking she was the fucking messiah or something? Causing trouble in Filly and getting dozens of us shot for her escape? Well, did we see her helping us?"

"NO!" The crowd cheered.

"So drink, fellow slaves of the great shit end! Finally, an end to all that lording-it-up bullshit as we find out she's just like the rest of us! She gonna shoot me because I stole from farms to survive? Gonna kill Skippy over there cos he had to give his clients a beating if they couldn't pay? You know she wasn't gonna stop at raiders!"

"NOT STOP!" They picked up the line with a raising of mugs.

"Not any more! She's guilty, and now somepony can give her some of her own method! No more gun-happy mare shooting up the place!"

I couldn't believe what I was hearing.

"No more stupid Dweller riling up the raiders and giving us hell!"

How... how dare they...

All day, I'd found ponies who didn't believe in heroes, ponies who had lost faith in legends. I'd fought and driven myself to near insanity in an effort to keep clinging onto some hope. I was not hearing this now!

"No more false 'hero' only making things worse!"

Why did everypony think that? No, she... wasn't! Legends could exist! They could! THEY COULD! What was wrong with everypony to stay so bad?

"Nothing but a murderer herself! Red Eye should get her back in here! The corrupted pony!"

Well I had had enough of it.

"HOW DARE YOU!"

The words screamed from my throat so hard that I felt my vocal chords go raw and sore. But they heard me, heads turned. I rushed forward, feeling Glimmerlight fail to restrain me. Galloping between the tents, I ran into the crowd, standing near the barrels amongst a hundred staring eyes.

"How can you all say that!? Can't anypony see? Everypony keeps saying she's turned or gone bad. She's good! She is! You should trust in her!"

They regarded me with distaste.

"Shut up, runt!"

"Get lost! She's just a shitty shade of grey like any of us! Get over yourself!"

I hopped onto the base of the trolley rack, moving up its bend roof until I was slightly above them, shouting to merely be heard above their voices. The arc of scowling slaves surrounded me, all looking up at me screaming at them.

"I... I saw her! How can you all just sit here and cheer about this? The Stable Dweller is trying to help the world to make this sort of stuff stop! Why can't you all see that? She's trying to help you! She's trying to help everypony! Please, listen to me!"

I looked left and right, but I saw ponies just wave their hooves and jeer. An empty can flew past my head. Seething, I tried again.

"The wasteland just wants everypony to give in and be horrible to one another! She tried to do something about it. But you all, while in this hellhole, keep saying that's the wrong thing? She's stopped raiders! She saved slaves!"

"I don't see my life changing, did she stop to save us? She just ran away for herself and a fucking stripe!"

"She's trying! She..."

The words were soul crushing to have to admit, that I wasn't under her protection...

"...she can't save everypony." I forced myself to go on, feeling those words sting. "Not if they don't want to be saved! I heard you all in the Pit, screaming for her to be killed like some bloodsport! Why can't you all just see that she's trying to be good and you all need to help out? She's the one last good pony really doing something out there and you all belittle her for it! How is that anything like Equestria? HOW!?"

That got their attention, and a silence followed. Stomping a hoof, tears in my eyes, I kept going, feeling my whole body shaking with nerves, fear, and outright adrenaline.

"So many ponies have died trying to save our world. They all try so hard, and sometimes they fail or go bad! I've seen them, I've seen the past! I've heard the stories of Red Eye. How many could have gone further if other people, not just ponies, had stood together instead of always fighting? They... they cried like me, they fought so hard, and it didn't matter! Because it's not one pony who changes everything. They can only show the way and inspire! Like she inspired me! Gave me a life I never had before! She showed you all the same thing! Why can't you see that? Why can't you see anything beyond just yourselves!?"

I sniffed, tears dripping off the pillar, falling below into the burning smoke that stung my eyes.

"Why can't we all just be better ponies? The Stable Dweller, she's... she's what we should be! How can you celebrate the bad and try to knock down the good? We're all ponies inside. Can't you feel that longing to be a part of a good Equestria again? That need we all have? That little spark in all of us that knows this is wrong? Ponies like The Master try to turn us against one another, and feed the fires of hatred and discord to all of us. She is trying to restore what we once were!"

"She murdered a whole fucking village!"

"I knew ponies there!"

"She's just a fucking psychopath! Least now we know it!"

I screamed back, feeling this quickly becoming a trading of barbs and denials.

"No she isn't!"

"SHE IS!"

"She wouldn't! I believe she wouldn't!"

From within the smoke, a half brick clanged off the metal beneath me.

"You're just talkin' bullshit, kid! She's a fucking raider now! Always was and just lying!"

"But she's good! She's trying to save all of— OW!"

A pebble, propelled by telekinesis, struck my forehead. A mug hit the lip of the trolley rack, and sloshed filthy water on me. More items pinged or struck off me. Another rock hit my chest, making me almost fall. I was simply shrieking, hollering. The wind swirled the ash and smoke around, making the crowd seem like one horrible entity, shifting and heaving as a singular force. Like I was seeing the physical manifestation of the wasteland itself before my eyes, recoiling and sneering at any effort to fight it.

"She's trying to save all of us! ALL OF US! PLEASE, BELIEVE ME, SHE— ARGH!"

Flaming wood crashed again upon the pillar, I almost tripped. Terror was overtaking the faithful will to try and convince the crowd.

I had to believe, to have faith that this would work.

"I... I'LL PROVE IT! IT'S ALL A LIE! That all this stuff on the radio is just a mistake!"

They stopped only briefly, my bruised but defiant body standing above them. I pulled my PipBuck from my bag, strapped it to my hoof and began pressing the buttons to get to the radio, whispering gently to myself.

"Please, please Littlepip. I believe in you. Have this be solved, have the truth come out now. Please DJ, please Goddesses... I need this as much as anypony else..."

I took a deep breath, and threw my hoof in the air, cranking the volume to maximum.

"Now, all of you just LISTEN!"

A straggly static washed across the area, before I heard the DJ's wonderful voice break through.

"—Wastelanders. We have, right now for the first time since Arbu... an update on the incident for all those who missed my last news..."

Yes! The newscast at the perfect time, this could work!

Everypony beneath seemed stunned at the seemingly prophetic timing, glancing upward with wide eyes.

"News is slow filtering back but... but I'm sorry to say..."

My heart stopped.

"It's happened again. Another settlement has gone lights out, close to Arbu. But this time it's no defenceless village. It's that bastion of the Steel Rangers themselves, Bucklyn Cross. Lost with all ponies, they're saying. No pony got out alive after the Stable Dweller's band were seen heading there..."

All the sound in the world stopped, the crowd didn't matter as I felt every emotion in my heart collapse. But one thought forced my head to turn away from the slowly angering crowd. Beside the tents, at the side, through the fires, I saw Glimmerlight standing in abject shock, looking at my PipBuck. Her eyes filled with tears immediately, her legs trembling, the horror upon her face actually painful to take in.

"Ah don't know what to think of this, my little ponies. Another whole group of folks, Rangers or not... it's just not right. All reports say it simple. Far as we know right now, no pony in Bucklyn Cross survived the massacre."

I could see her mouth moving...

"Bucklyn Cross... Mom... Dad..."

Every ounce of motivation was sucked clean out of me at that sight.

She took off, running through the crowds into the darkness. At the same time, a pain exploded across my face as a halfbrick slammed into my temple. The shock threw me off, almost falling into a fiery barrel until I grabbed the edge and swung myself clear. The jeering, the shouting and betrayed horror that drove their anger was worse than ever, and I had just offered myself as a target.

Under a barrage of projectiles, I covered my face as everything from stones to old boots clanged and whizzed past me.

I could have worried about them... I could have feared for my life at being seen. But all I knew was that Glimmer needed somepony. I saw her galloping, away into the Mall to escape everything. Shouting, I pulled myself to my feet, muscles aching... running after her, tearing away from the angry slaves.

"Glimmer!" There was no reply. "GLIMMER!"

Passing inside, I saw her stumble on the stairs, grief driving her to be barely able to see through misted eyes. I rushed up to her side.

"I... I'm sorry! There's some mistake or... or lies or—"

"NO!" Her hoof pushed me off, a face filled with anguish and furious sadness spinning on me. "That's it! That is... it! Once is something to be wary about, but a second time!? Murky, that's the proof. It had to have been her!"

"She wouldn't!"

"She damn well did, Murk!"

I wasn't sure what stung me more: that my friend believed this, or that in her anger she'd reverted to... to what others called me...

"Bucklyn Cross was a fortress! My... my mom wouldn't be killed off by some random raider, she was a Paladin! It had to have been her! They were too powerful to go down! Twice in a row... can't you see? I'm so sorry, Murky... she's fallen..."

I stomped my two front hooves, refusing to let her believe this.

"No she hasn't! Littlepip wouldn't—"

"You can say that all you like but it doesn't change anything, Murky! Wake up and smell the ashes, don't try to defend her to me here! She's just murdered my fucking parents! You can't follow somepony like this! That mare isn't what you thought, I'm sorry—"

"I don't believe that!"

We stood facing each other, her higher on the stairs than myself. The dull glow of Fillydelphia, lingering crimson and reflecting everything that came forth... the conflicted belief and anger.

"She's the one that gave me hope, Glimmer! She saved my life!"

"She saved herself. You just got caught up in it, believe in us, Murky! Not some mare out there! How can... how can you dare speak good of her after what she did? Two settlements, dozens of innocents, and my own mom and dad? Oh no..."

We both stopped, breathing heavily. Our eyes wouldn't blink, wouldn't move from the other. But finally, I saw Glimmer step back and snort.

"Perhaps you shouldn't be around me for a while. If you're going to praise high and fucking mighty the mare that just killed my folk. Too many times to be a coincidence now, and while you wear that PipBuck like her and carry a statue of her with that childish belief... I don't think I want to be around you. Not for now, at any rate, not till you... not till you realise what you're..."

Her voice trailed off, and I saw just how torn up she was inside.

"But—"

I stopped myself as her words only just hit home.

She shook her heads, her soaked cheeks glinting in the red light.

"I know you're still trying figure things out and... and to go through, but no, I can't just... not now. Look at it from my side, Murky. I'm seeing somepony I considered a friend telling me my parents' killer is some perfect pony. But till then I think you should just go."

She turned past me to walk onward.

"Go hide and s-stay safe, because so help me I can't bring myself to want anything bad to happen to you. I don't want to be the one that hurts you if you stay around, preaching her name to my face when I just lost my parents! We'll... maybe we'll meet later but... but for now just... just... go."

Glimmerlight began to trot on into the Mall, her voice cracking under wracking sobs on the last few words. I... I didn't... what did I... what could I say? I...

"...Sis?"

"Don't even think of calling me that right now."

Her head low, filled with tears, she galloped off into the musky corridors. Somehow, seeing her go, feeling the weight of the argument with her, I found myself falling to the stairs in great sobs. My front hooves wrapped around my head, I could only remember the times we had laughed together, played and bantered. The times we'd saved one another's lives and... and been chosen siblings...

Was it gone?

Silence lay across the lonely stairwell, populated only by me.

Instead of helping an ally, I'd just lost a sister.

I don't know how long I lay, crying into my hooves. I'd... I'd hurt her, somehow and I didn't even know how. I had to believe in Littlepip. If I stopped, then that was it. She was my foundation, but... but my belief in her was hurting a pony near me who thought otherwise.

Hooves approached, from back the way Glimmer had gone. Trotting close, I felt the presence of somepony above me.

Gently... slowly, I felt a hoof ruffle my mane, exactly as she did. She... she was...

"I'm sorry!" I wailed with my eyes closed. "I... I'm so sorry!"

Then I opened my eyes and looked up... to see my own staring back at me. Light green... my mouth began to widen to scream.

"Oh, you will be." The Master leered down from above me.

My hooves screamed into action, but it was far too late. A weight descended as I felt it clamp around my neck, the collar dropping hard and snapping shut before locking. Kicking out, I ran anyway, before my neck tugged and jarred to a halt, throwing my hooves from below me.

Lying on my side, thrashing, but being dragged all the same across the ground into the Mall, I could only scream and scream, accompanied by the triumphant laughter of My Master.

"Please... if anypony out there knows something, anything, let us here at the radio know. You know I don't like sounding emotional on here, wastelanders, but hope's been taken from us. I imagine there's a lot of folks out there clustering around their radios, waiting for it to be renewed. There'll be a lot of hurt ponies who need her back, need that light in their lives..."

I don't pretend to ignore that some poor little wishful pony's life out there might rely on it.

So I plead of you, wasteland. Find anypony... anypony with a little information on what happened. Because I'll wager there's a lot of folks depending on it right about now to save them.

Let me bring them the truth, no matter how bad it hurts."

Like Father, Like Son

“Does The Master really want progress, or does he just want slavery?”

“What... what is it like to be his slave?”

My greatest fear. To be trapped forever. It was finally coming true.

The collar snapped shut and with it, so did many of my hopes and dreams. The weight around my neck only drew the slave in my mind to the fore. He had me. His. His own. But I just... I couldn't think about anything other than how I'd managed to hurt one of my friends the moment that she'd needed me to be there for her most. Hearing Glimmerlight tell me to just... go. That wracked my heart in ways no slaver ever could.

Very quickly, everything was beginning to fall away from me. Every step after that one glorious moment of feeling like I'd done something by ending Barb's riot had only led me farther and farther away from the ponies I knew and loved. With them leaving, being taken from me, or turning out to... to not be what I thought they were.

That's all I could think of, amidst all of my screaming and begging, I could only feel the pain of losing the friendships I'd worked and suffered so hard to attain. All the toil, constant running, and desperate attempts to survive had been taking their toll. By the time he found me, I was already weak with a lack of proper rest and ripe for him to... to...

Sorry... I... I just need a minute...

“It's alright, sorry. You probably don't want to—”

No! I... I want to, I'm just... scared. I said before how scared I am of him, the way he's always there in my life in some way or another.

But this was it. I was now his... his...

“Slave?”

Yes.

Just a wretched trophy, the born slave, the crippled pegasus, the pony with a set of shackles as his cutie mark. The ultimate symbol to all those around him of what I represented, to all his peers of why he was the real slaver and a reminder to all ponies in Fillydelphia of just how they were trapped. That even those with wings were grounded and held deep within the bowels of the fiery industry. You couldn't escape Fillydelphia. Never ever could. Not unless you were already outside the Wall, or some sort of legendary figure like Littlepip.

Of course... the idea of legends was fast fading from my mind, held only by a tenuous belief, one born of hope.

I had fallen so far. Bereft of friends and weak of body, he saw the momentary weakness and pounced. He knew it wouldn't take much, that he only needed to push a little, get into my head and start to mould me back into what I had once been. I didn't want it, the idea of the chains snapping shut once again and casting me into the never ending blur of true slavery makes my heart beat and my head pound... it always does. I was about to be thrown through his world, subject to his whims and fancies and little more than a living toy with which he could sate his appetite for control and power over all others around him. But... I was so vulnerable... crying out for a purpose and a direction that... that I...

"...no... you didn't."

I started to believe him.

"I..."

I'm sorry. I'm so, so sorry, but this is the truth of it! You ask what it's like under him? Well this is the reality! The darkest days, as I said. He wouldn't let my life be anything but controlled.

But there was one little hope in my mind. Just... just one direction that mattered. The one thing I would not let him take from my dreams. Glimmerlight. I needed to... to get to her, say whatever I needed to and... and just do something to make it all fine again! I didn't know how. I hadn't known what it was like to lose somepony until the day before then with Caduceus and even then... much as it hurts to say, I hadn't really 'known' him. I just had to try.

That's... that's all that I had to go on.

"But, what about your escape? Didn't you want to escape? That driving force? Surely you didn't forget about..."

He... he told me to...

"...oh no..."

My neck was jerked, the bones of my neck along my spine jumped and felt like the gaps were separating far further than they should have as the collar tugged hard enough to pull me from all four hooves.

"Keep up!"

Choking out a strangled gasp, my front hooves pawed helplessly at the thick metal as it pulled again...

"I said KEEP UP, SLAVE!"

The chain jolted, biting upward into my neck and cutting off my windpipe. Thrashing, fighting to get my hooves under me, he gave me no quarter to think. Pulling me again and again, dragging me, pull by pull, down the corridors against all my efforts.

He would stride ahead, stomping his way through the Mall and yank the chain every time my weakened body fell behind. My head swam with terror, both for Glimmerlight and myself. We'd been in circles multiple times as he toured the Mall, observing the slaves. My only breaks were when he'd stopped to punish somepony else. Gradually, bit by bit, it had all become a blur. A couple desperate steps... followed always by that tug of my collar. My neck was already reddened and sore, bruising badly and becoming ever more painful to simply have on. Sores blistered over around where it hung.

There was no purpose to it other than the continual reminder of who I was and to demonstrate to everypony else that he had me. The entire time, I simply watched for Glimmer when I could, desperate to at least be able to shout two words, the two words I knew I had to say...

"Keep up!"

I was moving quickly, but only choked as I was pulled onto my face again, before being dragged another twenty feet for falling. My Master was just a giant blurry form to my oxygen starved and dizzied perception now. Occasionally I'd just see those light green eyes staring and try to get back up.

How... how long were we going to go on? I couldn't... I... I couldn't cope with...

"Keep UP!"

The chain tugged, my neck whiplashed and pulled me to my hooves to begin another circuit... carried along for no reason other than to remind me of my place.

"Inside, Number Seven! Go!"

"W-what's in— ARRGH!"

I cried from being picked up by the chain and hurled through a door. I hit something hard and wooden, collapsing upside down onto my head. My fleece caught on something and tore, the saddlebag landing beneath me as I rolled to the side and scampered backward into a desk before curling up, trying to pull the collar away from my rapidly worsening throat.

It was his office. I... I'd seen this before! My eyes spotted the ventilation duct above I'd once spied Barb and My Master from. The same heavy desk that I'd landed on... the same low and filthy bed... but now I could see more. Filing cabinets, taken from other places, were now ranked along the sides. Another two doors went away from the old office, leading to two private interview rooms, I guessed. A metal grated and heavily locked cage cupboard bore the weapons I had seen him use now and again. The walls were of rotted old wood and peeling wallpaper while I saw chains hanging from sharp hooks alongside a mass of items. All entrapment, all to restrict and prevent somepony moving in some way. The corners bore simple refuse and old clothing. This was as far from the calm library of Protégé as I could ever be...

But my eyes quickly turned back to him as I scrambled away from the desk, breathing hard and fast as I scampered for the back of the room... pressing myself into a little ball in the corner to be as far away from him as possible.

My Master strode into his own office. He was wearing a grin of absolute satisfaction as he advanced to the centre and kept his eyes trained at me. Chains swung from around his neck, attached to me. A thick whip hung from his armour. Slowly, with delight, he closed the door behind us.

Filling my vision in the smaller office, he advanced on those giant hooves until his bulk covered the meagre green lamp in the corner. Then he... he just stood there... watching as I shivered and felt more and more afraid as the length went on. For minutes or... was it an hour? How did time work here? I didn't know! He just kept staring and making me afraid every time he took a breath that he might speak or do something to me. Oh Goddesses help me!

"I'll let you off for forgetting the word 'Master' this once, Number Seven. Finally... oh, finally... you're right here."

The words slid from his mouth like creeping touches to my skin, making me whine and plea under my breath as he began to move forward. With a retch of my aching throat, I was pulled upward, his hoof wrapping around the chains to lift me up before him right off the ground. I struggled in the air, my hooves holding the collar to lift my neck up from it to... to be able to breathe! He... he was hanging me with my own collar! My hind legs kicked out fruitlessly off the floor, seeing little silver spots in my vision before I closed my eyes.

"You've defied me... ran from me... tried to keep other ponies from me. Oh you will be sorry for this, slave. Oh... you will. Eventually."

He dropped me. I fell at his hooves, coughing and spluttering before just curling up at his hooves, gasping and retching. The reality of it all was sinking in. Please... somepony be there! Brimstone could come back or... or Protégé could turn up at the door or... or anypony please!

"Look at your Master when he is talking, Number Seven!"

A hoof swung backward and caught me across the face, throwing me back into the wall as My Master advanced. I felt my cheek bleed, and I obeyed. My eyes shot upward to gaze upon him... and I felt sick at the mere sight.

"Well... it may come as a surprise to you, Number Seven. But I don't torture ponies..."
...h-huh?

"Surprised?"

I nodded, then squeaked, remembering. "Yes, Master!"

"No... no... I don't torture ponies. I'm a slaver, Number Seven. I only punish them. Now that we finally have a little, heh, private time... knowing you're mine. So we can get along with making you into what you're meant to be. Wouldn't you like to finally find your destiny? Accepting your punishment like a good little pony and coming back home where you know your place, eh? Don't you want to feel the comfort of knowing who you are again?"

He moved around the desk, his eyes never leaving me. Soaked by my own tears, I kept moving away, until I found myself pressed up against the bed.

"I... want to be free, Master..." My voice felt tiny, a shrill whisper against his commanding tone.

"So selfish. Want doesn't get, Number Seven. Oh no... this is your destiny right here!" His hoof thundered onto the desk, making it shake terribly. "By my side! My little pet! Don't you like that?"

"Please just let me—"

"BE QUIET, SLAVE!" The chain tugged hard, and my scream was cut short by the pressure on my neck. Trying to turn over, a gigantic hoof pressed down across my chest and belly, forcing me onto my back as his face leered down from above and slowly grew closer with every word. His other hoof slapped against one of my cutie marks, demeaning and invasive upon my body and hard enough that I cried out every time. “THIS IS WHAT YOU ARE!”

My ears burned, the bellowing inches from my face. I couldn't close my eyes, feeling my chest crushed under his weight. I shivered at the horrid sensation of spittle dripping or being spat over my face. The stench of rancid sweat and rotten breath wafted over me. But his face softened, losing its anger. Eventually, he even eased off my chest.

Harsh and then backing off for a few seconds. I was being toyed with.

“Perhaps we just need to find the best way for you to realise it, little Number Seven. You've drifted from your place in life. You've let the raider and the whore fill your brain with ideas you were never meant for. Let some little mare out there give you hope that was always going to be crushed. Perhaps we should let you see what life I can give you...”

He raised up, allowing me to once again retreat away. I could feel something dripping near the pain on my neck. A stray tear? Spit? Blood!?

My Master wandered back to his desk, his hoof touching objects across it idly, before his eyes snapped back.

“Did I say you could lie down, slave?”

“No, Master!” I actually cried in pain as I pushed injured limbs under me, driven past pain by obedience to stand up rock still.

“Better... now, as I was saying, Number Seven. You probably think I'm going to torture you, be some sadistic slaver that hurts you every day for his own sick amusement. But you'd be wrong. Your punishment will come eventually. For now, you are going to begin your time as my personal slave.”

My mind was hurting. Well, my skull was hurting, but it pretty much meant the same thing. What kind of trick was this? I had expected the water torture again... or... or to be sent to his mines. Or worse. But I could barely think straight. My vision kept hazing, my fears for Glimmerlight still aching away in my head alongside the gut clenching terror that I was locked to My Master.

“Nooo... no. As I said, Number Seven, I'm not a torturer. I just...” He paused, before cackling and sneering at me, staring down from his massive height. “...command. I only punish those who don't follow. Everypony is a slave, Number Seven, some just don't know it yet. So you will follow what I say. Now, admit what you are, and perhaps we might lessen your punishment for disobeying me and running away.”

It hurt more than I could ever imagine to let the words come out, but I had no choice here.

“A... a slave, Master...”

Crack! I stumbled and screamed, the wooden floor chipping as the whip struck it. How did he use it so fast?

“You are not ANYPONY'S slave! WHAT ARE YOU?”

“Your slave! Your... your slave, Master! Your...” I felt the tears keep rolling down my cheeks, the bitter words coming out as hatefully as if I were throwing up. “...slave.”

My Master's smile only increased... his chest swelling as he heard the reference to ownership. I wanted to be sick. The feel of a whip cracking had thrown me back in line, making me say what I'd thought for a moment was true. I was so scared that my teeth ached from being pressed together.

“Then it is time you began to act it. You are mine now. You will follow me, be my personal slave. You will keep your collar on at all times! You will remain in my office. You will sleep here when I tell you that you may. You will only eat what I give you. Your life is mine now. But at some point, you-REMAIN STILL!"

I bolted upright from where I had been dizzily swaying, standing almost to attention.

"So first, you're going to perform a task for me while I finish the rounds for the day. I didn't expect you to so kindly return to me, Number Seven, so you've interrupted my schedule. Get over here."

Trembling, I started to—

"NOW!"

I galloped forward, stopping short of the desk, shivering and sore. The chain jangled no matter when I moved. Literally every movement of my own was reminding me that I was attached to him. That thought alone turned my stomach.

What he had for me was completely beyond anything I could have predicted, of all the horrible imagined pains, it defied every one of them.

"I want you to organise this room, Number Seven. Before I come back, I want everything back somewhere that makes sense. All the spare ammo on the ground sorted, the chains stacked on their rings, and the papers organised on the desk. You will clean for me and you will do it promptly. We'll break you in softly, eh? Hehe..."

"I... I understand, Master..." The words stammered out weakly, caught by the pressure around my throat. It was a constant fight to not pull at it even while I stared, confused at the, well, easy task.

My Master leered down, before his hoof settled on my head. Gently running over an ear and curving across my scar down to my cheek, he lifted my head.

"You're where you should be, slave. Where you were always meant to be. Fillydelphia was always to be the climax of your life, where you would finally find your true Master. You can rest now. Relax and know you've found your true role in life. You've made it home."

The other hoof came up, grasping my other cheek and squeezing as his face leaned forward, pressing his forehead against mine. My body twitched. I wanted to struggle, but those eyes just stared and stared, holding me still.

"Now we're finally together, whether by blood or by destiny, you're where you always were meant to be. Just like when I found this city, I found where I was meant to be. We're bonded, you and I. You've turned out just how I always wished a pony would while I grew up. A little pony to own for myself, the one I wanted when I took her."

Tears were beginning to drop from my eyes. How... how dare he talk of that! The words alone stung and disgusted me. I didn't remember her but... but...

I... just wanted to cry alone. It wasn't true, I just couldn't face the thought of it. It wasn't true. I wasn't his!

His rancid breath washed over my face and made me oh-so-glad for my blocked nose. I just breathed shortly and sharply, not daring to speak out of turn to My Master. Finally, he leaned back, removing the chain from his armour and locking it to a thick hoop welded to a plate on the floor.

"Now... I'll leave you to your duty."

Chuckling, almost muttering a little tune to himself, he turned to the door before drawing a sealed box, from which he took a deep bowl. Immediately, I was hit with a waft of steam and a small wash of heat.

A smell hit my nostrils... even through the mucus blocking them I could detect it. A warm smell... rich and thick and fruity and... real food...

My Master pushed it toward me, right up to my hooves.

"I will return in under an hour. Get this task done."

There was no other response. "Yes, Master!"

"Good..."

With that, he turned, his massive bulk a poor fit for his own room as he blew out the lamp, sidled through the doorway, and slammed it behind him. The room fell into darkness and remained still. I heard at least three locks on the outside slam shut... and I was left alone in my collar... chained to the room itself. My ears heard him move away, stomping down the creaky floors to the stairwell and descending.

I waited only till I could not hear him before I leapt to the one providence. It killed me to obey him to eat when he told me to... but I couldn't turn it down.

Only, I had to. To eat was to put myself in danger.

Even as I lifted the bowl up, even as I smelled its wonderful contents and felt the radiating heat, I knew I had to refuse. It was a trap. He hadn't told me to eat it. He was just the sort to omit that on purpose.

Briefly, I was tempted anyway. I was starving. My stomach felt shrunk, and growled eagerly. My mind raced, could I take a lashing just to get food? Was it worth it? The thought lingered, feeling more and more alluring, until I placed the bowl exactly where it had been left.

That quaking thought of having to consider such drastic measures to merely eat let a lot of my situation really sink in.

The smell would haunt me all the while. A torture even in avoiding his ploy. I moved as far as I could from it. Technically, I should have started my work right away, but I just couldn't. Not... not after so much in so short a time. Gently lifting the heavy chain, almost as thick as one of my skeletal little legs itself, I just sighed and curled up on the spot, hearing the dull clanking of metal every time I moved. The entire situation was driving me to keep closing and opening my eyes in a desperate attempt to find that this nightmare wasn't real. I didn't want to do it... to do his work and fall into his world. Any minute now I'd wake up again. I'd scream and fall out of bed beside... beside Glimmer! She'd hug me and we'd feel better because we were... together...

...Glimmer...

Already, I missed her. Not like before... now I missed the knowledge that she'd be waiting with a tight hug and a teasy joke to make me smile through a blush. I missed the reassurance she brought to my life and the reminders of how we were all going to escape! I missed the knowledge that, no matter how bad it got, no matter what pain I endured, she'd always be there at the end.

I missed the feeling of being on the brink of freedom...

I missed my sister even more...

My eyes were already streaming before I even realised it. I didn't even fully understand what had happened. I kept playing the argument over and over in my mind. I'd tried to reassure her that Littlepip was good and that we'd all figure out this was just a mistake.

The chain clanked and dragged below my hooves as I pulled myself over to the first pile of cloth to sort out, fold, and place, well, somewhere. Part of me wondered why I'd been allowed to keep my PipBuck, saddle, and other possessions, but such things were trivial. Even if I could have fired my grapple to the airduct, I was still chained and collared to the floor with no method of breaking such thick locks and metal rings. Shivering in disgust, I began to pile and sort the warm, musty clothes and rags. I could already see tiny things crawling over them as I lifted them, making me whimper even as I shook them off.

My mind kept revolving about everything, finally settling on trying to think about the confrontation with Glimmer to get away from thinking about My Master. I had to figure out what to say first. I just wanted her to be happy and... and to feel better about things. Like she'd made me feel better when I told of how I'd lost my own moth—

That's when it finally made sense.

Pausing, I groaned and felt like a complete idiot. In my own frustration and desperation to have an idol, I'd been trying to calm her over Littlepip when she'd just lost friends and family! When I had mentioned my mother, she had hugged me and comforted me about my own grief. Guilt shot through me.

Glimmerlight had just likely lost everypony outside these walls that she'd ever known to go back to. It wasn't impossible they'd escaped, but it hardly mattered. Glimmer was only days out from losing Caduceus, and now this. Coral Eve's story was coming back to me. She too had lost her hope because everypony she knew or loved was either dead or now enslaved.

I threw my grief, guilt, and pain into the efforts, seeking anything to keep my mind off of losing my best friend ever because I'd been so... so stupid and out of touch with how normal ponies who aren't born damned slaves work! The chain in my hooves was thrown upward with force, bouncing from the wall and dropping. Again and again I threw it, screaming and shouting my anger and feelings at it. Exhausting myself, letting it all out, I eventually fell back against the wall and held my head.

I wished I could go back... go back and say it all differently. Littlepip meant so much to me, but I hadn't realised how it would feel to lose something I'd never had. My home.

Glimmer was going through something I couldn't possibly imagine right now, and I'd just completely ignored it.

Was... was this it then? Was this how it ended? All of us driven apart?

No, she wouldn't just... leave me, would she? They wouldn't go on their plan without me...

I summoned up all the courage I could to throw that feeling away. I wasn't going to stay here! I was scared, alone in a dark room and being kept like some sick pet, but step one was... was to find Glimmerlight. Find my sister, and... and somehow make it all better to get her back! I wasn't the same pony My Master had found in the FunFarm so long ago. I wouldn't just lie down and accept it this time! There were still some routes to get back in the saddle.

No. This was a... a set back.

I'd get out...

I turned back to the room filled with filthy and untidy objects. I'd been tasked to clean all of this up, but I knew my life wouldn't stay like this. The thought of being his forever simply enough to make me want to curl up, cry and do nothing until I simply died.

I'd make this work somehow.

I had to...

Even through the thick concrete walls and multiple floors above me, I could still hear the roar of thunder and the washing drone of the rain. Whatever storm was blanketing Fillydelphia was still more than present, shaking the very foundations of the Mall as it renewed itself in fury, casting its wrath down upon the darkened city. If I listened very carefully I could almost believe I heard the hissing as the water struck the forge fires surrounding the Mall. Trapped in a small room within darkness, I felt like it was all just crushing in from every side, with the cold seeping through the stone.

I couldn't simply remain still, though. My task was finished fairly quickly as I directed my rekindled heart into staying active. I'd often been instructed to do such menial work in the past, and compared to what I'd seen My Master's other slaves doing, I'd happily clean up his filthy office. I couldn't read his papers on the desk, but I had looked for patterns in their formats and gathered them together in a rough order before stacking them in little piles. I'd, with some degree of disgust, straightened out his bed and hung any stinking clothing in the cupboard he kept at the back. Out of curiosity, I'd tried the two doors, but both had been kept locked. At the time, it had only seemed like something less for me to actually clean.

To and fro, clanking my way on that chain across the floor again and again. Muttering ideas on how to apologise to her. The words felt difficult. Not to say sorry, but how to make it mean the right things. Every time I found one idea, I lost the others or they no longer made sense. I wished somepony was here to help me with them...

Caduceus would likely have known. He'd been a smart pony.

In desperation, I pulled out my journal to try and... and do anything. For long minutes, I trembled and hopelessly attempted to make even a vague pony shape. But it just wasn't happening. Every leg was too long, every eye mismatched with the other one. Problems that just wouldn't go away. A feral ghoul would have looked more like a normal pony... let alone who I really wanted to draw.

It... it just wasn't happening. So it was true then... I'd lost the one little talent I'd always sought refuge in. In a sudden rage, I threw the journal closed and stuffed it deep into my saddlebag before turning my back on it. At... at least I could still cry to let it out...

The thought to try the radio came to me, but I didn't even get to my PipBuck before the fear of what I might hear began to ring in my mind. What if it was Tenpony Tower next? Or Friendship City? What if I heard news that a slave camp near Shattered Hoof had been slaughtered by the Stable Dweller with... with all ponies dead?

A thick stomping began to echo around the hallways. My ears twitched gently at the sound before shivers began to roll through me. There was only one place he could be coming...

I'd finished the work well on time, not even realising how long I'd spent rubbing a cloth over everything with numb, bleach-stained hooves. The shock of finding how easily I'd slipped into the blurry routine of slavery was like a bucket of cold water being dropped over me. But now I only had to wait, hope, pray, and fear for what came next. The thick clank of heavy locks thudded in through the door. Reasserting myself, I fixed up a crease at the end of his bed, hid away everything I'd been using, and painfully galloped to the middle of the room to stand upright and ready like every good slave should when his Master approaches. The feeling of having to do so sickened me. My own body lay in ruin from my throat, sickness, weariness, and bleeding cheek... yet his office was now tidy and clean.

At least I could still consciously know I hated it. That was something. If I were to survive what was... oh Goddesses... what was coming, I'd need every little thing I could to hold onto in my head.

Light flooded the room amongst an ear-splitting creak of the oak door's old metal hinges. I lowered my head and bowed slightly as I saw the massive shape in the corridor light.

My Master walked in. I fought down the urge to shiver, as he immediately locked the door behind him. It was a silent little conflict against the crawling I felt under my skin, not helped by his eyes swinging back to me. As he passed around me, I didn't dare move my head. I heard him fuss over his desk... smooth a hoof on his bed... check the cupboards and rattle the jars I'd used to sort the spare shotgun shells he'd left lying around. Please... please be satisfied... please be okay with it, Master...

The trotting carried on behind me, moving close enough that I could almost feel him against me. Screwing my eyes shut against his uncomfortable closeness, I just stifled the growing whimper in my throat.

"I see you haven't forgotten how to do basic slave work, Number Seven." The words were low, almost muttered and carrying a quietly stern tone, "You work well with my things. Hmm, almost like you were meant to be doing this, eh?"

My Master finished his tour of the room, coming to stand before me. I'd wanted to protest that last sentence... tell him that I'd never be a slave again. But the instinctive slave in my mind knew far better what I was supposed to say...

"I... tried my best, Master..."

"Mm... that you did. Good... good."

His eyes travelled back to me, before passing to something on the floor.

"Then..." his voice took a terrifying drop in tone, "...would you explain to me why you disobeyed me already?"

A cold stab of fear shot through my spine. I staggered back, hearing the chain clatter around.

"I... I didn't! I did it all as you asked, Master! I— ARGH!"

He had grabbed the chain, wrapping it around a hoof and dragging me toward him, before simply hurling me into the far wall. Screaming, I slapped against it, cracking the plaster and falling to the ground in a shower of paint flakes and dust. Seconds later, something was thrown across the room, impacting on my hooves as they covered my face before I felt myself lifted and pushed against the wall by my chest. My Master's face glowered closely.

The thrown item was lifted in his other hoof... held before my eyes. The... the stew bowl...

"I provided you with a warm meal, and you ignored it like the little rebel you are! Wasted food, Number Seven!"

My mind rebelled as the sudden realisation sank home. He... he hadn't! He'd just put it near me... he hadn't... oh... oh no... no no no!

"N-no...Maste—" I was cut off, again by a scream as the bowl crashed over my head hard enough to crack it and spill its lukewarm contents over me. My left forehead, from my eye to my ear along the swollen scar, ached and stung under the impact. Dizzied, I slumped against his hoof with my vision reeling.

"Insolence!" His words were almost making me go deaf already, my ears unable to handle the close volume. "You ignored it to try and insult me, Number Seven!"

I tried to squeak my apologies, every thin leg struggling against his one gigantic hoof that seemed to cover my entire torso. But he was having none of it.

The stark truth was becoming clear. Whether I'd taken it or not, the result would have been the same. There was no right answer here with this monster.

“Stand up, slave...”

I weakly strove to obey, clutching my now bleeding forehead. Wearily, I opened my eyes to look at him.

“I’m sorry. I’m sorry, Master...”

“Silence. It isn’t up to you to be sorry. Do you not remember what I told you? I don’t torture. I simply punish those slaves who do not know their place. The ones who have drifted from their role in life. How many times do I need to repeat this to you, Number Seven?”

His voice wasn’t shouting. It was those times he scared me the most. When he simply trotted back and forth around the room, speaking as though in deep thought.

His eyes finally settled on me, regarding everything.

“These...’things’ you carry around. Gifts... toys of a spirit you do not truly own and clothing that hides your shame beneath it. Remove them. Strip. You disobeyed... now I need to remind you of some things.”

I bit my lip, suddenly breathing a lot faster. But I felt my hoof moving to the clasp of my saddlebag... steadily shivering over the fastening.

“Too slow, Number Seven! I said STRIP! You do not own those things.”

Squeaking with terror, I felt myself obeying, sniffing as I dropped my saddlebag and pulled my goggles from my head. Struggling and shivering, falling to my side, I tugged my fleece and attached saddle over my head, revealing my bandaged wings and feeling horribly vulnerable and exposed. But the sight as I brought my head out only gave rise to a sudden shock of tears and begging.

My Master had unfastened his heavy whip... letting it uncoil onto the floor.

“Throw it all behind you, slave...”

My quaking hooves just crept over my face. The shouted repeat of the command made me do it.

“Now turn around.”

I could barely stand, hearing the drip of tears off the floor as my hearing seemed to become more perceptive from sheer instinct and fear. I could feel the sweat rolling over me.

“Turn. Around.”

I almost fell, shivering on the spot with my eyes clenched shut as I slowly rotated.

“Please...”

“Silence. You earned this, Number Seven... the moment you thought you had a will to make your own choice. I control your life. You will obey, even if you feel you won’t. But you’ll learn over time...”

I heard the hiss of the whip being drawn back. I closed my eyes tightly.

“You’ll learn...”

I didn’t dare open my eyes.

My Master had a meeting soon, one I was to attend with him. I had time to do things. But I didn’t dare open my eyes.

He had opened one of the doors of his office to reveal a cell. The walls thick and lined with sharp edged metal plates and mouldy tile. The floorboards were gone, revealing nothing but ruined concrete that resembled hewn rock. The moment I'd been thrown in there to wait and 'think about my place in life'... I hadn't dared open my eyes.

I simply lay, feeling my back and rump swell and swell with growing pain. Feeling the dull throb of pain growing to a searing burn that twisted and surged all across my skin. Feeling the dread helplessness all over again of being ordered to stand still and take it... no matter how much I'd shrieked and begged. I wanted to see the damage... it felt like my back's skin had been flayed clean from my body as I felt trickles of blood flow beneath the swollen lines and thin slitted cracks where my skin had split. At least I could ignore one command. I could still cry. My one hidden rebellion. But I didn't dare open my eyes.

The door had slammed shut and left me to 'think about my place in life,' alone in a soundproofed cell with nought but the cold stone and the hot pain to feel. No ambient light to see by. I'd curled up, seeking to take comfort by hugging myself into as little a ball as I could, but the movement had opened every wound in my back. The scream as I'd felt that had echoed in the tiny space. This cell was so small that I... I dared not open my eyes.

I couldn't see... couldn't hear... couldn't go anywhere.

So, I had retreated inside. Closed my eyes and tried to remember the things I liked. But all I could remember was stroke after stroke after stroke. Each one feeling different. Every single time giving rise to a snapshot of my past flickering in my mind's eye. Of rock farms and cart pulling. Of punishments and long shifts. Of obedience through fear and acceptance through hopelessness. I had retreated inside to try and escape it to the past and remember the gentle world I'd seen so little of and bring all my friends and heroes into with me. To open my eyes... to see the truth...

I couldn't handle that.

So I dared not open my eyes.

I simply dared to dream.

The Mall had changed. Being dragged out and chained to My Master once more, I had been led around at his heel with my head low. But I had glimpsed at the stripping down of what had once been Protégé's work.

Now it was simply becoming the same nightmare I had seen elsewhere already.

My Master tugged me to keep up, something I was quickly learning was more like an exhausting half-gallop than a simple canter. Half tripping over my own hooves, I was taken upstairs for his final checks before leaving. Every little step was renewing my back's pain.

"You will remember your lesson for hours... days, perhaps, slave." He had told me that as we'd left the room and I had begun whimpering in pain.

The corridors had been tunnelled out in places now, knocked down to create a maze of additional routes through offices and store rooms. Whether it was more efficient or simply more to My Master's preference was unknown. But I saw slaves toiling away under gunpoint to hammer out the brickwork and thick concrete while others dragged in metal boxes full of tools and disassembled workbenches. What was he planning here?

The slaves and slavers all turned to look at me. They looked at me... my wings... my scars... my collar. Some laughed. Some grinned. Some just looked glad it wasn't them.

None showed any form of pity. Either they didn't care or they didn't dare.

Eventually, after many sets of stairs, we emerged onto the main balcony I had once been thrown from in the plaza. Oh... how it had changed. My Master permitted me to gaze over the edge and see what had been started.

The Plaza balconies were blocked by sheets of rusted chicken wire now, razor wire running around the edges to dissuade anyone attempting to pry it off. Each shop cell was being converted into a true prison. Thicker bars were being welded in and the doors kept locked as I saw the slaves being led back into the Mall. In small groups, they were assigned cells and shut in tightly. Others were being dragged out, often looking dead on their feet. I saw whips slash across necks, backs, and rumps of those who were slow in dragging themselves up... only reminding me of my own burning wounds. My knees felt weak enough to want to fall from the searing feeling... but I couldn't... if I did, he'd only whip me more.

Behind the fountain lurked a new item... a small incinerator. Thick, bulky, and with four small gates to the furnace inside, ponies were throwing scraps of wood into it. I was almost sick on the spot as I saw a small commotion around a cell turn into the guards simply throwing a corpse into it. She just hadn't woken up.

The smoke carried upward, belching through the hole in the ceiling that had been covered over with a cage again. But I could already see the smog collecting on the upper levels where slaves covered their mouths with cloth and lay in coughing heaps. Craters, bullet holes, and battle damage still ravaged the area, but the worst craters in the floor had been dug out and turned into more of the curious confinement cells covered by cages or sheet metal.

Even as I watched, I saw one buck dragged across the ground, thrashing in panic before being hurled into one. Immediately after they slammed the lid shut, I heard a squealing shriek and a horridly high pitched wail beside the panicked sound of hooves fighting to scramble up a sheer rock surface. My skin crawled at the sound.

"Now you see a true bastion of slavery, Number Seven." My Master grabbed my head, keeping my eyes forward. "The slavers command! The slaves obey! The disobedient are punished! This is how things should be run. Doesn't this look familiar? Feel like somewhere you know so very well?"

I hated his questions. They were cruel and obvious in their intent. He knew that I hated it... but if I denied it he'd... he'd do things...

The will to shout at how sick he was in the head was overwhelming. I'd once thought he was simply monstrous in his overbearing nature, but now I knew he was not sane. His methods were changing, this wasn't even slavery as I'd seen it. There was no end goal here. It was just control, and nothing but that.

But instead, I simply nodded. "Y-yes... Master."

"Mm... feels like home. Welcome to your new life." He paused, then grinned. "Hehe... look who it is. Recognise anypony?"

He wrenched my head enough that I cried out and would have fallen but for him holding me as the movement tugged every bleeding lash upon my back. My eyes were pointed down into the plaza. Blinking and trying to focus, I felt a sudden shock and will to leap into it pass through me.

Glimmer!

She was being roughly handled by a slaver, dragged in alongside three soot stained slaves. They were pressed toward her old cell, now newly locked over. But I could see she barely put up any real resistance, allowing herself to be led and tossed around with a lot less of the spirit I'd once known from my friend. I could see her hooves were frayed and sore from some form of physical labour and her back bore the dull marks of heavy weight pulling. But something else was becoming apparent. Her cheeks were flushed and her movements... dizzy. Like some sort of fever...

"Yes... your once friend. We've had her working all those proper shifts she missed after the welkin only gave her work repairing technology. She's been cast to proper work now, carting materials from the crater teams to the radiation engine Red Eye uses."

Radiation!? Then that meant it... it was a radfever! Poisoning! My Master must have seen the look on my face, for he just crudely cackled and patted me on the head with a hoof.

"Don't worry... if she learns to work hard and becomes sick enough we might give her a little RadAway... just to keep her working and not taking the easy way out. No pony escapes their duty until they've worked themselves for all they possibly can."

Panic was rising in my mind. I could see clearer and clearer than in the hours since I'd last seen her. Something had started to affect her badly. It must have been intense! She needed help but... but she couldn't take RadAway! It'd kill her!

I... I had to... do what? What could I do? I was even more trapped than her...

I wasn't given the chance to even shout to her. The collar pulled tight, choking any words from my throat before I could even gasp a breath to make a noise and dragging me to lie against My Master's leg. Unable to speak up, I saw her pink mane and dull red robes disappear into the old shop before her gate was slammed shut.

"P-p-please... Master... let me say so—"

His leg I was pulled against kicked out, knocking me on my side a good five feet away before the chain caught and stopped my slide just short of the edge. Again, I felt the raw skin on my throat tug and sting.

"You don't get to ask for things. Now... we have a meeting to attend at the Ministry of Arcane Science. Get up!"

Quickly, I obeyed, keeping my head low.

"Better... now, we—"

"Master! Master!"

A thin, nasally voice cut through, one I recognised all too well as his assistant. That scrawny thin pony that seemed to take care of any general paperwork and message carrying for My Master. Daring to lift my eyelids up a little, I saw him approach quickly and abase himself even faster, rather out of breath.

"I have somewhere to be, Wormtail. This had better be good..."

"I... phew... I bring news from... from Red Eye himself! He wants to speak with y-you, Master."

There was a brief silence. It became clear that My Master had taken that as rather important news indeed. I could understand entirely. Master Red Eye was, well, The Master of Fillydelphia. Every pony reported to him.

"Hmm... it seems he has received my request then if he wants to see me. Very well! Wormtail, run ahead and inform him I shall not be long. The ass will have to wait. Now..."

I quickly lowered my gaze as I saw My Master turn back to me.

"We can't have a pegasus snivelling around our great leader now, can we? Not his sort of thing..."

"N-no, Master..."

The chain pulled hard, jerking my head back as I fell to the ground, muzzle and chest first. It was followed by a half kick with his front hoof hard enough to drive the wind from me.

“I didn’t ask you! Learn your place and when to speak, Number Seven! Now... we need to find someplace for you...”

Curling up, choking, and trying to suck air in, I heard his assistant laugh in that shrill, demeaning tone. He shut up at a quick glance. My Master turned, unhooking the chain.

“You there!” He shouted to a passing slaver. “Take this slave to the Plaza until I return. Make sure he’s not in with the Ranger. Somewhere far back, out of sight.”

“Yes, Master!”

The chain was passed. It was almost a relief. I could keep up with this slaver on my shaky legs as I was led to the stairs once more. Behind me, My Master kept glaring until I was out of sight. I... I had to use what time I had, find Glimmer and... and try to get her RadPurge from Weathervane!

I may have lost her friendship, but I wasn’t going to watch her lose her life!

Just... how?

The Plaza was even worse up close. The sickly stench of decay slapped through even my choking cold. I was led across the clattering metal that now covered some craters, pulled between slaves who worked themselves to the (sometimes literal) bone on pulling the enormous pulleys for lifting giant rock debris through the roof. Every one of the covered confinement pits was a source of either a crying whine or dull defeated moaning. Despite morbid curiosity, I still couldn’t see into them. I could only smell a horrid rot seeping through each.

Quickly, I really began to hate my cold... it only seemed to let the bad smells through.

But my eyes could only keep going back to a certain cage... praying to myself I’d see somepony there.

There wasn’t. As such, I was simply led, whimpering and limping behind my allotted slaver toward the back of the Plaza. The area where the last confrontation between the griffons and raiders had taken place was chewed up, but I could still see gruesome stains on the floor and pillars.

“Eh, this’ll do. In here, runt!”

The chain was removed from my collar before a half buck punted me through the doorway into the darkness of an old store front. Curling on the ground, I heard the door slam shut behind me and solidly lock, leaving me to the darkness. Already, I heard slaves shifting around, but I just moved back to the bars. I was still bleeding from my back... tired, scared, and sore... but I just wanted to crane my neck through and look for any sign of Glimmerlight. Even just another glance to... to maybe catch her eye...

But the bars were too close... pressing my face against them, I slumped down, miserable. Everything was just coming apart...

Behind me, I picked out the sounds of hooves approaching. A couple of foul-looking earth pony bucks were coming up behind me. Turning my back to the bars, I saw one grin.

“Look who it is...”

“Yeah... remember us, kid?”

I really didn’t. Whinnying as my back scraped on the ground, I pulled my pained body away from them.

"Don't remember seeing us lying around under Barb's raiders? Don't remember the sounds of flaying skin?"

He advanced into the light from the plaza entrance. To my horror, I saw that one flank was just a red, angry scar of muscle and barely healed flesh.

"We saw you helping them raiders to begin with. You helped put us all in that!"

"Just your luck you're with us now, eh, little wings? Grab him!"

They lunged. Back to the side wall, I just screamed as they charged forward.

A feeling of overpressure in the air raced through my ears, before an eruption of force and a sound like a thunderclap slammed across the entire cell. A solid wave of telekinetic power blasted the two bucks away as easily as leaves caught in a hurricane. Crouching low amongst the small cloud of kicked up dust or pebbles, my mane whipped as I felt the forces unleashed tear at me and my exposed back. The slaves cried out, before being silenced by the bone crushing slam of their impacts on the bars. Aside from a white blue flare... it had been entirely unseen, like the wind or an invisible tidal wave.

"Get away from him, you two! Shoo!"

Amongst the fading rumble, I overheard a female voice that I knew! Opening my eyes, I saw the bucks lying in a dizzied, sore, and groaning heap near the wall bars, slowly trying to crawl away while holding their heads. Turning, the sparking light of a faulty-looking horn had rushed up beside me.

"C-Coral?"

"Ssh... Murk, come in here. Ignore those louts."

Her hoof carefully wrapped around my neck as we limped together into the darkness. With my eyes beginning to adjust, I saw it was an old confectionery shop with dozens of spilled (and unfortunately empty... damn) sweetie jars. She led me past the counter, into the back. A glowing gendlamp, like many slaves had managed to purchase from the likes of Sooty Morass, lit the tiny hovel of a room. The store room beyond had collapsed, remaining inaccessible. Coral showed me to a thin mattress on the floor beside the gentle blue glow of the lamp and softly pressed me to lie on it.

"Don't worry about that pair. They won't dare do anything to you with me around. They know I'd blast them through the bars if they ever got on my bad-ow!"

Her horn sparked, flickering like a spark circuit. I saw fizzles of energy drip from it as her hoof rested against the side, breathing heavily until it calmed down.

"Are... are you alright?"

"I'm... fine, nothing I've not been used to for years, now settle. Shh..."

Her hoof gently pressed on the back of my head, stroking my mane gently as I saw her eyes flow with horror to my back. It almost sounded out of place, to hear such a colourful curse surge from her mouth with disgust while she lifted the lamp over to get a closer look.

"That monster..."

I could only nod, resting my head in my forehooves. Lying still, it gave me more time to really remember just how much I could feel the demeaning scars upon my back reminding me of... of those few minutes under his punishment...

"It... hurts..."

"I know it does, my dear. Ssh... lay still. I'll do what I can."

Coral Eve produced a small bucket from the corner, making me begin to wonder if this was a cleaning cupboard. Water sloshed in it as she soaked a cloth and began to gently clean me. Such a moment... feeling a motherly touch from somepony who really was one. Even if she wasn't mine, even if it stung and hurt, having somepony to just wipe away the blood and grime that the lashes had left upon me was enough to give me a moment's respite. Hearing her soft coos, feeling the firm yet gentle strokes of a wet cloth and feeling the hurt flow off me under the thin light was gradually soothing my frayed nerves. If I looked up, I could see her long mane of white and black, tinged with blue. It was crudely tied into two braids and a long ponytail as though desperate to remember how she used to look. Her thin grey coat was smeared and scarred like any other slave now.

"I'm so sorry he got you, Murky. I really was hoping you'd gotten away. I... I wish I could do something to stop him taking you again... you poor thing. No pony deserves what he gives out."

I didn't reply, other than to lean my head to her side for some slight measure of comfort. After a few moments of squirming and whining, she gently cleaned the lash wounds and refitted my wing bandages with all the skill of hoof an earth pony might have. It felt relatable, I'd walked that journey once too.

"Th-thank you... by the way..."

"It's alright, my dear. I told you before. I know an innocent young buck in need when I see one. If I... if I can't care for my own, it would be wrong of me to ignore you."

I lifted my head. "Can I come back here, if I'm allowed?"

"Of course! You've more than earned that, Murky, with all you've done to help me. Although, I would have thought you'd go to, well... Glimmer."

There was an awkward silence.

Eventually, it was broken by the soft sounds of me fighting to choke back all the emotions as I finally let it all out to somepony about what had happened. The first caring ear since then was all it took to get me to talk as openly as I could. To my surprised, she didn't raise any objection given her past with Glimmer as she let me get it all out of my system. Instead, she simply held me.

Feeling the crushing guilt, I told her about our argument... about what had happened to cause it. About Littlepip and about what The Master had been doing. Coral Eve listened quietly before leaning her head atop mine.

"Listen, Murky... it doesn't matter about me and Glimmerlight. You need help too and I... I trust that she'll be good to you, too. She's proven that much to me, even if she and I are, well, a long way from seeing eye to eye..."

I looked up to her face, twitching slightly as I heard some guards canter past, slapping batons along the cages. Coral seemed genuine. Glimmerlight's assertion of who really was the true forgiver between them rung in my head over and over...

"So, I want you to know you can always come back to me, alright? Any good ponies need to stick together in here. That and, well... I could do with somepony around sometimes as well..."

She brushed her eye with a hoof before looking back at me. I just nodded, unsure of what I could say. But seeing Coral smile at least a little... that was the first true moment of relief I'd had all day.

"I'll... I'll try. But I don't know what he wants with me... and I don't know if... if I can go back to Glimmerlight. She probably hates me now, and she's sick and—"

"She's what?" Coral blurted it out, before pausing, biting her lip and reasserted herself. "She's sick now?"

I nodded, a little perplexed at how suddenly emotional her response had been toward someone she 'hated.'

"R-r-radiation sickness l-like before... like you. They're going to give her RadAway to keep her working, but she can't take it, and I'm s-scared for her because I..."

I fell out of her grasp back onto the mattress, holding my eyes.

"I don't want her to die... even if she doesn't ever want to see me again, I don't want that."

"I wouldn't want her to die either..."

There was an odd silence, before I looked up at Coral once more. I knew that was the case, but the way she said it had been different. This was not bitter ambivalence, there was a mournful worry in her voice now.

"No matter how I feel, nopony deserves to be in this prison city or to die the horrible lingering end that it provides. Look, if... if you want to know something—she won't hate you. I don't think she really can. You should have seen the arguments we used to have. If... if you talk to her... or make a gesture to just show that you're, well... sorry. Maybe a drawing?"

Sighing, I just shook my head. I had no journal on me. I had nothing but the bandages upon my wings and the collar around my neck.

"Well, I've got a piece of paper here if you want it..."

Coral shifted in the darkness, producing a single slip of paper bearing masses of tables and figures on one side, lots of small ticks in a grid covered it. But one side was almost deliciously white and untouched.

I sat and stared, shivering at the burning of my back and the heady fever I had... as I saw one chance. Just one.

One drawing to help save a friendship and... and show her what she meant to me and how sorry I was.

My mouth trembled. Could I draw again? I... I'd failed so much and... and just not done anything! It all came out wrong and terrible!

But I had to.

"Alright, slaver! Bring the pegasus to me!"

The voice cut the air with as much finesse as a sledgehammer, making me sit up straight with a shock. No time to think or worry, I turned to Coral Eve.

"I... sorry I don't have time to say but... but I'll do it! Th-thank you and... and Glimmer was working to remember..."

The look on Coral's face, just for a moment, gave me a little hope. That soft relief of somepony hearing about a promise being upheld.

"If... if I can save her, somehow, I want to keep helping her to... to remember and we, um, we can all come together to get out of here? Please say yes... I..."

I shivered.

"I don't think I can last under him. I'm so scared, Coral..."

"Where is he?"

Coral looked back to me. "Yes you can. I've seen what you can do already. If you feel the courage to do it... then do it. Do what you need to, Murky."

I heard the cage start to be rattled at, felt my forehead, back, and throat ache as I put my two tiny front hooves to Coral's chest.

"I'll try... and I will... I mean, spend time with you too. She really wants to help you... so do I... but please I need t-to... ask... before they take me! C-can you write something for me on this? I don't know how..."

"Yes, of course, hun. But hurry! What do you need?"

Less than a minute later, they got the rusty door open, throwing it to the side and entering to reattach my chain and drag me away.

Once again was at the mercy of My Master as he reattached the chain to his armour. He tugged me hard, whimsically noting my cleaner back and taking a sick pleasure in the way I trotted obediently alongside him. My head remained low.

But as we passed a certain shop cell... I saw her. Lying upon the floor, flushed and panting for breath from aching limbs... she had pulled herself from the stuffy back to take what breeze she could coming in from the skylight.

Our eyes didn't meet. I didn't even know if I saw them closing because she was avoiding me or not. But I had the last ditch effort of paper. I had it tucked into my bandages.

I had the words. I was three words stronger...

The plaza door was opened, and I was forced through, even as I saw Glimmer's head slump to the ground amidst a wracking cough. Leafshine was bent over her, shaking Glimmer by the shoulders and whispering into her ear.

To save her life and to save our friendship, my only spot of hope now, no matter what it cost me from My Master. For Glimmer. For Coral. For all of us...

I just prayed that I could dodge the repercussions.

Fillydelphia glowered in the dark. The streets toward our destination began to bustle again after a brief reprieve from the storm. Stumbling, limping, and sniffing from a running nose I followed My Master, feeling the light drizzle of hot and damp air stinging my exposed back.

One thing became clear very quickly. This was not the way to the Ministry of Magic, whatever it was. Picking up that my nervous trotting required a harsh drag every few seconds, My Master looked down at me. I cringed back, my eyes darting to all the ponies looking upon My Master and his pet dejectedly being dragged alongside.

"Our meeting is now in the old central factory, where the Ministry of Wartime Technology considered their hub. Thanks to the delay from our 'leader,' we had to move the venue." My Master turned as he trotted, staring at me eye to eye.

"You will remain silent unless spoken to. These are important figures, Number Seven. You will obey them if asked anything. You will be the meeting's servant. They will require drinks in the factory's heat. You are not permitted to take any unless I instruct you this time. Do you understand?"

"Yes, Master!" I almost shouted it, nodding fervently through clenched teeth. The pain in my back was terrible. every time it shifted from a step only making it worse.

"Good! Now hurry up..."

Our pace increased. I could swear it was deliberate, as the added effort on my torso was making my cuts open and close repeatedly. If it hadn't been for Coral, I worried that they might have become infected already. Who knew what My Master would have made me do for some medicine?

The journey was not long, thankfully. However, I began to notice that we were moving closer toward the crater than I had expected. Its baleful glow emanated over the rooftops and between alleyways in the thick misty dark. Part of me felt glad... it meant I was nearer to Hearts and Hooves Hospital, my only hope for RadPurge. Could I do this? Could I mount an escape from the chains during the meeting and somehow escape to make a desperate run of RadPurge to Glimmer? Could I even get away again afterwards?

Not to mention at some point find more RadAway. Amongst all the pain, I hadn't even noticed that my throat was feeling... tight. Not from the collar's chaffing, either. Had I gone through radiation without knowing? Had it been from the metro? What if it was just a worsening condition like before? This was too early since my last RadAway. The worry began to strike me... did My Master know what I needed to survive? What would he hold me to for it? Oh Goddesses, please in your great generosity provide...

"Here we are, Number Seven..."

The chain was pulled, briefly dragging me along to stand beside him. Before us lay the largest factory in the entire city. I had sometimes seen it in the distance, spotting the sheer scale of the wide manufactory itself. Aside from coolant towers, it was not particularly tall, but it must have covered at least ten blocks worth of the city behind thick walls and containing immense yards of old military technology. No wonder Red Eye had taken such an immediate interest here...

Before us lay the metal gates, made of metal fence and thick bars, they lay open to allow the slave workers in and out under the watch of two enclosed guard towers with griffon snipers. The wall wasn't fully intact. Being this close to the crater, much of it had collapsed and even one of the immense shop floors toward the craterside wing had seen its roof tumble inward. Like the other hubs, it had resisted the balefire well... even if the structure had been seared and blackened. Above the primary central headquarters, I saw an immense symbol of an apple, hanging on metal cords rather precariously.

The guards let us through, glancing and chuckling as I was led on beside My Master. One of them mockingly barked once we'd passed, and I felt my temper rise with embarrassment.

Inside the gates, I began to get a sense of the scale of this manufactory's produce. On every side of me lay ranks of old sky chariots, armoured and streamlined. There were protected wagons with long supply beds and strange V-shaped underhulls. Rotor-driven aircraft, driven by pedals and containing side seats for ponies alongside empty pintle-mounts lay derelict. Ponies were moving between them all, examining the carcasses of the war machines and checking things off or taking notes. No doubt trying to see which ones from the vast arsenal were repairable or better as use for parts on the other frames. Dozens... maybe even well over a hundred ponies were slaving away with auto axes, shearing the salvageable elements from the more ruined platforms under strict guard. I saw one struck with the hard wooden butt of an ancient hunting shotgun for merely even looking away from his station of work. Others were prying the head off of a massive tracked sentinel robot, one of a dozen lined under cloth-covers beside serried ranks of robot ponies with bulbous heads and empty weapon mounts.

This was Equestria's primary industrial base for its armies...

Our advance took us through a cleared route toward the main entrance, a huge set of steps leading to about a dozen doorways all lined up beside one another, all of which went into the same greeting hall. That alone gave a concept of how many ponies had once entered and left this place at once. If Red Eye could get even a portion of this working...

Very quickly, I gained a whole new respect for the capabilities of his army. The creepy hot air balloons and transport wagons were only to be the beginning. I didn't want to imagine the amount of time, sweat, and lives it had taken (or would take) to get this colossal place operational again and producing the replacement parts for the fields of war machines. But if it did... Red Eye would have access to the full military and industrial might of the Equestrian inventory.

My eyes were so concentrated on the military technology that I almost tripped upon the stairs leading up to the way in. Passing through the doors led to an enormous and open planned reception, high and wide with at least eight separate terminal stations at the large oval desk in its centre. Above me, a balcony ran all the way around three sides with two stairways leading up to it on either side of the reception desk. A rather skinny looking unicorn stallion with an almost zebra-like contrast of white coat and black mane was keeping two dozen workers under control there as they tapped away on the reactivated terminals, with wires running all over the floor. No doubt they were the control hub for this place, a necessity to keep track of the immense capabilities.

"S-sir... I've finished cataloguing the Whirligig reports for the south field, it's not much better than the north one, sir. Without ball bearings, they can't—"

"I know why they can't, just get it archived and add it to the part list for when they repair the aviation manufacturing hall. Hey! Hey you, what's taking so damn long on the weapon locker counts?"

"N-nothing, sir! Just the ponies who come to take them for the army aren't telling us how many they've taken..."

"Bloody plank-headed grunts... make your best guess, most of its in crap condition anyway. They'll be back within the hour once they realise the receivers are ready to fall apart. Tell them they'll just have to wait for them to be repaired or go ask the Ironshod outlet in the west wing for new produce. Oh! Master Shackles, I do say hello!"

My Master simply grunted, placing a hoof on the desk. I was left to meekly look up at it from the rubble strewn floor. After a second of wondering why there was so much coloured glass at my hooves, I looked up to see a massive stained glass window of a Steel Ranger that had been blown inward by the bombs. My Master tapped the counter a few times.

"Keep your politeness to yourself. Where is Grindstone?"

"You mean Master Gri—"

"Do you think I care for your formalities?"

The overseer went pale... even through his bone white coat... simply shaking his head. "H-he's in... in the old meeting room... central Ministry research h-hall... just off the place Ironshod used to use to—"

"I know the way. Now be quiet and send a runner along to tell him I'm here."

Gulping, I saw him wave to one of the slaves, who (rather intelligently) just nodded and left, having listened in without needing to ask for clarification. My Master began to pull me toward the stairs, without so much as a word to the overseer.

The inside was unthinkable complex and massive. I saw multiple doors almost as large as Stable gates and about as thick laying open and revealing everything from massive chariot construction halls to paper stuffed archives. Each door bore a separate symbol. One an apple... another a sword and cogs. Very quickly, it became apparent that this facility had been rented out or bought in sections by varying companies to act as a unified production front... even if they still kept to themselves for their secrets. No wonder the Ministry had chosen to come here. Now, who was their Ministry Mare again? The... the rainbow one? She'd looked angry and warlike enough...

A long hallway stretched before us, crossing a skybridge between two of the immense warehouse-like buildings. Windows had shattered on every side, giving rise to an ash filled wind that blew my mane wildly and stung my eyes and back. If My Master cared for the annoyance... he showed no sign, simply dragging me along over the thick and musty red carpet toward a huge set of double doors. Battle saddled guards flanked each side of it, giving rise to a pang of sadness... thinking of my own personal one from Blunderbuck languishing in a corner of My Master's office so far away... along with everything else that meant anything to me.

"Master! They are awaiting you inside!"

"Good... once I am through and the runner is gone, close the doors. We are not to be disturbed."

"Yes, Master!"

Clearly everypony knew to stay on his safer side. I really had to drill that back into me. Call your Master by his title. Always... always always always...

Inside, I was taken through a set of offices and meeting rooms behind toughened glass. I could see various stairways that led to a machine shop right below us. Up here, though, things were quieter. The terminals were all destroyed by the shrapnel that must have blown in from the windows I could see facing the crater. Almost teasingly... I could see Hearts and Hooves Hospital, its half ruined shape silhouetted against the crater's evil hue. At one side, I spied a little canteen for them to take breaks in. Even from here, I could smell the rot and stale stench over its foul-looking surfaces.

To my curiosity, I saw many of the desks had cutie marks carved into the polished wood of their construction. A set of pears... two screwdrivers... three intercrossing cogs... a sundial...

Wait.

The chain locked as I fell behind, drawing a choke and a reprimanding tug to keep moving. But my eyes just stayed fixated on it. In a far corner, near the windows overlooking the machine floor below. He... he had worked here, that I knew! It had to be! Two inactive terminals rested beside one another, connected to a single keyboard. His chair had been knocked over, falling against a long looted looking filing cabinet. Behind him on the wall, I could see papers and posters bearing schematics and rough sketches of metal ponies (or Ranger armour?) and dozens of individual parts far beyond my knowledge. But upon his desk I could see all manner of little things... amongst the tools there were photo frames and small dead plants with musty looking ribbons attached. Gifts...

I dared only imagine what was in the photo frames. I wanted to go over... to look, to see what Skydancer had looked like. He had to have her on it! I... I could draw them together!

But My Master would never have let me... the crushing disappointment as I was inexorably motioned onward felt like I'd turned hollow.

One more detail caught my eye though... just as I was passing. Between each wall he was near, a kind of ribbon surrounded his work desk at chest height. Pink... decorated with little faces of Ministry Mare Pinkie Pie looking rather stern and holding up a hoof to bar entry.

I wasn't given much opportunity to ponder it; the chain tugged with an impatient snort, and once again my attention was forced forward. But ahead of us... the usual desk farms and tables gave way to something much grander.

Another set of stairs rose toward a much more secure looking doorway. It lay open at the top. But before it, embedded into the wide stairwell itself, was a thick stone plinth wrapped in plaques and metal borders. Atop it... stood a Steel Ranger. I squeaked, falling in behind My Master. Only after hearing his amused cackle did it become clearer... it was just an inactive set of the armour propped up as a statue. If it had ever been operational. Whatever metal they used to build the armour had stood the test of time well. It gleamed. A more heroic and shining set of armour compared to the flame-streaked and battle-scarred metal gods of war I'd once seen in terrifying action outside the Walls. The symbol of the Ministry rested upon its flank while no weapons rested by its side.

An eternal guardian to the Ministry's secrets within the hub... but one that had stood idle whilst a mad-pony had looted it all. Crimson and gold-trimmed carpets led up the stairs to a very... official... looking brass and wood high doorway bearing four more of the guards. Without a word, they simply nodded and opened them as we moved around the Ranger statue.

"Aaah... Chainlink Shackles, so you join us!"

The familiar voice rumbled from the interior of the primary meeting room. Deep and heavily bass toned, Master Grindstone trotted to meet us at the door. Like an indomitable presence, shaking the very floor, his twisted cybernetic monster of a minotaur bodyguard lumbered along behind him leaving marks on the carpet. It sauntered like some sort of primate I'd seen in picture books, its bionic hand and immense crusher claw resting on the floor before its feet. Upon sighting me, it snorted and let out a sudden, short roar.

Only the chain stopped me in my flight of the room entirely, snapping at its full length until my body flew out under my head entirely, dropping me on my back with a dull thump. I'd almost gotten as far as the nearby canteen to hide in.

"The runner did mention you brought your... pet. I see you finally caught up with him." Grindstone glanced past My Master, watching me as I shakily got back to my hooves and meekly hid behind a desk... before I was simply pulled out and toward the boardroom once again.

"A pony can't outrun their purpose and destiny, Grindstone. He's mine now. Where I go, he goes. In this case... he's to be our little refreshment servant. Aren't you, cutie pie?"

"Y-yes, Master..." I tried to speak without letting the revulsion at that name get the better of me. Grindstone just continued to stare at me, before waving his gigantic minotaur guard back to the side of the room and stood aside for us to enter. Behind us... the guards locked the door.

The lights were low, the windows boarded over, and the walls clearly thick. This was no doubt to be a private meeting. Grindstone continued to stare at me, before snorting. Without reason, he slapped one of his almost elderly hooves across my face. Pain stung at my already sore cheeks. I began to wonder if my eyes would ever be allowed to heal from their blackening.

"That's for ever defying me, runt. Nothing compared to what Shackles does, I'll bet. But you ran from me too when you fled with that mare, Unity."

He lifted his hoof again, before snorting and turning away. I winced, finding a little spike of hate for this donkey emerging as he dared mention Unity's name.

"At least I know good old Shackles will give you the treatment in punishment enough without me having to lift my old body now. Don't dare bother me or I'll have Big Brutus here relieve you of those wings permanently.”

The bodyguard, hearing its name, stomped on the spot enough to garner everypony else’s attention. But it remained loyal and stood still in the corner, like the Ranger monument outside... silent and vigilant. My Master began to move me across the room. Around me I saw several dark slaver figures... each of them rough and wicked looking. That particular rough style Grindstone and My Master shared that led me to wonder if they were all from the ‘old days’ of Fillydelphia, as well. Trotting on his wooden peg-hoof, I recognised the scruffy and disgruntled figure of Mister Mosin at the far end too. Remembering his allegiance with My Master in the riots... it only made sense he was here too.

“Well, well, well... it would be ye, laddie...”

Oh no...

Maybe not all from back in the long past then...

True to the unmistakable accent, turning my head revealed Sooty Morass coming out from the small side kitchen I was likely to be sent to work in. The grin between his braided mane gave way to a hoof around my shoulders.

“Seems ye’ve gotten yersel’ in another little pickle, haven’t ye lad? Going down while I only go up. Isn’t that just precious? Doing well with the illness, are we?”

I didn’t reply. I just kept my head down and tried to ignore the foul pony. At least, I tried, before my Master’s hoof forced me to the floor, holding me down while he leaned to my ear.

“I told you! You will obey if asked by anypony in here! Now OBEY!”

Spittle flew across my face amidst my frantic nodding and cries of ‘Yes, Master!’ Shivering, hating every second of being made to look so belittled in front of Sooty. He was clearly enjoying watching me squirm... please... this, this was just demeaning...

“I... I’m not doing well, sir. It’s a constant fight to get the RadAway I need to stay alive and... and I think it’s getting worse. My sickness is... is accelerating... sir.”

“Oooh...’sir,’ eh? I think I like hearing that from ye, laddie. Shackles sure has ye broken in well. Well, come talk to me afterwards, always room in me new trade for a little squealing whinnier amongst me clients. I’m sure we could work somethin’ out for me stocks... if your Master permits it.”

What? What trade did he mean aga...

My mind finally caught up. The look of abject dread and shame was enough to make Sooty cackle, ruffle my mane and trot on past, happily lording up his new found power. Was... was he a full on slaver now? Or just a position of power with dirt on enough ponies to ensure a business trade within the city? I swallowed deeply... fighting to keep my imagination from going too far in its fear.

Sweating, I just tried to keep to the side of the room. Now that my eyesight was adjusting and the ponies were beginning to take their seats, I could see what we had.

My Master, of course, towered above everypony else bar the minotaur. Opposite him sat the old figure of Grindstone, clearly a symbol of authority. Sooty Morass sat off to the far end, likely one of their newest members to this little... club, while Mosin was fairly close to the middle, near My Master. He spotted me with his one eye and made something between a snort and a sigh of exasperation. Another five ponies were sat various around them, two stallions and three mares of a mix between earth pony and unicorn. All of them at least once regarded my curious looks with a snarl or fierce look until I glanced away. But one thing was clear... they were all short of word and very considered. I could see the intelligence in their eyes, for all the hate and brutality they exuded. My Master was among his kind here...

experienced and savvy kinds of twisted. No wonder Sooty had found a home with them...

Along those lines, those glances I got suddenly made a lot more sense. I could see each and every one of them working out just how they would punish me in their mind...

In a bit of a worry... I slunk off into the kitchen, the smile from My Master making it all too clear that I was supposed to anyway. They began to talk... simple greetings, reports on things I didn't fully understand.

Wandering inside, I found a somewhat cleaner-looking kitchen designed for catering groups providing for long meetings. But before anything else... another pony caught my eye, standing and eating what seemed to be raw meat at the far end. Much younger than the rest, but still a fully grown stallion. A unicorn, dirty white of coat and one of the most muscular looking unicorns I'd ever seen. His mane was a ruin, almost ghoulish-like, and caked with the remains of a dozen dark shades of all coloured hues, dye no doubt. A horrid scar ran across his snout, around and across his mouth like some form of bladed weapon had sank into it before. More deep wounds decorated his balding head alongside the multi-coloured remnants of his mane, giving rise to a huge question of why he was still alive. His eyes were of two colours... red and hazel while he bore piercings through his ears, nose, mouth, eyelids, and even just through his skin in general. My stomach churned as I saw they weren't metal... they were bone.

He was a raider...

He also saw me staring. Those eyes spun to face me... wide and with massive pupils, they looked at me almost disbelievingly to think that I was looking at him. The quake of severe drug damage in his system was all too obvious, yet he exuded a presence somewhere between uncertainty and unnatural authority. His whole body jittered for a few moments, before he spoke.

"You looking to me?"

Oh Goddesses... I had to reply, My Master's rules...

"I... j-just seeing who was—"

"Ah! Ah! I asked if you looking to me? You seein' somethin', eh? Seeing something here? Something about me?"

He began advancing, his voice sharp and speaking far too whimsically and fast. What, to any other pony, might have sounded like ignorant bullying threats emerged as an unsettling detachment from reason. As he turned, I saw his cutie mark. A hook, like one an old master of mine had used to hunt riverlife. My chain kept me moving too far away when he moved close by. Already I could see he carried a large machete across either side of his torso along with a coil of rope.

"N-no! I didn't—"

"Thinkin' something about me? Out with it? You got something AGAINST me, huh? All starin'? Ah dun like that! Ah dun like people staring, cause they don't see the real truth, right? So I make em not able to see, how 'bout that? Yeah... how 'bout we do that?"

His magic, a sickly yellow, drew from his side the very hook I'd seen on his flank, attached to the rope.

"I'm sorry! I... I didn't mean to—"

His hoof slammed into a cupboard door, those thick muscles of his snapping the thick wood in one strike. He wasn't anywhere near the size of Brimstone... but this raider towered above me all the same with more build than any raider I'd seen in Barb's gang.

"I said. Stop. Looking at me! You think I'm crazy? Huh, that's it? Think something about me makes me worse?"

"I—"

I didn't even get the chance to finish my sentence. He leapt forward at me suddenly with a keen howl. I fell backward, hollering out loud as he landed atop me and drew back the thin hook to—

...laugh?

"Hehehehaaaahaha! Oooh... oh you... hehe, I'm just fuckin' with you. You see it, right? You see you should be scared and... hah... I like the scream. Screaming's good, right? AARRRRRGGHHH! See? Good to scream... tells you that you're alive! Hehehe... c'mon! Laugh! Not gonna laugh, it's funny right? Laugh!"

Chuckling, he wandered back off me, the smile doing strange things with his scar to twist his face in a particularly mad way. The more I looked... the more I saw simply no sanity in those mismatched eyes. Suddenly, he snarled, fierce and hateful.

"You not gonna laugh with me!? C'mon little pony, laugh! Lets laugh together! Laugh!"

Squeaking... I tried to...

"Heh... hehe?" I was backed against the kitchen counter. "Hahaha? Yeah... um... funny? Haha?"

He looked at me, the smile suddenly disappearing from his face into a kind of bewilderment again. A low danger in his eyes...

"...you laughin' at me?"

"Ha... huh? I..."

"I said, you laughin' at me? You was just laughin', was that at me!?" He advanced forward, the hook drawn again. I backed away, finding myself in a corner... the chain tugging tightly through to the next room at its maximum pull.

The raider snarled, fierce anger appearing upon his wild face. His hoof stabbed at my chest, lifting my head up to face him.

"I... don't like ponies laughing at me... why was you laughing at me there?" The eyes blinked, the pupils wide and mad. "That's it... yer fuckin' getting' it, laughin' at me like something's wrong? I don't even like the way you're looking at me... like you're better than me? Thinkin' yer fuckin' better!"

The large hook rose, I closed my eyes, begging loudly as it began to move for my mouth. I felt the tip reaching inside for my tongue.

"Leave him be, Wildcard. The runt doesn't know you. He doesn't die."

I felt him pause... daring to open my eyes to find it mere inches away. The mad raider was looking over his shoulder at the doorway. My Master stood there. His words had seemed calm... but they carried a lot of weight. 'Wildcard' seemed to pause... then smile. He helped me up with a little pat to the cheek.

"Aw... I was just playin', it's no worry. I'm chill, no worries, big guy I'm chill. Chilled. We're cool."

Wildcard affixed his hook again to his hard leather armour. My eyes tried to avoid his as he trotted out. He paused briefly at the door, looking over at me and grinning with only half his mouth. The other half twisted into a sick frown with the scar.

"We cool, little kiddo? Yeah, we cool... gonna play sometime, eh? Get some of my boys together... make a night of it! Haha! They'll love ya, ha!"

He left to the main room, before suddenly firing his head around the doorway with a scream. I scrambled backward, falling and shrieking as he laughed and wandered off.

My Master jangled the chain to get my attention, glowering at the doorway.

"I wouldn't disturb Wildcard, Number Seven. Chieftain or slave now... heh... he's a lethal weapon of ours to point and let go. We don't want you getting strung up if he gets in the mood. You wouldn't know him, of course. Although, your 'friend' Brimstone would. One of his 'Big Four' so they say. Still leads the raiders that joined the Pit... trains them, slaughters the weak and toughens the best with cutting and beatings. Hehe... so mad nopony ever challenged him for any sort of leadership."

He paused, looking back out as I heard Wildcard muttering and chuckling in equal amounts. Then he turned back to me, his eyes low.

"You didn't really think Barb was the only pony with a position of authority in his Clan who liked the idea of working with us to get back at their traitorous leader? To take on their 'betrayed,' as much as Barb wanted to?"

"No, Master..."

"Good. So let that sink in a little. Just think what Barb was like and then remember Wildcard held the same position of power. Strong as any big earth pony and lethal skill with that horn's magic, too. Natural born killer. He may not seem it, oooh I know... but he fought Brimstone over and over for leadership."

For anypony to even consider voluntarily attacking Brimstone spoke volumes. My Master stomped more fully into the kitchen.

"Now... you'll find your things here. Put together drinks, whatever you find and serve the meeting as you are called. You will obey them. You will not speak at any point during our meeting and you will say nothing outside these walls. I trust you won't... Number Seven. After all... just remember who owns your friend's life now. We've got Wildcard in the same way we had Barb—to make good on paybacks if you squeal. I promise, his methods may not be as efficient, but they are somewhat more... unique... than Barb's were... hehe."

The chain was removed from his plated armour, instead affixed to a pipe on the wall coming from an old boiler right beside the door, allowing me to access both rooms. Making some of the tiles shimmy below him from their loose cement, he stomped out. Quickly, I found myself left alone.

My heart was still beating fast from Wildcard. That pony was... was terrifying. He had the build of an earth pony with the magic of a unicorn and his... his mind and the way he acted...

Very quickly, I began to worry about exactly what he might do next, which I suspected was entirely the point. What might he have done had My Master not been here? What had he done to ponies in the past? Barb would always be a very... personal... fear and memory. But I hadn't expected another of Brim's old gang to be so close to my life so soon. I didn't want him near me. I didn't want anything to do with somepony so... so off the deep end of the wasteland's insanity. If... if he was anything like Barb was, I...

I returned to the corner, curling up immediately on the cold floor, collapsing and trying to make myself cry a little to let it out. I could have sworn it was harder...

It hadn't just been Wildcard that had been affecting me. My lungs were starting to feel swollen and ineffectual. Every breath came with a little wheeze. It really was getting worse to advance this fast...

At... at least I had some time. Groaning, whimpering slightly at the touch on my wings, I drew the slot of paper bearing those three important words out along with a stick of charcoal.

Taking a deep breath, wheezing and sore... trying to ignore the arguing and harsh discussions next door... I began to create the most important drawing in my life.

“Number Seven! Get through here!”

I almost tripped over my own hooves. Chain rattling, I dove across to where I'd left the tray. As the time had passed, everything had been split between fearful entrances to the room bearing trays of the water I'd found inside a walk in fridge and desperate slow sketching whenever I could. As fast as I could, I threw the drinks upon it. A mix of water, Sparkle Cola, and a few heady mixes of alcohol I'd located all went on together. I had fast learned how to carry it upon my back... through great pain. The cold tray rubbed and ground at my whip wounds, leading to my time around the table delivering their drinks to be little more than a continual fight to not make a sound.

Seething as I placed their next round of refreshments upon it, I trotted in and struggled to carefully move around their table and get their attention without speaking a word.

Grindstone was speaking at the moment, his eyes only briefly acknowledging me before making it very clear I was to ignore him. A few clips around the ear had educated me very quickly in reading their moods.

“From what I can gather, you're proceeding as you should. I expect you all to—”

“You should not expect anything of me, Grindstone...” My Master growled across the table, the cutting tone making me very happy I was considered somewhat invisible to the assembled ponies. “Do not pretend to think that just because you are in the position to organise things means you hold authority. Just remember who ruled these camps before Red Eye...”

Wandering past Mosin, I felt him pick a bottle of clear liquid for himself and swig it, carefully watching the confrontation. Grindstone sat silent, before raising a hoof.

“What I was saying... was that I expect good things as a prediction, Shackles.” Grindstone continued rather diplomatically. “Your authority is and always has been recognised. None of us would be where we are but for your work. Now... I do have to report that, while Ministry Station has yet to be located, my slavers did unveil plans that it may not have been the Ministry's only outlet for research...”

“You're jokin'? You mean that there 'nother right below our hooves and we ne'er knew?” One of the mares had leaned forward, swatting at me as I'd moved close by. She had a strange accent, one that clipped and rolled on words as though she was fighting to be understandable. Almost tripping over the chain, I fell back against Mosin who cursed in his own tongue and batted me away with a clip to the ear. I'd only barely kept the tray level...

“No.” Grindstone lowered his eyes. “Not beneath us. Above us. In the mountains outside Fillydelphia, atop their snowy peaks where Red Eye began his mining operations months ago. The Ministry moved a great deal of researchers up there on short notice. Including, I may add, many of Aurora Star's chief leads on the memory projects. That alone warrants that we must pursue this as a critical element. But we cannot simply go up as a small team... that would... arouse suspicion.”

My Master nodded, casting a careful eye to me as I wandered past. Shivering, I kept my head low. The only noise I made was the soft jingle of my chain. Looking up, I had to bite my whimper short as I saw Wildcard beckoning me over. Before him rested the remains of a dozen drinks already. Trembling, I began to trot forward, nervously passing beneath the heavily breathing minotaur. Those beady red blinking eyes focused like a target lock on me as I heard My Master begin speaking once again.

"You propose we use our newly found slaves to create a mining force of our own?"

"Indeed... the reports back were not very successful without proper mining kit. If we found anyone with mining experience in our combined ranks, we could create a task group to offer as an experienced alternative. That would get us up there."

The moment I came near Wildcard, he lifted the entire tray with his magic... before offering me a bottle of stronger looking alcohol. Sudden panic shot through me as I saw My Master looking. I... I wasn't to take any of it without his permission. But if I turned down Wildcard, what might he do? Shivering, I shook my head...

Sooty chuckled, his first sounds in the meeting so far. "Aye... I'm sure I could acquire a few wee bits of tools for them, help sell the appearance, y'know? Yer all filling me coffers with caps from the clients ye bring in anyway, so I can tab ye for them and you won't be out a profit."

"Good." Grindstone watched their newcomer warily. "Mosin, arm some of them. The mountains are not without their dangers."

"Shall be no issue. Old shipment of arctic qualified rifles were found year ago. Only need to prevent pizdets of an assistant fucking with poor things till they resemble Hearth's Warming tree. On menya zaebal..."

I felt a brief prod on my muzzle. Turning back, I saw the bottle, again, offered from Wildcard. He wore a somewhat disgusted look... as though amazed somepony would refuse an offer. I just shook my head again... backing off. P-perhaps if I just turned and went back to the kitchen I would—

"Eh! Don't you turn your fucking back on me!"

I couldn't help it, I squeaked and spun around at his voice above the discussion in the room, just in time to catch the bottle with my face. Spluttering and moaning as I clutched my muzzle, I heard the uproar of protests at the interruption. Very quickly, I felt myself lifted.

"I told you, Number Seven! Don't disturb anypony and don't make a sound! Now get in there and shut up!"

I was hurled, passing through the door and impacting on the hard kitchen floor until I slid to the far end. Even before I had stopped, through my aching nose, I shouted out.

"I'm sorry, Master! I'm s-so—"

"Shut up! A slave should be invisible until they are needed! Do not bother us again! I'll deal with you later for this."

My mind rebelled... but it had been Wildcard and... and he had...

Oh... what was the point. I was just the one who got blamed anyway...

Pulling myself back to my drawing, choking on the heated, metal-tasting bile in my throat, I picked up the charcoal once again. It hadn't been going well. I was being slow... careful... not moving on until I had made sure each bit looked perfect! But at this rate it would take me days to finish what I needed to do...

Carefully, I settled the charcoal stick to the paper, holding back tears as best I could to not stain it. A slow arc... somepony's neck... round it off and... and make it thicker for the back. Yes. Yes that worked...

I could still hear them talking. I wanted to just draw, but I kept hearing those names too many times to avoid listening...

"Aurora Star," Grindstone continued, "we have now concluded, had more than a few 'personal projects' going on. Things that received no funding but which she continued with herself. I suspect that many of these may have illegally laundered funds and elements of proper funded projects to aid her. Her record of interviews from Ministry Mare Twilight Sparkle after her funding was cut is, suffice to say, rather long. If you're wondering why this matters to us... the reason is simply this. If Ministry Station didn't have enough of a presence to have its records on file in the Ministry proper... why did she go to so much effort to acquire it and then just use it for nothing but storage?"

A stallion, gruff voiced, spoke up. "We know this, Master Grindstone... because the Ministry was keeping something pretty damn secret down there..."

Distracted by their conversation, I felt distracted. In a lapse of concentration, I gasped as I felt my charcoal rub a little too hard. Panicked, I carefully rubbed out a part of their back on my paper, hers would have been thinner than that! Oh come on... I couldn't have too many smudges. Maybe... maybe if I worked on him instead. I moved to the other side, where more incomplete bits of pony sat apart.

"Yes... yes you are right. But my theory is now this. Aurora Star personally dealt with it all, and I have never found a single record check by Twilight Sparkle of it. Ever. From what we can gather, she was particularly keen on these checks for Ministry Mare approval, so anything lacking them gives a high indication of it being something outwith the publicised projects. Nor did I find any audit checks even by her own Ministry."

My Master's voice rumbled across the table. "You think that even the Ministry staff believed it was simply storage... other than Aurora Star herself? That she was making one of her own projects down there?"

"Believe? No... it's too obvious. She'd never have gotten away with it. Do I suspect it may be linked to that something we're searching for though? Perhaps. Fillydelphia was full of more holes than the primary hub of the Ministry of Morale here may have ever admitted. It was too industrial... too bustling and active and everchanging for them to keep up with. Just look at the reports of technology selling and we know the zebras were taking refugees away from shelters to the metro. If you wanted me to say one thing... it would be that I'm beginning to wonder how she got the resources for these 'personal' projects she sent into that supposed storage area. Now... I shan't theorise more lest we move off in an incorrect direction. Concentrate on the Ministry Station and on preparing a mountain slave force for now."

"Aye."

"Yes, Master."

I sat for a second. I couldn't have missed them referring to Sundial's activities there... nor the refugees situation I'd occasionally heard ponies from the past mentioning. It had become long obvious that there was some sort of power play going on to gain favour in Red Eye's... well... eye. One they didn't want other slavers knowing about to share the gains with. One they were seeking to uncover the past to hunt for. I began to wonder just how much of this was really interconnected... hadn't I heard something about disappearing Wartime workers too?

Below me, however, 'connection' was just what was finally beginning to happen. Delight surged through my weary mind as I saw a pony's face staring back at me from the paper.

One that... that smiled.

I could do this!

Thoughts of the past drifted from my mind as I heard them start discussing logistics. Yes... that gave me time to concentrate... I... I had to do this! It had to mean what I felt! Show what I meant...

I stopped... breathing out, trying to relax. I felt the vision of my drawing enter my mind, felt the pain fade away. I was alone without any danger... just... draw.

I drew... lines...

The lines... they weren't perfect but... they began to curve... and...

Became shapes to link the others I had done together...

I was drawing faster, all the voices and arguments over who did what nothing but the same background noises I'd drawn through a hundred times in my life. Thick swipes for a ragged mane... a gently breezy curve for a tail... a little imagination and picturing the past to round out that body a little...

The shapes... gradually, beautifully... they came to life.

The charcoal clattered from my mouth, rolling across the paper and falling between two tiles on the floor. Softly, I lifted the paper before me...

It...

It was awful.

I knew fine well what my own skills were capable of, but every out of proportion leg or twist of spine that made no sense was all there before my eyes! Why wasn't she looking at him when she should have been? Why were his legs too long?

Clamping my eyes shut... I almost tore it up then and there... why... couldn't... I just... draw!?

But I couldn't. It had been my one effort. It had to be enough! I just didn't have any other choice now!

That anger slowly began to build in me. The frustration and hatred of the news that had turned me into this talentless mewling nopony. That I would have to give this to her as an apology and it was ALL WRONG and looked horrible... she'd hate it...

But I had no other choice...

I had my apology at last. Now I... I just had to get out of here somehow before their meeting ended. This would be my best chance, alone in a kitchen and unsupervised. Slowly, I tucked the drawing back into my wing's now filthy bandages. Standing up, I realised how weak I was beginning to feel. But if... I could just get this and a gift of RadPurge to her I'd... I'd feel better.

Taking a breath, I turned to the kitchen to find my way free of these chains. To find my way back to my friend.

Problem one. My only way out is locked in the occupied room.

Problem two. I am chained to a pipe on the wall.

Problem three. I am beside a large group of incredibly dangerous ponies.

Add to that... limited time. It was no wonder why my searching of the kitchen was as frantic and panicked as it was stealthy and careful. Each cupboard being opened was slow and methodical, offering only the occasional rustle of a chain to convince anypony listening that I was merely shifting about in discomfort. As soon as a door was open, I would cast my eyes madly around to hunt for anything. Pots and pans, old degraded cardboard boxes of now blue cereal, and even tubs of bleach and cleaning fluids, the smell of which wafted out enough to make my eyes water. Nothing of any use!

Next door, Mosin and Sooty were engaged in an accent heavy argument over the exact procurement of parts for his armoury. Amongst the raging words and the occasional bellows of other ponies for them to quiet down, I dragged a stool over to clamber up on and get onto the worktop. They must have been unicorns in here... for I could see cupboards no pony could ever have hoped to normally reach. Pulling them open, I found lengths of tubing, replacement lightbulbs and bags of nuts and nails. Argh! Come on, was there nothing in here?

Moving around, I started even lightly tapping the wall to look for any hollow spots. I dreaded the idea of falling down another wall cavity... but at this rate I might have to. Tap tap. Tap tap. Tap tap—

Tunk.

I froze on the spot, the hollow metallic noise far louder than I expected. The speech had quietened down, and I could hear My Master beginning to outline who should send what slaves. To my horror, I heard the name of 'Leafshine' mentioned as one of the 'volunteers.' Glimmerlight wouldn't like that... oh dear.

But I couldn't help that right now. It was obvious their meeting was beginning to start rounding up all the remaining details. I didn't have long! Pulling away the masses of stacked trays from the wall, I stared in amazement at what I saw had languished behind them.

Like a small elevator, just big enough to fit trays of food or a large pot... some sort of transport to another preparation area on a lower level! Beside it, my heart leapt as I saw the light was still on. It would work! Problem one, solved! Almost too easy, really. I mentally kicked myself for not looking earlier. Was I getting that slow in the head? My fever certainly was picking up amongst the groupings of hurt I had from My Master's 'punishments.'

Now... problem two was going to be a lot harder...

"Are in agreement?"

"Aye!"

"Indeed so..."

"Seems fine to me."

"Good, any last elements?"

They were wrapping up! I'd hoped to get a larger head start, but now it would be a rush just to get out at all! Stumbling back along the worktop, I once again began digging into the cupboards. I tried my best on the slippery surface from my occasional spillages earlier, hoofing it carefully over plates and glasses. Hopping up on my hind legs, sweating profusely, I began to rummage once again. At first, I felt delight as I saw a set of boltcutters... but they would be far too loud. Nopony would miss the distinctive sound they'd make! All the same, I took them out and lay them upon the worktop., Maybe they could—

My back hoof hit a plate and slipped...

My hooves spinning, I felt plate after plate slip off with it, along with some glasses and pots. I went with them, my vision spinning as I dropped wildly off the worktop to thud on my rump upon the floor. My entire backside and torso flared in piercing agony as the punishment from earlier wracked my body, giving rise to a loud squeal and moan. Pots kept falling around me... again and again. It was a miracle I hadn't landed on any broken shards.

My skin crawled however at the single sound I heard... of a chair scraping back and somepony approaching. I just curled up under the mass of broken items and shivered as I heard him enter.

"I... have given you very simple instructions... Number Seven..."

Oh no... please please please no...

"I asked you to stay still and to stay quiet! You are the most useless slave I have ever seen! What part of your orders did you not UNDERSTAND?"

"I... I got scared, Master! I... I thought I saw a radroach and... I tried to climb up the —"

"SHUT UP!"

My Master glared down at me from the doorway. I knew that look. It was a promise. An unspoken declaration.

"Be silent, Number Seven. I expect you to be ready to explain all your insolence after this. I have numerous overseers who require shift work made up, any more of this, and I will see to it that you carry out them all tomorrow. Understood?"

As he turned, I whimpered. After what I was planning, I would likely have to go through that anyway. That had been too close. He was distracted by the meeting, not given the time to carry out his normal punishments.

I had to get out of here... before he warped my mind any more. I had to. I couldn't dare cry, so I threw all the anger into my body and drove myself to my hooves. I had to move before I was pushed down any further. Every punishment I felt breaking me more into my subconscious slavery. Their discussion had been broken. I had a... a little time to drag myself out of here... away from him...

I dragged the stool over again, pulling myself up to the cupboard. There had been a screwdriver up there... there had to be if there were nails. It stood to reason! Silently, I reached in and fished around until I felt my mouth bite on a handle. Yes! A screwdriver! Just what I needed! I wasted no time in hopping down, having to stifle a loud cry at the jerking movement along my back and rump, before sneaking over to the pipe. Nearby to the door, I couldn't make a single sound as I began to work the screwdriver in my mouth... feeling that every annoying loose tooth ache. I cursed it in my mind... always aching whenever I was feeling controlled like some nervous twitch to tell me when... when somepony had control of me!

Carefully... carefully... I slotted it into the first screw holding the segment of pipe to the wall and began to turn. There were four screws. If I could get them off I'd be free! I'd just take the boltcutters with me and cut the chain on my collar's end someplace else when I could. Blinking... feeling fuzzy inside, I got to work.

"Master Shackles, before we go, do you have any estimate on the time to find the Ministry Station in your den?"

The screw worked rusty. I strained, feeling sweat running down my brow and stinging my eyes...

"Hmph... we've done fifty percent of the rough area. If the room containing the records of it hadn't been destroyed..."

"We can't fix that now. How long do you think?"

It began to move... my tongue swirled skillfully, around and around, poking into the handle's concave end to wind the screw slowly out...

"Two weeks at most. If we can get more slaves, especially ghouls, it'll go faster. They work quicker... less affected by any radiation pockets. The ones I've got have been working down there for months constant. They're a bit... heh... droopy."

"You'll get them. Anything else?"

C'mon! The first screw just kept coming and coming. How long was it!? I could hear them ending!

"No... I think that's us..."

There! The screw dropped, the tiny noise I suspected only I had heard. Breathing fast, struggling to keep a grip on the screwdriver, I moved to the second one in a rush.

"Very well then. We'll meet again in a few days to see where we stand for the trip to the mountain mines. Good day to you all."

No no no! I was only on the second of them! Twisting madly, feeling a headache break in and my throat clam up in a dizzy spell, I slipped and dropped the screwdriver completely. NO! Damn my... my disease, it was making me dizzy. Fighting down the coughs, I began scrambling around and got it into my mouth along with a clump of lint it had fallen into from the floor. Retching, I just went back to work. I couldn't hope to not be spotted now! I could hear them all moving out. Wildcard giggled at the 'boring' meeting ending. By the sound of it, he was prancing out of the door.

"Master Shackles, a moment..."

"Yes, Grindstone?"

"Our leader's prodigy... what of him? He survives, yet he knows of your betrayal at the Mall."

My ears listened out, but I was having a lot of trouble with the second screw. The screwdriver wasn't fitting properly. Come ON!

"Heh... don't worry about him. Or the griffon for that matter. He won't be waking up anytime soon, and she's bound by contract not to interfere in the political matters of her employers. If he does wake up... hehe... we'll have him dealt with more... hmm, permanently. He has no real support against the word of those he would accuse anyway. Now, I must return to the Mall. I have a slave to discipline..."

The second screw was wiggling around, far longer than the first. I just tugged at it with my teeth, panic driving me to rip at it until it finally popped out.

"Very well... but I would appreciate it if you had any spares, you might send them to the Ministry? I do need some aid in searching through all the things recovered from the Stable if you have anypony with experience."

"Yes, yes..."

I had no time for the others, shaking so much I could barely see. My hooves reached out and tried to gently bend the pipe outward through its rusted joints so I could slip the loop of chain off. I could hear My Master pacing... he would be coming any second! My hooves strained... my mouth gripping the chain fought to not drop it... the heat in my chest only grew. What was wrong with me? My... my disease hasn't gotten worse this fast since the crater!

I heard metal strike the floor.

I blinked, staring at the pipe for a second before I realised what had happened... I was free... the loop of chain in my mouth. I didn't waste any time. I could hear My Master coming, so grabbing the boltcutters I simply threw myself up and into the elevator... hoofing the control panel's biggest button before tugging every part of the chain in with me. I heard his bellow for what the noise was... before I turned and saw him while I was squeezing into the tiny crawlpace. Behind me, I heard a clank of grinding chains and the smell of dust burning from an engine long abandoned. Come on... come on!

“What... get out of there, slave!”

I began to wriggle around, trying to dislodge whatever brakes were still holding it up, screaming as I saw him charge for me. Whether I was going to obey or not... gravity had other ideas. With a jerk and a creak of torsion wire, the tiny box I'd crawled into dropped. Bit by bit, shuddering and falling before jarring to a halt every few feet, I lost sight of him in a cramped black void. I saw the canteen on Sundial's floor pass by... but it just kept going! I heard screams and bellows for the guards... for the other Masters. My back screamed in agony, as did I in a more literal sense. The chain rattled madly and raked against me as I fell gradually before finally dropping and impacting upon the bottom floor. I didn't waste time... pulling myself free to find a darkly lit worker rest area and desperately tried to combat the maddened coughing fit that all the dust kicked up in my face had started.

Tables and empty chairs lay strewn in a much larger area with multiple fridges and windows looking right out to the shop floor! This was my only chance. I hoped they didn't know what floor I'd gone to, as I heard their hooves clattering away upstairs. Somewhere, somepony let out a whistle to alert others. I wanted to run... but first I had to get these chains off. Drawing the boltcutters as close as I dared to my neck, I leaned my entire weight upon the handles, feeling them close... bend... groan... cut, and then finally...

With a clunk, the chain broke. I fell over them, the sudden cut as they snapped a joint made me fall onto my front. I coughed as my stomach hit the ground, and when I got up I saw blood. I just hoped that was from my cheek wound... but the metallic tang in my throat told otherwise. The scant lights above seemed to glare terribly in my eyes... before I blinked and tried to reassert myself. Had... had that whole kitchen been radioactive? No time to think... I... I had to go...

Staggering, limping, and whimpering on every step of my back hooves, I fled into the shop floor, carrying the boltcutters in my mouth. (They'd be handy for our escape!) Above me, I heard the thunder of hooves on catwalks. I didn't dare look, instead diving between rows of automated workbenches bearing unfinished and blank shoulder plates of Ranger armour. They seemed strange without their decoration and symbols. But my eye was drawn to the far end, where I could see the dull red haze of Fillydelphia's exterior through a gigantic door. A way out!

Around me, across the catwalks, a half dozen slavers began to filter down, the ones who had been closest to the abandoned shop floor responded to the call to search. Three of them, masked guards, carried firearms... the others holding wrenches or bats in their telekinesis. I shrank into the shadows below an old lathe as I saw them immediately head to cut off the exit and stand guard. Above... the sounds of larger ponies, the masters... they would come here soon and clear it bit by bit until they found me!

I looked around to gauge my options, seeing monorails above my head that would carry large slabs of metal to cutting machines on an automated track system. The offices Sundial had worked in looked down upon this place where they had once manufactured the armour, but so much of it seemed ruined with the irreplaceable precision tools destroyed by times long gone by. Hoof-making workbenches filled the far side near large cages of materials. Generators were behind still sparking fences on the other side. In the middle with me, underneath the offices, were the toolstations. Lathes... drills... cabinets... this place was a veritable maze that must have been a nexus of activity back in the day.

Plenty of hiding spots... just not many ways out.

"The shaft went down again! He'll be on the shop floor! Get down now!"

Grindstone's voice was followed by a deafening roar. With horror, I realised they'd set the minotaur on my tail. Fear led to adrenaline. With a quick glance around me, I made a decision and just hoped that it wouldn't backfire like so many of my plans. I wished I had a smart pony like Glimmer or Protégé to tell me what the best idea was... somepony to just tell me what to do so I could follow and do what they—

...said. My mind stalled a little, before I shook my head and grabbed a bag of nails. This had to work.

Behind me, the brutal sound of a double door being ripped off its hinges by something far stronger than even Brimstone Blitz himself was enough of a motivation to get moving.

Breathing was getting more difficult, but I managed to take one big breath before I leapt out into clear view, turned, saw the slavers... and screamed in fear.

All six of them turned immediately, spotting me emerge into the primary path through the manufactory. They started galloping before even shouting.

"That's him! Go! GO!"

"Stay there, little guy!"

Skittering on the smooth stone floor, I turned and galloped for all my worth back the way I had emerged into a small maze of high powered band-saws and lathes. They each had huge, clear perspex cubes surrounding them for safety, creating a very regimented and cramped area to run through. Weaving left and right around them... an almost inefficient route away from them... I came to the far end and turned back... freezing on the spot with my limbs locked as I saw them galloping madly up the main route. A scoped carbine was pointed directly at me.

"That's it! Stay right there! Don't move or I'll— ARGH! ARRRGGGH!"

"FUUUUCK!"

"The hell is-YARGH!"

The six of them collapsed, rolling and screaming as they'd ran directly over my little minefield of spilled nails. Their heavy heads had made them all roll nicely to have the point right in the air, just one more example of the ponies of old not thinking designs through very well. This was probably the same company that didn't think safety rails were a good thing.

I cringed a little as I saw them fall and spike their sides through the leather armour... not to mention the ones embedded in their hooves. Weapons fell to the floor as their concentration broke and telekinesis stopped working. Turning, I ran, picking up the boltcutters from where I'd left them.

"What the hell was that? Where are you all, you blithering idiots?" Grindstone's voice cut down from above. Glancing upward, I saw him standing at the edge of a catwalk with no railings (I knew it!) and pointing a hoof to somepony I couldn't see. But I could sure hear their hooves on the floor.

Along with some rather... bigger... hooves. Galloping back to the main concourse, I headed right for the huge exit. Outside lay the ranks of old vehicles, I could lose them in there! Two shots whized above my head, too high to be anything but warning shots... but the sound still made my heart skip a beat. I stumbled, looking behind me to see a dozen ponies, including the minotaur at the back and My Master leading the way. They were all coming for me.

"I command you to stop, slave!"

Come on, Murky... prove it... prove you can still defy them.

"Stop right THERE, Number Seven!"

Glimmer was waiting, as was Sunny and Unity, and Brimstone and Coral Eve. I had so much work to do still, and if I lost Glimmer, so much of it would fall apart.

"Your Master demands you STOP!"

I couldn't stop now... dare, Murky, DARE! DARE TO DEFY AND RUN!

Crying out in sheer effort, I pushed my skeletal legs as hard as they would go, tearing out to the exterior. The heat and humidity trapped below the stormclouds hit me like a wet cloth to the face. My hooves sunk into the soft, yellowed gravel and kicked it up behind me in little spurts as I made my beeline. Glancing over my shoulder, I saw everypony else gradually catching up me, their longer legs powering them along faster than my own galloping. My lungs seared, my throat burned... I couldn't keep this pace up. I... I had to lose them somehow!

My route went right between two large weapons with massive barrels pointed to the sky. Ducking between and through the harnesses of the cannons, I navigated and pushed myself further into the crudely organised mass of war machines. A feeling all too similar to the first time I had run at the Wall came over me. If... if I failed, the consequences would be dire. But I wouldn't let him be My Master! He wasn't mine! Not My Master... not my f-fa...

The words died in my mind as I tripped, landing in the harsh gravel. Hearing them tear the reigns aside for their larger bodies to fit through. The sound of that dread cyborg abomination assaulted my ears, as I heard it tear at the vehicles and throw entire wagons aside, roaring like some mythical titan.

Slipping and sliding along the gravel, I rushed for the closest wall, hoping they'd be delayed long enough to let me get a proper head start this time! Slipping underneath a sky chariot, I pulled myself to the opposite side, confident no one else would fit through there.

"Where did he go?"

Yes!

"His tracks in the gravel, there! Move, you imbeciles!"

No!

I curved right... then left... then right again. But every time I heard their hooves closing in on the same turns! They were following the soft indents in the gravel I was leaving! Ahead of me, a winding group of more chariots blown away from their original ordered ranks formed a straight run for the wall. A large puddle had formed in the crater around where it had once stood, now a curved breach upon the manufactory's old defences. I could just—

But... no... no I couldn't...

"Follow the tracks! Get him!"

There was no way I could outrun them. I was beginning to flag, my hooves sliding and making huge marks in the gravel. I couldn't... couldn't get the oxygen. I was using too much energy just to keep breathing.

I stopped, leaning against a large ammo crate. Hyperventilating, my head twisted back and forth till my sweaty and straggled mane drooped and flew. I began pacing on the spot, my hooves coming down into the same indents of the gravel each time in sheer panic and-

Ah... aha...

I drew breath, steeling myself as much as I could (sort of a bendy copper at most) as the air drew over my throat, feeling like I was swallowing glass. Sprinting forward, I stomped all over the ground in one big line until I reached the puddle... then began trotting backwards, keeping my hooves carefully inside the imprints I'd just made. I'd... I'd go back to that ammo box and hide, hopefully they'd think I had kept running on! Nerves fraying... feeling like they'd come around the corner any second... I had to balance speed with precision. My vision wavered, pants becoming coughs. Whimpering and whinnying between them, I kept hesitantly stepping backwards.

"He's just around here! Go, go! The tracks you idiots, the tracks!" A slaver was screaming, I couldn't hear the minotaur. It couldn't fit through here. Had they called it off? Where were My Master's stomps? I didn't want to look backwards. I didn't want to turn around and see... and see...

Nothing. He wasn't there, my heart tightened as I began pulling myself up and into the ammo box, checking to make sure none of my false tracks had shown my backward motion. No sooner had I pulled myself in did I hear slavers charge past. I couldn't close the lid. I hadn't had time. I just had to pray they didn't look in.

"Up ahead, he tried to use the puddle! Go, over the wall!" One of the mares screeched, before hooves throwing up the filthy water became all too obvious.

"Spread out! Check all the buildings!"

I gently lowered myself down... my breaths came in ragged gasps. In the distance, I heard Grindstone shouting for his bodyguard to follow. Closer by, I heard—

Stomping. Oh... oh no... he was coming around the corner, slowly... like he knew. I lay still, trying not to shiver and rustle the metal box atop inert shells for the massive barrelled wagons. My eyes were fixed on the opening. My Master would move up to it. Any second, his head would just look in.

I heard him stop... listening. Every skill, every little shred of talent I'd come to cherish to stay hidden, I put into action. Holding my breath, tensing my chest to prevent coughing, hugging myself to not shake so much...

He trotted on... oh thank you Goddesses... you haven't forgotten me after all.

I'd escaped pursuit, if briefly... but now I had a greater task to achieve. RadPurge. Glimmerlight. Hearts and Hooves. The hospital would be easy. I knew a half dozen ways to sneak into it now, but the Mall would be more difficult. With our shop cell's door undoubtedly closed off by now, and no way through the plaza's main entrance, I'd have to get creative. Thankfully, I knew one other way...

I'd just have to push myself to my limits and return somewhere it had terrified me to get away from, though.

Hold on Glimmerlight, just a little while longer. Please be alive. Please. Our escape will come yet, even if you don't want me around after it.

Just... just as soon as I had a moment to catch my breath...

Flowerpot was screaming the entire basement down at my intrusion. I galloped as fast as my rapidly weakening body could carry me, virtually falling into Weathervane's office and knocking his wheeled stretcher across the room amidst a fall from a wracking cough. The room spun and I fell, crying out.

“Weathervane! Doctor Weathervane!”

The basement was, other than the pus choked howls of Doctor Flowerpot, absolutely silent. The dim lights the ghoul used were out. He had to have been on a shift. Left alone amongst the grim jars and confusingly arranged test tubes and apparatus, I knocked the stretcher even further from me with a bark of frustration.

“Oh come ON!” Baring my teeth, I limped around. I’d have to find it for myself. If he even had any.

It was becoming a little worrying how many times I found myself trotting along worktops. In this case, I had to carefully avoid the little bubbling flames hung below steaming jars. I could have sworn I saw something... fleshy... in one. There was plenty of the fluid he used to make more supplies for the, drastically in need, hospital, but I had no idea how to mix them! Syringes of Med-Yes were kept in a heavily locked cabinet like I’d seen in the Ministry of Arcane Whatssits. I wished I could reach one of them for my back, it was draining my stamina far faster than normal as movement became a continual pain. I’d get used to it... before an odd movement would simply flare it up all over again.

The centre worktable was empty, other than the memory projection orb of Twilight Sparkle. I hoped it had helped him.

But I was getting nowhere!

Doctor Flowerpot offered his help. Unfortunately, his help amounted to a throaty roar through the wall with a slam that made the shelves shake.

“Oh... just... just be quiet you stupid... f-f-f...” I felt so much frustration build up, ready to explode verbally, “...fingerpuppet!”

Yeah, that’d tell him!

Almost to my amazement, Flowerpot went back to a gentle growling. It occurred to me how strangely routine his noises in the locked room had become over my time spent dying or healing in this place. But amongst the horrors and pain, I found a chance to sigh and try to smile again. Hah! Weathervane wasn’t the only one who could swear up a storm!

Taking what chance I could, I hopped back to the ground to search his desk instead. I told myself to keep smiling, like I had one with Glimmerlight. I forced a grin onto my face, feeling my cheek sting as the movement shifted the cut from earlier. I tried to ignore it, push away the fact that I was feeling shivery, even though my body and face were warm. Just... smile. I had to keep telling myself, ‘You’re going to get her back... so smile, Murky.’

With a sudden noise in the quiet room, something clattered to the floor the door behind me.

I leapt into the air, squeaking and spinning to face the door. I screamed, seeing two light green eyes staring back at me from the darkness. Falling backward against Weathervane’s desk, I raised my hooves.

“No! NO! Master... please, let me get it to... to...”

In the door, bulbous and bobbing through the air, I saw one of those weird Sprite-Bots staring in at me, two little green lights blinking on its carapace. It glanced to the side at the mop it had knocked over with a careless wing flutter, before seeming to look surprised that I’d spotted it. Without a sound, it turned and fluttered off, leaving me standing rather surprised with that smile still plastered on my face. It had been from trying to cheer myself up, and then of relief that it hadn’t been anything more malicious. My mind wanted to ask the obvious question. What in the Goddesses’ names had it been doing down here!? I made to follow it, to bark a question, but it had already disappeared into the radioactive basement. Presumably, it had just gotten lost down here. I didn't imagine going there any more than I absolutely had to would really help.

Besides, I was on a schedule and for a second I'd... I'd thought... no. Just put him out of your mind. Turning back to his desk, I began rifling through the drawers, feeling only slightly guilty. (He got to ruffle my feathers, only fair.) Theory books, one of those freezing cold things doctors held to your chest, various quills...

I tugged open the first drawer on the other side, finding it empty. I moved to the lowly humming fridge at the back. I'd only seen him store confusing looking things in here before, or bottles. Not any RadAway from his previous huge stash. But the freezing air was a wash of pure delight against the musty air down here. Pity that my body was shivering from fever too much to enjoy it for long...

But there, between two beakers. The dull grey sachet...

A single RadPurge... like he'd been saving it. That thought alone made me hesitate. What if this was like last time and somepony else needed it? No, that time I'd known. This time I... I only had one confirmed pony needing it, I couldn't risk not taking it! Without much hesitation, I bit the cold edge and turned to grab a bag from the hooks where Weathervane's spare medical coats hung. Finding one in my size took a little work, but I eventually settled on a foal's medical drapes tied into a little bag and tied around me with some linen. Gritting my teeth as I pulled it tight over my back and slid the boltcutters through to stop me needing to carry the filthy metal things in my mouth, I knew I'd have to spend time apologising later. I hoped he would understand... Weathervane had a hair trigger, but he did care so much for everypony.

I passed the desk again on my way out, stopping only briefly to see the photoframes. But then I turned, finding there was more than the one I'd seen.

A healthy Weathervane... with a tiny looking Sundial, short stubby legs and puppydog-like eyes sparkling with gentle wonder as his father held him up to feed a monkey on a tree. The little Sundial, grinning wildly, held a hoof to the monkey's head as it fed from some dried fruit in his other hoof. So caring... careful of hoof and focused on it...

Just like his father was with his patients, the similarities between the two, even from stallion to colt, were so striking. From the eyes, their build, and even the soft way they each held the thing they cared for in their hooves...

Biting my lip... finding the oddly difficult impulse to cry wavering at its peak, I couldn't help but feel an intense... longing in my heart. I had to go. I had to move. But for a second, I couldn't deny the sudden feeling.

The stallion that came to mind wasn't mine and it didn't make full sense and... and I knew he wouldn't think it too b-but... I...

Finally, a couple of tears dripped from my eyes.

I really missed having Brimstone around...

Three slavers marched somepony past in chains, dragging them hard enough that their shackled up hooves could barely stride fast or long enough to keep up. Behind them, two griffons swished through the low embankment surrounding the old park near the Mall at high speed, blowing up arcs of ash and dust behind them. Aside from them... it was almost clear.

Almost.

I'd been approaching the Mall from the side of the Ministry of Arcane Sanitis-thingys. The giant high rise that had collapsed across the park formed a colossal barrier, driving me to head through some old gardens of once impressive manors that had bordered the park itself. All their once impressive metal railings had been taken to the forges, leaving their gardens strangely borderless. After seeing few griffons soar over though, I'd taken to hiding within an oddly intact kennel, where I'd since waited as a work party moved into the park to continue digging at the rubble from the high rise... A missing plank in kennel's rear let me watch the few guards that stood over scavengers, and wait for a moment of free space to gallop through...

I'd just seen it.

Shaking my head to clear the fuzziness, fighting temptation to just take a sip of the RadPurge to see myself a little better, I moved out. Dropping into the embankment to avoid their glances, I pushed onward toward the Mall itself by winding through the sturdy manors until out of sight. I no longer had my grapple-gun saddle, but on the way I had dreamt up a little plan to get over the Mall's fence. Rough living in Fillydelphia over the months had given me a certain appreciation for finding uses for what few items I could muster...

As I dropped to a canter, feeling the stress of a full gallop quickly depleting my stamina, I took a second to catch my breath and let the warm dizziness pass. My chest felt immeasurably tight. I could feel a second pulse like... like something else was throbbing right in there. It made me sick to think of that growth on my lungs pulsating and slowly choking the life out of me. That was it... first... first thing after Glimmer was... RadAway. I'd go and raid somewhere or... something...

Slapping a hoof to my face to snap myself back to reality, my staggering stopped. I found I'd wandered, sore, miserable, and sick to almost fall against the slope of the embankment of the park's outermost border. Looking around to check no pony still saw me, I saw the Ministry in the background. Aurora Star's office window was all too easy to spot. Part of me almost wished I'd had more time in there... thinking of Mister Peace sitting alone...

Maybe I could sneak in after this and try to help him out? He'd keep me safe if I could find someplace for both of us...

After another twenty minutes of fast rushes and painfully slow crawling around convoys, the Mall was finally visible ahead. Tired, fighting a headache, and worried for just how long I had with the accelerating disease, I wandered around to the back, finding an unguarded stretch of the low, but razor-wired, wall. Unpacking my boltcutters and the linen sling, I opened the cutters to their full length and wedged a stone between the scissor handles to make sure they couldn't close. With the boltcutters spread at a right angle, I tied the linen around the centrepiece. A makeshift grappling hook...

I took the boltcutters in my mouth and hurled them toward the top. It took many tries, my accuracy being as horrendous as ever... not helped by the times I spent tripping or spending a minute at a time hacking up dark stains upon the rocks. I just had to hold out a short time longer. Just a little more!

It caught! The angle of the cutters handle slipped through the mesh fencing, catching and forming a rough little linen rope to the top of the fence. Using my teeth, wrapping my hooves around the linen and all the strength I could muster I began to pull myself up it. I could hear slavers nearby... but I couldn't turn my head. Just... just don't look here!

Nearing the top, I wound the linen around my hooves tightly and began to use my mouth to push the linen all over the barbed wire to let me roll over the top and drop down. If I hadn't been feeling as fevered as I was and enduring the burn and ache from every joint or the dull ache along my back, I might have felt proud of myself. At the top, I dragged the boltcutters clear with my teeth and tossed them back the way I'd came. My throw landed them into the dark crevice between a couple of old sheds. They would just weigh me down, and there were numerous ways out again. I'd rather have them someplace I could repeat this if necessary. Finally, I dropped down.

My ears pricked up. If I focused my hearing, I could make out the sound of hooves wading through the thick, goopy mud the storm had left. The slavers were coming around the corner of the building. Picking up the RadPurge and cutters, I wasted no time in rushing forward and hiding behind the Mall's old power boxes near the wall, shimmying myself into the small gap. Sure enough, a couple of mares trotted by, exchanging hushed conversation on their clearly boring shift. Lucky for some.

Stopping to pull at my collar, I could feel the red marks and sores below it already forming. They stung to touch, chafing against the collar when I moved. I needed to get this done quickly, before all the sickness kicked in bad.

Now to get in.

I'd been deliberately ignoring this part. Meekly, tripodding my way forward with one hoof clutched to my painfully convulsing chest, I wandered past where Flippy Bit had met his untimely door-related demise and unsteadily made my way to the fire escape, feeling ready to faint at any moment.

There was just one way in I knew...

Three... two... one and a... a half... one and a qu-qu-quarter... one... a bit less than one...

Forget it... GO!

I heaved and pulled the stiff doorway open, throwing myself inside before I had time to think about the mind numbingly stupid thing I'd just done. The dusty room's musk blew into my face, made me squint my eyes, and blew outward into the city as I simply galloped inside and for the vent before it woke up!

I slipped and stumbled over the masses of used food packets and cans upon the floor, that small vent all too promising in my vision. I didn't dare even look... but I heard it. Like an exhale of dead air, dry and throaty... building to a distended mouth's horrid howl...

I leapt for the vent, my hind legs kicking madly as I tried to pull myself up and into it. With a look over my shoulder, I saw the ghoul janitor throw its body around to get its rotten legs below it, scrambling and pulling its ruined body toward me from beside the door where it had lain to rest since my last departure. I screamed, screamed, and screamed again as I failed to lift my own weight. C-come on! Couldn't I even do a single pull up!?

My leg found a box to the side of the vent that I could use for some support. Pushing up with a hind hoof, I tugged myself into the vent even as I felt it gnash at my tail. Still crying out with every short, stammered breath, I kept dragging myself with my forelegs until I was clean away from the entrance and crawling deeper into the vent.

Behind me, the gnashing sound of the ghoul's mouth was all too audible as it leapt toward the vent entrance, snapping in again and again. It only got more frenziedly the further I pulled myself back with its rotten hooves clawing and thumping away at the lip. The sight over my shoulder made me freeze on the spot... before the coughing fit finally came.

I matched its spasm-like movements, convulsing as pain racked every side of my body and blew small wisps of blood. My vision whirled, and I felt myself falling. I didn't feel the impact.

Dizzy, hearing distance noises and feeling a pounding in my skull, I opened my eyes to realise I had blacked out for a few seconds. H-how... I... I wasn't in radiation!

Slowly, not helped by the howling of the beast screaming in at me, the nausea passed. Breathless and sweat stained, I shivered and felt even my abused back and rump simmer down in comparison. I just needed a second...

A horrible sound. One of the most, in context, terrifying ones I'd ever heard began to make itself known. That of the duct thumping a lot closer. Wide eyed, I curled around to look into the darkness... and shrieked. My Master was staring right in at me... reaching... clawing and stretching to pull me back to him! Curling up, I closed my eyes. But an unbidden command forced me to open and look again.

Somehow, I didn't even know how, the ghoul had gotten into the duct and was slithering... gasping and howling for me, pulling itself through the cramped confines toward me. What... oh Goddesses! What was wrong with me!?

"NO! GO BACK!" I'd screamed out of fear, nothing else. It didn't listen. My hooves kicked into action, pulling myself back and away much slower than I'd have liked. Desperately, I began pulling and frantically crawling backward away from it. Gurgling, the janitor didn't give up the chase, keeping pace with the sickened, weak pony it so desperately wanted. I reached a two-way junction before panicking. Which way had I come the first time? What... oh Goddesses what if there was a dead end!? But I had no luxury of time. I just picked instinctually and kept crawling. I glanced back to find the horrible hanging jaw and the distended tongue swinging and swaying mere feet from my hooves. The beast tugged itself ever closer, its eyes glowing a hideous green. How was it moving so fast!? This was a nightmare!

I was so intent on the ghoul that I nearly dropped into the same pitfall I had last time. My rump almost disappeared below me before I caught myself and tugged my frail body over the hole of the downward plunging duct. Twisting painfully, dragging my back against the wall, I saw the ghoul move closer. It stretched out to grab me and clambered past the gap. Why couldn't it be stupid and just fall in!? I lashed out with a hoof as its own neared my leg, cracking its already broken nose. I kicked again and again, watching it lose balance and struggle.

One more bucking kick, normally reserved for the nether regions, made it slip. The howl of hungry rage as it descended into the darkness below made me shiver. That had nearly been me...

I wanted another minute to pant and recover, but I didn't have time. Not to mention that the screaming of the trapped ghoul was only making me feel worse. Clambering on, I knew I had at least one more ordeal before I finally... finally got to Glimmer. Feeling my wing, wincing to the touch, I at least knew my drawing was there... pathetic and insultingly bad as I knew it was, it was all I had.

I was, however, pausing now.

I knew this hole. The grate through which I could drop... I knew it, because I could still see my blood spilled upon the same floor I had cleaned.

His office. My prison.

He wasn't home. But I knew my luck. If my cutie mark and its foul destiny willed it, he'd be ready to come out of the wall or something the moment I dropped down there.

Already, throughout the Mall I could hear screams and shouts. The horrid thing was I couldn't tell the difference between the slavers taking orders to watch out for me and the slavers taking advantage of the slaves they now had under their absolute will in My Master's foul version of this place. It all just... meshed together, a chorus of Fillydelphia. But at least my route would avoid them for all but the absolute last moments.

Carefully, I dropped down. The landing... could have been more careful. Although I landed on his bed, the shock through my legs buckled my back, splitting the clotted blood on my back all over again. Crying out, I dropped to my side upon the bloodied floor, only adding to it all the more. My voice grew hoarse. I croaked painfully as I pressed a hoof behind me and held a scrap of linen torn from his bed against the wound. I could feel how... bumpy... my back seemed. The feeling revolted me, almost enough to make the rushing fever and running nose feel inconsequential.

There was a moment of silence as I bit my sore lip and listened carefully. I expected it any second... the sound that would imply he was approaching. It always happened. This had been too easy thus far. (If I forgot the ghoul, which I was very keen to.) But there was nothing. Standing weak, with my lashed back and rump, bleeding cheek, swollen brow, and a headcold with my sickness getting worse every few minutes... I just had to keep pushing. All my things were still here, to which I gratefully pulled my fleece and saddle on. It stung... but the soft material just made me feel better to cover up my wings again. No pony had to see them... I'd been lucky thus far with them on show. Everything else I hid in my saddlebag, slipping the boltcutters through the fastenings of my battle saddle opposite the grappling hook.

I touched Unity's statuette of Littlepip for luck, seeking any form of belief I could hold on to. I wasn't going to waste time and... and...

Before I knew what I was doing, I found myself fixing his bed after I had landed on it. Afterwards, I would tell myself it was to try and cover my tracks. But even I knew there were no illusions who would have taken my things.

As I shot the hook back into the ducts again, I screwed up my eyes and tried to pretend I'd just made a mistake about that... to pretend it hadn't been for the... the other reason.

Last bit... last bit and I was gone. 'You've come this far, Murky', I told myself. Just a... little... further...

This part was not going to be easy.

The plaza was heaving. Slaves were being brought in, vast quantities of them. I wondered if their 'Mountain Task Group' was gathering here before their request was put in... for as I stared out of the air duct Brimstone had lifted me into days ago, I could see no real way through.

A column was being marched past my hiding spot, upstairs toward the higher levels. Many of them carried that sooty looking residue, as though they'd been working in the rest of Fillydelphia's mines before being brought here. My Master was really calling in all his favours over the slavers to amass so many. Already, I dreaded how many were being sent to the unending underground hell of the metro. Behind them, I saw cages filled with more ponies than I'd ever seen in this place, no doubt to impress upon Red Eye that they could resume more important missions. I could only guess to get the choicest loot for their little 'group' before any other slaver. They really were making a big move... getting rid of Protégé through false info leaks and betrayals had only been the beginning...

Red Eye's potential for a greater military force had astounded me. But now I found myself in stark astonishment at the sheer ambition My Master was clearly holding to seek favour from Red Eye for power...

Glimmer's shop cell was in the main ground floor. If I dropped out now, I only had to go down half a flight of stairs, get to the bars, pass my apology through... say... say whatever needed said... and go. Straight back. Once in the ducts I'd be safe... er.

But there was only one way through here... I'd have to try and blend in.

Because that had always worked out in the past...

Awaiting the column to consist entirely of slaves and not slavers... or at least till the procession blocked sight, I hopped out of the duct and walked morosely downstairs with my head hung like all the others. Some of the slaves looked up at me... but simply seeing another little pony who had been battered around, they didn't pay me any heed. Thank the Goddesses I'd thought to get my fleece on!

"Hey, watch it, runt!" A hoof shoved me against the wall, staggering on my exhausted legs, I slipped down and covered my head. The movement felt far too natural. Sadly... that sort of thing was fairly common in my life. But it let me creep away faster with a valid reason to do so, cantering down the rest of the stairs into the main plaza. It had changed even more in the few hours. Scrap-built scaffolding had formed bridges from one balcony to another on the higher levels, which were gated on either side and held long rifle armed unicorns who swept their barrel around far too readily. The incinerator had really got going, belching its smoke in thick clouds to the wired cage roof while I could see slaves being forced to work away on stone chipping, sewing or other small tasks even in their rest periods.

The bustle gave me a good shot to stay hidden. Falling in amongst a group beside an elderly earth pony (How had they ended up in here?) I matched their pace as it slid along the wall, passing shop cell after shop cell. The heat in here from that incinerator wasn't helping my dizziness. Twice, I stumbled. More times, I coughed. But I swallowed the bitter air and kept going. So... close...

"You all! Halt!"

My hooves froze. It was My Master's assistant, what was he called? Wormtail? I saw him march across the ground, before turning to an entirely different group. I was about to feel a little happier until I saw who was with him. Wildcard. My Master was obviously moving him into a role that Barb had once had until he likely had become too much of a threat. At least you would see (or hear) Wildcard coming. Even now, he was whistling as though nothing in the world was wrong around him. What was that tune? Four short whistles then a long one? The same again... then four long ones.

Forcing myself to ignore it... I made the last short hop and pressed my face to the bars.
"Glimmer!"

My hopes fell. There was nothing... nopony. The cell door sat open, not needed while they had been taken to a shift. My heart felt like it had been... been crushed. Sliding down the bars, I lay on the floor before it for a few seconds. No... she... she should have been here! I needed this! She needed this!

Slowly, I drew out my package for her, wrapped in linen. Wishing I could sob, I brought out my drawing carefully and slid the edge into a fold of linen. She... she would find it... she'd know it was from me...

Wandering inside the cell, I moved into the back and set it down on her side of the couch. She'd find it. I stared for a long time at the drawing... just hoping she'd come in behind me and be surprised... but I only heard more cries of those thrown into the yet unknown pits outside. The door out back had been blocked up. I just held the picture and stared...

It was meant to be Glimmerlight and... and Brimstone and Coral and... and what I remembered Coral's son to be like from the memory. Caduceus too... Leafshine like she'd asked me and... and even what I imagined her parents were like. Strong and tough Steel Rangers but still caring for their daughter.

But I'd messed up so much... her mother and father were in the wrong jobs, I'd done her father as the paladin and her mother as the scribe. Caduceus' little glasses looked weird and messed up his eyes. Brimstone was freakishly huge, even more than he should be. None of them scaled right... I could see curves wrong or... or how I'd made Coral's son look too fat and... and...

The three words stared up at me. Those three words I'd hoped would mean it.

'I'm sorry, sis...'

They had once been an apology for... for not realising and saying the wrong things.

Now they were simply an apology for making everyone she ever loved look stupid on this drawing.

I turned and left.

I still wished I could cry again.

Trotting back out, I made to sneak back to the duct and slink off into the night. I'd try and hang around the Mall and see if I could spot her looking any healthier. But with such a pathetic apology, she'd likely not care to see me. Even after what Coral Eve said.

Depression was hitting hard, but even it wasn't enough to stop all the burst of adrenaline I felt at who I saw the moment I left the shop cell. A new wave of slaves had been brought in; all of them thin and hungry. They were sat around the fountain, waiting to be told where to go. I spotted the fiery and earthy two-tone mane immediately. Sunny was among them. Part of My Master's stock, I had figured I'd keep bumping into her while I was around him too.

The decision was reached in my head before my hooves even started moving. I didn't head for the duct. No, I went forward, weaving around the confinement pits. There was a silver lining to all this confused running! I could turn this into something good! Hope flared up in my heart, I could check one thing off my grand objectives!

"Sunny!" I whispered as loud as I dared. She was staring at me, but didn't reply immediately. Her mouth gaped, moved and finally seemed to break through into speech again.

"M-Murk? Why are you..."

I couldn't stop myself, I hugged her.

"L-listen, I'm not meant to be here, but we can go! Me and you. Like we planned!"

"Go where...?"

My eyes were starting to cast around. We didn't have the time to discuss it, already I could see Wormtail and Wildcard coming far too close for comfort. Was that raider being a bodyguard or just enjoying the sights from that mad half twisted smirk? I lightly tugged her arm, almost feeling sick at how quickly she'd gotten so thin. I'd been born to it, and my friends I'd met after they'd been in there, but she'd been a healthy wasteland veteran not too long ago.

"Out of here! Hide! Escape! Come on, we can sneak out in the ducts now you're so, uh, so thin..."

She might have made a little joke about that, I was trying to give her reason to quip or snap at me a little. But the almost blank look she gave me simply broke my heart for the poor mare. I really wanted to give Doc Minstrel a good square buck between the legs for leading her to this, had he still lived.

"O... okay..." Her voice was soft, before she gritted her teeth. "I need out. Need to get... get my gun and... and shoot that... that..."

Yes! That was the attitude! I nodded furiously, before wincing in pain and confusion at the world blurring before my eyes. "Follow me, we'll go get your gun, Sunny."

I hoped I could find one. But that wasn't important. What was important was how she reacted, standing up warily beside me. Cautiously, we began to retrace my steps as a sense of growing momentum began to overtake me. We would do this! With somepony else I could talk to, we could find a way to help the others too. I'd be taking Sunny away from My Master too. We would both be defying him! We sped up, trotting around a group of slaves being pulled from their shop cell. I kept my grapple gun facing away from any slaver, direly hoping they wouldn't see it.

"Everypony halt!"

Wormtail's annoyingly nasal voice snailed out and was noticed only through how downright insipid it was compared to having any real power. It took everypony a few seconds to obey, compared to the freeze frame on life My Master could pull off with a shout. I sensed Sunny stopping behind me. Turning, I shared a look with the dusty coloured mare. Only now that I got a chance to look, her brow now bore the horrid scar of a lash wound, much like my back. I could only imagine who from.

"We're one short! One shooort! That's one less for you idiots! Where are they?"

Oh shit! I permitted myself to blaspheme in my own mind as the stunned look we shared made it all too obvious who he meant.

"Come on! Oooown up! Where are they? I know numbers and I know how to count! This is... this is highly dis-satisfactory!"

Was he serious? I could even see a slaver slap his gas mask with a hoof above us. Wormtail began to move around the middle group, asking them who had gone. We didn't have much of a chance.

I glanced to either side of the plaza. The duct was only about twenty feet away, but if we moved we'd be spotted. If we didn't we would be too.

Only one way. Dare.

"Sunny... y-you ready?"

"I'd rather be shot than continue this, Murk..." Her voice sounded so fragile now, like she was terrified of having been brought to that point.

Staring into each others worn and red tinged eyes, we turned and galloped for the duct.

"THERE THEY ARE!" The new bridge guards had us in a second, screaming out to the rest.

My legs ached, I could see Sunny tearing up at a pain in her leg as she fought to push forward. We dashed around slaves, leapt over those lying down and Sunny even barged a slaver out of the way!

Ten feet! Just up the stairs now!

"Block them in! BLOCK THEM!" Wormtail screeched over the commotion. The slavers above held fire, likely from the mass of targets their Master wanted kept alive too well. But ahead of us, we almost ran directly into a block of heavily armoured slavers rushing to guard the stairwell. The duct was blocked!

To my credit, my panic was now only five seconds long instead of ten. Reaching out to grab Sunny, I pointed to the opposite and unguarded stairwell. One slaver leapt a pack of slaves with his back hoof catching one in the face to stop us. Yelling in pain from the action, I dived to half slide and half roll underneath him. Sunny took advantage of his stumbling over me to shove him into a mass of weary looking bucks who'd grouped together. The slaves simply stared in astonishment.

Reaching the stairs, we found even more slavers rushing down. Screeching to a halt, surrounded, I looked up and again while trying not to keel over and give up. But my eyes found the balconies.

"Sunny, grab hold!"

She stared at me for a second, before doing as I said. "I really hope you know what you're doing, Murk!"

"So do I..." I murmured, hopping up to point toward the balcony, flipping out my mouthpiece and firing the hook to catch on the scaffold bridge. Biting hard upon the trigger as soon as I saw it wrap around, the tension strength almost surprised me as both our wasted bodies flew upward, tugging hard on my back.

I couldn't scream, I had to keep my mouth shut on the trigger! Together, we flew up above the slavers and wound quickly onto the bridge. One slaver above tried to catch us, but just received Sunny's desperately swung hoof in his face for his troubles. Sunny held him down while I clambered over the edge and got untangled from the scaffold with panicked hooves; then we galloped on.

We'd run to where I'd fought Barb near the roof and use my grapple to pull us out through the hole! That cage wire couldn't be too tough and I wanted to bet that Barb's knife was still up there from stabbing Protégé to cut with! Glancing back, I saw slavers fighting through the slaves to chase us with clubs, whips and (making me shiver) chains. Briefly, I saw Wildcard running up the opposite stairs we'd tried for. Well... all right then, whatever floats his boat...

We passed a cart of pipes for constructing the scaffold bridges, one that we spun and, as one, bucked down the stairs. An almighty clatter that assaulted even my ears rung out as dozens of heavy pipes thundered into the chasing slavers. We went higher, entering that darker stage of the enclosed stairwell. Behind us, I could hear more of the slavers beginning to cluster on the balcony and be shouted at to give chase. But the pipes had slowed them, hurt them. Every single item we found, either Sunny or I turned to hurl at the individual pursuers. The door was just up ahead, but a faster unicorn tossed the projectiles out the way with his magic and began to catch up with us, charging up the stairs. Squeaking as he went for me I pulled my mouthpiece trigger again to fire the hook into his chest before retracting it. The projectile blew him off his hooves to crash into two more behind him. I glanced at my grapplegun as it retracted.

“W-wow... gotta remember that idea...”

I felt Sunny pulling me as we pelted into the darkened room, she slammed the door shut before we worked together, our frail bodies offering just enough to push a work cabinet in front of it.

“What’s the plan, Murk? You do have a plan?”

“Y-yes... kinda. Make s-sure it stays shut, I need to hunt around.”

Hearing the slavers beating on it harshly, I turned back to the nightmarish generator room. It still haunted me, being chased by somepony in the dark and hearing Protégé scream in pain like that.

Now, to find that damn knife! It had to be here some—

“Surprise, everybody!”

I ran directly into a hoof. My head stayed where it was as my body kept running beneath it, bending me back to twist over and collapse to the ground with a bloody nose. Another stomped down into my gut, driving what little air I could manage right out of me along with a spray of misty blood. Through my darkening vision, I saw a multicoloured mane and mismatched eyes erupt from behind a generator and surge right toward Sunny.

The mare spun, instincts no slavery could kill driving her into the counterattack from a life on the harsh roads of Equestria. Her hooves flew out, but were simply batted aside like any child before one of Wildcard’s front hooves slapped across her face, throwing her to the ground. He began kicking lightly at her.

“Get up! C’moon! Get up! Get up get up get up! Come on, gimme a good performance! Be a star, get up and fight!”

I saw her in danger. I’d handled Barb. I could push myself to help a friend from this nutjob! Lifting at least my front half up, I bit hard on the mouthpiece, firing the hook directly for him. Feeling the jolt of firing, the hook soared forward like a long range punch... before curving away in a glow of magic. Wildcard’s horn sparked, my own hook soaring around to come right back at me, spin around and around to wrap up my legs, lift up, and drop me on my back... hogtied. Gasping in the pain of the drop, I fell to the side and saw him just laughing.

“Unicorn brawlers, huh? Pretty fun things. See, somepony told me a unicorn couldn’t be that, so I tore his throat out with my horn. Then I realised that was a pretty bad move, couldn’t tell me he was wrong, you see?”

His magic surged, flaring brightly with that vomit yellow colour to slam me into the generator before arcing across to grab Sunny’s backward double buck by her hooves and lift them from the floor. His own counter buck spun and slammed into her chest. I heard something crack, but I couldn’t even scream myself as the impact to my head only felt heavier and more painful.

I didn’t even see the end of the fight. I passed out far too early, the last sight of a unicorn combining his telekinesis and earth pony like brawling into one hurricane of brutality. The powerful demonstration making me realise that it’d be a long while before I was truly free of Brimstone’s past still hurting the present.

Consciousness brought only a deathly feeling.

Even before my vision came back... I could feel my throat gurgling and full. My chest was convulsing like I'd swallowed a parasprite. A windpipe that seared and burned inside me along with a head that felt like it had been split open. I was cold... shivering. Everything felt wet... I'd been stripped again...

Sunny... I... had to go get...

My limbs felt restricted... they couldn't move far from below me. Was that... mud? Damp? Stinging... the rain? Where... where was...

"Wakey wakey, Number Seven..."

No... no... don't be awake! Faint, faint Murky! Fall into the black and just don't wake up!

"I said... wake up!"

A hoof hooked around my forehead, tugging it up and back. There was no hiding it as I groaned loudly at the rather large swelling on my forehead being handled roughly. I didn't want to open my eyes... but I had no choice. The groaning turned to a horrid cough... I was... was very sick... like before in the crater. I could feel it bubbling in my throat... feel the loss of breath and heady fever taking grip. I... I didn't have long...

My Master was staring down at me. From underneath a sheltered umbrella upon a stand in the ground, he was backlit by the flare of sheet lightning above us every few seconds. But those green eyes... they were never-ending.

"There we go..."

"Pl... please..."

He grunted, dropping my head to flop back down into the mud, my mane lying soaked around me.

"Don't even start, slave. Now before I begin to say anything, I advise you look around you..."

Almost not wanting to... I did look around, moaning from a stiff neck and the dizziness from just looking. There was...

Nothing.

We were alone. I didn't even recognise this place. A large expanse of barren wastes in a clearing between abandoned buildings. Thick mud gooped beneath me and him, water slid off the nearby rooftops like waterfalls. The umbrella was keeping it from falling, but already there were many large puddles formed around us... some of which seeped underneath me and stung horribly. But to my horror... I saw that I was chained to the ground by every limb and once again attached by the collar to My Master.

Even with just shifting my weight, the pressure of the collar gave rise to a horrid spontaneous amount of choking and coughing when my chest spasmed. Eyes rolling over, curling up as best I could from being staked down... I whined and cried for help from my sickness... I cried for Weathervane. I needed... needed RadAway... now!

Then I saw it... right beside him. Right within my reach was an orange sachet. Still hacking and dry heaving, I began to pull myself toward it, please, Master I needed it!

Chuckling, his hoof slowly pushed it back out of the way... out of my reach.

"Oh no... disobedient slaves don't get treats, Number Seven..."

"I..." My sentence was cut short by another cough. "I... I need it, M-Master... to liiive, please..."

My head was grabbed, forced to look up at him.

"You disobey me! You run from me! You try to take another of my slaves and now you say you want more? Are you so greedy, Number Seven? She was sent to the metro for her punishment. You are here as your punishment! My punishment of you... and oh... you will not be getting away so easily this time! NOW BE QUIET AND LISTEN!"

Holding my ears, shivering and whining as he bellowed into them, I was cowed into shrinking back from the needed medicine. I heard My Master chuckle at the submissive reaction, before patting me on the head.

"I figured you might try something like this, Number Seven... I figured. It's why I offered a little insurance policy..."

"W-Wildcard, Master?"

He sneered. "Oh... oh no, he was useful, yes. But in the end you would never have gotten far. You must be wondering why you kept slowing down... getting sick... always worse and worse despite your own medicine. Well... that was my assurance that you need me. A RadAway a day... the doctor's told me. Easy to find for a determined pony. But a three RadAways a day? Oh... much much harder..."

"Th-three... Master?" I wanted to cry, feeling my chest rise and fall and swell and hurt and... and... "Wh-what have you d-done to me...?"

That sick cackle and sneer, my head was lifted, before I felt his hoof tapping something.

My collar.

"It's a wonder of what you can find in an old contaminated prison right beside the crater, Number Seven. A collar irradiated enough to keep slowly killing you... over and over and never ceasing its work to end your life. Not enough to harm those around you but just enough to make that growth of yours much worse... hehehe. Just enough that you need somepony who can get anything he requires to keep his favourite little slave alive..."

I wanted to be... to be sick. Not just from the disease but...

My hooves touched the collar, trying to pull it off. My eyes stung... I felt hollow inside. All... all this time he'd been... been making it worse. He'd locked me into a killing collar! I fell to the side, screwing up my eyes and trying to cry as best I could... but I only spluttered and spat. I could subconsciously imagine it... magical radiation particles eating away at me... slipping into my throat every second. The red sores and rashes all around my throat made so much more painful sense now...

Oh... Goddesses please... somepony! Lift me out of here... I didn't want this anymore! Please!

"Please... Master I... I'm dying... now! Please, can I..." The words felt foul in my mouth, but already my vision was fading. I didn't have a choice. "Please... can you... you give me some RadAway..."

That mocking chuckle made every inch of me crawl in disgust. I felt him pat my head again, like I was some sort of little child.

"Oh we will... we shall ensure you will be kept alive so long as you obey. But first there is your punishment for all you've done, my boy."

My mind rebelled. Do not call me that.

"I told you, I'm not a torturer, Number Seven. I don't sadistically harm ponies for my amusement. Control them? Oh yes... I do love my little subjects... but I don't aim to hurt them. Many just... heh... can't handle the job. No... your punishment is not to be harmed."

My body kept shifting, convulsing and tugging against the bars which he'd chained my limbs to. Then why... why outside and chained into the mud so alone? But then I saw his eyes narrow, before reaching into his own armour's pockets to pull something out and drop it before me.

My journal.

"Oh no... you won't be punished with whips or beatings, slave. I am a merciful Master sometimes... I only ask that you do one thing."

He leaned down, those yellowed rotting teeth inches from my face and staring intently at me as I writhed in the mud, caked and soaked amongst it.

"You will draw me."

The journal was pushed forward. I recoiled, trying to force myself away from it. No! NO! Drawing was... was my only real freedom! NO! I wouldn't... I couldn't!

"Please... Master, s-something else... I'll do more shifts!" I turned, begging to him and trying to ignore that knowing smile that he had me in a figurative corner.

The wind blew the sheet rain in under his shelter, soaking me from the side all over again and stinging my wounds badly. But he only kept smiling.

"No... you will draw."

"I can't anymo—"

The thunder rolled above me, but as quickly as it went... he was on me. Screaming, I felt the rain wash over me as I was pushed out from under the shelter into the torrent of lightly burning rain upon my back. Thrown side to side, roughly handled and aggressively controlled, I was pressed to the ground... a brown muddle went before my eyes... before my head was pushed forcefully into it. Mud sloshed across my face, blocking all air as the liquid flowed into my nose and mouth. I flailed, panicking and trying to move. But his hoof stamped down... pressing my face into the water as it bubbled and splashed around me. I... I couldn't breathe! Mud went down my throat... I coughed and swallowed the dirty water... I... he was drowning me! Smothering my face to—

Air! The pressure released, I choked and spat, falling to the side. Groaning and hacking up wads of wet mud... I felt myself sink slightly as the rain kept pouring down into the recess I'd made in my frantic kicking. My entire body was quaking... all too ready to expire. Then I saw the journal slide before me again... that umbrella following it.

"You will draw or you will die, Number Seven! This is your punishment! To prove to me that you are willing to be my slave! That you submit to your life here by using your freedom to choose this drawing... to complete me in your life!"

His behemoth like stature flared and silhouetted in the lightning. I could see his giant weight actually sunk a little into the mud. My chains slid and turned brown under it all as I just looked up and tried to shake my head.

"But... I... I lost the ability. I can't draw any more..."

He didn't even reply. I just felt him reach for my head and move toward the puddle again. Screaming, I wasn't even given a chance to close my mouth before my face was splashed into it again. It lasted longer, all thoughts blurring into a vague nothing... my thinking slowing and turning more to almost hallucinogenic colours and silver shapes that spun and twinkled even through closed eyes.

Then suddenly... the sky. I hadn't even realised he had pulled me out from the torture again (Damn whatever he said about it!) and laid me on my back. Again... the journal was pressed near.

I couldn't take another drowning... I actually couldn't. I could feel my life hanging by one fraying thread... awaiting the unconsciousness before I would drown not of mud but of my own blood that even now I could feel clogging my lungs from the swelling taint growth. Shivering... I looked from my chains... to my journal... to My Master... to the sky and to my own cutie mark.

I thought of all the others. What would they will me to do? To do this? But I had to live... for them. Please... please let me... let me see past this...

Slowly, I reached for the provided charcoal and moved to a clean page...

"Good, Number Seven..."

Ignore him! I shook... the charcoal rolling against my loose tooth before I gently bent down and... and began to...

...draw.

L-l-lines... corrupted lines I never wanted to do became... they became c-c-curves and...

They grew bigger, stronger. Outlines taking more prominent priority and then whispering inward with quick flicks. I had to pick up the charcoal as I kept coughing... but always came back to it... feeling his hoof stroking almost lovingly over my mane.

Curves grew and joined up to... to make the next bit... the same mantra, the ongoing routine I'd always held and used. The one that had been broken now came back. They became shapes...

The little details flushed, glaring up at me. My eyes burned with the effort to cry... but his orders somehow stopped me doing so. Terror flowed through me. For my life... for my freedom and will to be my own pony. I didn't want to do this! But the mud trickling from my face and mane that dripped over the paper only reminded me of what awaited... as if drowning in my own blood wasn't bad enough.

The shapes they... horribly... slowly and maliciously...

They came to life.

I sat back, shaking more than any point in my life as I saw My Master examine it. My breath was shallow... fast... please, I've done what you want, give me the RadAway please!

The journal was lifted... and I could see what my own subconscious had done.

I'd drawn. Properly and with all the old talent I had... but now used only for drawing the things I was commanded. Was... was that it? I had lost my own freedom of mind? That I could only draw what I was told?

For before me... I saw My Master upon my own journal. Now immortalised and carved in my mind's eye. Huge, authoritative, and a presence beyond scale upon my life. He stood protectively there, grinning that grin. His eyes all too familiar and his own scar identical to... to...

The pony I'd shown eternally attached to him...

My Master stood protectively above me... his one large hoof wrapped over the little slave I'd drawn, keeping him close. The way a father would do for his... s-s-...

...son.

I didn't say a word. Neither did My Master. He simply looked to the drawing... before grinning... turning to a large smile. Slowly, he hoofed across the RadAway that I took and bit away the seal of to hold my life in the balance. It'd take a few minutes to work... I still felt weak as I felt him stroking my mane while I drunk.

“There, there... now you’re learning... let’s go back home, shall we? Your time has only just begun Number Seven... you have yet to begin true slavery under me. But I’ll be nice before you start... I’ll even let you into the plaza where you can tell your friends, because you’ve done so... well...”

The chains were released... all but two. The one around my neck and...
...and the one around my soul.

Coral Eve tried her best. She really did. But as we lay together in her cell, I just couldn’t do much but cling to her and shiver. In her motherly embrace, she cooed and softly whispered, sensing a buck in need even if he wasn’t a child anymore. She had cleaned me of the mud, helping to wash away some of the physical stains and help my back.

But after I had told her, I think even she knew that it would take a lot more than a little hug to really help how I was feeling.

My ear twitched... I’d heard something. A little tap upon the bars. Not like the batons like somepony might knock on a door.

I looked up, attracting Coral Eve’s attention.

“What is it?” Her voice betrayed worry for the two of us, having found ourselves in a mutual state of simply needing anypony else who could be there for them.

I didn’t speak... I simply got up and began to trot out the room. Her two cellmates glared at me... but wisely kept their distance. Coral Eve held some real fear factor over them. But my eyes only saw what awaited.

Near the bars, I could see a small package with a sheet of paper sticking out of it. I trotted carefully over... slowly unpacking it to find two bottles of water and a little of the preserved soup from long ago. With baited breath, I opened up the paper... I recognised it... I knew it...

The drawing of... of all of us. Terrible as ever and bearing all the mistakes. She’d... she’d returned it...

But it held something new.

Amongst it all, between her and Brimstone, in somepony else’s style of rough scratchings more used to diagrams than real drawing... I saw... myself. I had been added to it all right beside her. I felt my eyes go wide... surprise...

Below it were two words I couldn’t read, below the three I had on it.

Coral came out behind me, looking over my shoulder in surprise, a hoof resting carefully on my neck.

“W-what does it s-say?” I stammered...

“It says—” but she stopped. Looking up.

Before us, emerging from the shadows of the plaza... weary... hungry looking and barely recovered from sickness. She wore her torn red robes, her pink mane fallen around her head and before sullen eyes that already held tears.

“It says... ‘me too,’ Murky.”

My hooves shook, dropping the drawing to push forward as we met at the bars, nuzzling and reaching through in the best approximation of a hug we could manage.

“I’m so sorry!” I squeaked, finally feeling relieved tears begin to fall from my eyes. Finally. “For... for it all and... and sorry the picture was so bad! I got it all wrong and I hoped and...”

Her hoof touched my mouth, stopping me. Her tired but oh-so-trying to be happy eyes glared to mine with the best smile she could manage.

“Murky, dear... I don’t care how good or bad you think it was. I care that you did it. That you took the time to do this for me. That’s all that matters...”

Behind me, I felt Coral move up to be beside both of us... animosity briefly forgotten for this one moment at least. Glimmerlight looked to her.

“Thank you, Coral... for taking care of him.”

Coral Eve merely nodded, her hoof resting on me as I held my friend.

We had a lot to talk about... to work out. Things wouldn’t be perfect immediately between us all and... and I knew I definitely wasn’t the same. I’d lost so much to the world around me. I knew I’d been knocked back... devoid of what my friends had given me and my growing personality.

But for now... I had a sister again. The family I had chosen for myself.

The Only Way Out

“Will I lose my dignity? Will somepony care? Will I wake tomorrow from this nightmare?”

“What is it like to be without hope?”

Do you know that feeling? Like, when you’re about to have something done to you that you can’t possibly hope to change and there’s that one horrible moment of clarity when you realise ‘this is really happening, and I can’t stop it?’ As though you’re strapped into a... a... rollercoaster about to go over a horrible dip, but you can’t get out? But worse because you know it’s going to be something terrible.

“Not to sound like I’m trying to lessen what you’re saying but... yes. I do.”

Then you know what I mean. The first time I ever felt it was years ago as a foal, when three slaves held down my legs and pulled my wing across the cold metal of an anvil. Time froze for one horrible second when I saw him raise the hammer and an icy inevitability ran right through me when I realised that hammer was going to fall and something you never think will happen to you is suddenly beyond your will to stop. Then it happens and you just want to wake up from the nightmare that you know is all too real.

It’s the knowledge that you no longer have any say in your life at that very moment. That something else is driving you and forcing something to happen and no amount of begging or wishing is going to stop it. It’s like that every second of the day.

He was right. It was only just beginning. My Master had broken me in, demanded that every facet of my life accept him until I was even bearing him in my journal. Now I was to begin my ‘new life’ as his, simply accepting what I was told was all I was meant for. To work for his benefit, to be his own slave, and to have no choice of my own that was not pre-decided by him. He... he lashed me for waking up too early! I had my food taken away for not eating it in the right order! Shift after shift, unending... his way to instruct my life. Make every moment of it into a living model of obedience. To push me past my limits then order me to go further, just to see me manage it and shock myself that I could so easily become what I was before the Pit all over again.

Rarely was I given any rest. He'd only throw me into that tiny cell in his office that was my true home in his eyes and leave me alone in the dark. He leave me in the cold; wet, sick, and alone on a rough concrete floor.

I just couldn't handle it. My life was swinging out of control! I made attempts to escape, but he knew where I would be every time. He'd... he'd even let me get away from the Mall, sometimes! But he'd always be there, allowing me to think I'd gotten away before the chain would snap tight, and I'd be drawn back. I made one last attempt before he began telling me to grow up and accept life as his s-s-son.

Always always always ramming it into my head to accept him as a father and... and g-g-grow out of believing it...

"...was what? Hey, hey what's wrong?"

I don't want to remember that moment! But it's always there, and it always will be! I just... the feeling.

No, no no, it wasn't fair. Why then? I wasn't ready to know it. I wasn't ready!

"Murky? Murky, what happened? What's wrong? Hey, hey come here..."

Just, I... I can't help it, s-sorry.

He didn't give me a choice! I only had one choice left.

One choice... one way out...

"Murky...?"

...I had to.

"Murky! What did he do!?"

The bar locked shut through the handles of the trap door. I knew it wouldn't hold them long.

A violent thumping on the weak wooden, iron reinforced door signalled that my pursuers rather agreed. They screamed, ordering me to stop and blasted chunks from it with roaring shots of those snout nosed shotguns many slavers carried. Buckshot flew through the air, pinging into the empty studio I'd ran to. I ducked back and galloped away from the lethal swarm of pellets.

Sweat flowed, my brow and muzzle stung as it reached the cracked skin of my radsors. Every leg thumped, aching to be rested, like a thousand needles were being jabbed into my inner thighs. I could feel my mane plastered to my head and the searing pain in my eyes from when I had run through chemical smog belching from the factory next door.

But I still ran.

Floorboards snapped, creaked, and splintered beneath me as I galloped for the windows, the only way out of this room. I knew that for sure, for I'd tried this route twice already. I only hoped the slavers behind me hadn't been on those shifts to know, too.

With a sharp crack of snapping wood, the trapdoor sprung open behind me! Glancing back at the dark forms rushing through, I turned and redoubled my efforts with the long chain hanging from my collar dragging and clattering behind me. Sprinting through the building with thick wads of bloody pain in my lungs and throat, I dove through the broken window. I knew what lay outside it, that a corrugated metal overhang like a ramp to catch me. Landing with a clatter, I slid onto my side, skidded down it, and leapt from near the bottom. The jump sent me sailing over a three-storey drop to crash through the scattered glass of the adjoining factory. Shouts of frustration as I heard the overhang collapse and fall behind me almost lifted my spirits enough to ignore the harsh slap of hard metal floor meeting me belly first.

Screaming, I curled up, clutching my bruised stomach. The bruises hadn't formed from the drop. They were old. So old I couldn't even remember how long ago I'd received them. Hours had become like days. I didn't know how much time had passed since the first broadcast about Arbu anymore. No, these blackened shades of skin beneath my patchy and, in some places, non-existent coat were from when I had taken the liberty of assuming he'd wanted his bed made. I could still see all too clearly the wooden rod he'd beaten my stomach and chest with.

Yet, even after landing on my abused underbelly, I could not cry. Some things just ran that deep these days.

I reached for the railings of the metal catwalk I'd landed on, almost falling right over the side into a tanning vat beneath as I found no such rails there (some things never changed). Beneath me, slaves were still cringing from the shower of glass I'd sent into their workplace among the mill's vats, the falling shards plinking into the thick, fatty mixtures. Pulling up my legs and finding them crooked and shaking beneath me, I stood up to continue my escape. I... I had to keep going, I'd gotten further than last time! My Master had missed me when he'd tried to do his whole 'appear and trap' routine! This was a proper escape now!

My head glanced from side to side, looking at the floor beneath me. The rows of vats underneath the catwalk I was on emanated foul fumes up toward me, but closer to the exit I could see a massive conveyor bringing in carcasses and lengths of leather that cut right from wall to wall. It was blocking all routes to the exit on the far side from me. Two scaffold bridges crossed over it on either side of the room. I'd need to get over one of them to reach the way out!

The stairs shook over a foot from side to side on crude fixtures as I descended to the tanning mill's work floor. Slaves backed away from me. I could see their overseers beginning to shift through the crowd I was so desperately trying to merge into, but they all saw my wings. None of them would let me near. They all knew the standing orders about 'the pegasus.'

I had to... to run. It was the only way out! Just run!

Crying out in pain as I forced my body to go one more time, the collar and chain feeling heavier by the second, I fled. Galloping across the floor, around ponies and ignoring the shouts of the slavers knocking slaves aside behind me. I'd heard too many cries to stop to tell them apart now. Only one voice mattered to avoid.

I galloped for the closest bridge, but seeing two slavers throw a mare aside to rush down the aisle between vats toward me, I doubled back. They were already on that one! I... I had to get to the other one! The foul stench of tanning liquid spilled from buckets knocked over in my passing, giving them a horrid slippery surface to catch up.

A slaver mare, as deep red as Brimstone and a gas mask swinging below her snarling face shoved her way past two bucks, leaping between the vats to get me and block the way to the other bridge! With the two behind me, they had either side of the aisle blocked! I couldn't go over! I was too short! But if I went under I'd be too slow!

I was caught with no way out of the factory!

Casting my head from side to side wildly and whimpering, I spotted a wheeled slab of metal for letting repair-ponies slide under the conveyor belts. Rushing forward, I pushed it toward the conveyors between the vats. At the last moment, I jumped toward the trolley, landing atop it and rolling underneath the conveyor belts at speed with the rusty clanking of the rollers passing inches above my head.

Behind me, the slavers from either side dove to try and grab my tail. Mercifully, for once, their hooves caught nothing. The trolley sailed on past the other side of the conveyor, hitting the loading ramp leading out of the factory and began picking up speed. I flew from the factory on my makeshift transport, rolling onto the granite courtyard ground and whizzing by the guards that seemed too surprised at the sight to realise they should have stopped it. My chain trailing behind whipped around one's ankles, tripping him on the spot.

I had to admit, even under the panic and desperation, a little satisfaction crept into my heart at the sight.

Hitting the edge of the concrete pathway with a jolt, I was catapulted into the muck from the last shower of rain. Cast out into the dark street under the black clouds and swirling smoke of Fillydelphia, I fought to get the air in my complaining lungs and to keep putting one hoof in front of the other. That was all I'd been telling myself. Escape was possible. I knew it was. I'd seen her do it. I just had to keep trying!

The familiar tone of enraged Fillydelphian slavers emanated from the factory behind me, the situation all too memorable by now, I could hear their hooves stamping and galloping onto the hard ground. I just had to go a bit further! Trial and error had got me this far! The sewage outlet was near, one I knew was hidden. Not the closest, not the furthest. It was picked at random from me choosing the first number I'd heard from somepony else around me to ensure he couldn't predict me.

Slavers burst from the tanning mill, following the trailing grind of my chain upon the ground. Panicking, I kicked my legs into a mad dash over the road to slip and stumble down the steep embankment that led down to the overflow sewer drains. I fell, rolled, screamed, and pushed my hooves beneath me again even as the motley assortment of leather and metal clad slavers appeared at the top behind me. I was so close! He wasn't even close to me, I'd have heard his thick stomping! I just had to avoid this bunch of—

The slurping sound of someone stumbling in mud was my only warning. Leaping to the side, a murky green slaver fell down past where I'd been, his clumsy hooves sending him tumbling down the slope. Swearing, holding his horn where it had struck a rock, I saw eyes promising imminent pain if he caught me. Unsteadily descending to the ground myself, we began a slow and slippery chase in which our hooves sank almost half a foot into the ground on every step. Behind him the others slid and wallowed, that red mare trying to hop between rocks to catch up before falling on her side, covering her long, trailing coat in goopy greenish mud. Panting, I felt my vision go blurry and my throat swell under the radioactive collar. I knew that this was a death sentence if I couldn't infiltrate back into Weathervane's soon after this. But I'd be away!

Just escape. That was all that mattered. It was the only way out. The only thing worth keeping in mind. There was something out there beyond the Wall. Remember it and push on!

Dragging my chain, trying to keep it ahead of the unicorn. I felt glad the fall had at least damaged the telekinesis he seemed to be trying to use. His horn sparked like Coral's before fading out. But he was gaining. Long legs were so much handier for this terrain! I could see the passage ahead, but it wasn't the one I wanted, it was the false one! I'd done this before in my food run just after the Arbu broadcast, so I had to be sneaky. The one My Master would think I was going for was the closest one! But my real one was around the corner, the one to fool his tricks!

Just a... bit... further...

My chain went taut. The sudden stop made my hooves slip and sending me collapsing into the sloppy ground. The unicorn had caught up to me! Reeling me in... coming closer.

"Hah! Gotcha now, kid! Now let's find who you belong to, huh?"

He bent over me, front hooves reaching under to lift me up. Slurping, pushing my hind leg out from under the mud, I shot a back hoof behind me at speed, crashing into his nether regions. The legs around me went limp, a horrid squeal of pain and disbelief pierced my ears as he fell to the side, squirming and holding himself between the back legs. I winced myself. The strike had felt like much more of a crunch that time.

He kept writhing, screaming in horror. But I kept dragging myself onward. Slavers were catching up from being more cautious on the hill. From all sides they rushed. I saw whips, nets, and canes. My body ached at the thought (and ached for the same reasons in a more practical manner, too) even as I kept going. I just had to make it to the sewers! It was the only way out! The only way to be free!

"He's going for the sewers! Stop him! STOP HIM!"

I had to! Sliding on a shallower section of ground, I began to pull the lichen covered nets that had once acted as filters away from the opening. The slimy substance coated my front hooves... even my mouth as I disgustingly bit and ripped away at it with everything I could. Beyond it... the gaping hole with an open cage door lay before me.

I'd made it.

I hazarded a look back before the warm, fuzzy joy of relief flowed through me. They were still miles away! Pushing through, tumbling as I got in, I struggled with the caged hatch to close it. Through the bars I saw them approaching, first four, then ten and then twenty. A whole crowd of slavers seeking to keep me enslaved. Not anymore!

With them still ten metres away, the door wrenched shut. I slammed the bolt and clicked into place the padlock I'd stolen from my last shift before trotting backward when they crashed into the bars. They tried to pry it off to no avail. The lead slaver, a huge brute with pitch black coat and mane stared at me with hazy eyes and unspoken threats. Feeling my chest quiver with fear, I turned to gallop into the darkness...

...and ran straight into his embrace.

Tiny wails from my tortured throat barely had time to echo before they were clenched and half-choked as one gigantic hoof held me to his stinking and sweat soaked leather barded chest. From the corner of my eye, I saw the lanky grey mane, the thick brown coat, yellowed teeth, and my own eyes looking down at me from the darkness.

My Master only grinned, leaning down close to my ear as he sat back and stroked my forehead with his own hoof, tracing across my scar. Our scar. I just stared away as best I could, feeling sick. How... how!? I'd been so close.

It was like he'd read my mind, whispering gently even as I saw him.

"A random direction... surprising routes... deliberately taking the harder paths and yet still you come to me all over again just when you'd thought you were free, eh? Come back to complete your punishment shifts? There's lots of overseers want to see you in their workplaces these days."

He slowly clicked the chain into place again. I struggled, but without even a word he hurled me into the side of the sewer, striking me across the mouth repeatedly until a wet line of blood trickled from my lip. I begged, but he only brought his hoof down one more crushing time. Under it, I heard a crack. Howling, feeling my eyes water from physical injury than from choosing to cry I fell back. My... my snout moved under my hooves! I howled again and again through my hooves, a muffled scream that led to me falling forward toward him. I hugged his nearest hoof, nursing my broken nose and pleading that I was sorry. He simply stood above me and began to drag me by my chain toward the exit and the grinning slavers.

“By this point, son, after so many tries you really should be asking yourself if you aren’t finding your way back to me all on your own without even realising it.”

“Murk? Murky Number Seven? Where have you got to? Hey, Murk, get those skinny hooves trotting and get out here!”

I was leaning against my workbench, my hooves idly tracing across multiple large brass casings for anti-machine rounds to fit them into the heavy metal boxes for transport. Clicking the last one into its slot, I groaned as my aching neck took the strain and lifted the box in my mouth by a strap to carry.

“Where in the blithering hell are you, Murk!? I said get over here!”

One of my legs wasn’t working right... my nose felt stuffy and swollen. Shifting a few inches at a time, I wearily carried the box to a large crate, feeling my teeth throb with pain at the weight in my mouth. But I worked on, passing through a roiling cloud of dark red ashy smog that blew through the factory. Chemical smoke tinged in my half-open mouth, burning my nose and stinging my eyes. Coughing and choking, I dropped the case of ammunition to the floor and fell upon my side.

Nopony working at their own benches around me paid any heed to the little pegasus, naked and bearing his broken wings at their hooves as they morosely trotted to and fro like little cogs in the great war machine of the factory. Just like me. Groaning, I dragged the ammo box the last few feet, pushing in alongside a mare with little coat left and choking up yellowed spit as she placed her own box in. I’d have complained about the chemicals saturating the air, but the truth was the ambience in Fillydelphia alone was toxic to the core. Even outside, you could still taste the rusty tang at the back of your throat on each strained breath.

“There you are! Murk, why didn’t you respond?”

Whimpering at the effort, pushing my tired hooves up I slotted the ammo box into the last remaining space before the guards began to close it up and mark it for delivery. Finally, my ears picked up on the words. Other ponies... they were becoming distant compared to the only voice that mattered. Slumping against the crate, my mouth hung open in exhaustion. I saw the overseer coming through the steam clouds wafting from the forge and acid wash machines with a cloth tied around his mouth.

“So... sorry. Didn’t hear...” My voice was quiet, little more than a whisper interrupted by a harsh hacking. My body was weary beyond measure... a dozen crates of a dozen ammo boxes each filled with a dozen heavy rounds for hours upon end in the sweltering heat of a forge had driven me to the edge of stamina. I didn’t even feel my movements... I just slaved away until it had all become a blur...

The overseer... List Seeker, he was the one I’d worked under before, a scrawny earth pony who had given me the forge socks that were now our waterskins in waiting. He wasn't so bad if you did the work right. He trotted over to where I could more properly see him and his cutie mark of a candlestick with multiple wicks either side. Casting careful eyes at the finished crates, he turned and nodded approvingly.

"Good work, Murk. Now go on and get. Your shift ended ten minutes ago. Time for you to go back to the Mall. It's your rest period."

Horror struck through me. I couldn't go yet! I abased myself before him, shivering and only adding to his confusion.

"M-Master, pl-please can I work one more shift? Just one more! I... I don't want to go back there! I want to keep working here with you..."

The overseer sighed, looking away. "You've worked four shifts in a row here already, Murk. Well beyond what I allow ponies to do before the chems start to kill them. You can't spend all day here. We've been through this three times already and I don't think he'll—"

"Please!" I begged, moving forward, my front hooves resting on his. "I want to keep working here! A... away from—"

"Me, Number Seven?"

Even in the stuffy atmosphere of this factory, I felt my blood run cold. Through the smoke I could see his gigantic silhouette looming there. Every slave scurrying around him with their heads lowered, afraid to accidentally make eye contact with him. Shifting and coiling around him, the smoke drifted past to reveal My Master. Standing amongst the other slaves, he had already seemed to exude authority and become the very nexus of this workplace regardless of whether it was his or not. The overseer beside me gulped, trotting forward.

"M-Master Shackles. Murk has offered to work another shift here. He is doing good work once you find something he can manage. If you would loan his services to me for just one more shift. Just one more—"

"Silence your weakness of care, List Seeker. Don't think I can't see what you do. Trying to find and take in slaves to just 'get by' and 'meet the quota.' Finding those who could perhaps survive in your factory in their time here. I've humoured your requests for Number Seven purely as a means of allowing him to find his own realisation that wanting to work is the mindset of a true slave. Isn't that right?"

His eyes glared down at me shivering behind List Seeker.

The overseer took a second to consider his options. But really, with My Master above even his gangly height he had no choice. My squeak of horror as he sadly trotted to the side was only matched by the one I made as my chain was removed from the bar I'd been attached to at my workplace. A hard tug and once more I was tied to My Master's harness. Exhausted, with every joint aching and stiff I found myself dragged up to his side again with my head hung low. I... I wanted my workbench! I could lie on it while I worked. Just cease to exist for another few hours, please!

But as I was dragged away, my brief hope that Glimmer or Coral Eve might be back from their shifts on my rest period was shattered when I was pulled in the opposite direction of the exit leading to the Mall. Looking stern, Overseer List Seeker turned to look at us departing through his arms factory.

"Hey, the Mall's in that direction, back there!" He pointed a hoof.

My Master simply cackled and patted my head.

"Number Seven asked for another shift. I'm giving him what he wants. Just not under you.”

Limping and staggering out into the surging wind of the ever present dark storm above us, I could only see List Seeker’s concerned look turn to a dejected sigh as he turned back to his own factory and the workers inside. The crashing sound of machinery faded away as I limped in step beside My Master, the ground turning from smoothed stone to gravel below me. Light rain misted all around, giving rise to the sense that this storm that had wracked Fillydelphia ever since Barb’s riot was not going away any time soon. A darker Fillydelphia for darker days.

But for all its changing atmosphere I quickly realised where I was being led. Right into the past.

“Well would you look at what we got here.”

I sat before a desk, sniffing from the damp rainwater dripping off me and stinging my burns and radsors. A miserable little sight in the eyes of the pony who sat looking over her desk. Not that she would ever need any reason to hate me.

Wicked Slit moved from her chair, trotting around the desk with her eyes trained on me. I tried to keep watch on her knife while it flicked around and rubbed against the floor near me. I could still hear My Master moving away down the catwalks outside her elevated office. He hadn’t even spoken to her, but instead just threw me in the door and left. Now I was trapped with the most neurotic slaver in Fillydelphia all over again, just like old times, just like— WHA!

I was being dragged. My chain was still attached and Slit had grabbed it in her magic to pull me to my hooves and out the door.

“One shift, Murk. I’m not going to let you waste seconds of time you could be failing to meet quotas sitting here looking sorry for yourself! You brought all this on yourself the moment you made a run for that wall. This is far too long overdue. Move!”

Her hooves lashed out, striking me on the side, flanks, and face. Anywhere possible, really, as she began forcing me from her office. I couldn’t even reply to her as she began slapping and striking me onto the catwalk. I tried to move ahead of her, but my legs felt triple jointed and mixed up. I reached the stairs and tried to move...

“I said get moving!”

Her magically enhanced voice stunned me before the vicious full buck caught my shoulder. Sharp pain flared and I was sent tumbling down the catwalk stairway to land on a searing hot concrete floor covered in still sparking fragments of metal. Howling and squealing, I pulled myself up and began backing away from her while trying to pat down my smouldering coat and the pain of the small burns.

“Please, Ma... I mean, sir I... I mean Ma’am! I’ll work! I’ll woork!” The last word stammered and warbled from my mouth like a long plead. The resistance had been battered from me. I was too tired and sore to properly think and... and just let me do something I can switch off for...

She dragged me by knife point toward the yard of her foundry along rows of the all too familiar carts. Of course she’d want me to work on them. I was shoved and, shrieking as her knife prodded my hind quarters toward one, I began the soul crushing task of locking myself into the harness of the item that had defined my life, feeling the familiar weight of a cart resting ready to be lowered onto my back.

"You probably think you're lucky. I made a few threats last time, little Murk." She trotted around me, pacing back and forth. "Told you what I'd do to you if I caught you. Well, Shackles wants you working, so I'll put you to work. But don't think you're getting away without a little something from me!"

I stood stock still, now locked in place by the harness. Oh Goddesses! She could do anything and I couldn't escape. The sweat trickled from my face. I saw slaves watching, grinning. A bit of free entertainment in their ongoing slow days. What was she going to do? I'd seen her kill ponies without meaning to when she got lost in a frenzy.

Wicked Slit backed off, suddenly grinning through her long and sweaty red mane.

"Oh, just something to make you remember. To make you regret daring to run from me! To kick me. You had your fun hitting on me."

I saw the slaves glances to one another, a mixture of confusion and dark humour leading them to be unsure if they should laugh or look afraid. Wicked Slit turned side on, stamping a hind leg.

"That hurt you little fucking weasel! Thinking you could do that and you wouldn't pay?"

Slit began to trot toward me, her knife passing to my cheek and slicing across it just enough to break the skin.

"Eye for a fucking eye, Murk. You'd better fucking remember why you're afraid of me so much. You'd better remember what it was like to be the slave who would gallop on a sprained hind leg to finish in time so that I wouldn't remove his leg. You'd better remember, runt... just what you are to us. You aren't some fucking hero who's going to escape. You aren't somepony different from all of those other slaves in my factory. Now you're going to remember it every step you take for the next few hours."

White hot pain slid across my back, I screeched and writhed as I felt hot blood trickle down my sides. She... she'd slit open one of my whip scars before slamming the harness down on my back. Coming close to my ear with her psychotic voice dropping, I couldn't cry to let out the fear but I could cry in pain, moaning and choking in equal measure.

"You're a slave, Murk. His slave. But for the next few hours, you're my fucking slave. Now Mistress Slit says... gallop. Gallop upon the back you'll spend your whole life breaking for us." She paused, "For Red Eye."

There was no choice, no argument. I simply had to weep and gallop even as my back stung and bled behind me under the harness. Gallop, be loaded up and then gallop again. Always galloping even when it hurt too much to carry on. She or somepony else would always be there to push me onward. Even if it fell to exhausted tearless sobs, I didn't stop crying the entire way. Journey after journey, load after load. Every time returning to be met by her gleeful and satisfied stare at the pony who'd dared to defy her. Filled with scrap, cut metal, or discarded refuse, I was sent on my way. Trips to the Ironshod Outlet, to List Seeker's munitions depot (Seeing the tired overseer watch on with almost pity), and even back to the Wartime Ministry Hub.

Until finally, as some sort of twisted mercy, My Master was there waiting at the end. Collapsing, my back crusting over and my chest pitifully trying to raise and lower for breath, I fell at his hooves. My throat was swollen. My disease catching up from the workload and my collar steadily pushing my life's countdown onward...

Please... RadAway... now... I... I couldn't take much more...

He only grinned that one grin at me, and slowly spoke.

“Get up. Time for your next shift.”

The crate behind me finally slid the last few inches, pulling it into place.

“Good, laddie! Very good!”

My ‘overseer’ clapped his hooves in delight at my first job completed for him, grinning to a pony he was bartering with. Sooty’s desk lay near the front door, behind us two huge curved staircases ran to the upper level on either side of an inside fountain beneath a recently repaired chandelier.

“Just my new little worker, my friend. Now, what shall it be? A quick fix? The whole experience?”

I fell against the crate, seeing through unfocused eyes the shape of that most hated trader laughing with the sick minded client. Around us lay a nexus of debauchery. An abandoned mansion in the residential district hastily converted to operate this newer venture. Sooty’s new trade in ponies to the slavers (and sometimes slaves) who could pay for the opportunity.

Across the hallway, there were various bucks and mares, slaves all, chained to the wall with a crude board above detailing their costs. I was somewhat glad I couldn’t read the various crude lists of ‘tiered’ acts each was expected to market. But not one of them had anything approaching any will in their often blackened eyes. Some were crying, having realized they were consigned to this as their life from now on.

I had long since forced myself to ignore the sad sounds from the closed rooms upstairs.

My Master had dropped me here to work as Sooty’s assistant. My crates were heavysset, but empty. Designed to accommodate the varied manners of payment Sooty’s ‘clients’ brought with them. Anything from spare clothing to weapon parts was exchanged after a brief haggle with Sooty Morass himself to attain their ‘credit.’ I’d seen him sell a pony for an hour in return for a good set of cooking pans he’d wanted. Was that all a pony’s dignity was worth to him?

I felt sick. Even beyond my current heightening disease that saw me blacking out for a few seconds every couple of minutes.

The trader trotted toward me, tapping the crate with a hoof before grinning down to me.

“Now might I ask what ye are doin’ resting, lad?”

“I... I... why...”

The trader seemed to sigh a little, patting me on the head in that far-too-friendly manner.

“Ye know, laddie. Here’s a generous wee gift of info. In this world, you use everything you can get to find a way by. Me? I just do it better than anypony else. Ye think I care what I sell or who I exploit if it helps me make me way through life? Just accept it, lad. The ones who know what to do to survive succeed in this world while the ones who don’t, like you? Nothing more than a means to an end. Ol’ Red Eye gets it. I get it. Shackles gets it. It’s not personal, just business.”

How could that be how my world had to work? I’d seen Equestria, seen the green fields and beautiful colours.

But back in the real world, my captor simply sighed at my lack of agreement and spun away.

“Come on! Get the back to work or Shackles will no doubt be interested to hear about you taking unordered breaks. Shift yer arse and get the rest!”

A command.

I obeyed.

The rest ended up being twelve. Every one of them had to come from the basement and eventually taken upstairs to his storage room. I passed slavers taking poor ponies to an assigned room. Some fought and were dragged while some simply morosely trotted with a resigned and depressed look. Every time I came in, he lorded over me, taking the chance to abuse this moment of power with an ‘assistant’ from My Master being sent to him. Finally, as the last crate was shoved into position, and I leaned back against it to try and dig a large splinter from my right fetlock, Sooty Morass trotted over. With all clients satisfied and left to make their ‘choices’ behind him, he had a few spare minutes for me.

“Does good to repay your debts right, doesn’t it? For all yer scamperin’ around, ye still come back to be here with me. Coulda saved yerself a lot of trouble by just taking up my offer back at the skypport, huh?”

I couldn’t muster much of a response, simply looking back up at him with a quivering jaw. Seeing his hoof reach out, I shrank back against the crate, unable to hide a little shrill squeak of fear.

His face lit up as he heard it.

“Oh... oh now that, that’s just...”

The smile turned to a deadly fiendish grin.

“...marketable.”

I’d felt the sensation many times but never had it been more true now as my blood turned to ice. Hearing the arrogant little chuckle as Sooty saw the look in my eyes, I just shook my head.

“Oh don’t give me that, little laddie. Don’t ye remember I asked ye before? I’m sure something as, heh, exotic as you...”

I felt him stroke my feathers poking out from my bandage. I... I wanted to throw up.

“...would attract quite the attention.”

His voice was different. This was no longer the carefree and arrogant marketeer. He smelled money from me and the greed and ambition to grow and prosper was all too visible. Tugging me away from the crate to the centre of the giant entranceway, he stood me upon a large fragmented mosaic beneath the domed roof and chandelier before beginning to trot around me. I kept my eyes front, trying not to whimper too loudly at the clacking hooves and beady eyes on all sides.

“Good and small. Not many bucks your size. Lots of interest for that from the male persuasion. Bit sick looking, but we could help that with a lil’ RadAway. We’d still make a profit.”

I couldn’t believe I was hearing this. I wanted to wake up.

“Mm, yes. I’m sure we could still find a use for you. Put you to good use in my ‘lower expense’ range, hmm?”

He lifted my front hooves, tapping them before raising his other hoof under my jaw and gently patting the side of my mouth with a knowing grin. I knew what he meant, I just didn’t want to think about it. All I could do was squeak and hide under my own front hooves to quiver on the floor even as the thick stomping from the main door started.

He had come back.

Sooty turned, laughing as he stood up away from my huddled body.

“Master Shackles! Your timing as ever is perfect. He has just finished his work!”

The mosaic's broken tiles jittered loosely and trembled out of their sockets as My Master strode into Sooty's sick business. I could see him smiling at the sight of it. Slavery within slavery. No wonder he liked it.

But he represented, for once, a way out of here. I scrambled across behind him. He hadn't even spoken a word yet but Sooty only laughed at me moving so quickly.

"Was just discussing a business deal with the little pegasus here. Me doors are always open if you ever want him to grow up a little. Got more than enough clients who'd pay a good amount for a little submissive pegasus like him."

My Master cackled. My heart skipped a beat. Was he? Was...

But as I looked up, he only shook his head.

"Get up. Next shift."

"Ready up! Cycle's coming again!"

Nostalgia. Horrible, horrible nostalgia. To be forced into work at the very places I had once gathered my items to escape from. My life told in reverse. To be back the threshing mill amongst the small ponies forced under its whirling blades.

"Go!"

A sore body, a near delusional mind... I saw only the lint and frayed threads ahead of me... the scything machine just beyond. I charged, scooped and then fled the impending doom. My back was a mess. The little strands were catching in my scabbing wounds from Wicked Slit's tasks, my leg still didn't feel right...

"Ready up! Cycle's coming again!"

Dropping what I had I felt the light cane whip over my ears, as it did every slave. Their new theory. We could never get enough. We would always be pressed for more. Till our very blood became the price they paid for the small scraps of thread. It... it didn't make any sense...

"Go!"

I dove in. I cried out... snatching what I could and scuffled with another slave who tried to take my quota. We retreated, feeling the hiss of cold metal at our tails. Falling out, I felt the cane whip over my ears... then the next... and the next...

"Ready up! Cycle's coming again!"

This was so pointless! Why didn't they just use unicorns!? Why us!?

"Go!"

Why us!? WHY ME!?

Again and again... unceasing. Bearing new slashed cuts on my hind legs, as shallow as they were, but still another addition to my gradually breaking body over this day of hell.

Lying amongst the thread, choking and spraying my lifeblood across what I had gathered from my mouth, I simply let my consciousness begin to slip. My throat was thumping, my lungs were tightening... but I looked up to see him there...

"R-RadAway... M-Master please..."

He grinned.

"Get up. Next shift."

Sliding... galloping... screaming... I clambered from cart to cart, terror forcing me to make one last effort despite my injuries and despite every inch of my body saying no. I wouldn't let them eat me.

My leather suit had come undone from an auto axe cutting the threads, I could have sworn on purpose. Now I fled through the underground nightmare that was Hive's pits. They swarmed around me. Beasts in multicoloured winged forms that fought and rushed and pushed, all trying to get in through the hole in my chest. My goggles were steaming up! I couldn't see! I couldn't breathe through the mask! I fell...

Dusty rock met me on the way down. I beat my hooves, feeling their scrambling bodies around the hole. Then a horrid stinging pain as I felt tiny teeth rip a small half-inch chunk from my chest and gnash in again and again. Its comrades joined it, shoving to get into my breast. Crawling and likely invisible under the swarm, I felt my chain catch on something, jarring me to a stop. I... where was the exit!? Where did I go!?

My body failed me. I fell. The spasm came, my chest convulsed. The coughing fit hit me like a sledgehammer to the ribcage. Swelling over my collar, the painful seared skin of my throat from such constant radiation rubbed and chaffed on every wheezing kick of my body. Blood splattered from my mouth, coating the inside of my hood and vision slits, blinding me. I felt a sting on my chest, a nibbling before I rolled over to put the hole to the ground and ride out the sickness.

I lay there a long time, hearing the sound of the parasprite pits around me. Eventually the little demons left me be, sensing their hole was covered. But I didn't move. Blind inside the foul armour, exhausted beyond motion, I simply lay. I might have passed out. I didn't know. Every so often I tried to move a hoof, only to feel the muscles complain and respond slower than they should. Inch... by... pain... staking... inch... I... pulled... myself... toward... yes!

Reaching up, I felt the handle of the locker room, used by those who needed a quick repair. Pushing the first door open to the area, I slipped inside and fell upon the floor, finally tugging my hood off.

I couldn't move. My legs were... were gone. I couldn't feel my body. I was spent...

I knew he was there, watching me from across the locker room. I knew he would be. He'd have known when to return. Looking up, opening my eyes, seeing through a fine red haze (Oh Goddesses... I'd turned bloodshot in my sickness...) I coughed up another thick wad and shivered, pleading with my eyes... please let that be enough...

"P-p-pl..." I couldn't even finish the word, my throat was... was dying...

He only shook his head.

"Get up. Next shift."

Helping repair the Mall. Kept away from the cells and my friends amongst the higher levels to sledgehammer a wall down. I didn't even know why. Just an old back room of a shop they wanted connected to the corridors. I didn't know what shop.

I could barely tell who was around me, but the buck to my left was crying openly. He had made the mistake of trying to beg to the overseer. One of My Master's most brutal. An obese and slimy wretch of a stallion that kept his saliva smeared clothing on only through crudely tied rope. But the slave beside me? He had begged, saying this wasn't what he was meant to be doing, that his life was being ruined from the slavery.

They'd taken him and... and...

Oh Goddesses preserve him, they'd cut his cutie marks off. Just held him down and ignored the pitiful, humiliating screams that stripped his pride and strength as the serrated knife dug and slit. The overseer's way of showing him that he wasn't meant for anything anymore. They'd caught me looking and...

I was just lucky they hadn't done the same.

It was just one faded, blurry mess. Like I'd scrubbed a hoof over fresh charcoaled drawings and ruined all the clean definition. In the same way I could no longer draw, I could no longer see my own life. No longer feel the clarity I'd spent so long honing and achieving through hardship and the joy of friendship.

Just one exhausted, painful and useless tap of a hammer after another...

I'd be knocked on my side if I dropped it. Every single time. I was useless! I had no idea how long I'd been here but I'd managed only six strikes that didn't even chip the wall. My rump was red raw from the whips meant to motivate me. Nearer the end I couldn't even shriek in pain.

I was dying, but something made me keep moving...

Again...

"Get up. Next shift."

Taking his clothing to be cleaned by my own hooves, feeling the stinging chemicals burning my hooves and making my muzzle's radsors swell with the toxins emanating from the tub. Of me being found lying on my side simply moving my hooves with not enough energy to move the rest of me...

And again...

"Get up. Next shift."

Carting refinery fuel, somehow trotting still because I was told to...

Past every limit I should have stopped at...

"Get up. Next shift."

Cutting scrap in the junkyards...

What he commanded, my body obeyed...

"Get up..."

I couldn't... I looked up... this was it for me, I knew it. Blood dribbled from my lips, I bled from my back... pain covered every aspect of me. Every place, every intimacy and crevice of my frail and mortally sick body. I had... had given more than I knew I had... give, give, give... now with nothing left but my life that he owned.

The orange sachet appeared before me. A sudden last lifeline. Getting up, I suckled on its tear off straw even while feeling his hoof stroking my mane gently.

“...good boy.”

The door had slammed shut, locking me in the shop cell. I hadn't trotted in, I'd been carried 'home' on a slaver's back after being dragged by My Master back to the Mall.

Now I lay on my side, wheezing as my skeletal little chest fluttered and tried to raise as best it could. I lay in the one stream of light that entered through the cage from the Mall outside. In the diagonal rays filled with dusty air broken only by the shadows of harsh faced slavers trotting on patrol outside.

But she was there.

Coral Eve had been waiting. She always did when I was out on shift. Every chance she had she was here waiting and hoping that I'd be returned before her own shift came up again. The mare was limping from a savage cane lash to her front left leg and hazy eyed from a fever brought on by chemicals ingested in her own shifts... but she still did what she always had in these last few desperate times. Without words passed between us, I felt her gentle touch lift me onto her back and begin to trot into the back room. Purely by instinct, I found myself clinging around her neck along the way until I was lowered onto the mattress and covered with a ragged blanket for what rest I could hope for until it all began again.

The orb shone, glittering brightly and illuminating the room as it hung in the air before Glimmerlight's horn. With a splash of radiance, it split apart and the shards of sparkling magic wrapped around her horn.

“Alright, Murky, just lie there. You know this doesn't hurt.”

I had little choice, my failing leg had, well, failed. All while, my snout and chest ached to even move. But Glimmer's sole remaining healing orb she had stolen back during the riots was our last possession to keep me going, working its powers as she traced her horn an inch from my body. Up and down, the gentle and easing warmth spread through my body to restore strength and vanquish pain.

It said a lot that Glimmer was using this on me. Her face bore numerous new bruises. Without Brimstone around, she'd had to fight off the attentions of those who saw her as 'vulnerable' now and had tried to take her food. At least that's what she told me they'd been trying. Thankfully, she'd stayed as safe as could be despite the injuries earned in her own defence, I knew she could take care of herself. But for her to endure an infected cheek wound to instead heal me, I was so lucky to have her.

Glimmerlight had joined us more properly earlier, somehow wangling her way to a cell transfer. I'd managed to push out a wheezy question of how. It seemed that we still had at least one friendly face in here as Blunderbuck, the junior armoury assistant, had been ordered to take away her scrap pile to the armoury and new workshops of the Mall then evict her from our old cell. He'd managed to get her in with Coral to be closer to me.

It was perhaps the only piece of good news all day.

I groaned on the spot, feeling the painless but nonetheless uncomfortable sensation of tendons re-knitting inside my leg as the tension of muscle power returned. Glimmer's hoof reached over to gently stroke my mane, calming me.

"Not far now, Murky. It won't do it all, but it'll help you rest better and let you move again. The better you move, the less they'll hit you. Don't worry, help is coming. I heard somepony talking about the punishment detail returning later today. Brim'll be back! It'll get better with him here. Promise."

There was a little snort from Coral's direction before the grey mare stood and trotted over while Glimmer finished up, the spell fading from her horn.

"Th-thanks, sis..." I stammered, still wary of the term even after the apology. We really needed a chance to talk about it. I could see it in her eyes. The brahmin in the room, the 'talk' we'd need to have sometime soon about... about what happened. But not now... things were too bad right now and we both knew it. We'd both been angry, both been hurt... but right now we needed every bit of strength we could muster between us.

Shifting up, I still hurt, but the sharper cuts, burns, and strains were gone and replaced by a dull ache that accompanied most muscle movements. That and my tooth still felt loose even as my hoof felt the raw skin around my neck. Always related...

"I mean, thank you. I... I hope he's back soon."

"You're telling me. Sooner he's here, the sooner he can bully some slave into getting his own shop cell back and the sooner he can buck that welded door clean off its hinges and get you out of here away from him. Heck, we'll all go, I thought we could tough it till Protégé got back but..."

There was an odd silence, broken only by a light and dry attempted sob from me. I'd seen him stable in the Fun Barn, but the sight of that black dagger piercing out through his neck and chest still horrified me.

"But I don't think he'll be coming back." Glimmerlight finished quietly while Coral nodded lightly, reaching out to incline Glimmer away from me.

"I don't want that beast anywhere near me, but if his strength to knock a door loose can get Murky away, I'm not turning it down. Now let him rest. It can't be too long till they'll come again."

I bit my lip nervously. Coral and Glimmer always seemed on the cusp of a debate or argument, but I only saw Glimmer nod, clearly not wanting to do anything right now that might invoke harsher emotions.

"It's... it's alright. I'm just tired..." I muttered, trying to smile at Glimmer, probably failing, "I just need to get my head down. I'm... I'm used to this life..."

It was a terrible lie and perhaps the worst attempt to reassure someone not to worry about me I'd ever made. But the fact that Glimmer seemed to spot that and hug me close meant the world to me. She was putting on her best, comforting me all she could while clearly keeping her eyes averted from the bruised eyes, hastily bandaged wings, and marked body I had before her. She simply looked at me. Into my own eyes, reminding me that she saw a pony, not a simply physical tool.

That alone reminded me that I wasn't lost yet. I may have been broken around My Master but... but with my friends, I could manage.

...barely.

She clearly had noticed the weakness though, biting her lip even as Coral coughed politely for her to give me space to try and sleep. Her hooves seemed a little slow on wanting to leg go of me, nor mine from her. Finally, I saw the sudden horror of her stifling a sob behind a smile, leaning her forehead on mine and speaking so quietly. I knew it was just for us.

"I'm sorry this happened, Murky..."

"I know..."

"We'll live. I swear to you we'll live. Someday... someday soon, we'll make a home for ourselves, far from anypony and just live how we want. Please... please keep believing in that. No matter what happened to... to my parents, or your Stable Dweller. We matter, Murky, don't let them take that away from you, please. You've worked so hard to become who you are."

"I'm trying. I... I still want to get out, promise."

She ruffled my mane, choking a little smile out.

"Go dream of that mare y'want, lil' bro. They can't take your dreams. I'll be just outside."

We parted, Glimmerlight reluctantly leaving me to finally rest while trying to dream the dreams that would see my life better.

Somehow, it didn't feel too different from a single night in a pigsty once so long ago.

"What's that?"

"Huh?"

"What is... what were you going to do!?"

I shifted in the blanket, my body feeling crashed out from the healing and exhaustion. Sleep had come when I'd least expected, a slow and creeping relief after the comfort of knowing I'd at least been left with my friends. But my ears picking up the sounds drove me to crawl through the blanket and lean up, the shallow snooze leaving me groggy eyed and disoriented as the sudden shouts rippled through the cell.

"I... I was just—"

"You were going to do it again, weren't you!? I can't believe you! All of this and that's what you fall back on? How many?"

No reply.

"How many?"

"Four..." A sniff. "My shifts. To try and stay happy, for him."

"Now a fifth? When does it end, Glimmer? Let go of it, give it to me. Put that blasted thing down now!"

Coral. It was Coral shouting, arguing with Glimmer. I heard a brief scuffle, before something clearly fell, pinging off the ground and bouncing away from them. My eyes finally adjusting, I saw something roll into the back room with me.

An empty memory orb.

"What were you going to get rid of, huh? Caduceus? Forget what he tried to do for you all just to rest easy not seeing what happened? Today's shift? What will it take to get through to you!?"

"It wasn't that!" Glimmer shouted back at last, silencing the air between them. I'd heard them argue many times since Glimmer had 'moved in' to our cell. The two of them in close proximity was just drama waiting to happen but they'd at least found some semblance of order in taking care of me.

Somehow, I felt a little guilty about that.

"I... I was going to... to strip away what his radio told me. About my parents..."

I could just imagine the look of fury building on Coral's face, unable to properly express the anger as I heard her voice low and unerringly steady.

"You were going to forget your own parents' deaths? Just throw away that they died because you couldn't handle thinking about it like anypony else has to in this hell we call a world?"

A hoof stomped at Glimmer's voice rising. She was crying. I could hear it.

"You don't know they're dead yet! But the worry's killing me! And it wasn't for me! I swear it! It... it was for Murky..."

"What?"

"I thought that, if I didn't remember it for now we could get on just fine like before. He needs solidity, Coral. Now more than ever with that monster killing him day by day! I just want to help him! Be the the big sister he needs, the best friend who isn't constantly worried about wanting to tell him off for believing in the mare who likely killed my damn parents, Coral!"

There was a brief silence, interrupted only by Glimmer's occasional sniffs. I wanted to desperately gallop out, grab her and tell her... tell her...

I didn't know, what was I meant to say about her mom and dad?

Coral replied for me.

"Do you know why Shackles is letting him stay with us, Glimmerlight? Have you thought why he's permitting him to not be kept in a tiny cold cell on his own?"

"I..."

"It's because putting him here with us makes it worse, Glimmer. He's out there every time breaking him to the point of death before healing him just enough to rest up until the next day. He's putting him with us because he knows we'll comfort him. We'll take care of Murky and treat him well all so Shackles gets to drag him away from us every single time to break him all over again."

I gripped the blanket, cuddling it tightly as I listened. I'd... I'd begun to suspect it but...

He was using me to hurt them...

"We're his counter, Glimmer. Part of his sick little game as much as those slavers are whether we want it or not. If he left Murky alone without us, he'd break and likely die in a day. You and I both know it. By caring for him... we're making it hurt longer but he knows we won't be able to just let him go. It's unfair and cruel beyond measure and you know what? We don't have a choice. There's no victory to be had here in trying to make it all seem 'alright' every time he comes here with some stupid 'consistency' because there's no end out there."

"Please... Coral." I'd never heard Glimmer's voice so weak. "I... I don't think I can cope. It's like going cold turkey on an addiction! I keep wanting to just get rid of something to make it hurt less. As much as I keep telling myself we're working toward something, I just don't see it. We've fallen farther from escape than ever."

I heard Coral Eve snort, and the sound of somepony moving.

"If you want to do anything for him, Glimmer, you need to stop trying to pretend it's all fine and that you can just forget the bad things. I want out too. I want my son, but just wishing for some impossible heroic race outside the walls isn't going to work. Maybe... maybe something will happen. Maybe your raider 'friend' can do something, maybe Protégé will come back."

Her hard tone eased. I heard her sigh.

"But if you want to help him now, give him something to hold onto. A hope no pony can take away no matter how many times they try. I've had to see the faces of my friends and family screaming and begging as they were humiliated and torn apart before my eyes every night. I see my son alone, begging for his mother. You are... you used to be stronger than I was. If I could manage it, so can you..."

Gripping my blanket like a foal with his stuffed toy, I leaned back on the mattress, surprised by the sudden change of tone. She sounded like she had in Glimmer's memory orb...

"Swallow your grieving, Glimmer. If you want to help him, talk to him about what he believes. What matters to him. Go on, there's not much time before they come again. If you want to talk to him, do it now."

There was silence between them. I only heard the outside Mall... the crying, banging, and moaning that perpetually filled the air of sick and weary slaves. But then slowly... the sound of somepony getting up and trotting toward me. I threw myself under the blanket again, pretending I was asleep. Only after I heard the hooves entering the back room did I allow my eyes to open, as though her trotting had woken me.

Glimmerlight was in a real state.

Her eyes looked sunken and red sore from crying, far more than I'd obviously heard. Her soaked mane straggled about her head, caked in grease and mud. Seeing me looking up from the bed, my big sis only gave a sad smile as she wandered over to lie on the bed beside me.

"Hey there, Murky. Sorry to wake you..."

"S' ok..." I muttered quietly, rubbing my eyes. But somehow I got the sense she knew I'd been pretending. She had that look in her eyes that told me she could tell.

"Listen, I..." She paused, her eyes flicked to the door, as though trying to think of what to say, "I just wanna' say something, and I don't know if it'll come out right. I'm sorta' making this up as I go along."

Truth be told, I wasn't sure what she was going to say either, but I could understand that fear. I felt it in every conversation.

"It's okay. I... I don't mind that. I'm no better, right?" I tried to smile, tried to forget what every shift meant, tried to forget the demeaning life as a 'pet.' Right now, I was simply her friend, shifting across to lean my head against her shoulder. Slowly, moving away the blankets in the hazy darkness of the cell, I felt her hoof wind around me.

"I just wanted to say... it doesn't matter what you heard Littlepip's done out there."

She must have felt me jump. For the last day all contact had been harsh and unfriendly, despite hugs earlier, I still flinched. But she seemed to guess what was going on. It was partly anger, partly a void of sadness and misery at everything involving Littlepip, because she held me tightly and stifled my protest.

"Don't say it, Murky! Please, hear me out! It doesn't matter what she's done out there. Why did she inspire you?"

"B-because she was... was free and... and... really strong to d-defy slavery and escape..."

Glimmer nodded, biting her lip. Where was she going with this? I didn't want to have her tell me to just accept the truth again. That wouldn't help! I... I needed the real truth, that this was all some lie...

"Because you saw her escape to be free. That's what I mean, Murky."

She turned, her hooves on my shoulders.

"It doesn't matter what she did or didn't do out there! You have all the proof that she got there. She inspired you because she escaped, never ever forget that! That's the important thing! No matter how bad it is, no matter how much we hurt or argue or... or lose. She's done what she needed. Proved to us that it's possible. For now, that's enough to give us hope to hang in here."

That was true...

That was so true.

I sat there, her hooves resting on me, just staring and thinking. Every aspect of this nightmare of my hero becoming something I refused to believe was ignoring the biggest thing.

She had already escaped.

Glimmerlight smiled, seeing the look on my face as my eyes widened and mouth clearly gaped open a little, knowing she'd stumbled onto at least one way to find some form of compromise between us.

"We'll talk it all over later, Murky. I promise. But for now this has to be enough for both of us. No matter what she is, what she did, or what's true or false she gave us hope of potential. Now we just need to hang on, Murky! Brimstone's coming back, Protégé will recover eventually, we... we have Coral with us now, and I still managed to hide our stuff in the wall cavity before Blunderbuck came!"

She wiped my sweaty and drooping mane from my eyes, seeing my own terrified gaze behind it.

"We can still do this, Murky. Just don't let them beat you. You're strong, lil' bro. You've so much more than you think. Now please, please hear me when I say this. No matter what's happened between us or... or them, don't let them win. They can't break who you are because somepony's already proven it's possible! Don't let them ruin who you became since I met you. Just don't..."

I felt a twinge in my eyes, the feeling so familiar I never even noticed it. Part of my mind rebelled. I hadn't been told I was allowed to cry! I hadn't been told!

But I dared to rebel a little.

I cried with my sis as we held one another.

"Just a little longer, Murky. I know you're feeling weak right now, vulnerable. I know what he's doing to you, but please just hold on. I... I couldn't bear to see you go back to what you were, you're such a beautiful little pony with an incredible heart that I don't want to lose! No... no matter who you want to believe in, I'll still love you, lil' bro..."

The tears properly came at last, shift after shift of them held back released by the care of Glimmer.

"I love you too, sis... I... I won't. It just hurts so much..."

"I know, Murky. I'm sorry."

"But I... I'll try and hold on for that better day when we can all leave together. All of us, Littlepip got out, she... she did it. They can't take that away from me! N-no matter what they do to me there... there's still that hope, right?"

She smiled, ruffling my mane. "There always is."

We both jolted upright as we heard the cage door lock slammed open and the door wrenched across the ground, creaking and scraping as it went.

"Murky Number Seven! Next shift! Come on, Shackles is waiting!"

I couldn't help the little whine escaping me. It... it was starting again! But Glimmerlight pulled me tightly to her.

"Just hold on, you've got that little core of hope. They can't take that away from you, you always have that over him, just stay yourself. Don't turn back to the slave. You're more than a number."

A harsh trotting step gave way to a slaver barging into our back room, invading our safe haven of peace. I didn't even pay attention to his shouting as he took my collar and chain, dragging me away from Glimmerlight. She followed as far as she could to the door of the back room where all the other slaves in with us were instructed to stay. A couple were grabbed too, a cull for the workforce. I was simply dragged away from her.

"Hey, you too! Get over here, mare!"

I looked up, seeing the masked slaver pointing with an armoured hoof at Coral Eve, sitting morosely against the wall. With a brief glance to me... she didn't take more than a second to get up and join the movement, giving Glimmer a brief look. I could see the unspoken words.

'I'll take care of him.'

Even as I was brought outside. Even as the chain was taken up by My Master with a sick grin and an all too intimate stroke of his hoof across my face at seeing me somewhat recovered I knew she was there. No matter what hellhole they had planned for us, at least I wouldn't be alone this time.

The scream cut the air around the Mall with such a sudden cold shock that I almost joined it.

The thud that followed, however, only took whatever fear I had and converted it to a sudden and hollow kick to the gut.

We had just left the Mall when the sound had made almost everypony spin to look as we all saw the shape fall from the roof and crash into the hard gravel path around the Mall. Just out of nowhere. Now everypony was silent, gradually moving closer. I couldn't see anypony on the roof, had somepony pushed him? Was it an... an accident?

My Master strode through the crowd, me being pulled in tow. With slaves parting ahead of us... we saw the reality of what had happened.

Before me lay a young buck with his cutie marks sliced off.

...I...

I didn't...

A single moment on a control tower long ago was in my mind, one inch away from leaning too far off the edge on purpose while scared and hurting...

My Master snorted, ordering a couple of slaves to dispose of the body. I remembered he'd told me this long ago, that slaves used the roof of the high Mall to end it when they saw no other way to escape the pain. No other way out.

He was just like me. But he hadn't the same hope. The same sight that I'd seen that there was a way out from inside the city. That somepony had managed it. Without that he'd... he'd...

"Do not cry." My Master did not shout. He simply spoke firmly, simply turned and dragged me away as I saw the lifeless body dumped into a cart.

Nothing more than a means to an end.

Sooty Morass' observation on the life of the enslaved bit deep, as I saw one more unknown and lonely soul disposed of. Nothing more than a simple tool that had reached its final use before breaking.

Meanwhile, all around, the slavery went on.

At the very least, it wasn't raining.

Sore of hoof and stiff of body, I trotted behind him with my head low at the front of the process of two dozen slaves. We had all been quiet. Whether in simple submission or out of emotion for the poor buck we had all seen I did not know, but My Master seemed content with it as he led us. We had left the Mall headed in the opposite direction from Hearts and Hooves Hospital, toward the Ministry of Arcane Science and eventually taking a turn that led us somewhere else entirely.

I'd never been to this area of Fillydelphia before...

It felt isolated, barely used by Red Eye's empire from a lack of the colossal factories around. Instead it was populated by cold grey homes of hewn rock and thick pillars. Lining the streets past soggy dead gardens they seemed silent and untouched. There couldn't have been many resources to be gained from out here but I still saw some individual ponies sifting through them with maps hanging around their necks. I knew that job, they were slaves pushed into exploring the city to find potential areas that could be stripped of anything useful and help prioritise the places effort was made to salvage properly.

This must have been the only significant area left within the Wall these days so untouched.

Large tenement buildings, single floor shops, and abandoned diners passed by us on either side. This had once been a crowded neighbourhood. We had to sometimes weave around crashed and ruined chariots or wagons. The entire place looked bustling but none of it particularly wealthy. Likely the reason why Red Eye hadn't dealt with it other than to wall it off for eventual expansion into. I had to give him credit, that sure was thinking ahead for the long game.

Curiously, many of the buildings had large unfinished upper floors that seemed to jut out of already existing rooftops. Had they been trying to expand the housing around here vertically? Much of the work in progress had been decimated by the Balefire to leave girders and long poles of metal hanging or having tumbled into alleyways or over the road. But many still bore wooden platforms up high. Desperate building for cheaper expansion when the funds were going to the war effort, I supposed.

"We're here, get in the gates you wretches! Move!"

My Master stamped and pointed to the next building at a cross junction. Surrounded by high metal fences, what looked like an old school or mansion seemed to jut out from within. Most of the fence was melted, fallen upon its side from the heat that had warped the shape or bent it toward the ground. Crunchy dead grass went underhoof as I trotted into its grounds.

Behind me, Coral stopped briefly and turned her head. To our right there was a sign, leading me to simply glance at her for the literary aid.

"Cross Street Orphanage..." Coral didn't dare speak too loudly, you never knew when

The Master was ready for any excuse.

We were led up before the pillared entranceway. Casting my head up, doing my best to stay as far from My Master as my chain allowed without pulling, I got a good look at the building. Above the way in, I saw an old mural of the Goddesses. Twisting around one another.

Protégé's cutie mark. The symbol of peacetime Equestria. Only at the centre of this one lay a small sleeping foal protected by the will of the Goddesses either side. The dream of better days for sure.

Going higher, I saw high angled terracotta tiles on the roof punctuated by musty windows. But above that again was another of the girder and wooden panel extensions intended to add another half floor to the already tall building. They hadn't even gotten around to cutting through the roof before everything ended.

I could see several slavers waiting around and inside the main oaken doors. Thick and reinforced, they must have been a real security barrier along with the iron bars across every one of the tall windows. They looked tacked on, wartime paranoia affecting a once idealistic building. Trotting in behind My Master, we were brought to a halt in the dark reception. A huge staircase swept up before us covered in a thick blue fabric that ran down into a muddy carpet of very old hoofprints. Old furniture bearing brass decoration and edges flanked us, the sort of thing I'd once seen in stuffier rooms within Manehattan.

"Your task, slaves, is twofold." My Master looked around, before staring across every slave in turn. "Red Eye wants the girders from the roof, they're of a rarer alloy metal. After that you are to search the entire orphanage. Red Eye wants, hrm... toys, for the foals."

The slaves distinctly seemed to contain their relief. This was an easy task as far as things usually went. The chance to spend a little time hunting toys in an enclosed building for a little? Even with the girder job this was a... relief.

Part of me couldn't quite shake the horror that any form of slavery felt like a relief. But even as I kept my head low, hearing the slavers start organising the rest into teams to complete the job on the roof first, I felt a tug on my chain, pulling my head up to look at him.

"All ready to begin again, Number Seven?"

I cringed, feeling myself lean against Coral to my side even as he stared down. Those light green eyes, my eyes, glinted with joy at a job for his little pet.

But I had a little more strength. Glimmer was right. Just look forward and keep going. N-nothing he could d-do would stop me believing. We could beat this, we could beat him and—

My chain tugged, pulling me from my hooves to lie on the soppy wet carpet trodden by so many hundreds coming in from the mud and rain. A hoof stepped on me, pressing down and holding me to the floor.

"Do not dare look upon me with that kind of face, Number Seven! You look to me only as your Master and nothing else!"

I tried to move, but his weight pressed down.

"I... I... auuurgh! I'm sorry, Master!"

I choked, my chain lifting me up by the neck, his voice roaring and drawing back a large bony hoof.

"I did not tell you to speak, slave!"

Surging, driven by his huge body, the hoof crashed across my snout, swinging me like a piñata on my collar while held up. The pain of my recently reset snout sending a lance of agony through my skull and down the back of my neck to the choking burn of the collar holding me.

“He was just apologising! Leave him alone!” Coral rushed forward, before being thrown back with the flick of that same abusive hoof that had so recently struck me. Struggling to keep my eyes open, clutching at my collar to keep myself breathing, I saw her knocked back into the rest of the terrified slaves. Their Master’s fury was not one they wanted to be caught up in.

“You do not dare believe you have the freedom to speak, Number Seven... now get back in line and don’t ever look upon me with those rebellious eyes again!”

I couldn’t breathe! The blood from my snout was running down the back of my nose into my constricted throat, drowning me in my own fluids! I couldn’t even nod!

The hoof struck one more, propelling me into the crowd of cowed slaves. The example before them of what happened to slaves who ‘resisted’ brought them to huddle and cluster away from me. All except a black eyed Coral Eve, Whining, I nodded rapidly to My Master after keeping my mouth shut. He... he hadn’t asked a question, I wasn’t to respond. It wasn’t my place, I was just a slave, what had I been thinking!?

I wasn’t free to think. I’d forgotten that.

“Good! You’re learning...”

Standing in the light of the exit, the darkened red haze of Fillydelphia casting a blood red glint to his eyes through the many doors, My Master instructed the slavers (who seemed more than hesitant to speak themselves) to get us onto the roof. Reaching down, he detached my chain from my collar before chuckling and turning. Walking toward the outside world away from our task, I could only presume he was to wait outside or deal with something else in the meantime.

“Come on, Murky. I’m here, my dear.” Coral whispered, her hooves around me. She tore a section of her shredded blouse to hold against my snout. The light blue fabric dulled and turned a harsh darker red as my bleeding nose seeped into it. I... I wanted to cry. To cling to her, pretend she was my mother, and just let it all out.

But the command was still standing. He’d reminded me to follow it again.

“You will not even cry.”

“It’s okay...” She coddled me, stroking my mane as each slave was raised by the slavers for the journey upstairs onto the roof. “It’s okay, you’ll be fine...”

I wouldn’t be. This was too much, every time I healed, I... I got this treatment. My snout was broken again. I could feel the bones shifting. My ribs hurt, my neck burned, my cold stifled my thinking and hurt my head. My lungs were... were... swelling and burning like my throat...

Too much...

Just too much.

This was a lot higher than it had looked.

The top of the orphanage’s floor expansion project was utterly exposed to the hot winds of Fillydelphia. Breaths of air that stung your eyes and sent the bitter poison of the air swirling into your mouth. Most of the slaves had found something to wrap around their mouths. We weren't so lucky.

But the full extent of the project was clear. They had been building three extra floors as wide as the orphanage again onto this wing of the large building. One side of the old walls below us had been sheared away completely, exposing every one of the three existing floors to the wind as well. I didn't know anything about architecture other than that the world needed more safety railings installed, but my best guess was that it was to rebuild the support walls into the new floors on top.

Honestly, the whole thing was just silly.

Oh... and of course we were tasked to strip girders from this whole ramshackle deal...

Hooking another bag of screws, nails, and tools onto the harness across my back, I began the journey back up. Carefully limping across wooden planks and trying to avoid going near the edges, I ascended the three rickety floors set between the two dozen loosening girders. My snout had swollen up, blocking my nose with dried blood and giving me a distinctly silly look. Slaves and slavers alike had already renamed me 'Red Nose.'

That wasn't what I needed right now.

"Hey, Red Nose! Black sheep of the Red family?"

I closed my eyes, pushing onward to the top level. Ignore them. Ignore them...

"Your big brother Red Eye get all the favour?"

I wanted them to stop, but I dared not speak. My nose throbbed as though in response, tickling inside like I was about to...

Oh no.

I sneezed. My cold catching up with me in the choking air up here. Writhing pain spiked through my snout and throat. I shrieked sharply and fell to the ground, clutching myself and trying to not let my other illness spark up, too. One hoof pulled the collar as far from my neck as I could, like it'd do anything.

They snorted and turned back to their work, ignoring the little filly-sized buck that lay clutching his nose. I actually felt light headed. I hadn't had any serious cuts, but all these little injuries were adding up. I was just one small pony! One little being who couldn't take this any more.

Yet I got up and moved on. I had my commands, and a good slave didn't disobey, even if it hurt to do so. Gingerly, I picked up the bags again and continued moving, trying to keep my hazy vision focused on the thin planks that formed ramps between each level. Eventually, the relief of the third and top floor lay before me as I offloaded the goods for the slaves and rejoined Coral to work on the long-rusted screws that held the scaffold to these girders atop the entire stack.

She'd seen me coming, extending a hoof for a gentle hold even as I approached. I knew it couldn't last. We had a quota to meet.

"Still hanging in there, Murky?" Her voice was soft and very quiet. I wondered if Glimmer had told her I liked knowing someone was speaking so that only I, with my sensitive hearing, could hear.

"Mhm." I wasn't up to many words right now, so I just nodded as I picked up the heavy wrench I'd been allotted and started the long, difficult grind of pushing my whole body weight onto it. We used the screws as temporary holders to stop the entire thing collapsing once we removed the long jammed ones. Some more 'skilled' workers would come later on today and actually do the deconstruction. Our purpose was just to make the job easier for them by replacing the hard-to-remove nuts and screws with easily workable ones.

The entire thing was just so menial, so pointless. I could think of a dozen better ways to do this. But it wasn't my duty to think, I was just to be a little cog.

My wrench scraped and ground as it tried to find purchase. Working my hooves around it, I fell into the work again, starting the weary process of spending minutes at a time trying to make it move that one slow inch to the left or right. Somepony had told me which way they came off but I couldn't remember.

Just put your head down and work, Murky Number Seven. Do what you've always done to get by.

And so my head was lowered as I leaned into the work. It couldn't stop the pain in my body, it couldn't stop the longing and wishing to be able to just spend hours cuddled up to somepony to relax and pretend life was good. I barely cared with whom. Coral, Glimmer, Unity... the Stable Dweller. But it could make time blur and let shifts flow by, that I knew.

Coral beside me worked as hard as she needed, cautiously watching for when a slaver was nearby. We had to speed up then, look like we were striving our utmost. They listened for us talking, so I simply took comfort in the occasional tap of her hoof on mine. Just to remind me somepony kind was there.

The nut in front of me jammed even tighter. I'd been moving it the wrong way for the last... however long! My legs shivered as the frustration built up higher still. I... I wanted to just hit it with the wrench! Hit it again and again until all this somehow went away...

I'd never make my quota now, because of one stupid little thing.

I was going to be whipped. I just knew it.

Thumping a hoof down, I leaned my forehead against the girder, feeling the sway of the platforms below me and slowly casting my eyes up to look out over the red-lit vista of Fillydelphia. In the distance, I could see the sun just poking over the edge of the Wall. Its hazy light through the cloud cover ever-taunting and full of unfulfilled wishes. Once, I'd dreamed of what was out there, but now I couldn't think much further than that Wall.

Looking down over the chimney stacks and collapsed roofs, I saw the dead city streets that led back into the more bustling industrial sector. Every block led to an increasing nightmare. Between towering smoke stacks and clouds of smog, I could see the thick shape of the Mall, the faded colours of the helter-skelter, the sprawling Wartime Factory Hub and the enigmatic Ministry of Arcane Science, all of them clustered among mesh, brick, stone and hot metal. Lower down still, I could see the slaves tramping about just like me. Day after day. Below that I saw the pits, or the smoke rising from them at least. Down. Down. Always down to find worse things.

I couldn't escape all this.

My eyes travelled farther down, seeing a few prospectors in the next streets, then farther down still until I was looking over the edge.

Between the walls and the half melted fence, I could see the gravel surrounding the building. Blinking to clear my eyes, I could fancy I saw the dead plants among the little trails of gravel. I leaned out a little, peering toward it.

Would... would it hurt? S-six floors. Would that do it? Would that let me escape?

Eyes wide, I couldn't help but just... think...

Maybe... maybe I—

“MURKY, NO!”

A magic field slapped me back, hurling me away from the edge where I'd been hanging over and about to fall without even realising it. I tumbled back, thrown into hooves that wrapped around me and drew me safely away. I... I... what had I been doing!?

Coral pulled me farther back. My nose throbbed terribly from her powerful use of magic, but I was in more shock than pain, my wide eyes staring at the edge I'd been slowly tipping over.

"What were you doing? No, Murky! You don't have to do that! Oh, it's that poor little stallion from before putting ideas in your head. That's not the answer!"

Her hooves stroked my mane, keeping me close, ignoring the shouts of the slaver as he heard the commotion. But she was wrong. That stallion jumping hadn't put the idea into my head.

He'd only reminded me of it.

But feeling her there, the realisation only began to slap home of how close I'd been again.

"I'm... oh Goddesses, I'm sorry! I'm so sorry!"

My eyes felt wet, not on command, but I looked up at her face, both stern and caring. I could see her horn crackling, and she sucked down the pain that using her magic had caused her. I just kept apologising again and again.

"I... I didn't meant to! I promise! I just... just felt... I can't do this. I thought I'd escape! I thought I'd be free so long ago!" Sniffling, I put my head to her shoulder. "I can't do this under him! I want the pain to end..."

"It will! Remember what Glimmer said, Murky. Remember what your, hm... sister said. It will, someday. We're with you. We all are. Even if we're not all around you, I'm sure they're thinking about you. Even that nice mare you told me about... Unity was it? We'll all be together someday."

She was struggling. Coral, I knew, was one of the most hurt of all of us with her son out there somewhere. I could hear her fighting to even believe herself, but it was obvious. She was saying it for me. Simply nodding, I clung to her and tried to forget the horrible sensation of my body's balance tipping and moving toward the point of no return.

"What's all this racket!? Get back to work, you fucks! You two!"

We looked up. A masked slaver brandishing a shock rod in his magic had ascended to check on progress. I could just imagine the face snarling beneath it.

"Get back on the line before I—"

He was drowned out.

At first, I thought that Coral had unleashed her magic out of protective anger, but it had been a great clash of thunder that had shaken the building. The clouds above broiled and twisted, the flash we had missed the first time flared once more before the scaffold and girders rocked and swung from the concussive force of thunder above.

Then slowly, we began to feel the drips.

Every slave knew the routine. Get into cover. Coral held me safe through the rush as we all fled to the building below. Slavers allowed it, for slaves losing their skin or getting horrendous infections from prolonged rain exposure were no good to anypony.

The door slammed behind us all in the upper pantry of the building, two dozen slaves cramming into one small area hurriedly. The slaver drew his mask off and spat upon the floor.

"Well, guess the toy collection starts early." He turned, spotting us as I felt Coral tighten her grip on my weak body at his lowering of eyebrows. "Well? Get going!"

She helped me up, and I saw the others shaking off wet coats with towels stolen from the pantry before beginning their own trudge to search the orphanage. My own wing bandages were sodden already.

"Come on, Murky. Come on. Let's get your mind off such things."

I squeaked, looking away, feeling ashamed to have had her see that.

"I'm sorry... I... I didn't... I don't... I..."

Out of the door, she stopped for a second, kneeling down to be more on a level with me, placing a hoof gently on my battered face.

"You're scared and losing hope. I know how it feels, Murky. But please, don't do that to yourself. Don't do it to us. Please promise me you won't ever think of that option. You're one of us, Murky. You mean a lot to us."

Hyperventilating, trying to get the breath, I only attempted a shaky nod after four attempts to find the words.

"I... I p-promise..."

One last hug, and she looked to the hallway. We were in an old wooden construction, one with dull, carpeted floors and old, thick doors leading away from us at the top of the staircase. The bannisters were decorated with a long-faded antique finish.

"Come on, let's get some toys for the foals. Something even we can feel a little better doing. You just take it easy and I'll search, okay? Find something to distract yourself with, don't think about it..."

The doll stared back at me disapprovingly.

I sat on my rump before it, watching it as it lounged atop an old pile of towels, perhaps having been cleaned with them before it all happened.

The whole thing was blackened, twisted, and bug eaten. But it was the only one we'd found nearby the laundry room. I'd made to pick it up until I'd seen that look in its little plastic eyes, sat there staring back with all four hooves on the ground. I had recoiled a little, before glaring back at it myself as though asserting that I had confidence in some ways. Even if it was over a foal's toy. Without quite knowing why, it had become a contest between the doll and I for who would look away or blink first.

A contest I wasn't sure I was winning.

"Y-you won't win!" I boasted, stomping a hoof on the ground as my eyes itched.

The doll remained quietly confident.

My eyes narrowed, feeling the strain. It would fall over any time now! That stomping of my hoof on the stone floor totally hadn't been to make it fall. No, that was just... a... a warstomp! To psych myself up!

It moved not even an inch. Those glinting eyes staring back as I leaned in closer and closer. My cheeks pinched in an effort to push myself, I could push myself to win sometimes! I wouldn't... I wouldn't...

I blinked.

Suddenly, somehow, the doll looked rather smug.

"ARGH!" I picked it up, turned, and dumped it on the floor, throwing a towel over it. And then an upside down basket over that. Followed by jumping on to the basket to sit on it.

Just to be safe.

Crossing my front hooves with a snort, I allowed myself a raised chin of achievement. That'd show it! Smug little thing thought it was so much better than me! Well, who was the pony on top now?

Looking at the quiet room around me, it did occur that I was perhaps trying too hard to distract myself from what I'd been thinking about up on the roof.

Coral Eve returned from the dryer closet carrying a few layers of cloth on her back with perfect balance normally only seen in earth ponies. With a small smile to me, she began to tear it and work with a little needle and thread we'd found for laundry repairs. Her eyes went to my makeshift stool before

"I see your contest ended?" She had a sly smirk. "It win?"

I balked, looking down below me for a second.

"N-no!"

"Of course, dear."

All I could do was blush. "How did y-you know I was, um, doing that?"

"Mothers know these things. Like how I knew you weren't actually sleeping earlier when I sent Glimmer into you. We've got eyes everywhere, Murky!" She looked up, tapping the side of her head. I blinked a few times, blushing rather widely until Coral patted my head and went back to her sewing.

Slowly, I climbed down from the toy's prison and picked up a needle myself to help her. She looked rather surprised that I knew how, before we both fell into the brief process of creation. I looped and joined fabric while she shaped and sewed it into a shape and form. Just a few minutes of calm while doing something we both wanted to do. We made a saddlebag for the toys! She kept working, though, so I kept helping her. It wasn't drawing, but it gave me something to focus on. I found myself hoping to sew more things with her.

We'd avoided the topic of what had happened, instead using this downtime as a chance to let the scared little buck inside me calm down. But I knew it was all façade. We were just trying to pretend that there was something other than the nightmare of My Master to return to when this work ended.

All the same, I appreciated it.

"There we go! It's rough, but it'll help if that rain's still on when we make the journey back." Coral held up our creation. A multicoloured and rather garish looking patchwork of various bits of fabric she had found. Tying it around my torso, I felt the gentle comfort of cover for my wings once again.

"Thanks, Coral..."

"You need something in your life right now. But we should get moving, we've got your one toy yet somehow I think they'll be expecting a bit more. Where are the others?"

Shifting about till my bandaged wings were safe and secure under the makeshift cover, I sat and closed my eyes, allowing my ears to do all the work. Slowly, I tried to tune out the throbbing of my own irregular heart and ignore the stinging pain all along my muzzle to simply... hear.

The stomping of hooves... upstairs, to the right... the far wing.

A shout from the front door... the common room.

The crashing of pans... pantry.

Nothing to the left...

"The left wing's not been touched much yet."

I opened my eyes, seeing Coral take the toy out from under the basket and throw it into the crude saddlebag. (I saw that little 'better than you' look there, toy!) Joining me near the door, we continued the hunt. The others hadn't had much luck... mostly on account of them all rushing the common room first and fighting over the more obvious ones that had been left. We'd stuck to the outside areas... figuring we'd pick up what was ignored in less obvious places.

Partially, I thought, it was also Coral not wanting me involved with any of the fighting. I could still see her glancing at my hurt nose every minute or so.

We trotted the abandoned halls. Behind us, the shouts of slaves fighting over toy trains in the common room to add to their quota sounded all too appropriately childish. No, we'd made a good decision to come the quieter path inside the surprisingly large building. The walls were decked with old crayon drawings here, sunny rays beaming down on crude trees and stick figure ponies.

"Orphanages are such sad places." Coral let her hoof drift along the crayon. "In wartime, it wouldn't just be those who'd never had a mother or father, would it?"

"No..." I bit my lip, feeling the sudden realisation of what she meant come all too close to home for me.

The haphazard colours on the wall went below internal windows for supervising the playrooms. Now, though, they only looked in on collapsed ceilings. We followed the drawings, before turning the corner and coming to a large wall that had perhaps once been blank.

It certainly wasn't now after somepony had had their way with it.

As high as a small foal could reach with a stool, it was covered in crayon. Held in stark relief from the thin red light entering through the musty windows, it stood out in the dingy, abandoned corridors like a great flare of happiness. Drawings, words I couldn't read, ponies, and places all in a grand vista. I saw Canterlot Castle, rising high in thick white chalk upon the once-beige wall. Dozens of ponies played, foals mostly. They were defined only by the colour of what the stick body was and some clumpy manes. Some sort of huge garden party under massive streams of thick yellow sunlight that arced down through the drawing.

Everypony seemed so happy.

"This is some serious dedication from a foal." Coral cast her eyes around it.

I had to agree. They had clearly been young, however they really had made this something special. I could even see how some of the chalk was older than the rest, more dry on it.

But then I stopped thinking... and started looking. My hoof drifted on the crayon for a few seconds, before my heart nearly skipped a beat with a sharp thought.

"C-Coral?"

"Yes, Murky?"

"If these were wartime, why is the crayon over the top of the dirt and dust?"

She blinked, before reaching forward to wipe at one section with a hoof. The pink chalk of a brightly smiling, poofy maned pony smudged off easily, blurring the edges of a cartoon face staring to the side. I could swear she was looking with shock exactly at the place where Coral had smudged her.

The long maned unicorn beside me took a step back, wiping her hoof on the floor.

"Let's... just keep going, shall we?"

I could hear the sudden uneasiness in her voice. My hooves hesitated, but hearing her trot much more cautiously away, I couldn't help but follow. Glancing back, the pink pony drawing—

It had a hoof up, as though waving at me.

Hadn't it just been...

Had I just missed...

But...

I wanted to snort, but it would have hurt too much. Instead I simply turned and stomped away with as much indignation as my little hooves could muster. I really hated pink ponies.

We passed various doors. A simple cleaning cupboard, a staff room for those who ran the orphanage, and even a brief first aid station. We hunted for any RadAway, but we found nothing of value. Anything was either long gone or simply had been beyond this orphanage's budget. At most, there were some dirty needles and a roll of bandage. We paused briefly as Coral tried to clean my snout a little.

For the next ten minutes, anypony might have wondered what all the squeaking from the first aid room was all about. Dealing with my flinching, with me trying not to pull away too much, she did her best to clean it out to avert an infection from the smog-filled air. We sat, alone in the whole wing of the orphanage.

Eventually, I couldn't bear the silence.

"Coral?"

"Yes, dear?"

"Do... do you think she'd take me back?"

I yelped again as my nose stung. Coral Eve gently, but firmly, held me still and finished her work, before settling back.

"Glimmer? She already—"

"No..." I fixed her with a slightly pleading look. "My... my mom?"

Her eyes went wider, setting the bloody bandages to one side before placing her hooves on my shoulders.

"Of course she would! No mother would ever want to have their foal anywhere else in the world."

I looked to the side, out into the corridor. Through the station's glass back into the hallway, I could see the crayon. The foals all happily smiling beside one another. No adults.

"They weren't wanted..."

"Murky, dear, that's not the same. You told me she was nice to you from what you do remember. That she offered herself to the slavers in an attempt to make them let you stay? Doesn't that say something?"

Coral brought my head back around.

"She clearly loved you from what I hear. Any mother who wanted a child would want to see them again."

"But it's... it's been so long and... and I was..."

"Was what?"

From behind her, the sound of something metal hitting against wood echoed through the orphanage.

We both startled, hopping to all fours. My head whipped to the side, spotting a thin grate near the floor. The source of the noise!

"What is it? What do you hear, Murky?"

I listened, hearing a small pitter as something moved away down the vent behind it.

Lowering myself down, I tried to see but my eyes couldn't see into it even after I let them adjust to the darkness.

"We're not alone, Coral..."

"Probably a radroach. Come on, let's get going."

She moved to the doorway, but I stared again into the grate. I could still hear the sound moving farther and farther away. Standing up, I made to follow Coral, before remembering my unfinished sentence. Nervous and unsure, I ended up just blurting it out.

"I... I wasn't wanted." She stopped, hearing my weak little squeaky voice utter it. "I was an accident..."

Coral's eyes closed as she sighed sadly, holding the door open into the musty carpeted corridor again.

"Many ponies in this world are..."

She took a long breath.

"But it's not how it happens, it's what you do after it that matters. You're a good little pony below all that dirt, blood, and toil, Murky. After all this life, you're still so innocent with a beautiful big smile when you really let go, so I hear. If I want that, I'm sure your mother would too. Just keep dreaming about her, dear."

I tried to look up and smile, I really did... but I couldn't seem to make both sides of my mouth cooperate very well. It was enough for Coral, it seemed, as she smiled back and ushered me back out into the orphanage.

"Now, we need to make tracks. The dormitories are down here, I think. They'd keep them near the first aid station."

Closing the door behind us, I couldn't help but glance at that grate once more. But my mind was more firmly on Coral's assurance. Would my mother still truly want me? Her little colt who didn't even remember her. What if she'd forgotten me too? I was the seventh. Maybe there'd been others since. Maybe she liked them more...

No! No, keep dreaming. She was out there! She was still a goal. Something to dream about. One more thing to stop my mind from going to the edge. It was possible

"I'll do my best. Thank you, Coral." I spoke as we trotted toward the corner.

"Just remember she loves you. We love you. We don't want to lose you."

"I'm sorry..."

She only glanced down, as though debating saying something, before finally putting it into words. "Just... don't go off alone if we can help it, okay? Stick where we can see you."

Nodding along a little meekly, wanting to assure I'd be fine, I instead just kept my mouth shut. I could see we were at the front of the building through the windows, the ruined garden behind the fence drooping out below me. Light from the crater washed through the darker twilight, casting a glow through the half-broken windows. Glass crunched beneath Coral's hooves that I found myself naturally avoiding. I couldn't help but let my ears stay pricked and ready... eyes wary of every single vent. The slaves were still making a huge commotion as they gutted the place from the other end.

We had to step around various items, and I saw an old laundry trolley. It had been left when its owner had, no doubt, fled at the sound of sirens. Tipped on its side, its dirty bedsheets had long been eaten by insects, leaving only tattered and stringy remains to identify them.

"Bedsheets. The dormitories must just be down the hall." I muttered to Coral, before looking up, squinting my eyes, and gasping. "A toy!"

Outside a doorway ahead of us, I saw a little toy train lying on the floor, strings for a pony to pull it lay loosely in front of it. That had to be where the foals had slept! I galloped forward, and picked it up with accomplishment in my eyes, feeling the cheap plastic creak a little. Coral only chuckled, patting me lightly on the head. She trotted on past, laying a hoof to the door to pull the handle down. I could see a few faded flowers embossed on the door alongside a fancy type of writing.

“Looks like the foals liked to keep their toys near where they slept. Well, let’s have a look in—”

Her scream as she looked inside was cut short in sheer shock. Her motion to head in was arrested, and she instead stood and merely shivered at some sight within, tears began forming in her eyes. Through the half-open door, red light from windows I couldn’t see streamed across her suddenly aghast face. Her whole body froze, then began to tremble. I moved forward, but her hoof pushed me back, before Coral recoiled and slammed the door shut, before steadying herself against the wall. Caught by surprise, I had hopped back from her hoof... but now I moved closer, looking up at the older mare.

“C-Coral? What’s wrong? What’s in there? Was it... the... the...”

She didn’t respond, eyes tightly held shut as she pulled me into a fierce embrace... for her benefit, no doubt.

“There was a fire.”

That was all she would say as she led us away from the dormitory. A dormitory that I now remembered had been facing the crater.

Coral was silent for some time. Trotting behind her, I could hear her trying to conceal occasional sobs. Twice, she had stopped to rest against the wall when we had found any remnants. A little blanket or a bathroom with so many tiny toothbrushes along the line of sinks...

Normally, I was the one who reacted worse to these ruins of the past, but Coral Eve’s maternal instinct was not enjoying this place. I couldn’t imagine what I’d have done if I’d seen what she had.

We moved farther down the wing toward the back end of the orphanage, away from the dorms. A wide canteen had been long stripped of food by those who cared more for survival than catering for foals. The mess they’d made, so long untouched, was covered in deep dust that wafted into the air when I smoothed my hoof along a table. I wondered if they had been ghouls from before the Stables had opened, or just those lucky enough to survive the blasts.

I heard something like shuffling behind me.

I swung, hopping up onto one of the low, foal-friendly tables to look around. Coral spun, too, trying to spot any vents. But the sound had stopped. Even after a minute, the only interruption being the sound of other slaves crashing into the same dorm we’d passed, there was nothing more. All that I saw was a small bowl spinning from where it had dropped, near the corner of the tiled canteen. At least two doors led away from it.

“Still think it’s just radroaches?”

Coral breathed out, placing her two front hooves on the table I’d leapt onto. “I just think I want out of here. Come on, let’s check the kitchen. Even if we don’t find toys, I think they'll appreciate any tools. Hopefully."

She turned toward the canteen's work tables near the back. I still stood on the thin metal table... watching the doors with narrowed eyes. I'd been in too many places with hidden secrets by now to believe in simple radroaches. Slowly, still watching the doors, I trotted over to them and pushed one aside.

Behind lay a musky room, dust falling from a hole in the ceiling, from what looked like a propped open door through to the attic. Two slabs of wood had crashed down here and destroyed a terminal that was embedded into the desk itself, like they'd been built together. Some form of small office... maybe the cook's? Or somepony who helped organise the orphanage? One large poster hung on the wall beside a rewritable board that bore scrawled writing. The poster held the yellow Ministry Mare, Flutter... shine, was it? Yeah, Fluttershine. She was proudly waving to a little cartoon foal being led away by two wonderful-looking ponies, one stallion and one mare. Behind Fluttershine, many other foals were waving goodbye from a building's windows. Even I could guess that this was advertising some sort of adoption service, even without reading the little speech bubble coming from the child. Those lucky foals.

I hoofed through the small shelves of books and folders, seeing a lot of carefully written script and graphs. They had to have been a unicorn to be this neat. I sighed and replaced it carefully before turning back to look at the drawers upon a filing cabinet.

They held little, just a few inkwells and a calculator alongside an empty bottle of alcohol. But I did notice a few rolling bullets near the back, big and thick ones that I'd never have been able to shoot. Hoofing one out, I wondered where the weapon was. Probably taken whenever this pony abandoned their workplace in the sirens.

My eyes fell to the ruined desk, finding something much more valuable. Another audio diary! Without so much as waiting, I hoofed the play button I'd long come to recognise by shape alone and sat holding it.

Click.

No... oh no, this wasn't going to be happy.

For the first sound I heard was that of distant sirens and the shouting of adults over scared children. But then the stallion's voice, mature and of good birth, cut through, speaking close to the microphone.

I knew I should have pressed stop.

"I failed! I... I failed! Miss Fluttershy, I'm so sorry! Please, forgive me!"

Even as I shivered, hearing Coral Eve poke her head out of the kitchen to check if I was alright, I simply watched the turning tapes inside the recorder. I heard someone hammer on the door, screaming for them to 'get their butt out and help,' but the voice overrode it.

"I'M SORRY! You asked me to find them parents that could afford the tickets, but I couldn't do it! They were just so rare! No pony had the bits, and I turned away so many good parents because they could never have afforded the Stable tickets! I thought I could save the foals, but now they're all still here! I told you that you could count on me, I'm so sorry!"

Sundial wasn't the only one trying. The idea of just how hard his task must have been cut hard. If an orphanage was so unable to get tickets for foals that they had to selectively pick rich families...

In the background, the siren kept droning. Somepony swore and galloped away, presumably from the door. Turning around to look in that direction, I could see how it had only opened for me to pass because the falling wood had broken the lock.

"I didn't deserve your trust, there's no way out. Only one. I'm sorry, Miss Fluttershy, you should have chosen better. They're all still here. The four minute warning just went out. Oh, Celestia and Luna, how disappointed they must be, I swore to protect the foals. I swore!"

A brief pause.

"I won't hurt them anymore."

I pulled away as the sound of a gunshot blasted through the microphone. It fell from my hooves, clanging on to the desk before the sound of somepony slumping to the ground played out, just before the device clicked to a halt, spinning on a broken wind of tape.

I knew I shouldn't look. I knew I shouldn't, but heart in mouth, I bent over to see behind the desk before twisting and falling with my back to it, head in hooves. Yes, that was where the weapon had been. I just shook my head, feeling for all the world how it hadn't even been the balefire that had been the start of this world's end. Twilight had been right.

Coral Eve found me there, casting a brief glance to the decayed skeletal remains before laying one of the lengths of blanket over it.

"Come on, Murky. There's nothing we can do for this place now."

"They just wanted a mom or dad..."

"I know, dear... I know." She helped me up, turning to the poster at the same time as I did. "I'm sure at least some of them found what they wanted."

"What does it say?"

Looking at me in surprise, she raised her hoof to the words, letting me follow it as she read.

"It's 'The Ministry of Peace Orphan Adoption Service.' Then the foal is saying... heh, cute. It says 'I was lonely, but Miss Fluttershy's ponies helped me find my Forever Mommy.' I'm sure many did. Now come on, Murky. I found something."

We left the office, leaving the blanket covering the poor orphanage leader's remains. I made sure to close the door behind me. Breathing deeply, I followed Coral as she led me through the canteen toward a far set of double doors that had half fallen from their hinges. Smiling to me, she pressed open the doors.

Before me lay all the toys.

They'd been gathered here, what seemed to be a playroom they could come to after getting their dinner in the canteen! I saw a few low foal-size tables with stuffed toys and little plastic figures. A desk for a supervisor sat near the window, bearing little paper excerpts of crayon art all over it. Near the fireplace, some socks were hung up, while the floor had play mats and board games strewn about, still set up to play.

"Jackpot." Coral smiled to me, before setting down the saddlebag to start taking what we needed. "This should see us a comfortable way back for tonight."

I nodded, still looking around at it. Normally, I would have been struck by all this being abandoned, imagining foals laughing and playing. While I did imagine it, the sight wasn't sad because of the past...

...it was sad because I'd never gotten anything like this.

I felt selfish. These foals had been killed by the balefire, and here I was jealous of them having a fun playroom to grow up in and ponies who took care of them, not force them to work! I felt terrible for thinking it, but it just didn't feel fair. Morosely, I passed Coral to see if there were any drawing supplies on the desk. The same stick figure style covered all of them, many of them with Fluttershy. But I found the desktop itself to be a little bare other than one last thing.

Not an audio recorder, but it was a link to the past.

One of Aurora Star's special memory orbs.

I reached forward, picking it up along with the stand I knew activated them. The larger-than-normal orb held under one leg, I hobbled to the centre of the room.

"Coral! Look! I... I've seen one of these before. It makes a pony appear and... and they talk, and it's the Ministry Mares and—"

"Woah, woah..." Coral held up a hoof, somehow silencing me with a look, with those unexplainable mother abilities. "It makes a pony appear?"

I was already drawing out the space to use it. Setting the stand down, I held the orb above it, feeling a slight pulse of magic in the air as it neared.

"Just watch!"

Slowly and ever so carefully, I lowered the orb. Clinking like glass into place before the magical snap flickered around the point of contact, making my ears pop and Coral's eyes go wide. I hurried back, almost clinging to her leg as I felt even a little nervousness creep in. I hadn't even thought of who it might be in this one! A growing swell of energy within the orb coiled and swam before shooting outward, little glittering gems of light that flew and circled in the air in all directions around the orb. More and more, before they arced inward, passing by one another and joining, gaining strands of light that grew into lines and then curves that bent into shapes that joined and grew and grew and grew...

Coral's eyes widened alongside my own. For before us, translucent and twinkling like a star shape in the night sky and radiating both golden yellow and soft pink, stood Fluttershy. We were in the presence of the Ministry Mare of Peace herself.

"Oh... I do hope Aurora doesn't mind me using it for this, but I couldn't leave without saying this to you, little... is this working? Oh my, it is! I'm so sorry, can I start again? I can't? Oh dear..."

She crossed her front hooves, her long pink mane still drifting down over one eye.

"I... I'm so sorry I couldn't come see you, Lilac, but they absolutely need me in Canterlot so very soon! I couldn't leave without being able to say this to you, you poor thing. I really hope Aurora isn't angry I used her super special few-of-a-kind memory orb to send one message, but I couldn't bear to go without making good on my promise. I hope you don't mind this. Please, come and stand in front of me, so it'll be like I'm actually looking at you? Can you do that, please?"

To my surprise, I felt a hoof nudging me. Coral was smiling, pushing me forward.

"Coral?"

"Go on, Murky."

She nodded to the briefly paused and thinly smiling form of Fluttershy, trotting forward till her eyes were looking directly at me. Apparently I was small enough.

Somehow, I found myself trembling as though she could actually see me.

"Now, I've left this with the orphanage master, okay? He'll let you have it whenever you want to listen, Lilac. As many times as you want. Mister Ferrous is very sweet. He'll take care of you and find you a family."

Her face changed, becoming harder, like this wasn't easy for her to say.

"I wanted to help you settle in myself. No little filly should have to go through what you did, but you aren't alone. Many of the foals here had mothers or fathers that went to serve their country, too. When I heard they'd both been... I... the chances of it were just... I just couldn't help but come out myself and see you, you poor poor thing. I know your daddy wasn't in the army, but a zebra spy was caught at the war factory trying to sell plans to them and... and some zebras tried to help him escape. One of them had a gun and..."

She paused, looking up, as though hearing somepony else talking. I could only imagine saying that a filly didn't need to hear this much.

"You're a strong filly, Lilac Rose. I remember when I found you, and the first thing you asked was if you had to step in and do your daddy's job because he couldn't anymore. No, all you need to do is just need to play with the fillies and colts here now till somepony comes along to see you safe. You can do that, can't you?"

She smiled at me, turning her head so that the mane fell away and revealed two big, innocent eyes. She had me totally outclassed in that department. But then they closed as she knelt down, coming down to my level.

"I know you're sad. I know this must all feel like life has spun out of control and there is no way to fix it. I'm so so sorry this happened to you, but there's always somepony out there who'll care for you. Don't give up, dear. This'll all be over someday, and it won't hurt anymore. You'll be cared for and grow up into a wonderful pony yourself. Such a sweet little innocent mind is just what this world needs right now and I promise it'll all be okay... it will be okay. You've got your friends here with you, stay close to them, okay? They all worry for you, too, but they understand what you're going through."

I hadn't even realised when it had changed, but I wasn't looking at Fluttershy talking to a filly anymore.

I could believe that she was talking to... to me.

"You were kind and gentle even when your world got turned upside down. Don't lose that side of you, because you're a brave little pony. More so than you probably feel. You shared what you needed to get by with others and even drew your little pictures for them. That's why I know you're a wonderful pony, who the ones around you love dearly. Not because they pity you, but because you helped them even after all you'd lost."

Those eyes glittered, they were wet, and the little sparkles making up her body twinkled to show it...

"Your mother would be so proud of you..."

That line did it. I felt the tears flowing over my cheeks as I looked into her eyes, before the entire image of Fluttershy shifted, bent forward... and hugged me. She couldn't touch me, but the sparkling form wrapped around me, her hooves holding just over my back.

"You'll get there, my little pony. Just keep looking forward. There's always a way through. Others have shown you that, right? Trust in that."

"I will!" My voice cracked, but I didn't care how embarrassing my shrill little voice sounded. "She did show it was possible! I'll... I'll not give up so long as I know that!"

Fluttershy leaned back and smiled beautifully.

"I'll always be around, wishing the best for you. All of you. No matter where I am, alright? Now on you go, and keep that little chin high."

A transparent hoof partially passed through my mane, before her form became vague... fading as the little blinks of light gently shifted... swirled, and clustered together back into the orb, before fading entirely. I stood still, one hoof over my heaving chest. I knew it wasn't for me, that she had given up a priceless orb to let one little filly hear what she desperately needed to. The sheer kindness of the act, for somepony else or not, simply wouldn't leave my heart. Because of her message.

That so long as there's a shred of hope, you can't ever give up.

Coral moved to me, laying her hoof across the back of my neck to avoid my tender back. No doubt she had some kind words or follow up to what we had just seen, but my ears twitched.

I'd heard a toy being knocked over.

I took off, scampering across the floor and leaping the toys toward one of the larger couches. Throwing my pained body over it, I landed in front of the vent. The small figure crashed into me, screaming and flailing. I knew I'd been hearing something! Radroaches couldn't make such noises!

I felt tiny legs kicking at me, and a rough, high-pitched voice cried out. We rolled out from the couch before we separated. Her leg caught my nose, making me fall back with a cry. Ahead of me, the figure backed off to scramble into a pile of toys.

"D-d-don't hurt me! Please! I wasn't spying! I wasn't!"

Eyes wet from as much the strike on my broken nose, I forced myself to sit up and look.

Before me lay a quivering little earth pony filly. A ghoul. Dressed in an often-repaired uniform, and with a coat that was still surprisingly intact, at a distance one might have thought she were a normal foal but for the horrid rings of broken skin around her eyes and mouth. She was visibly terrified of me, twitching every time I moved. I... how, but I wasn't going to hurt her! What did I do to tell the little filly to not be afraid?

The answer was, I wouldn't. The expert was in the room, and it wasn't me.

"Ssh... sshh, it's alright my dear. We're not going to hurt you. We were just scared as well." Coral Eve trotted across the moth-eaten carpet, holding up a hoof passively, before sitting nearby. "Are you alright?"

The shivering ghoul looked from me to Coral, large eyes bearing small pupils and a yellowed complexion. Quickly, she nodded. "I... I'm fine, miss! I'm sorry about your nose too, miss..."

Wait, but she hadn't hit Coral's...

...oh come on!

"He'll be fine, dear. He's a tough little pony. Tougher than he knows, like you to be out here, as well. Are you all by yourself?"

"Mhm..." The foal nodded, fiddling with her uniform. Her stranded, light purple mane bobbing about over a coat that had clearly once been a brighter yellow. "I... I live here. I got scared by all the ponies, so I did what I always do. Hide in the little places and watch them to see when they go home. But... but then I heard you talking to Miss Fluttershy so... so I came to see if you were going to take her away."

Coral and I shared a glance to one another. My friend leaned forward to the foal.

"What's your name, sweetie?"

She bit her lip, sitting up and looking a little bashful.

"L-Lilac Rose..."

There was a brief moment of silence... before Coral simply surged forward and swept the poor filly up into a tight embrace, ghoul or not.

"I'm so sorry. Oh, by all the forces in this damned world, you poor thing..."

I kept watch. Or rather, I kept an ear out for anypony approaching by sitting near the double doors. I'd closed them over to give us a little more cover from anypony who wandered into the canteen. Coral, meanwhile, sat beside the couch, the little filly right beside her as we tried to piece together the story behind this long-lost orphan.

"I went outside a few times, Miss Coral. But it's all nasty and the ponies shouted a lot, so I just galloped back here and hid. I felt safer here with Miss Fluttershy." Lilac's tiny rasping voice made me wince. It was such crime for this sort of thing to happen to a foal.

Coral, if she felt the same, didn't show it. A different side of her was on display; gentler, and offering more smiles than I'd ever seen from the often-pained mare.

"So you just made this your little hidey hole, huh? Did you do all those amazing drawings on the walls?"

"Uh-huh. I was afraid Master Ferrous would come tell me off, but it was getting so dark and dirty and it made me feel sad and I haven't seen him in such a long time... so I made it happier!" Her voice pipped up, squeaking through that worn throat. "So that any ponies who come here later will feel happy, too! Look, I even put stickers on the fireplace to make it pretty!"

Her tiny hoof waved excitedly up at the small flowers and suns that were scattered all over the marble sides of the fire. I couldn't help a little smile myself. Coral stroked the back of Lilac's mane, bending down a great big smile. I'd never thought I'd see that on her face.

"Those are so pretty, dear! Aww, we loved the crayon drawings, didn't we Murky?"

I could see that look in her eyes. One that clearly said 'Disagreement will bring harsh words later on.' But I just chuckled and nodded; it had been nice to see a little more innocence in an unforgiving world. Even if she did make silly pink ponies.

Lilac Rose seemed delighted by the response. Her eyes beamed almost as wide as her smile. She immediately started picking pieces of paper up to show to Coral.

"I've got lots more! This is my old house! And this is my mom and dad! And this one? That's Mister Ferrous, he was really nice to me, but he was very strict! This is the cat that sometimes came in the garden. She was smelly, but I fed her the bits I didn't like eating. I've done lots of Fluttershy, but I just use the ball she gave me if I want to see her. And this one?"

She had a wealth of pictures, so much so I saw Coral struggling to keep up with them but giving the foal abject attention she had clearly needed for a long time. Something was bothering me though, she was so childlike. still. No, she was a child.

I sat nearer to them, sucked my lip, and chose my words with care.

"L-Lilac? Can I ask you something?"

"Uh-huh..." She didn't look up from rustling around her drawings.

"Do you know how long it's been since the bale... I mean, the big booms outside?"

Coral's eyes flickered for a moment, before she caught on and realised the same thing. This child was over two hundred years old. Anypony should mature in that time frame, even allowing for a lack of adults around to aid them.

Lilac held her mouth open and looked at the ceiling, deep in thought, before shrugging. "I dunno. I don't really remember it much. I heard the nasty alarm in the city, and then the matron started screaming. But then there was a really big green flash, and I felt really sick, but I hid and didn't come out for a really long time."

Coral's hoof drew her in a little. "It's alright, dear. You don't need to remember all that. What did you do after it?"

"I... I think I fell asleep for a long time, because it was snowing when I woke up. I was afraid I'd get shouted at for not waking up, so I got out. But everything was like this. Some ponies chased me when I went outside. So I ran away. There was green flames. Like, huge ones! I couldn't see the sky, so I came back here to wait for Miss Fluttershy to come pick me up again like last time. But I think I fell asleep again..."

The filly toyed with her front hooves, looking up at Coral.

"Do you know where Miss Fluttershy is?"

"I'm sorry, dear. I don't. It's... it's been a long time."

She was clearly trying to keep her own tears in for Lilac's benefit. It made a little more sense, the feral ghoul janitor had seemed asleep until my presence had woken it up. It stood to reason that other ghouls might be capable of the same long, drawn out sleeps too. In Lilac Rose's case, for so long that she had neither aged mentally in the time she'd been alive, nor aged physically from the effects of the balefire.

It didn't take much time of letting all this sink in before Coral once again let Lilac snuggle up beside her. My friend's limbs wrapped around the fragile little pony protectively, as though by some manner of sheer will and wishing she could hold this one poor filly safe from the world she'd been cast into.

"Did anything hurt you? Were you safe in here, Lilac?"

"Uh-huh. I didn't go outside much. I had a sore tummy so I didn't really eat, but lots of ponies came here shouting to find food. Some of them didn't say words, they just shouted a lot and looked really slimy. They didn't take food, either. I hid from all of them in the little places, but even when one caught me sleeping they didn't seem to care about me. And this one time not long ago? I heard a lot of ponies shouting for help and galloping away. I went to look, but this really icky smell was coming from outside like mint, so I ran away..."

Coral squeezed her gently.

"Good girl. You've been so brave, you know that?"

"But they scared me. There was this beeping and—"

"Hush, dear..." Coral stroked her mane. "Being brave isn't about not being scared, it's knowing you're scared, but still doing the right thing."

I saw Coral's little wink at me. Despite myself, I actually blushed a little.

"But the scary monsters are gone now. It's alright, I'm here."

Lilac seemed to fall all too naturally into Coral's embrace, the little orphan seeking comfort and reassurance from the older mare. As though looking for any maternal and caring mare to be their...

It seemed all too quick and simple a solution that I found myself not quite believing it. It couldn't happen. We were slaves. Foal's couldn't stay with us. If My Master saw her, he'd—

Oh no.

I hastened forward, hissing quietly.

"Coral, can I talk a bit? Y'know, just us?"

She looked up, taken away from her whispered soothing words to Lilac as the filly told her about how she'd been lonely. I could see Coral didn't want to move away from the filly, but seeing the look in my eyes, she calmly let her down.

"Do you think you could make me a crayon drawing, Lilac?"

"Sure!" She bounded away to the paper, taking up her worn crayons as Coral and I met near to the couch.

"What's wrong, Murky?"

Scuffing the floor with my hoof, I didn't really know how to break this. But swallowing the lump in my throat, I looked out the window at the girders in the rain above.

"She can't stay here. The slavers are going to tear this whole place down for resources eventually. In a day? In a week? If... if it's him who has this job now, who's to say he won't be on the job when they find her? You know he will."

The realisation on Coral's eyes hurt me to the very core. I saw her look at the humming foal, happily scratching away with crayons across the room.

"We can't just throw her out into Fillydelphia, Murky. She wouldn't last a day! We have to take care of her." Her words cut hard. I didn't like confrontation, but I didn't like the thought of My Master getting another ghoul to throw in his mines. Foal or not. I remembered him saying how valuable they were to him.

"What about Weathervane? He's got a hidden basement, and he was a father!"

Coral's face twisted. "A dank basement she can't ever leave is no place for a child to be raised, never mind that Weathervane is close enough to turning feral as it is."

"She might help him hold on to life..."

"No, Murky." Her words were stern, silencing me. "Lilac needs somepony to take care of her, to help her adjust to this world. Do you really think being cooped up in a scary basement with a zombie pony who swears more than the rest of the wasteland combined is a good place for such a sweet filly?"

This was heading toward the only other option I knew, the one I knew she wouldn't like even more.

"Well, then..." I cast my eyes to Lilac Rose, talking almost to herself about which colours to use. "There's only one place in Fillydelphia that takes care of foals."

I could see it sinking in. See the rage building inside her. She outright scowled.

"No! I will not let that monster take her. After taking my son away from me? You can't seriously say—"

"Where else can she go, Cora?" I surprised myself with the interruption. "I don't want her to live the life I did! If she stays here, then she'll be tied to a chain gang in a tunnel till she's rotten and falling apart! I've seen it! I've already seen somepony I want to save taken there, seen Weathervane's friends hurt every day. Ghouls are kept working for dozens of years! I don't want that to happen to her, and it will if we don't find her someplace safer, the one place that's safer."

I wiped my mane from my eyes.

"Look I know it isn't the best but she'll have other foals, an education, and proper care. Yes, they are taught under Red Eye! I'm sorry for that! I know you hate what they did, but I don't see anything else for Lilac."

Coral seemed as taken aback by my outburst as I was, simply lowering her head. I stepped forward.

"Protégé visits the foals. He told me they're safe and happy. There's even another ghoul there, Lilac and her could help one another. They... they could maybe tell your—"

"Stop."

Her hoof raised, the bottom held toward me. I could see the tears drip from her eyes. This was such a harsh decision for her, more than anypony I knew.

"We'll... we'll do that. But promise me, Murky. Promise me when the time comes for you and Glimmer to try your plan. We won't forget them. I will not attempt any escape unless I know my son and Lilac will be safe."

"I promise." I said the words, but I had no idea how to make it happen. We had to get into the metro for ourselves, find Unity before that and then get Sunny out of the mines down there en-route. But we had a mission to rescue the foals, at least her son and Lilac now, too.

It seemed impossible. But part of me held that hope. Two rescues. At least Sunny was already in the metro. We could do this. Once Brim was back, we could make a try.

Escape was possible. We'd make it happen.

Drawing me from my thoughts, I heard hooves approaching!

I spun away from Coral, surprising the upset mare as I looked at the door, just in time for it to slam open. Two slaves, scuffling over a teddy bear, fell into the room. Lilac screamed, pushing herself back against the wall. The pair of bucks heard her and looked up and around.

They saw all the toys and then they saw Lilac and us.

"Shit! Shit, dude!"

"Yeah, shit! We hit the mother load! And a foal!"

Coral was between them and the filly before I could so much as move, stomping her hooves with her horn sparking.

"The mother is going to make you into a red smear on the wall if you come any closer to her! GET OUT!"

A wave of overpressure blew much of Lilac's paper drawings up as Coral's magic erupted into being. Ocean blue flickered from her horn, and a telekinetic wave surged into the two invaders. The pair didn't even get a chance to respond before they were blasted backward into the canteen, spiralling end over end before smashing through the flimsy rusted tables and out the far door into the hallway followed closely by the doors that had been blown clean off their hinges.

Staring with wide eyes at the power that had sent two fully grown bucks over twenty feet, I took a careful mental note. Never treat a foal with anything but abject respect when Coral Eve was in the area.

Horn sparking, eyes watering from the pain her fault magic inflicted for using such a strong spell, Coral staggered for a few seconds before righting herself to look for Lilac Rose. The filly had dove behind the desk and was peering out with wide eyes at Coral defending her.

I glanced out the door, hearing the slaves pick themselves up and gallop dizzily, calling for My Master. Oh crap.

"Coral, we've got to get her out of here. Now." I looked around, but clearly this room had been chosen precisely because it only had one way in or out to watch the foals more carefully. I even checked the fireplace, but it only went from this floor to the roof. There were two storeys below us to the ground.

The grey unicorn was already whispering to Lilac.

"Listen, Lilac dear. There's some very bad ponies coming here. We're going to take you someplace that's like an orphanage, alright? There will be lots of other foals to play with and... and..." I heard the hesitation, "nice ponies to take care of you. But you've got to be brave, alright?"

The filly was clearly terrified, holding onto Coral's leg and shivering. "Y-yes, Miss Coral. I'll try..."

"Good. You'll be fine, I promise. Is there any other way out of here?"

"Yes!" Lilac perked up, letting go and running behind the couch to reach up and pull a bit of the wall out and away, a hidden door! Behind it lay a thin staircase. "Sometimes the helpers used this... they said it was an old... old...um, servants way! That was it!"

"Good girl, Lilac!" Coral cast her head down it before nodding. "This will do, now quick, grab a couple things and lets get going!"

I had already fetched the Fluttershy orb, holding it ready for the filly. She gasped and pulled it into a little foal sized saddlebag, hugging me for the help. A feeling a little too nervous kicked in to gently hug her back. It was rare I ever was the one doing the comforting. After that, I helped her grab a few of her drawings and a very muggy looking soft toy pony doll before we met Coral on the stairs.

They were a bit of a squeeze, filled with cobwebs and shockingly steep. But Lilac Rose tore down them with practised ease while Coral and I blundered about behind her. Passing two doors we kept moving to the basement and carefully edged out into a somewhat less fancy kitchen than the pantry we'd been in before. This must have been where the servants of whoever owned the mansion before it became an orphanage cooked meals that weren't for special occasions.

Briefly, I felt struck by the odd nature that some ponies would willingly choose to be slaves to rich masters in such a time of apparent freedoms and light.

All the same, it was empty. Perfect! At the far side, past a bank of ceramic stoves and long emptied fridges we found an entrance they must have brought in the food by once, a trap door that opened outward. Already above us I could hear a horrid stomping sound that could belong to only one pony. Others scampered around, before muffled bellows as they no doubt discovered an empty room started to sound out. We had a head start. We had to move!

The dark sky met us when climbing out, Lilac sticking close to Coral as she felt the outside world's air on her body. The rain that fell through the trapdoor the moment we opened it made her recoil a little. The filly might not have left this place for a long time.

"Ssh, it's okay, dear. Stick beside me and we'll keep you nice and safe, alright? It's just a lot of galloping and it'll all be fine."

"Y-yes, Fillydelphia's scary now..."

"I know... I know, just stay with us, you don't need to look at anything. Here, I'll carry you."

We had finally all climbed out, me first then reaching back to lift the tiny ghoul out from Coral raising her up. Lastly, Coral herself joined us and we began to canter over the dead grass. This place had a huge garden with branches from old bushes still showing the form it had once taken. Across the back past the ruined fence lay the fouled back ends and delivery doors of old shops. Perfect cover. The rain that fell lightly, a mercy from the thunderstorm earlier, stung and burned at my wounds. But Coral's newly sewed cover would be invaluable, now, for keeping the worst off me. I tried to let my mane fall to cover my eyes, noticing that at least Coral still had some of her own ruined blouse. Lilac didn't seem to notice any pain. Probably a ghoul thing.

I led the way, using what sneaky instincts I'd been honing to find a way back. If we stuck to the back streets in this lonely part of Fillydelphia, we could throw them off then sneak through the shift changes to get to the Alpha-Omega Hotel where the foals were kept!

"Move!" I whispered. We broke into a gallop, Lilac on Coral's back. We had to move fast! Get away from the orphanage as quick as we could! Get to cover, out of sight before—

It was then I heard the window smashed open from behind us.

“Stop right there, slaves!”

Coral kept galloping through the slick ground, but I felt my hooves jar and deaden beneath me, almost tripping into the mud. I turned, looking back and seeing My Master staring down at me with furious eyes, his huge bulk having broken the entire thick window upstairs. Behind him I could hear the slavers rushing to the stairwell, aiming to catch me. My Master snarled, a look of displeased anger the likes of which I wanted to cower from passing across him toward his pet out in the rain against all orders.

“I demanded you bring anything you find to me, Number Seven. You disobey even now. Stay where you are.”

My legs trembled horribly. My mind in two directions. My... My Master was commanding me...

I turned, looking as I saw Coral and even Lilac eager beckoning me to get moving! I... had... to... obey... My...

Very slowly... one hoof moved.

Away from Chainlink Shackles.

“I COMMAND YOU TO COME HERE, SLAVE!”

The voice tore at my ears, harsh and sudden the moment he had seen that tiny glint in my eye. Seeing the brief inch my hoof had moved. I could feel his slaver's instinct washing over every aspect of my existence, seeing the rebellion and the conflict inside. But gritting my teeth I looked back up. Glimmer... Coral... Fluttershy... they'd all been telling me the same thing. Look to the one hope, so long as I had that I could keep going! For my freedom, for a foal's safety and life and for my friends.

I could... resist.

“COME TO YOUR MASTER, NOW!”

Sucking air through my teeth, I looked up. The rain pattered either side, hurting my ears and I felt every drip of blood from my nose... but I was focused, drawing all that hate and will to be free up through my body and through my sick throat, before uttering perhaps the most important word in my entire life.

“No.”

My heart lifted, my mind came back to me. Remembering the soaring of the Stable Dweller as she did the same, I turned and galloped away, seeing just for a second the surprise on his face. Before the fury settled in. Terrified, feeling I was doing wrong, but resisting all the same with every hoofstep on the rotten ground, I felt his words slap at my mind and pull on every little twitching nerve I had to shut down and ignore.

“YOUR MASTER COMMANDS YOU STOP, NUMBER SEVEN!”

Not a chance, not now! I fled with Coral and Lilac, splashing up puddles as I went and trying to not listen to the individual words beckoning my name, my status as a slave or appealing to the part of me that wanted to obey. I would pay for this, I knew it. Terror lurked in my mind of my punishment for doing this. But it had to be done! I wouldn't let this foal be dragged into the nightmare of the Fillydelphia metro mines.

I caught Coral's eye as we bounded into the alleyways between the large shops. She saw the fear in my eye but her look said it all. Or rather, repeated what she'd said before. Bravery wasn't about not being afraid.

It was about doing the right thing, no matter how scared you were.

Looking into the shivering little filly's eyes as her tiny and enclosed world spiralled out of control, I knew I was doing just that.

The hard concrete brought us into a large courtyard of old benches, food shops and collapsed decorative trees. An old foal's playground lay nearby half collapsed into the ground but I could see the gaps between buildings ahead of us... just the thing to use to get away! Whipping my soaked mane from side to side, I checked the flanks of the courtyard before moving out.

"This way!" I swerved, passing beneath an old gazebo in the centre for even a momentary relief from the downpour. My hooves were searing as they went through puddles and splashed the acidic water up onto my fetlocks. But we made it to the thin street, populated either side by kiosks and high rise tenements above the shops. Behind us, I could hear the slavers spread out. Goddesses, how many times had I been in this position of fleeing?

The trouble was we weren't moving fast enough. I'd been in enough desperate chases by now to notice our progress. Or lack of. I was limping and staggering every time my barely-healed ribs were jolted or stressed upon. Coral was bearing the weight of a foal on her own frail body. Her route was swaying... that fever she had wouldn't be making it easy under the hot rain and stuffy atmosphere. This wasn't working... no sooner had we gone twenty feet down the thin street did I hear slavers charging into the courtyard behind us. If we could speed up I... I...

My vision swam, my legs deadening a little. I could feel the exertion catching up to us... there was no way I could make a sudden sprint. I'd just been beaten and abused too much. This short run was draining on my body and the adrenaline from resisting him was wearing off fast. Before I even knew it, I tripped onto the cobbles, rolling on my sides and crying out from my wings and battered body striking the hard rocks. I staggered and pushed myself up, seeing Coral stop to move back for me.

"In here!" I spun, pulling at Coral and trying to hop over a kiosk's blown in window, my back legs dangling as I kicked at the air and pushed my short frame up. "We can't outrun them."

Seconds later, I felt Coral simply push me in and climb over herself. Landing inside the dusty outlet on several empty tins and crushing them below us, we pressed against the back of the serving window's ledge and all huddled close. I could feel Lilac Rose gripping one of my legs incredibly tightly, her tiny heart thumping fast. My own heart instead felt like it stopped as eight sets of hooves tore by the kiosk window less than a couple of feet from us with such aggressive force in their pursuit that the ground shook.

Then the horrid thicker hoofsteps I knew all too well.

"I know you're hiding, Number Seven." His voice seethed out, barely restrained anger. I could almost imagine his smile, the smile of somepony beyond fury. "You couldn't gallop too far. There's a shout going out. They'll find you."

Feeling exhausted and dizzy, I still clung to Coral as much as Lilac clung to me. I... I could resist! Just don't cough by 'accident' to lead him to you, it doesn't work that way! Don't... don't... he'd never find you in this mass of hiding spots!

"You'll be back with me before the day's out, little slave! I know you can hear me! You'll come back when that collar starts to drag the life from you... start to get the blood and taint within you forcing you to return to your birthright! You can't escape, slave!"

My neck stung. I could feel the heavy collar rubbing my blistered and cracking skin in a ring around my neck. The stomping on the cobbles continued.

"You've got no place to go you won't be seen. Don't think I don't know what you're doing with that foal...”

He stopped again, ten feet down the lane.

“I’ll see you there to reclaim you.”

Then he was gone. The sounds faded. I knew I could evade a cordon in such a maze of alleyways as this but the fear had settled in now. He was right, but all that mattered was this one proof that I could resist and take the punishment, prove to him that I was a free pony who believed in escape.

Lilac Rose was my challenge to prove it now. Between me and the hotel lay a network of alerted slavers waiting to keep her from Red Eye’s more protective gaze.

Please be proud of me, Littlepip. No matter what happened to you out there. I’ll do what you did.

I didn’t even know when I passed out against Coral, falling against her side from the spotted darkness in my vision and the pain of exerted ribs clouding my mind. The exertion of the run too much for my weakened body as I fell into a troubled unconsciousness of lonely foals and eternal chains against the sunset itself.

The trek across the quieter areas of Fillydelphia was not difficult. We had to have that rest, but before long I had been gently woken by Coral and bid that we continue. Groggy eyed, my hooves feeling like lead weights, I’d nodded and glumly set out for the efforts ahead.

I’d expected it to be grand, adrenaline rushing and heroic. It would likely still be, but the first hour for us to return to the busier areas while aiming for the hotel was mostly quiet. Occasionally, we’d had to shelter again. Either to rest and catch our breath or to dodge patrols and slave columns.

Coral had taken care of Lilac Rose en-route. Whispering between them, asking her what her favourite colour was (Red) or what age she thought she was (Nine and three quarters) to help the filly relax. She even played a little hoof clapping game accompanied by a quiet little sing-song in time to the claps once with a delighted smile on her own face. So strange that both Coral and a two-hundred-year-old filly knew the same rhyme. Some things never changed, I supposed. Here I was, seeing Coral Eve as the mother she’d always wanted to be, the one thing she loved being that had been taken away from her.

But now we’d come to the stretch that mattered.

About three hundred metres away from us as the bloodwing flew, the Alpha-Omega Hotel cast its lights into the dark haze of Fillydelphia. Protected by magically charged fencing and a newly dug ditch, it was also guarded by far more soldiers than I normally would have expected to see any time I’d passed by it. This was near the FunFarm after all.

I knew why. Many of those slavers and soldiers were... his. My mind was caught between names, what to call him? But I knew that they wouldn’t hesitate to drag us off to the mines and back to him. We couldn’t trust anypony to simply throw Lilac at them and hope they would recognise she should be in the hotel and not simply take her back to him.

No, we’d have to deliver her ourselves.

But between it and us there lay other obstacles nearly blocking the view. We’d had to approach from the more clustered areas among abandoned buildings that were taking the slaves years to dismantle. Lacking the massive equipment of the past, these firmly constructed places were proving a nightmare to bring down. I knew. I’d tried. Eventually, we'd been told to leave them alone and been sent to other more important jobs. They would return once excavation equipment or more surplus supplies of explosives were made available to finish the job. For now, they were our hiding spot and our route among the variety of structures. Other competing hotels mostly, there were a square of them around one courtyard. The Alpha-Omega Hotel lay beyond this square.

Three hundred metres. Five buildings in a square. Lots of guards. A ditch. A fence.

And somewhere out there, he lurked.

To deliver her into safety, we'd have to overcome all of that. After that it didn't matter how we were caught.

Very briefly, it occurred to me neither of us had told Lilac Rose that we wouldn't be joining her in there. I'd decided to leave it to Coral Eve. She knew what she was doing with what to say and what to keep quiet. Lilac had spent much of the way staring wistfully back toward her orphanage or around her at the suffering ponies in abject confusion. Between her long sleeps and the bewilderment of anything outside her orphanage in a city she no longer realised, I could see the underlying terror in the filly's eyes. Yet she just kept moving with us.

Fluttershy was right. This was one brave little pony to take all this in and not break.

"Do you think you can sneak us toward the gate, Murk?" Coral whispered beside me. We'd been poking over a low window from the farthest away building to judge our route in.

I glanced forward again. Two buildings, one on either side, formed the closest ones of the square courtyard beyond. Behind them the other two at the far side. I concentrated on the farthest one, closest to the hotel.

A tall building of thick pillars and overhung windows was being dismantled by a swarm of slaves with grapple hook harnesses to hold them up. A pang of loss for my own saddle struck through me at the sight. They must have been just told to take anything from the rooms and rooftops that were salvageable. To strip out the places before leaving the undefeated foundations for later. Slaves might be a handy group to merge with.

Before that though, we had to get up to those two front buildings, we'd have to sneak through them first. I could see the patrols in the courtyard guiding slaves or watching the surrounding area. Huge piles of rubble offered some cover alongside a crashed skywagon nearer to us. If we could bunny hop from cover to cover and stay quiet...

"I think so. But this could turn nasty. R-real quick..." I stammered, mostly from my throat. I'd had to swallow thick wads of metallic-tasting bloody spit to clear it. I hadn't wanted to spit in front of Lilac.

"Nervous?" Coral cast a look of concern to me.

"Terrified."

"Glad you were the first one to say it. You know we're likely not getting away from this one, right?"

"Y-yes..." I nodded. "But it's worth it..."

Coral lay a hoof over my shoulders. "I heard what you told him. That's more important than anything that happens now. We should get going. They're going to patrol back here sooner or later, and she needs to be safe."

I nodded, hearing her turn back toward Lilac as I studied the layout of the rubble ahead. Once that patrol moved past, we could make it to the skywagon... then that pile of broken up chairs behind... then the rubble... then the building...

"Ready to go, my dear?" I heard her speaking to Lilac.

"Uh-huh, is that light over there the place for colts and fillies?" Her voice was tired; the journey hadn't been easy for her.

Coral stroked her mane away, nuzzling the little pony with a grin. "They're all just waiting for you, but there's some bad ponies in between us and them. So stay quiet, okay? Murk's going to lead us past them. Just stay behind him. I'll be right behind you. Nopony's going to hurt you. I promise."

The patrol moved away. I spun back to them again and nodded firmly.

"Alright, dear. Go!"

We burst from our hiding place, one by one galloping as quietly as we could around the edge. Under the red sky again, we rushed for the skywagon, twenty feet away. The patrol had just moved past our building but we still had to stay low. Any over the rubble ahead could spot us if they turned—

I saw one mare move her head and leapt behind the wagon. Lilac galloped into me and Coral rolled herself in beside us. I clutched myself and curled up tight to hide. Had they spotted us?

Horribly exposed from almost every angle, we waited, uncomfortable and fidgeting to move.

Nothing.

I took out my one trump card. A shard of a smashed mirror in the building we'd just passed, using it to check around the side of the wagon, waiting for the chance to gallop forward another set of cover. We only had to get close... close enough for one mad gallop to the fence gates. The guards inside the gates had to be safe to give her to.

Squinting, rubbing the dusty mirror clear of muck, I watched and waited. There were three groups of them. One on a balcony, one at the gap between the buildings and one I knew was out of sight but lying down against the back of the rubble. Had to wait for the first two groups to look aw—

Now!

I hissed to the other two, springing out low and rushing around the wagon. I watched their heads, listening to somepony shouting in the courtyard about their shift times. We made it in plenty of time, pressing in behind the stack of broken and discarded chairs. I had to take a second, get my breath back. My lungs felt tight, leading to me sucking air in with my front hooves low on the ground. Sweat poured from my body at the exertion. I couldn't go much longer. The only thing keeping me going was that one little fact, one little knowledge that escape was coming eventually.

The mirror went out again. Coral held Lilac Rose protectively close to her own underbelly. The filly was shivering despite the heat. She was so scared. I knew the feeling.

Angling the mirror, I watched the two groups I could see. We had one more rubble pile to get to and we could get around the back of the building before getting inside. If they saw us, they'd cut us off long before we got there. Thankfully, they were all still listening to the voice.

"Way's clear, go." I whispered in Coral's ear before creeping out. We had to go slower and quieter. Low to the ground in single file, we made the achingly slow journey in plain sight behind them. Yes... we'd done it. The first wave was—

My entire hoof found no ground to stand on. My front right leg disappeared, falling down a hole I hadn't seen! I bit my lip hard to quell the shriek as I looked down. A drain! My hoof had fallen down a drain while I'd been looking up at the guards! I tugged at it, but the muck and dirt had fallen in with me, jamming the hole smaller than before. Oh no! No! NO!

Coral bent over me, her much stronger limbs wrapping around my leg. Even Lilac put her tiny hooves on mine as we pulled and pulled and pulled. The pain from being dragged up through the tiny hole made me grit my teeth, squeeze my eyes shut. I couldn't scream! Don't let that tickle in your throat make you cough! Not now! Not now!

Suddenly, a release. My hoof popped out and we fell back. I clung it close to me, favouring the scrapped skin. Looking up, I saw the guards still looking away. Coral put a hoof to my cheek, her face bearing concern, mouthing the word. 'Broken?' I shook my head and we got up to creep the remainder, thank the Goddesses.

Thinking the word 'crap' earlier must have displeased them, however.

The drain cap slid, came loose... and fell. Clanging, a full two-foot square of metal crashing and tumbling down and around as it broke up from the rust that we had loosened getting me out. Hearing the noise only grow and echo, I looked up with horrified eyes.

That same mare from before was looking right back at me. We met eyes for four long seconds before I saw the scowl grow into a scream of alert.

"RUN!" Coral shouted! We took off, heading for the building! Around me, I heard slavers shouting for confirmation, the mare shrieking and pointing. The third group came into view, immediately galloping forward.

This was it. One last rush to get her there before we were caught.

Coral swept up Lilac again as I tried to keep up. Hooves pounding on the soft ground we tore for the back of the building, we could find a ditch! Lose them and go around!

To my horror, I saw a fourth group emerge from behind the very place we were trying to go from the far end of the building. If we went around, they'd just double back and catch us! I stopped, pacing, probably praying, looking around. There had to be somewhere!

Coral thought faster than I did, stopping and looking at the half crumbled walls of the building bearing some old wooden stopgap over the concrete.

"Into the building, we'll lose them in there!"

"How!?"

She answered with her magic. With a great WHOOM of sound that blasted back off the building wall and flared my mane back, Coral blasted the crude makeshift wall into the room it had once protected. Splinters flew inside, shattering old paintings and remnants of windows like shrapnel as my ears rung terribly. When she was pushed, Coral's magic was terrifying. I briefly underlined that mental note to never anger her. Just for extra emphasis.

She and Lilac were first in, with me following, breaking into the corridor beyond the front room we'd smashed our way through. I could see Coral swaying, that spell having taken a lot out of her. Even through the shouts from outside, I heard her whimper. That faulty horn of hers sparking and bleeding magical energy in a method even a non-unicorn could imagine the pain of. We didn't even look at what our path was like, we simply chose random doors in the effort to lose them. A set of double doors to a restaurant... another kitchen... a freezer with a broken wall to a bedroom... back to the corridors until we found the front door.

There we stopped. Slavers were swarming the building after us, seeming far more efficient than I had ever wanted them to be as they spread out to cover every eventual direction we could have taken. That wasn't fair!

Even worse, if I poked my mirror through the front door, I could see was being watched.

I ran to the only closed door not leading backwards. It lay beside the reception's thick glass window with only one small area to hand money through. Wishing hard, I pulled on it. Locked! NO! NO!

Slamming my hooves against it, Coral shoulder barged the heavy wooden doorway, but only bounced.

"It's a staff door! The keys could be anywhere! Where are—"

Before she could even finish, I saw her eyes go wide. Spinning myself, I saw Lilac's tail disappear through the reception money slot. Ten seconds later, the door clicked and it swung open to a shaking but smiling filly.

"Is... is this better?" Her voice sounded painfully innocent given our situation.

"Good girl!" Coral beamed, sweeping her up. "Such a quick thinking, clever filly! Now come on!"

I locked the door again behind us as we entered the office. A face appeared at the reception window, then a gun muzzle through the hole!

"Down!"

Buckshot tore into the office, blowing old papers off a desk and shattering the screen of a terminal. Coral had fallen. My terror of her being hit was relieved only when I saw her gallop on. There were three doors in here. We tried the first to find a dead end office with two clutching skeletons draped over the desk. Recoiling, before screaming from the buckshot that tore into the room again and shattered the far window, I almost fell through the second. There had to be a way out!

Behind us, a second weapon fired on the door but missed the lock. They wouldn't be held long.

Looking up from falling, I pushed the second door open while Lilac and Coral took cover behind a further back desk. I made to run inside before finding it to only be an identical office. Oh come on!

Another sharp rifle blast blew splinters from the locked door. They wouldn't miss again.

Almost crying out in frustration, I bucked the third one open. We all dived into it without even looking as the main door burst open and the slavers rushed through. We scavenged, not seeing anything other than a desk that we threw against the new blocked doorway. I knew it wouldn't hold, it was too light.

And this room had no way out.

Not even a window.

It was another identical private office.

I stomped, bucking the wall and screaming at the door. Frustration, anger, terror, and adrenaline all fighting for attention in my head. Lilac hugged close to Coral, who simply looked around and bit her lip. I saw the same realisation. We were trapped.

As if to merely remind us the door was rammed, already starting to list on its hinges.

"Get out here!"

"Master wants you!"

They were his.

"Murk? I... I don't see a way out. Any ideas?" I couldn't imagine how hard it was for her to admit that around Lilac Rose, but I only shook my head while stepping back into my natural spot. The corner.

"I... I'm sorry! I... I thought there'd be a way."

I stopped, an unusual feeling on my hind leg. Why was my leg feeling a breeze?

Looking down, twisting back on my body to the point my ribs protested the movement, I saw one little hope. Emphasis on little. A tiny vent. One I could barely squeeze through if I had to. Bending down, hearing Coral questioning me and Lilac pushing her nose beside mine (I might have found it cute any other time) I cast my gaze through it and saw the outside world.

"Wait, there's a vent, it goes outside! But it's tiny..."

I had never saw Coral as anything but strong, but the speed with which she made the decision reminded me more than any other moment I'd known her in till now just how strong a pony she was.

The unicorn gently pulled me aside, smashing it with her hooves to get a purchase... and began to pull the vent upwards and off. Even as she pulled, I felt and heard the slavers push on the door. One hinge fell off.

"Coral! What are—"

"Shh, dear." She put a hoof to my mouth carefully. "This is as far as I go. I don't regret it."

"They... they might h-hurt you bad..." I stammered, my mind only now catching up to the horrible realisation of what she was asking of us.

"I know, dear. I know. But you said it yourself." She nodded toward the quickly confused filly, wondering why I was looking sad. "For the life of a child, it's worth it. Lilac, honey?"

Coral turned, her hooves resting on the filly's shoulders.

"M-Miss Coral? Why aren't we g-going? You should go first! Your leg's hurt and... and..."

"I'm sorry, my dear. But you're going to have to keep going. Murky will get you to the safe place, alright? You stay with him." Lilac opened her mouth to protest, but Coral cut her off. "I know we only just met, but you're one of the sweetest, bravest, and most wonderful fillies I've ever met to have done all that you have. We'll see each other again, I promise."

Lilac's eyes went very wide, throwing her little hooves to Coral's shoulders.

"B-but I l-like you, Miss Coral! Y-you're nice! I've not met anypony nice for... for really long!" I felt my own eyes dampen... seeing the filly shed her own tears.

Coral simply hugged her close. I could hear the door breaking in, but I couldn't dare bring myself to separate the two. The look in Coral's eyes showed conflict though, as though she was trying to decide on something. Eventually, she let Lilac go, but held their heads close to one another.

"When you get there, Lilac. If... if you meet a little colt..."

I saw her glance at me. I only nodded. This was hard beyond words for her, the closest she'd ever come to her son knowing she was only bringing another foal to the same fate.

"A little colt called Chirpy Sum. Tell him his mommy loves him very very much, can you do that for me? Please?"

Her voice cracked on the last word, but the filly only nodded, grabbing the older mare again. I shoved the desk back against the door once more. We didn't have long!

"Coral!" I shouted to her, holding the vent open for the filly. She nodded... gently pulling Lilac from her to go to the vent.

"I will! I promise I will! You're really nice, Miss! I'll do it. I've not met anypony nice for a long time and I've been really lonely..."

"I know, dear."

Lilac seemed to look hesitant, before biting her lip. "They told me they'd find me a nice mom to take care of me but they never did. M-Miss Coral, when you come to... to pick us up? C-can..."

Her tear struck eyes looked into my almost grieving friend's.

"Can you t-take me with you? To... to be my Forever Mommy?"

For just a few seconds, even the banging at the door seemed silent and pointless in comparison to the wonder that was the expression upon Coral's face as a little orphaned filly asked that one question. As though nothing else mattered in the world to her but the plight of one child.

Matting down Lilac's mane, hooves seeking to find all the ways she wished she could comfort the poor filly, Coral simply leaned over to kiss her forehead and held her tight to her breast, Lilac gripping around her neck with those tiny little forelegs.

"Yes, my dear. Yes, I'll do that for you."

A hoof crashed through the breaking door. I hated leaving her, but we'd both known this would happen in some form or another. I just had a bit to go first. I let go of the desk, galloping to the vent. Seeing them coming, clearly not wanting to let go, Lilac had to be gently pushed off by Coral. With one last hopeful glance, she disappeared through the vent. I started crawling through, turning back only briefly.

"I'll get her there."

She smiled, the door falling to pieces behind her.

"I know. That message orb she carries, you understand it means a lot to you as well, right? Don't forget that."

"I won't. G-good luck."

Even as I pulled myself through, I saw the door crash. On either side of Coral, I witnessed the slavers rush into the room. The last sight of Coral I had before I fled was the light of her horn over her fearsome face. I knew she would buy us the time we needed. Ignoring the pain on my back, I let Lilac ride me as I tore off away from the building, hearing the furious pressurised slams of Coral's magic and the cries of slavers caught in it.

Lilac's hooves hung around my neck tightly. Burying her face into my mane as we ran. We'd come out the opposite side of the building. There was one more building ahead, the huge tall one with the slaves all over it in grapple saddles. Just past that one and I could make a mad sprint to the gates! Somehow, anyway. Just... just somehow. I had to get her there! I'd promised!

"There they are!"

How many guards were there? Glancing toward the shout, another group of four were rushing across the courtyard from where they'd been waiting to guard the front door. I couldn't outspurt somepony that far!

"Mister Murky!" A hoof above my head pointed to the tall building, seeing one door ajar as a slave limped out on a bad leg to see what all the noise was about.

"Good girl!" I changed direction, dodging and hopping over the rubble. Two slavers were in the way, but in all the mud and in their vision-restricting gas masks, I could weave around their stumbling efforts. Was this how Littlepip felt? Free to escape and go and dodge and not care about what they shouted!

The slave leapt aside as we went in. In one end, out the other! I arced around the old food trolleys in the hotel's main route and sent a few slavers to the ground by bumping past them. Not too far! There were slavers behind me, slavers either side in the common rooms that tried to leap through doors! I managed to keep away! We were getting there!

Up ahead, the far side door opened. A bulky soldier stepped up with a full battle saddle primed. I could see the radio on his helmeted head. He'd been told to cut me off! Feeling Lilac grip tighter, we skidded to a halt, and I spun on the spot. Exhausted slavers in air restricting masks lashed their whips behind me. The big brown and dark blue soldier grinned, knowing he'd been the one to trap me. Either side, the slavers watched their own flocks, casting me foul glances.

"Come on, now slave. Give up the ghoul."

I could feel those terrified limbs around me. No... no I couldn't let her go to those pits. Not turn into one of the unfortunates like Weathervane's friends. Falling apart with broken bodies...

"Sh-she's not going with you!" I tried to sound brave, I really did. But they just laughed. I kept looking my eyes around, but the only way was upstairs and there was no other stairways down I could see! If only I had my...

Oh yes.

I gave them no warning or one liner, I simply bolted upstairs. They were slow about pursuing, presumably knowing I had no way out. But I went up floor by floor, tramping the thick carpet until I found what I wanted. A whole ton of slaves around their equipment stash. I grappled one of their grapple saddles and kept running upstairs.

"Where are we going, Mister?"

"S-safety!" Was all I could think to say. Opening a door on the top floor, we were at what I'd hoped... an open walled room, blasted by balefire or torn down long ago, I didn't know. But ahead of us, only thirty feet away I could see the illuminated Alpha-Omega Hotel. Its thick and protected windows well lit from powered interiors while I could see the air conditioners on the top even functioning properly! On this side, I could even smell the food. Good, warm, and healthy food...

I had no time to savour it. Taking every piece of furniture I could, I started barricading the door behind me as thumping hooves neared our room. Shoving a desk, a chair, and, with far too much strain, an empty chest of drawers against it, I bought us a little time. I even had to grin as I saw Lilac grunt and lift a tiny desk lamp onto the pile to weigh it down a little more.

"Is that the place that's safe?"

"Yes it is!" I looked over it. Partially, it occurred to me that had I been brought to Fillydelphia a few years earlier I might have been eligible for its comforts and an educated life. "That's where you'll be fine."

Sitting on the bed, startling and squeaking just as much as Lilac, I heard the door thump behind me. Picking up the grapple gun, I aimed as best I could with this larger model near to the ground of the hotel. I had to make sure this was just right. Too high would be a disaster, and I only had one shot.

"Careful... careful..."

The furniture was jumping, being pushed back.

"Mister Murky! They're getting in!"

Now!

I pulled the firing mechanism with my hoof, knocking me on my rump as the grapple sprung off from compressed air and shot right across the fence. It struck the wall about seven feet from the ground... and stuck.

"Yes!"

I wished I had time to answer Lilac's questions, but I quickly pulled the gun apart to get at the remaining wire, before tying it around a segment of rubble. Behind me, slavers swore and chanted numbers to time their smashes on the door.

"Lilac! Come here." My words were not the carefully chosen ones of an experienced mother, but she approached me as I started fiddling with the saddle itself, beginning to tie it around her.

"I... I kinda didn't tell you before but... if I go over there, they'll kill me. Th-that's what they do to slaves who try and break in..."

"Slaves?" She looked at me even as I fastened the saddle to accommodate her smaller frame.

"You... you don't know what a slave is?"

She shook her head, looking perfectly innocent. I just stood and blinked.

"A... a slave is... me. Like... somepony like me."

"You just look like a normal pony to me."

Somehow, those words meant more to me than I could conceive right now.

"Thank you. You've been more than I could ever tell you in the time we have. Helping me to realise a few things. But I'm sorry, Lilac, this is where you go on yourself. They'll kill me if I go there. It's only for foals."

The door pushed another few inches in, they were screaming at me. Screaming my name. Lilac looked horrified, shaking her head and clinging to me. But I held her back to finish my work.

"Listen, Lilac, this is very important! There's another pony you have to look for, too, when you get in! She's called Starshine Melody, and she'll tell them that you're supposed to be there, alright?"

"But she doesn't know me!"

I pulled the last fastener taught, eliciting a yelp from the foal, but I wouldn't have her slipping.

"Just tell her the little pony sent you." I tried to smile. "She'll keep you right. Keep Fluttershy hidden from them, though, okay?"

"Uh-huh..." She looked at me, before her lip quivered, and she leaned in to hug me tightly. "Why can't I stay with you and Miss Coral!? Why? I don't want to leave you!"

Feeling the cold wetness on my cheeks, I held her back, as comforting as I could be.

"I know this must feel like your whole life's just turned upside down, Lilac. But we live in a very bad place. The world isn't what you knew it was. We just need to keep you safe right now, Lilac. Somepony like you doesn't deserve what's out here. I know it's confusing, and even I don't understand it all, but you must go to a safer place till we can come and take you to a new home. We will come. Escape from this city is possible. Because somepony's shown me it. Because I know they can. I know we can, and that's what keeps me going. We'll get you back to Coral. Now come on, you have to go now!"

She didn't understand. She just didn't understand, but the world of post-balefire Equestria simply couldn't be explained in such a way so quickly. I helped her up, hooking the back of the saddle onto the wire.

"Gallop around to the front and they'll let you in. Foals always get in. Stay safe, Lilac..."

"Bye-bye, Mister Murky..." We touched hooves... before I let her go, the filly building momentum and sliding down and away from me to safety. Just as I'd promised Coral.

The door broke in behind me. I saw Lilac's horrified look, but I simply waved to her, tried to comfort her that I'd be alright. But the slavers were not kind. They threw me and struck me. But I simply watched as I saw one foal saved.

One who didn't ever have to become a born slave like me.

Like me or somepony else I knew...

Manacles slammed shut, a chain snapped onto my collar... and I was dragged away.

My tender underbelly slapped onto the drying muck, tripping over my chains when pushed. Groaning, I rolled to my side, clutching my own chest before finally opening my eyes.

A thick pair of huge hooves stood just before me. He was here.

I'd been tugged outside and thrown before him in the courtyard. Surrounded by slavers in weather that looked ready to unleash another downpour any second, I was one lonely little slave looking up at his Master come to reclaim him.

"I told you I'd be waiting, Number Seven, yet you came anyway. Galloping right into the trap I'd told you was here." His voice was quieter than normal, calm and arrogant. "I told you that you'd always find yourself galloping back to me no matter what."

"I... I didn't come here for you. For... for her, to get her safe."

His hoof lifted me up and hurled me. Screaming, I landed five feet away. My nose stung and bled.

"You forget your place, slave! You will call me 'Master!'"

I should have been scared. I should have been begging. But after all this, after turning my back on him before and after knowing what I knew in my heart, I could not. My delay led to another fierce yank on my chain, flipping me over. I heard slavers laughing at one little pony bearing the attentions of such a huge leader in their chain of command. Whether at me or simply the appearance of it I didn't know.

But I wasn't going to call him that.

"Not... not going to be here."

"What was that, slave?"

"I said... I'm not going to be here forever!"

The chain pulled, I lifted from the ground, swung another ten feet to crash through a bench, impacting on a pavement concrete. I was sure I'd heard a slaver cry out 'Look, he can fly!' before more laughter kicked in. Just the sort of mindless kind he attracted.

The skies broiled, wind blew. Looking up from the ground, my body hammered and exhausted, I could see the clouds. They didn't look quite so dark anymore, the storm was almost over. Then his face appeared above me, furious. I took heart. It angered him to see me resist, to realise I wasn't going to be in these chains as long as he'd like!

"Oh, I'm afraid you will be, Number Seven. You need only look to your own skinny rump to know that."

"I'm not going to be your slave forever!" I choked the words out, rolling to my hooves. It hurt, oh it hurt, but I stood on my own power, looking him in the eye. "You won't own me!"

A silence. The slavers cut their laughter. Nopony had ever talked to the Master this way. His anger was still visible, but he only glared back, daring me to go on, daring me to do this now.

"You... you want me as your pet! Like some slavery that never ends! Well it won't last!" My throat felt raw, but I cried out with all the volume I had, stomping a hoof before the colossal pony. "You won't own me forever!"

The chain clanked as I kicked it aside.

"You can punish me! And hurt me! Shout at me and chain me up and put me on enough shifts to almost kill me, but someday I'm going to... to get over that Wall! I'm going to live my life how I want to with... with all my friends and find my mom and strut into that radio pony's studio and tell everypony how I escaped you!"

Tears were in my eyes, and my mind whirled in terror. Every instinct I had being fought against. I was riding the knife edge here, but as I looked at those lowered eyes, that simmering look upon his face, and I knew I couldn't stop.

"You... you know why!? Because I know I can get out! I've seen somepony do it! I've seen somepony tell Red Eye that he wasn't going to own her! That one sight is all I needed, that proof to always give me that one hope that no punishment you could ever dream of would make me forget! I... I won't lose that!"

Turning, I looked to the nearby Wall, the same section I'd once run at.

"I'm going to be free, because all I need to do is keep in mind what I saw, and I'll know that there's a way out. I'll dream and wish and hope. Someday, someday... I'll dare! Maybe not make it... maybe I'll need to be hurt and cry and need picking back up again and again and again but I will do what she did!"

I took a rasping breath, screaming with all my life's hurt and desperation into his face.

"I WILL BE FREE!"

I collapsed, chest burning and trying to keep the hacking and coughing as small as I could, lying on my side. The effort had taken what remained of my physical strength. I couldn't move... but I... I had won.

The Master furrowed his brows, looking down at me. I anticipated the scream, the shout. The hoof to crush my head and sentence me to unending shifts.

I didn't expect him to smile.

"You really believe that, slave?"

Hesitantly, my head juddered to nod. He only laughed, shaking his head as though it were some half-joke shared over a drink.

"You really do... well, well." He barely muttered, turning behind him to nod and then incline with his head. Through the smog, a couple of his aids drew something up, big and bulbous with fluttering wings.

A sprite-bot, one of those strange ones with a screen on the front. The master tapped it with one hoof.

"These things. They see everything, you know? The Ministry Mares did their work all right. They still work. They still respond to the same triggers to watch for ponies talking and then observe what they're saying. The eyes and ears of the Ministry of Morale... such a wonderful tool. I had a feeling this one would come in handy today after you said 'no' for once."

Turning back to me, his face hardened.

"Now you resist and tell me that you'll always want to be free? Because you saw her escape? Perhaps you should see something."

A tap and a spark, a few buttons beneath a hatch pressed made the sprite-bot jump and flicker, that screen springing to life and turning to static multiple times before stabilising. Black and white by appearance, it began to show moving images at last. Confused and wary, I watched it with wide eyes.

A rooftop, wait, I knew that one! It was the Ministry of Morale! The FunBarn!

Amongst the flickering bars, I saw figures run out onto it, two of them. Leaning closer, I squinted before feeling my heart beat faster.

It was her.

Unmistakable, surging out onto the roof with that zebra in tow, Littlepip looked quickly around her, judging her location. Wait... I knew this, I'd seen the balefire phoenix fly to there! This must have been when it happened!

Sure enough, even as I saw Red Eye's cybernetic terror dog, Winter, creep out of the door after them I saw the glare on the screen. The light approaching as that colossal flying beast came to play its part in her escape!

Flaring to and fro, catching glimpses of it as the sprite-bot watched the encounter, it burned the balloons trapping her! Sending them crashing to the ground with immolating fire that I remembered all too well, I had been lying just below it all in the mud! This was it, I'd see her when she escaped! That dog even fled!

She simply stood there, looking around, scowling.

Was she just gathering her energy? When was she going to move on? What was it she was waiting for? A gap in the pursuers? To let the zebra get her breath back?

I felt my hooves quiver, I leaned closer, wide eyed as I saw her just stand there. Guards ran out of the stairwell and guns pointed. Come on, Pip! Take them out! When was she going to do it!? Do the... the thing that let her...

At gunpoint, she was led away.

The screen began to flicker again, turning back to static. Beside me, I felt My Master lean down, a hoof across the back of my neck, speaking almost oddly calmly in a voice I'd never heard.

"You really thought she escaped, didn't you, Murky?" I didn't turn to look at him. "Right to your little core. But the truth is, nopony escapes from in here. Her capture was as ignominious as it was inevitable."

"No..."

My mind seemed to slow, become clouded and fuzzy and hard to process anything. I just kept staring into the screen as the shiver spread over my body. No... no no no...

He reached out, tapping another button. The picture changed, highlighting another scene... that of the main gates of Fillydelphia from the outside. Hovering about, the black and white recording paused and turned to face a gathering of ponies as I saw her led out under guard to the drawbridge and two waiting ponies, one a Ranger and the other a lithe mare. I saw Red Eye himself behind Littlepip, smiling calmly from behind an alicorn shield.

"She didn't escape. She became just another agent of Red Eye, little Number Seven. She joined him in doing work for him."

The recording let out a buzz of noise, the sprite-bot's sensitive spy microphones picking up one line through the haze as I saw him lean down to her, whispering in her ear.

"Remember my offer, Littlepip..."

I closed my eyes, shaking my head to clear the well of tears building in them. I heard the machine click and turn off. With a little bump to its chassis, it beeped and continued on its merry musical way.

I had no words. All the courage, the belief... the proof, and faith in my heart. It simply died. The energy to speak up and know I was going to be alright just flowed right out of me.

My Master sat down, patting my back.

"You really thought you were something special, didn't you? The next in line to be like her? The slave who would break free? But the truth is you're just a pony. She was a legend, Number Seven, and she didn't even come close to a way out. But don't worry, this isn't something unusual."

From my hooves over my face, I peered up to him, his light green eyes staring into my own. He stroked our mutual scar.

"Every slave rebels at some point. Every slave comes to that point when they fight back and make a try to be free. They either die or they get over it. It's like a form of adolescence, a rebellious stage. I've seen it happen to hundreds over the years... you're no different from them. And it's such a very hard stage to go through. But it's over now. You can go back to the life you know."

Around us, I saw columns of slaves forming, being led to various places. I recognised a few, ones from the Mall. Within them, I saw the battered body of Coral Eve being thrown in, barely able to stand. But there in the line I caught the wonderful azure eyes of Glimmerlight watching me. A slaver was having to repeatedly push her back in. I saw Sunny Days too...

All of us slaves.

"This is just how it goes for ponies like you, Number Seven." My Master stood up, pulling the chain. "There is no way out. No grand escape. Fillydelphia is your home and your place is by my side."

His voice was returning to its strength.

"Now you know it, she was caught and joined us as much as any other pony. She is out there working for Red Eye now."

Arbu... Bucklynn Cross... it made so much sense, he... he was right.

"So now we'll simply see about returning you to a crash course in handing away control. You are a slave, Number Seven. It's time you remembered that. Your punishment will teach you this more than you would ever need to have us direct your life from now on. Wormtail!"

The wretched aid of My Master crept over. He cast me a smug little grin as I sat shivering; wide eyed and barely thinking. No, I was thinking, just not what I wanted to think and see and... oh Goddesses.

I'd been believing in a lie all this time.

There was no way out.

"Take this disobedient slave for his punishment before returning him. He'll work a shift somewhere to help him get rid of feeling like he's anypony that matters. Perhaps at the old merchant's new place..."

"At once, Maste—"

"NO!"

The scream wasn't mine, I turned to see a slaver belted across the face, before Glimmerlight galloped out of the line of slaves and skidded to between me and My Master.

"Can't you see you're hurting him enough already! You don't need to do that!"

He snarled, raising a hoof. "Get out of my way, slave!"

She did not.

"Please! He's barely hanging in as it is! Don't do this to him! You... you can..."

Her body quaked, but I saw her raise a hoof, resting it on her own chest.

"...you can take me instead... not him! I filled his head with all this, helped turn him to making attempts! Please, just let him go back to the Mall with Coral, and take me for this punishment.”

There was a silence, My Master bearing down, staring into her eyes from far above her height. Behind her, I simply gazed on in amazement... my head hurting, the scar thumped and my cutie marks itched... the feeling of the chains shutting all too clear. But to see her do this... offer this in my defence...

Without warning, he raised up and crashed his hoof to her face, knocking Glimmer clear to one side and into the mud. Striding over, he kicked her.

“You have no say! If I wanted you to be there to be punished, you would be! You have no bartering chips! No say in matters! You are a slave like he is and you will not attempt to ever believe you can change my mind!”

He turned, twisting back to me.

“Take him back to the Mall and throw him in the cells until I arrange his presence for Morass. He’ll want to get the customers lined up. It shall become his new place of work after my shifts for him are done. After today, he will be split from other slaves entirely. You will learn what control is by the hoof of those that could seek it over you, Number Seven. You will serve their pleasures as the obedient slave you always were.”

Slavers grabbed my legs and chain, dragging me through the mud and over concrete. Glimmer struggled from the ground, trying to move toward me but being held harshly in line, kept away from me as we were dragged and returned to the Mall.

A journey that I spent quaking and crying as Wormtail spoke of how I was but a slave, a crude imitation of his own Master.

“Oh... oh Murky, they weren’t going to...”

We’d been thrown in to our shop cell for me to await that dreaded shift.

That was his plan to remind me that I was the bottom of the pile, and always had been, no matter what I’d believed before I was shown the truth.

I’d been thrown to rock bottom. Hitting the floor hard and being cast into a grey neutral world in my head that just didn’t make any sense anymore. Like I’d gone back to sleep.

It felt like I had over the years before.

“Murky, I’m so so sorry...”

I didn’t even feel anything... just... just...

Numb.

I lay in Glimmerlight’s gentle grasp, feeling my shoulder wet from her tears. I hadn’t cried since we got back. I simply couldn’t bring myself to. I just lay still and gazed at the wall, at the markings of generations of slaves beforehand, and feeling nothing at all.

I didn’t know what exactly was going to happen any more. But I didn’t need to for it to make me feel sick. Sick and worthless.

They were taking everything away from me. My hopes, my dreams, the mare I’d so shamelessly admitted I’d had a stupid crush on, and now they wanted to take my dignity itself just to remind me of my place.

My Master had seen the potential Sooty offered with me. Feeling me whine in fear, Glimmer tightened her grasp, whispering that it’d be okay, choking on her words as she looked into my vacant eyes. I didn’t really see her. I simply looked through her, feeling my body settle into its old routine and tell me 'I told you so.'

"We'll sort this, Murky... s-somehow... we always do..." Glimmer muttered again, she'd said it a dozen times. "Brim's coming back soon, he's going to be at the next shift, we'll see him there, okay? M-maybe he can get to you in time or... oh Murky, I'm so sorry."

Why did that matter? Even he couldn't fight all of Fillydelphia.

Even with him, there was no way out. Protégé hadn't offered me one. Red Eye hadn't given me one. Littlepip's way out had closed. The plans wouldn't work, you couldn't escape this city as a slave, not from behind the Walls. Not even from outside them for me.

My life was here now. No way out. No way out at all.

I could see Coral sitting quietly against the wall, her head buried in her hooves and looking shaky from that fever I knew was burning strong inside her. Glimmer's heart shaped face was covered in dried blood and grime. We were failing. We couldn't manage this.

No, my life wasn't here... it was in the hooves of My Master. He owned my life.

I felt Glimmerlight hold me as though she could somehow stop them from doing this. But I couldn't even muster the energy to fight back. What was the point now? Nopony could escape slavery.

Nopony could escape Fillydelphia.

But there was one little thought in me, one last little glitter that refused to go out. One train of thought. One desperate realisation.

There was one way out.

Half an hour later, our shift began. All of us were marched from the cell by the slavers, out of the Mall. It was there I took the chance, slipping away from the line like a ghost, before they could take me to Sooty's place. Only one pony saw me go, the pony who had been holding onto me and felt me leave.

Even as I sneaked away, blank-faced and grey of mind toward the one avenue of escape left to me, I heard Coral Eve shout, scream, and beg as she tried to make me hear her. She'd seen the look in my eyes. But she was dragged back in, chained down along with Glimmer and taken toward their shift, unable to follow me. Unable to do anything but try to make the slavers hear her pleas to catch me.

"Generous souls of Fillydelphia, I thank you. I thank you for your sacrifices. That day after day you place your own lives down to help prepare this world for a better generation. With our next scheduled event in the Pit coming tomorrow, I offer a day of rest then, that I would see you understand my gratitude for this effort. Even now, as I hear the reports of progress on all fronts, I feel indebted to the work you, as better ponies, have done."

Hoof before hoof, I trotted my way through Fillydelphia, taking the route I now knew. Down toward the Ministry of Arcane Science. Master Red Eye's voice boomed from the speakers that were lashed to signposts and lamps all over the city.

"Let it never be known that there is not good in the world. By being here, in Fillydelphia, you are doing a greater good than has been done in two hundred years of fruitlessly wandering the wastes outside. This great spectacle, the majesty of your blood, sweat, and tears... it shall be your monument to the future, the one place when you found your purpose."

I turned off the street, and headed to the quieter areas of Fillydelphia. The voice faded as I moved away from his infrastructure, coming into the silent grey streets.

"Yes, some may ask me, 'Why? Why do you keep us here?' Because this is the only place that anypony need be. There is nothing outside these walls but misery, spite, betrayal and pain to be found. Only in the future, through your sacrifice of time and energy, will we make..."

It became a mumbling, passing beyond the distance I could discern individual words. I stepped onto the one particular street before one building.

Cross Street Orphanage.

The doors creaked, an entirely empty interior meeting me with nothing but dark shapes and grey dust floating in the heavy warm air. What passed for twilight in Fillydelphia streamed through windows, tinted grey by the muck sapping colour from its strands. With each hoof making naught but a tiny click, I began to trot through it. My body felt so weak; my broken nose, diseased lungs, head cold, bloodshot eyes, and so many whips, scars and lesions along my body that I felt like a ghoul. Every step was shaky. My mouth hung open and my vision swam. They had wanted to destroy me. No freedom... with no dreams in any cold cell to warm my broken heart.

Almost a ghost of what a pony should be, trotting alone in the abandoned halls of the past.

I lifted my PipBuck. Reacquiring it and my journal hadn't been hard, I knew the way to sneak into his room now, as I'd prepared for coming out here. I'd wanted them with me for this moment. They had to be with me. Clicking through channels, I set it to the only one I cared about.

"—far be it for me to guess, my ponies of the Wastes, but I'm afraid I cannot say that we can expect any information readily any time soon. The warning stays on the airwaves. Just avoid the Stable Dweller until we know for sure that this travesty is nothing but a falsity."

I'd seen the proof myself, I knew that there would be no truthful information coming.

Limping my way through the halls of the Orphanage, I passed crayon drawings of a world I'd never see. Happy smiling stick figure ponies laughing and sharing time together in fields, slowly darkening off to a ruined wall where balefire had scorched the pictures clean. The good had been purged from Equestria long ago.

"It hurts me more than I can say that our hope is faltering, wastelanders. Just... just wait, please hold on a little longer and—"

Click.

I turned it off. That was all I could bear to hear.

I reached the stairs, moving up flight by flight, steadily approaching the way out to the new floors of girders that had still been left unbroken. Covered in damp puddles, the sheet metal and sodden wood creaked and plopped beneath my hooves.

Shaking, I began the ascent in the suddenly cold wind above the Orphanage. They... they wouldn't get me. I was going to escape. They weren't getting my life. Not to abuse and... and send to that place.

My heart thumped hard, my head aching and my teeth chattering, I reached the top of the unsteady construction. The nut I'd been trying to remove was still there. Sitting my ragged, untidy, and damp self down beside it, I sat and waited with my journal. There was just one last thing to... to maybe help me. While I sat quivering... I tried to draw.

A shaky line... led to a wobbly curve... and a stupid shape.

I hit my journal with a hoof, leaning my head down. I tried again. Raggedy figures and terrible sketches that made no sense and had no direction, I almost drew things by accident. The only times my subconscious led me to draw was when it was something about him.

Wanting to scream, I very nearly threw the journal from the top. Instead I just clutched it close and tucked it into my saddlebag.

Beep!

I almost screamed in fright, I was so on edge.

Beep!

I'd been startled by the very thing I'd waited for.

"Please, Sundial... please."

Click.

"I... I... oh no, I don't have long!"

I could hear shouting, a fumbling with the PipBuck and a desperation born of exhaustion in his voice. It sounded wrong. Sundial was in a better world! He wasn't meant to sound like this!

"They got me! I was going back to my desk and they were waiting! With their cuffs and their batons and... oh help me somepony, they're going to take me away as soon as they get through this door! I'm so sorry, Equestria! I just wanted to protect her!"

I clutched the PipBuck close, feeling my own tears double up for him. Oh Sundial no... why now, why you? I wanted him to get by and be happy and have a family before the end!

"So please, if you find this, please tell her I love her! Skydancer, she's the best thing that ever happened to me! Please! I'm so sorry Mom... Dad... I just don't know what's going to happen to me now! I'm—"

A crashing sound!

"Suspect, come here!"

"I'M SORRY!"

"Get down off the ground now! NOW! Get down or I'll—"

Click.

I simply sat and held the PipBuck. It had been the first thing I'd found that really became, well, mine, in this city. The first thing in here that mattered to me. It had always been there for me, but that was it.

There was no happy ending. Not for Sundial... not for Littlepip... not for me.

I began to shake, worse this time. Not from the cold, but from conflict. Fear of what lay ahead.

Slowly, I stood up, trotting forward. They wanted to hurt me every day, and I wouldn't let them...

My front hooves stopped at the edge. Before me, the sunset. Casting my quivering head down, I saw the same hard gravel and thickened mud below.

I was alone atop the only world I was ever going to be allowed to see... alone, cold, wet, and scared. I turned, looking behind me as if expecting to see somepony rushing up to stop me, but I knew nopony was there. Nopony would be there for me now that I'd come out here. I was just the lonely pegasus... as I'd always been. Some may want to help me, but they couldn't save me.

Nopony could.

Slowly, I closed my eyes, entering into my own mind and my imagination. I heard every thump of my heart, a thick and deep sound in my ears. I had only one thing left to do.

Please... make it not hurt...

Hesitation. Fear.

But one little realisation, a memory that popped up. P-Pinkie had told me about this, hadn't she? In that creepy letter...

"When the time comes to make a choice, whether to leap or not... you'll know what to do."

The time was here... I knew what I had to do to protect myself.

I felt myself edge forward, the tips of my front hooves rested over the edge. I couldn't look down. I just clenched my eyes shut. Shaking, crying, whimpering, and trying with all my might to think of all the pain that would end.

They had taken my freedom.

They had crushed my dreams.

"I'm... I'm sorry, Glimmer... Brim... Coral... Protégé... Unity... I'm so sorry... I... I..."

I didn't even feel myself lean forward past the point of no return.

Simply a motion, a whisper of wind against my body, and the loss of all solid ground as I fell.

There were no dramatic last thoughts as it happened.

My little body left the rooftop, not even turning as it plunged. One last escape from the nightmare. Nopony to witness me or find me. I would just disappear with as little celebration as I had been born.

Nothing but a number.

The speed picked up, every minor detail somehow finding its way to my mind in the few short seconds of my fall.

My eyes saw the ground move, tumble, and spin. My whimper grew to a scream... a scream to end all of my pain.

From being torn from my mother, to the horrid anvil and hammer, through every lash, cane, slap, and stomp... to the carts, back breaking work and lost hopes. For my whole life... I screamed.

A simple and anguished cry of sadness that grew and grew as I saw the harsh ground of Fillydelphia again and again as I spun and tumbled, those broken wings plastered to my sides.

It would all be over! One little pain I'd had the courage to face! My only way out of this city to be with the Goddesses at last to await my friends in their merciful embrace!

But the scream grew, beyond what I could. A roar... a brutal cry as something exploded and shards of wood and brick flew all around me. My body slapping into something hard, and I felt hooves grasp me in midair, crushing me against a huge chest.

Brimstone Blitz caught me. Diving through the wall of the orphanage, he had thrown himself with that mighty cry, hooves out to grab me. Thrown off course, we tumbled. A slam and shock of pain as we hit the adjoining building, crashed through flights of scaffold and bounced from loose brick we fell together, over and over...

Before crashing to the ground. Pain overcame me, and my vision turned to black.

But the pain didn't end.

Slowly, growing, that spark of life led my eyes to open. He was there, lying still and breathing as his hooves held me against him, stopping me escaping, stopping me crying out and running away from what he'd done.

Even as we were surrounded by the slavers that had chased him, he held me tightly. I struggled, beating at him with my hooves and crying aloud for stopping me! I wanted out! Why, Brim? Why?

"No!" He hissed, a more emotional tone than I knew he possessed.

Cradling my head and shivering as I broke down crying and hollering in his hooves, I was completely stopped from moving, restrained even from choosing my own end. Yet he clasped and embraced me.

"It's not that bad... it's never that bad..."

His eyes shifted up, to the slavers.

"This will end better for you. I'll see to it."

A low and ebbing growl emanated from his chest, and I sensed the rage building in him.

"There will be a reckoning for whoever made you come to this..."

Lucky Break – Sometimes a break only lasts so long. Whatever item gave you that luck to just scrape by time and time again has lost its meaning now. Your Luck characteristic has been reduced by one. Guess you're just an unlucky number...

Rage of the Warlord

"Don't bother with the white flag for that brute's clan, my little ponies. They'll only strangle you with it."

"What was it like? That is, realising how much he'd broken you?"

I didn't realise it, that was the problem.

From the moment he'd shown me that sprite-bot's truths, that everything I believed in had been a lie, what did I have left to believe in? I'd believed I could escape, but I had failed. I'd believed that I needed to become like Littlepip and be brave with my friends to escape like she did, but then Arbu happened. I'd taken my last solace in that she had done it, that no matter what I'd be able to somehow do it if too if I was only determined enough.

Then I found out that she hadn't even come close. I'd simply been telling myself what I wanted to hear all along from the very start in the Pit. Just a delusional little slave who thought he was more important than he actually was.

His methods to remind me of my place, that I had no dignity, hope, or control. It was like I was back under that anvil, feeling it coming but being unable to stop it no matter what I tried. It took all that spunk and inner strength and corrupted it... made me feel worthless.

I'd needed something to believe in... a way out. I didn't throw myself from that rooftop because I was broken... I did it because I thought I was escaping. You don't do these things to yourself knowing that you're racing to your death. You do it to get away from what's hurting you. Every avenue I could have believed in had closed, directing me down the only path that my mind felt made any sense just to make the pain stop.

"But you'd come so far..."

I know! My friends knew too, and it still stabs at my heart knowing how much I hurt them by doing what I did. They never said anything about it but I could see it in their eyes. Even before I'd met any of them properly I'd at least been able to maybe quip off inside my own head or... or after I'd met them, laughed, and joked! They'd made me happy, and for the first time in my life, be it while being teased or feeling joyful, they were proud of me for the things I'd done. But after it all started to go downhill, I was turning into the slave I'd been before Fillydelphia all over again! I just couldn't handle that; to be given such a glimpse of the pony I could be only for it all to be ripped away moment by moment again and again! From losing Unity to the broadcast about Arbu; making things worse for Sunny to the second news report about Bucklynn Cross, and then to find out that she really hadn't escaped? That she had failed in everything I'd dreamed of and joined Red Eye on a mission for him!

Could I really be blamed for thinking there was no other way to escape slavery? I'd been deluding myself the entire time that there was a way out of Fillydelphia. That city, it's impossible. Slaves have a saying, you know? That once Filly gets a hold of you, then you'll only ever get out if you lose something, be it a life or a soul.

"But Brimstone saved you, didn't that help remind you how important you were in the lives of others?"

Yes...

Sorry, I don't mean to cry.

"It's alright."

Thank you, but no. It should have but I just couldn't shake that numbness. I'd been saved, but for what? All I could see was another slaver coming to take me to a shift. I couldn't live like that, and so I simply retreated. I ran away from life itself into my own mind, desperate to make it all just blur past until the day I staggered... tripped... and just fell over to be swept away by time.

Really, though? I wasn't the real problem.

"Sorry, I don't follow."

A reckoning, he'd said. Vengeance. A fury drawn deep in a pony that fought his own battle against the born life he could never quite escape.

Even as I found The Master's ownership breaking me into the slave I had been born as, the first of my allies was finding our treatment bringing his own past to the surface of his mind. All he'd needed was something to give him a reason to set it loose.

For a long time, the Great Warlord had been dormant.

No more.

I spent that night in My Master's tiny office cell, hunched and shivering within its cold confines and trying to pretend that those crawling sensations over my body were just my imagination in the pitch black. My back stung, for the cost of my survival had brought with it further punishment for disobedience. A burn on my side spread into an aching across my ribs and surrounding joints. That shock rod he carried had been the newest implement to try and 'bring me in line.'

I'd been thrown in. Ordered not to sleep, but to think on my place in life.

Life...

Did I even have one? Could I even have one?

Front hooves resting over my muzzle and coughing every few minutes as the collar worked its sick purpose, I felt the tight swelling in my breast remind me that no, I couldn't.

Outside the Wall was no paradise, no place of health and relief from what life had 'blessed' me with inside, either in my mind or body. My Master was right.

Sniffing, I couldn't help but feel upset that Brimstone had saved me. I knew why he had. I'd have done the same. But from my perspective, all it meant was I had more of the pain to go yet. I couldn't escape Fillydelphia and I couldn't escape my life. No matter how much I wanted to. Knowing that deep down hurt more than anything, the thought that I had wanted that escape.

Really, for the past few hours I'd done nothing but keep thinking over all these things. I'd been ordered to.

My head perked up, ears twitching as I heard the door to My Master's office being flung open. A heavy tread—it was him! Quickly, grunting and moaning in pain, I stood up in the cramped space as best I could to turn and face the doorway with my head lowered and ready.

"Time's up, little slave!" He called from outside even while I heard the keys jangle and turn in the thick locks. "I hope you've been doing as ordered this time!"

Grinding and screeching as the metal door dragged across the hard floor, I squinted against even the office's vague light. That light soon turned to shadow when My Master stepped forward, stroking the thick coat on his muzzle with a hoof and leering down at me. My eyes tried to stay low, but I couldn't help but see the heavy whip and inactive shock rod sitting on those leather bandoleers, or the loop of chain around his neck. Suppressing the squeak of fear, I simply abased myself.

"Y-yes Master. I have."

"Gooood... and?" One of his hooves rested on the door. No doubt to slam it shut if I said wrong.

"I..." I sniffed. "I don't choose w-when to stop my work and d-die, only when My Master chooses for me..."

"Very good." I felt the cloven hoof on the door move down to pat my head gently. "Anything else?"

"I d-don't think so—"

"Oh but there is." My Master stepped back, I saw him reach for the whip!

Yelping, I staggered back into the cell while shaking my head rapidly, my whole body trembling. Oh please, don't! Not more! Think, Murky, think!

"Yes!" I shouted the word oddly out of place, seeing him hesitate and raise one eyebrow above those beady eyes. "Th-there... there isn't anything for me out there anyway. No heroes, no better life. Nothing I'd understand how to deal with or live in. I... I realised where I belong..."

There was a silence in the dingy office. I knew what he was doing. He was letting it sink in. But I couldn't take him just watching as if wanting more.

"I realised there's no way out, you are who you were born to be and... and there's nothing else after that. I was born a slave..."

Finally, My Master nodded.

"Seems we've finally gotten through to you, Number Seven. Don't you worry, every slave rebels at some point, it's all natural. Now you can go back to a life you understand. You are a slave. That's all you are meant to be and you've just had a little period of adjustment in your adolescence. You'll settle in eventually like they all do, just another number."

I hated his voice. I almost wished he'd shout. This 'day by day' tone that simply talked of experience and expectation terrified me with the thoughts of that this was my life.

It was.

"Now, we have a lot of work for you, little runt. Get your chain on and follow me closely. You are to be left in the plaza until arrangements have been made for your schedule. An event in the Pit is scheduled later today, accompanied by one of Red Eye's, hmm... break days. So not many shifts are going into the latter half of the day, but don't you worry, slave! We'll make sure you get the chance at something. Sooty is eager to have you, you know?"

The moment he'd told me to get the chain on I was already pulling it around my collar and falling into step beside him to begin the journey. But that last line had drawn a shiver from me and made a sickness rise in my throat. I wanted to scream, to beg and plead with him not to send me there.

He chuckled when we left the office, hearing no complaint from me.

"Very good, Number Seven. No words means you're remembering how to act. Now come on, you'll get to meet your little friends again. You'll like that, eh? The two mares will be back soon, and the raider seems, heh... eager to meet you. I'm sure they'll be excited to see the real you. Show them who you really are, Number Seven."

There was no choice in it, I had to stay silent and obey.

Simply had to do what I did before.

Don't think.

Don't feel.

Don't wish.

Don't dream...

"All right, wretches! Roll call is over, now get back to your holes until we require you!"

Dozens of slaves began to limp away from the redesigned plaza, passing around the smokestacks, incinerator, and the strange solitary confinement holes. As they left, slavers trotted behind them and slammed the cage doors shut. There was no such thing as the freedom to wander the plaza that they had once had under Protégé's rule.

I had stood alone during the entire event as I always was instructed to. The only pegasus in a group of his own, still chained to My Master. Glimmerlight and Coral Eve were still out on work, but Brimstone stood above the crowd, glaring at My Master with death in his eyes.

"Red Eye's rest day will begin in six hours, until then you will all produce a full day's worth of smaller tasks in your cells to make up for that lost time! As by his orders you will be permitted to leave the Mall to attend the Pit by your own choosing. However! You will all be back before noon the next day; slaves not returning will be subject to punishment duties."

He stood near the old fountain, as though taunting me with the temptation to drink from its muddy waters. My throat was burning, dry as the ashen ground of Fillydelphia, while the ground below me held a few spats of blood from my coughing. I'd seen Brimstone glance over every time I'd convulsed.

"And you..."

He turned to me, unclasping the chain from my collar.

"You will remain here while I arrange your next shift."

"His shift where?"

The entire plaza seemed to stop moving, ponies both slave and slaver alike turned back from the movement.

Brimstone Blitz stood, having not moved at all from where he'd watched over the roll call. Standing straight on with My Master, he had his chin lowered, eyebrows narrow and eyes hard. I heard My Master chuckle and turn with a shake of his mane.

"Of no concern to you, slave. His shifts are—"

"Well overworked. He's done more shifts in the past day than any slave is meant to in three. You think somepony wouldn't notice? By Red Eye's rules he's earned a day of rest. He will have no shifts today."

There were gasps. Nopony disagreed with My Master these days, but they all remembered the hoof-wrestling match. They knew the bad blood between these two. I shivered, feeling far too close to the two largest ponies around here. Please... please Brim, don't do this.

My Master grinned, arrogant and sure of his position. His authority was absolute here, turning his head to me with no chain to my collar.

"Red Eye has his rules, yes. But I didn't say that his shifts were from Red Eye. They are my request to him. My order. From Master to slave. Number Seven is my personal little pet slave now, so why don't you ask him whether he wishes to obey my personal requests? He accepted this position after all, and Red Eye does permit a slaver to hold a personal assistant if the slave agrees to it and wishes to work for them. Well, Number Seven? You don't have to do work, but I've ordered you anyway, what do you say to all this?"

The shivering turned to a quaking. Eyes wet and mind racing, I turned back and forth between the two. My Master only stood confidently. Brimstone finally turned his head and I could see his eyes pleading. In the scant minutes before they'd torn me away from him I'd seen how much he had come to care for me as well.

I wanted to go to him. My Master said I could if I chose to.

Feeling my bandaged wings dampen with the sweat of a blistering indoors and the pressure of fighting choice and chains, I tried to fight both sides of it. My... My Master might... might do things if... if I didn't...

"Murky? What's wrong, he can't do anything but ask you! Come on!"

I looked up, seeing Brim looking almost impatient in his stoic fury. Clearly my situation was all that was keeping him from launching forward.

"Just walk away, Murky!"

"From your life, Number Seven?" My Master's voice cooed behind me, just quiet enough for me alone to hear. "Defying your born Master? Chained to me by fate since before you were even born... you can't defy that which owns your very mark's meaning."

Brimstone stamped hard enough to crush a small piece of rubble on the ground.

"What are you waiting for!? This sick bastard can't force you to do any more today!"

We had tried to escape together more than once. Escape... no, it couldn't happen. I couldn't. Some things were too important.

"I'm s-sorry, Brim. B-born a slave..."

Slowly, my head lowered and mumbled the last few words as I trotted back to My Master's side. A low growl from Brimstone was all I heard while My Master's hoof stroked my mane and effectively pulled me in against his repulsive sweaty body.

"What?"

"See, raider? Number Seven knows his place in life at last. You are what you're born as... he's not the only one either, looking at you ready to frenzy up. Now! All of you! Back to your cages while I set the planning out and meet with the merchant. Come when I call, Number Seven. Might have even heard of a few ponies lined up from the merchant, heh."

Setting me down, I simply nodded and lowered my head in submission. Trotting away, I made a slow pace for our shop cell out of habit.

Brimstone Blitz glared at My Master as he left, before whirling around, picking me up and stopping just short of slamming me into the wall. I screamed, covering my face with my hooves, before feeling him put me down... realising what he was doing. Making a short snort, he bent down.

"Why did you agree!? You don't have to listen to what he says! What's this 'merchant lining up ponies' piss-talk? You've worked enough to not need it, you stupid—" He cut off, stamping a hoof to curb his anger. I knew it wasn't really at me. "Why, Murk?"

"I'm a slave... I obey..."

I simply trotted on by him into the cell, hearing him turn to watch me go into the back room, aiming for a corner.

"Goddesses above, what has he done to you while I was away?"

"HE'S GOING TO MAKE HIM DO WHAT!?"

I winced, my ears aching along with the very cell shaking at Brimstone's roar from the front of shop. Accompanying it was a heavy slam. A part of the wall bulged inward into the back room where I lay curled on the couch in a blanket. Pieces of degrading plaster flew off and fell across me.

Glimmerlight had returned earlier, staggering her way in with her initiate robes ripped on the back from a whip. She hadn't shown what injuries lay below, but even I could see the effort it took to keep the pain from her face. She and Brimstone were in the front shop now where I had heard her telling him what I was being pushed into doing.

Now I only heard her seem to suddenly panic.

"Brim! No! He's scared, he needs space!"

The floor quaking beneath me, the giant form of the raider stormed through into the back. A full shelving unit, flung aside for him to take a more direct path, crashed across the ground before the huge earth pony almost seemed to snarl at me. Yelping, I withdrew to the corner of the sofa, curling up, my eyes open wide. Teeth bared, muscles twitching and bulging, a great raider bore down above me demanding my answer. I... I was scared of him. I hadn't been scared of him in so long!

"Is this true?"

Squealing, I covered my ears and shrunk away, pulling my blanket over me. I heard Glimmerlight gallop in behind him, shouting for him to back off. But my safe little world beneath the blanket was torn away, pulled clean off me.

"Is. This. True?"

I knew he wasn't going to hurt me! But the look of anger and rage just terrified me! At feeling him bearing over me, lighting up every imagined horror awaiting and of every huge Master I'd ever had.

Screaming, I found myself scampering off the sofa and diving into the darkness.

"YES!" I cried as I went, feeling the tears flow and the horrible hurt of knowing what had become of my life being admitted in my own voice, before it fell to a choked and diseased gasp. Looking back at the huge pony standing there I saw Glimmerlight rush in to stand between him and I. But I could only nod gently and fearfully from behind her.

“...Y-yes.”

There was a pause. A silent pause as the heavy and scarred figure simply stared at me. Filled with anger, but in those eyes I saw care. I saw a protectiveness that now felt it had failed. Only now did I really see how much I meant to the big pony, how small and innocent I must have seemed to him.

Now to those same eyes, through violence, oppression, and intended violation, that same innocence was being stripped away.

“He has gone too far this time.” Brim’s voice was dark. Without any hint of the stoic demeanour I had known him for. “Every day I watch him hurt ponies, abuse them, and destroy their lives and free wills.”

A bucket unfortunate enough to be close by him was flattened, bucked across the room.

“I see him throw you to raiders for your wings to be torn off and find him working with them to try and kill the one slaver who actually had a heart in this fucking building!”

The sofa flipped, spiralling and crashing to the floor.

“He strikes Glim and leaves her a malnourished wreck, bit by bit, after sending me from her. Now this? NOW THIS!?”

A full shelving unit was picked up, hurled into the wall where it shattered into its component parts. Boxes once arrayed on it spread everywhere as Brimstone snorted and stamped.

“This has gone on long enough. He has hurt too many ponies. He thinks he is some kind of sadistic slaver god, he does not know the meaning of rage and darkness in the hearts of the raider clans of old! Enough is enough.”

It built slowly. A tremble of his front hooves. A snort. A closing of the eyes. Grinding of the teeth and a slow rise to his full height as that immense muscled body struggled to contain the absolute and unbridled rage that was seeking to explode.

Yet explode it did. A bestial howl of anger and fury echoed around the room so hard that even Glimmerlight fell to her haunches and covered her ears. My head turned into splitting agony from the sound in my sensitive ears. But before me came a whirlwind of violence, a desk picked up like it were a toy and smashed against the far floor. The very concrete of the walls cracked under a ferocious buck.

Before a very sudden and very deliberate turn toward the door.

Glimmerlight spotted it before I did, galloping forward in front of him.

“Brim! NO! That’s what he wa—ARGH!”

My jaw dropped in shock as I saw Brimstone knock her aside like anypony else.

Brimstone. Struck. Glimmerlight.

The sight seemed impossible, but all the same I saw her thrown backwards to scatter on the floor. She simply lay back, eyes wide in shock more than anything. Helping her up, we both ran out as we heard the cell door completely fail in its purpose to stop anypony exiting the cell, just in time for it to be slammed back and jammed shut in our faces from a hind leg buck.

He was in the plaza. Still trotting slowly, deliberately, he moved to near the fountain and turned his head to the balcony above the main door out before taking a deep breath.

“SHAAAACKLES!”

Ten seconds passed before another great bellow of the name, he shouted again and then a fourth time. Every time sending the name echoing all over the Plaza and throughout the entire Mall, enough that I heard the few remaining panes of glass shake. Glimmerlight was fighting with the door, trying to get it open from its wrecked but jammed lock. I simply stood back from it, staring through the bars with wide eyes.

“SHAAAACKLES!”

Slaves were gathering at their cell doors. Some slavers, the easier-going assistants who kept an eye on us and brought us food, very wisely decided not to approach him if they were already inside the Plaza. They weren't particularly nasty ponies, often long term slaves themselves who had simply found a menial role in Red Eye's workforce as a way to escape true servitude. All the same, they did not want to risk garnering his attention at all. But after that last shout... he appeared. The true slaver in here. Atop the balcony above, that leering and grinning face. As though he had expected this reaction... as though he had been expecting it. Placing me in here just so Brimstone could find out from me.

“Well... if it isn't our little captive raider who wants atten—”

“Shut up and get down here NOW you pathetic sack of worthless flesh! Stand before me!”

A hoof slammed into the ground before him, making a slab of concrete snap in two with one side popping up from the ground level to fall at the side. I was not witnessing my friend Brim... this was the Great Warlord Brimstone Blitz. His voice rang with authority and power, completely eclipsing that of My Master.

“You forget your place, slave!” My Master cackled, glancing to either side at all the cells... his eyes found me. “You have no say here, raider! You are no warlord. No king of raiders any more! You are nothing but my slave. You shall remain there to simmer down.”

If Brimstone Blitz showed any sign of caring for My Master's orders, he didn't show it. A violent snarl through almost foaming teeth led to a hurling of the slab of concrete at the balcony. Flying upward, it crashed into the softer brickwork and smashed one section of the balcony around where My Master stood. I saw him have to flinch to the side to avoid the shrapnel.

“You will stand before me and answer for this or I will destroy this petty prison to find you! GET! DOWN! HERE! FACE ME, COWARD!”

My Master lowered his hoof from covering his face against the rocks that now fell and tumbled down back into the Plaza. That grin persisting... enjoying seeing Brimstone trapped in the Plaza and raging an order he would never have followed. With a cackle, he simply turned and left.

I thought that would be it. That Brimstone's anger would explode in violence against the guards who were very hastily retreating into one of the cells to hide.

However I had never seen the Warlord at work when his ire was truly raised.

Roaring after My Master, rearing up and bellowing his protest at somepony turning their back on him, I saw Brimstone instead cast an eye to the new thick door that protected the way out. No doubt specifically reinforced just for him. But I saw his eyes then turn to the slavers watching above with rifles. He knew it as well as I did. That if he took time to destroy the door, he'd be gunned down.

When I had first met Brimstone Blitz, it had been his cold and calculated practicality that had terrified me beyond anything else. That capability for intelligence through the frenzy. To think, plan, and execute even while throwing all control to the wind to brutalise that which stood in his way. Here again I saw that. His eyes found something else as they travelled to the side, viewing a cell full of ponies.

Glimmerlight saw it too. Banging her hooves on the cell, crying her eyes out as she screamed and begged him from afar. To no avail. I saw him turn to the cell, slowly trotting toward the place all those slaver assistants had tried to hide in. The place they had trapped themselves in.

"Brim! BRIM! Don't! PLEASE! You're better than this! You're BETTER!"

He didn't hear... or he didn't care. Even as the guards above finally realised his plan, it was too late to aim and fire before he charged. Braying his war cry, the raider warlord disappeared into the cell before the horrified screams started. I couldn't even see it, but I could hear all too clearly the crunch of bones, wet splats of blood and every body-aching crash amidst the whirling movements in the dark around a dark red behemoth that began to systematically and mercilessly slaughter the assistants.

One even managed to get past him, bearing a crushed cheekbone and staggering out on three legs, his fourth was...

Oh Goddesses.

I had to turn to retch even as the assistant collapsed in a red pool, squealing for the help that would never arrive in time to save his life. I heard Glimmerlight sink down at the bars, wailing as loud as she could for him to stop.

Up above, panic reigned. They saw a large portion of their workforce being massacred and struggled to bring their weapons to bear. Slavers ran all across the upper level, none daring enter the Plaza to reach its new built bridges. But Brimstone had chosen his plan well and the inside of the cell was hid so tightly away from the balcony that they could never reach him. Eventually, perhaps in desperation, I heard the order shouted: 'Get in there!'

Hooves clattered down stairs. I heard rifles cocked and shotguns racked. I wanted to warn him, to shout out and tell him to stop! But I could only sit back, witnessing powers and authorities far beyond that of my place in the world act out unstoppably before me.

The main Plaza door swung open and Brimstone was there to meet it. Blood splattered across his body, pupils dilated from the adrenaline and thundering forward he rushed for the doorway. Two slavers who galloped in were simply crushed below his hooves. Ribcages snapped as Brimstone simply ran over them as the third tried to retreat and close the door. With one mighty swing, Brimstone slammed it shut himself and crushed the pony in the door frame. Retching as he screamed, the slaver became a door block to all his colleagues trying to pull him inside and seal it.

No chance.

He tore it from their hooves, swinging it open and disappearing through it. I heard everything. Gunshots went off, slavers shouted for reinforcements and to 'just fucking shoot him!' Flares of gunfire lit the area just outside the door and the smell of gunpowder reached my nostrils. But the violence only kept going on, slavers ran back into the Plaza pulling their brutalised comrades to escape the carnage that went on behind those doors. I heard the sound change, moving further away, higher up. Crashes, raging cries, and sounds of walls and all furniture being absolutely destroyed in his path simply went higher and higher... he'd found the stairs!

Glimmerlight pulled aside one of the broken bars, bucking the doorway over and over as it taunted and teased her with only just not opening. I was frozen, listening to Brimstone fulfilling his very promise by sound alone in the distance. No, wait! Not further! They were

A squeal of terror sharply cut the Plaza as a slaver crashed down from the balcony before going utterly silent in a crumpled heap. Even my recent mind couldn't think too deeply as my eyes were drawn upwards to see the sudden light of gunshots and debris of battle combined upon the balcony. Slavers appeared now and again, dozens of voices! Brimstone was taking on the entire Mall alone!

But there was another voice, I only heard it for a few seconds in the distance. Swearing and accompanying the titanic crash of two huge ponies wrestling back and forth. I saw My Master back toward the balcony! Then Brimstone's head briefly appeared before they both disappeared again.

What was—

All my thoughts were put on hold at the sight that occurred. Charging forward, ramming My Master ahead of him in a crushing tackle, Brimstone Blitz screamed bloody murder and came rushing off the edge, My Master below him as the pair flew into thin air! Hanging for a second before my wide eyes, surrounded by the broken remnants of the balcony's marble barrier, the two biggest ponies in my life arced and fell from Brimstone's rampage down multiple storeys. Tumbling, spinning... My Master was on the bottom as they landed, obliterating the surrounding wall of the fountain and sending a thud through the ground so hard I felt my insides judder.

Water poured out, washing through the rock dust that had kicked up around them that cleared to the sight of the most ferocious raider in perhaps Equestrian history unleashing all that anger upon one pony. Guttural shouts and curses on every movement, Brimstone beat My Master into the ground, grabbing his head and slamming it repeatedly off the fountain's remaining structure. Only pausing to slap aside any attempt to fight back, I saw that my thought of them as huge equals was not even close. Brimstone was straight up destroying him! Blood poured from both My Master's head and Brimstone's mouth, whether from injuries or ripping attacks before, or simply from biting himself in the frenzy!

Slavers swarmed. From all sides, they leapt upon him. Whips, clubs, shock rods and even buckshot flew into Brimstone's body without any apparent effect! Three slavers were grabbed and hurled across the Plaza from straying too close. One of the heftier raiders was dropped with a solid butt from Brim's skull before throwing himself back at My Master. Taking note of the water he shoved the Slave Master's head beneath it, aiming simply to drown the slaver!

"COWARDLY BASTARD!"

Dragging him out, Brimstone slammed a hoof into his chest and threw him right back underwater, hooves cutting into his throat!

"I WILL MAKE YOU SUFFER, YOU FUCKING SADIST!"

Hooves slammed down again and again even as he held the struggling slaver's face below water. My Master's hooves battered at Brimstone, cutting him on his hoof's edge, bruising with his own huge strength but ultimately not doing anything to penetrate the blood rage that had overtaken my friend.

The slavers finally got their act together. Glimmer cried out as she saw three high-powered rifles brought to bear.

"Fire! Fire!"

"BRIM!" Glimmer bucked hard upon the cage, jarring it, but not quite getting it open!

He paid no heed, veins standing out, and shaking his victim beneath him.

"YOU ARE NOTHING YOU—"

The rifles fired in a quick volley. The raider was flung to the side, struck three times along his torso with enough force to make him buckle, stagger and fall. Collapsing into the pouring water out of the fountain that was washing over and mixing with the blood spilled all around, Brimstone dropped.

With a clang, finally the cell door sprung open! Glimmer galloped out and, not knowing what I was doing, I followed. I saw her make a beeline for Brimstone, putting herself between him and the slavers. I only got a few feet before I felt somepony grab me from behind.

“Come here, runt! We’ll need a little insurance!” A whiny and nasal voice; Wormtail!

I felt a barrel pressed against the side of my head... and I went very still.

Brimstone was getting to his hooves again, somehow. He was clearly hurt and bleeding profusely, but still limping forward to continue.

“Stop! Raider! You don’t want him hurt? Well, how about this?” Wormtail cried out, pressing the muzzle harshly into my ear, making me whine.

Across the crowded Plaza, past the battered and exhausted slavers, the barely moving heap of My Master in the fountain and the tear-stained Glimmerlight pleading for Brimstone to stop... I saw him finally give pause.

There was a silence between them, the gurgling of water as it flowed around the unmoving and brutalised form of My Master, drawing his lifeblood with it. Limbs flopped, his messed mane floated over the fountain’s surface. He had just been absolutely torn into, an example of Brimstone’s capability when truly angered.

Growling lowly however, Brimstone stood his ground from my situation.

“Let... him... go...”

“So you can break me? Hah! Move one hoof forward and your little stunt earlier won’t mean anything!”

I simply stared at Brimstone, seeing the willpower it took him to resist the urge inside driving him to keep fighting. He didn’t take one step forward... but did move backward, turning to put a dent in a cell before using it to lean on.

“Sick bastards... he is innocent!”

No, no Brimstone. I’m not innocent, I’m a slave. Please understand, doing what they want is what I was meant to be doing. I don’t want it, but I’m not worth ruining things fighting over. I only wished I could dare speak out of turn to tell him.

Wormtail didn’t have to answer... for in a splutter of water and thick blood My Master rose from the fountain before falling back in, his body failing him to land spreadeagled and coughing thick wads of bloody spit up, all too similar to me. Yet even on his back, strewn in injured ruin... he laughed. He laughed long and he laughed loud. Arrogant, triumphant, and utterly satisfied.

“I told you! HAHAAHAAA!” He turned to my friends, twisting shattered teeth through a sick grin. I saw Brimstone’s pain in his eyes mixed with the anger, dearly wanting to cave the slaver’s skull in.

“I told you! Told you I’d find a way to hurt you! BAAAHAAHA! You remember? You said there was no way, raider! But there was! That runt fucking pegasus got into your big ‘tough’ heart, raider, and I have him set to be ravaged just to show you that there’s no beating your Master! He will always find a way to punish you for trying to act high and bloody mighty before him like you have a choice!”

He coughed, falling out of the fountain and beating slavers away as he came to his hooves and clearly struggled to get up.

“Now you’ll get to die knowing just who controls who hurts and who lives around here, raider!”

Brimstone snarled and clearly made to charge, but my throat constricted from the hoof around it to the point I shrieked at hearing the trigger mechanism of the pistol against my head tighten. The massive earth pony ceased, growling lowly.

He... he did it all just to get at Brimstone.

He used me like his personal weapon to hurt my friend. Just some tool, some belonging My Master possessed to use however he wanted, for whatever end!

Just like I was being used now, like the pathetic and incapable slave I was, to keep Brimstone in check. The horrible thing was part of my mind was only telling me this was supposed to be my role. Just a slave. A slave who strayed too far from his purpose.

“Heh... you just stay there, raider! Slavers! Restrain him and find him some healing potions, he’ll need them.” My Master limped toward the door before turning back and speaking loudly after spitting upon the floor. “For the disobedient slave Brimstone Blitz will be sent to die in the Pit later today for your amusement, and to show that you do not disobey in my Mall! Get him in the strong cell till it’s time, go!”

That was that. Even as Brimstone, Glimmerlight, and I found each other’s faces, I just couldn’t keep up with the conflicting emotions of anger, guilt, pain, and despair between the three of us.

All I knew was that I just wished I had fallen from that control tower long ago, so that maybe none of this would have happened.

Even the day was dark. Some slaves that had returned from trawling the hillsides outside Fillydelphia for scavenged materials were claiming they could see the end of the storm coming near in the great blanket of clouds above. But for now Fillydelphia was still firmly locked in its embrace. Beneath the rain, pools of water formed in the Plaza under a harsh battering on the metal roof above us.

Thankfully, this darkness only aided me.

The lock hadn’t been repaired on our cell yet. Awaiting a chance, I had sneaked out to try and find him. It wasn’t hard, most slavers had retreated from the Plaza to treat the wounds or say a goodbye to their comrades who had not survived Brimstone’s onslaught. Frankly, I thought, the fact that they’d not simply killed him on the spot was a miracle in itself. Presumably My Master wanted the drawn out nature of the Pit.

The huge bars just ahead marked where they’d taken him. Slowly, creeping hoof by hoof, I shifted up to them while trying to ignore the fear of being within reach of him. Oh come on, Murky, I chided myself. That’s stupid to think! He’s your friend! Your... friend.

My eyes adjusted to the darkness well, seeing the massive shape of him near the back of the cell. Sitting down and hunched over, completely unmoving. His head turned when I tapped lightly on a metal bar with a hoof. The sound was tinny and weak, nothing compared to the thick sound of him rising to approach the front with those immensely thick shackles around his hooves dragging under him.

“Murk.” A simple and rather curt greeting. “You should be in your cell with Glim.”

Shuffling on my hooves, I glanced back at the cell I’d left, before shaking my head.

"She's re-watching one of the orbs from before that we looked at. Trying to distract herself, I think."

"All the same you need your rest more than ever right now. I don't need the rot to tell me how sick you look. It's like you've just switched off upstairs a bit, lad."

No... no I'm fine. This is just how you're meant to see me, tired and blurring life by... nothing but a slave. I'm fine..."

He snorted, the rush of air blowing my mane to one side.

"Your very coat is falling out in places around your neck, Murk. I can see how pale you are beneath it. The bones on your legs are visible with malnutrition. You are not fine after what they put you through just to get at me."

A low growl accompanied the words, gritting his teeth before the big raider slumped down... anger extinguished to simmer below the surface. Looking at my legs, I leaned on the bars.

"My Master would probably have done it anyway. I... I think. It's horrible... but he asks and I have to obey. J-just how it is for a born slave."

I felt myself well up a little. Brimstone only snorted again, blowing my mane in the other direction even after I'd fixed it.

"I just don't get why you want to let him control you. I don't get it at all. Maybe it's just what we're born as. Slave and raider. But I won't see you just giving yourself up to all that. To him or to life. Just... just fucked up. With my life, that's saying something. At least I chose to do all I did."

"Sorry..."

His head turned sharply, before just sighing and shaking his head. I really was sorry though! Sorry that he didn't understand. Maybe because he'd actually had a life, and tasted what freedom was, even if what he'd chosen to do with it wasn't right. Perhaps that's why he didn't understand why the only choice any slave ever had was when it should end.

But I had to ask the question that had been on my mind.

"Will you, um, be okay in the Pit? It's like before, I'm scared Brimstone."

He gently lay against the bars, as though sitting beside me.

"Just been sitting here thinking the same. Maybe once I could say for sure, but this body's getting on a bit, Murk. Shackles won't make it easy, probably round up what's left of the Big Four. You've seen Barb, he was my lesser in a Clan that rewarded brutality and bloody spectacle but you saw how dangerous he was. The others are here too."

"I... I've met Wildcard."

Brimstone's head whipped around to me, eyes containing a concern and a fury. I hopped back from the bars like I'd suddenly seen Barb appear behind him, the anger catching me off guard. My nervous feelings flying up. Shivering and feeling so weak, I tried to force myself to sit down again.

"Wildcard? That maniac? You are lucky to be alive. Where?"

I told him, explaining the incident with the meeting and later on with Sunny, my tone low and without much spark in it, something I knew Brim spotted. But his eyes narrowed as he heard how Wildcard was working with My Master to some extent too. Clearly the notion that the 'Big Four' and the slavers were further in league was not a happy one to him.

"He is one of the more dangerous, as much as Barb could be, for sure. I don't know how Shackles managed to secure him to do anything. Took me beating his face into a rock eight times over two months before he finally saw me as leader and did what he was told. Nasty sod. The power of a combat unicorn with the body of an earth pony and one fucked up mind that didn't give two flying shits about pain or danger. You avoid him, Murk. Don't ever try to predict him or trick him."

"D-do you think he'll be in the Pit?" Quaking, I rubbed one leg with my hoof.

"Almost certainly. If he knows I'm in, he'll be there. This is still a fight, aye, but Shackles will try to make it an execution."

I hesitated a second, but part of me was curious. Raising my voice up, tiny in front of his deeper tone, "Who were the others? The Big Four, I mean?"

As though realising he was resigned to not much but me to talk to about his past, Brimstone rolled out his neck and settled back, looking rather grim.

"Barb was the youngest of them... but he had his uses in ways I'm sure you know well enough. Wildcard was too dangerous to not let be in charge, he'd been a warband chieftain long before, with his own drugged-up crazy lot. The others?"

He scratched his chin with a hoof, the chains clanking.

"Well, not all were ponies. Had a great big minotaur. Big Brutus, we called him. Wandered into the camp one day and challenged me. Right out of the damn blue. Tough fucking fight. Couldn't make him anything but one of the four after that."

Big Brutus!?

"I... I met him too!"

The look on Brimstone's face was almost funny in its sudden look of surprise.

"M-Master Grindstone has a minotaur called that! His bodyguard! He even chased me once... he was at that meeting too, all, um... cy... cyba... cybamentinic! Like, robot arms!"

I waved my front legs about a little, as though trying to demonstrate what I meant, before realising how silly that seemed from the lack of any change on Brim's face and pulling myself back in. A little slave instinct told me to quit drawing attention to myself. Guttled inside, I couldn't quite beat it back down.

"Cybernetics? Sounds like him. Always was pretty determined to find a way to make himself stronger than me. Wildcard may have challenged more times but that was just for fun to him. Brutus was the real leadership challenger I had my eye on to probably someday put me down. Following Grindstone though? That doesn't make any sense... Big Brutus hated being led. Those enhancements must have done something to his brain."

Brimstone snorted again, flipping my mane backwards to expose my forehead and that accursed scar. I tried to snort back when I corrected it, but simply sounded akin to a filly's sneeze.

"Probably a good thing, he's better off not being ambitious anyway. But he was already a nightmare for those before him, with bionics he would be a fell foe indeed."

"So, who was the last?"

An odd look came about him.

"The last... now there was an interesting pony. Not a straight up fighter, but he was the one who kept us all going. Clan that big? Needs somepony who can know where to get the food, the kit, and where's good to go and chib when we needed something. Fancy-thinking stallion called Rough Diamond who dealt with all that and who got what. Well, once me and the others got their choices from any loot, anyways. Even raiders have a bit of organisation, and he was the one who did it."

I was suddenly sat wide-eyed. Glimmer's memory had had a stallion she'd called 'Diamond' in the time before the raiders attacked!

Oh no... oh no...

"Basically, Diamond would go out, find out what he could as a trader, and then bring us in when he felt the time was right. Sometimes even open a gate from inside if Barb wasn't around to do it. No pony fucked with him, even if he was a piss-poor little wee thing for fighting by raider standards. Cos' if you did, you had me to break your skull. He was too valuable; intelligent minds don't often find raider clans."

Do I tell him? Do I ask? He hadn't mentioned Glimmer, he'd said he wasn't involved in Creaky Hollow's destruction when they destroyed Coral's home! Oh, I didn't know. I had to be vague, find out more before I risked causing another incident here.

"Is... is he at the Pit?"

Brimstone shook his head.

"Nah. He's long dead now. When I got to Creaky Hollow I found him among the bodies. Happens sometimes, got a new raider up soon after but we were caught by Red Eye within days so it doesn't matter. Always was an odd stallion, Diamond. Never quite fitted in with us, little sassnach, I used to call him."

"A what?"

Brimstone blinked, before chuckling in that gravelly deep voice.

"Lowland born. Wee of body and flighty of tone. Quiet and not like us, he'd sit off or go elsewhere when the brutal shit started. Probably why he often got trusted by settlements more than any of us, with that silver tongue of his. Got on well with him, probably the only one I didn't expect to backstab me. Made me wonder what his game was being in a raider clan, sometimes."

Brimstone rubbed his chin.

"Whatever, he's maggot food now. The Goddesses can judge him for the liar he was. Right now I only need to think on what they will think of me. That's what I've really been thinking on. Whatever happens tomorrow, if I were to die in a Pit of rage and violence in front of ponies who would see my life ending as justice... is that enough for the Goddesses above?"

There it was. What sounded like curiosity, but I could hear the tone of fear underneath. Not a fear of anything bad or scary, but a fear of himself and with what the Goddesses would see in this brutal figure for his life. But that was a lot to think on. Rough Diamond was one of the Big Four! It was starting to come together, or was it? I hardly knew the full tale.

Looking up, seeing Brimstone, I had enough things to concentrate on right now rather than something I couldn't change as he spoke.

"I cannot ever allow the rage to take me again, no matter what happens. I have done enough damage by letting the Dragon roam free. Even if it robs me of my fighting spirit, I will not fall to that ever again."

"The Goddesses are kind, Brim. You helped me and—"

"Is it enough? Go to the wastes and watch every fucking settlement be afraid of me. Look at the fifty-plus years of killing, torturing, looting, raping, and burning that I caused upon hundreds of lives. At all the slaves in here because I sold them in. That's all I wonder, when is it enough? At what point will I be forgiven and at what point I could forgive myself for what I am? Just a rage-filled old pony with a life of death behind him."

Brimstone sighed.

"I cannot allow that rage to control me again... not for anything. For fighting or for anger... never again."

Once more, we went a little silent as I curled up near the bars to stay in the shadows. I never knew the words to say that would help things... so the most I could do was simply be there to listen to him. However Brimstone turned to look down and toward me, softening his face.

"Murky, you grew up with the Goddesses in your belief, didn't you?"

"Y-yes. My mother taught me it. S-she said that where she grew up they all believed it."

"What..." He paused. "What do they do after you die, Murk? On the eve of a great challenge, I have to ask. What does this faith of yours tell is judged for a pony when they fall?"

Shifting to sit up, I blinked a few times and rambled through my patchy memory to try and recall it. I remembered the prayers through repetition and desperation, but what happened after death wasn't something I'd thought on in a long long time.

"Well, m-my mother told me that it was like a rush? A release?" Taking a breath, I felt a few memories pick up, words of wisdom on the mercy of the Goddesses. "That as it happens... as life ends and the darkness comes to your vision, it will flow around your senses and leave you as you were dying, awaiting the peace to soothe any pain."

My voice began drifting, closing my eyes. Imagination of it all beginning to soar and truly remember my mother's teachings.

"A moment of calm to reflect on that it has happened alone. You will be left to your dying moment for reflection before the Goddesses above, mighty Celestia or watchful Luna, will come from on above to stand by you. As the world recedes like a silver fading veil they will be there to comfort and ease your passing when they carry you into the great sky as mercy for your lived hardships."

The world had faded to just Brimstone and myself. His presence was easy to hear with my eyes closed, clearly sitting and thinking on it.

"There, when they have arrived where the sun and the moon spiral eternally... they will turn to you, and... either one or the other will speak. Asking you about the life you have led and you will answer truthfully, for they know lies from honesty. It takes as long as it takes, until they have heard all. It is not judgement, but simply a process before they will lead you to a new place in peace. What you tell of your own life will no doubt make you think and change before you are left under their watchful rule in a new world."

I sniffed, wiping an eye.

"Some place out of reach from all chains of birth, far beyond the stars in a place not so different to the world you know. You might see the same lands you remember, or maybe your home, but it is where past and present might be reunited through a new journey you shall take to find the friends and family you left behind within a better world than what you left. To seek them out and be together again after your escape. That's what she told me, I mean, I... I think..."

Bowing my head, I leaned on the bars, hearing Brimstone shift. Softly, one of his giant limbs reached through to settle around me. The moment it touched me, I couldn't help but flinch and jump. Gritting my teeth and feeling guilty, I fought past the my shattered nerves to not pull away. A friend, Murky... a friend.

"Aye, then they shall hear my life and look sternly upon my brow, but I shan't hide from them. Thank you, Murk. No matter what tomorrow brings, if it has to happen I will gladly tell my life at their behest."

Without much indication, he drew over a small bowl of the rank food they'd handed him. Too small for his needs, but he slipped it through to me.

"You need this more than I do. Go on."

Looking up at the big raider with wide eyes, I pushed myself into his awkward embrace through the bars. Under the quiet time of rest in this early morning amongst the Mall, interrupted only by the sobs and moans from various cells, I just lay shivering beside him at the bars and finishing the food he had given up for me.

"I don't want anything to happen to you in there, Brim..."

"What happens, happens. Glimmerlight will always be there for you. If it's time for me to meet the Goddesses, then I shall still look upon you all from on high. Now go, Murky. Glim needs you just as much as you need her."

I didn't go immediately, but spent time shivering and trying to wish I could rest there without being eventually spotted. Only when the clatter of keys in locks signalled a slaver patrol coming near was I finally forced to break away and creep back to my own cell.

Behind me, lowly from the cell, I could almost have sworn I heard that deep voice of his murmuring unsure words.

A prayer.

"This has all happened before, Murky. Don't you worry."

Glimmer reached across and gently ruffled my mane with a thin smile. We were sitting in the back of our cell. My belongings had been left there. Allegedly, Blunderbuck had retrieved them from storage when My Master had rid his office of them. My journal, PipBuck, saddlebag, and the statuette Unity had given me at least anyway. Anything else was either in the armoury or storage chambers. My fleece, I had heard, was beyond repair after being used as a cleaning rag by My Master. The sting of loss for that warm companion I'd had to hide my pitiful wings since my first attempt ran deep.

The statuette, I hadn't dared look at. I'd simply stored it in my saddlebag. It didn't truly mean what it used to anymore.

As such, possessing my journal again, I'd sat staring at a blank page, not sure what to draw. Or even if I could.

Truth was, I was being quiet and still. So much so I was sure Glimmerlight was rather concerned at my mental state. I didn't blame her, seeing the slave instead of the pony, the slave who'd sought the only choice he could ever make not a few hours ago.

"R-really?"

"Oh yes." She nodded. "Brimstone's been through the Pit three times now. Four if you include where you met him. Every time he had to fight. Every time he completely destroyed them. Brim'll be... okay."

I heard a hesitation, it was fairly obvious what it was. Brimstone had faltered, fallen back into the murderous pony he'd been once more. Biting my lip, I sat up and turned away from my journal to more properly face her.

"Are, um, you okay, though?" My voice sounded raspy. Truth be told I was feeling quite weak of limb and dizzy. Only scant thought to not make things worse than I had already was keeping me from trying to show how badly I could feel that... thing swelling in my lungs.

Glimmerlight kept smiling, but only with her mouth. Eventually, seeing me looking up, her ears drooped and her head dipped. Like a mask falling off, I saw just how hurt she was from what had happened.

"He... he hit me. Just to get me out of the way. It didn't hurt, not like a strike, but he just threw me aside. He's never done that. I haven't seen him like that since... well, y'know?"

Her hoof lazily gestured to her small bag of memory orbs before she lay back against the sofa, hissing in pain from her whipped back before settling on her haunches.

"Brim killed all those ponies, Murky. Just slaughtered them, defenceless and just trying to stay out the way. Not every pony in here is evil! They didn't deserve that, I knew a few of them by name from bringing us food! Ponies like Blunderbuck could have been in there. Folks like him are just good ponies in a bad place with no way out, the same as us. I..."

She sniffed, wiping her eyes.

"I want to forgive him, but it's just turning into an urge. To reach for an orb and just... let it go. Go back to only remembering him as he was. Emotions clashing with temptation. An addiction of sorts, making me weak. Sorry, I've not been as happy as I like to be lately."

Picking up my blanket, I huddled up beside her, placing it over her back as much as my own. Brimstone had told me to be there for her and though I would have done it even without his wishes, I wasn't about to let him down. All the same, Rough Diamond was a harsh topic, one I didn't want to bring up lightly, yet one that bore down upon me. The stallion who she thought she'd loved was nothing more than Brimstone's raider spy taking advantage of Glimmer's casual nature. No wonder Coral Eve was angry.

But I had to believe for Glimmer, believe that she could come past this, find the truth, and put an end to that chapter of her life. It was for those reasons I picked up her bag of orbs before sitting beside her too.

"If... if you're feeling bad about wanting to use orbs and get rid of things, maybe do the opposite? M-maybe trying to find out more will h-help you distract yourself and... and come closer to working through it?"

She looked weakly at me, then at the orbs piled in her bag. Then she giggled and laughed, trying to force it through the hurt on her face.

"So if this one's another tonsil tennis session, you'd be alright? You seemed a little flustered last time, maybe if it was a certain unicorn we know..."

I simply sat quietly, before I realised that was humour. Was I really so numb to the core that I couldn't even recognise a tease from Glimmer? Letting her words run through my head again, seeing her concern, I felt the harsh pang of reality hit home. I doubted I'd ever think of who she'd meant the same way again.

"Oh... um... I don't think she'd ever—"

"Pfft, who said she?" Glimmerlight pushed a grin through a split dry lip that had long gone without enough moisture. Looking up, she saw me blink and only get it after a few seconds, before giving a knowing wink as I baulked.

"I... I... uh, um... mares!"

"Sure, lil'bro, sure..."

Leaving me to have my mind racing on the words to tell her that I liked mares (Honest! Really!), I saw her digging around the little glowing spheres. How she told the difference between orbs was beyond me, I just saw colours. But then it was her talent after all. Laughing as I blushed and hugging me tight with a kiss to the forehead, I could do little but appreciate the kind gesture. It reminded me of better things about contact between two ponies when my mind was fighting the hateful imagination of something much more vile.

"Th-thanks..." My voice felt weak while she dug out an orb.

"Hey, I may be the gal who is more than happy to tease the clothes off somepony, but I know more when someone's hurting, Murky. Just... just try to not think about it." She lifted the orb in her magic, a pale pink sparkling one. "Let's just drift away for a bit, alright? Go someplace else, fight another battle to find out what really happened. Forget about the one we're losing in here. That sound better?"

Gently, feeling my emotions on a knife edge as they were right now, I nodded. It did sound good, being able to see another life and pretend I wasn't a pet slave for a while...

Settling down beside me, keeping the blanket over us, Glimmerlight brought the orb between us before her horn's light from telekinesis shimmered and grew.

"Just let go for a while. You need the break, Murky..."

Things didn't change much.

In the world I'd left I was snuggled under a blanket with my sis', but the feeling didn't disappear as I felt myself enter a larger and stronger body than my own. Somepony was still snuggled into me.

Murmuring happily, Glimmer opened her eyes to find she was huddled up under a blanket outdoors under the night sky. Well, the dark clouds in calm weather anyway. The light wind with the night's chill was positively refreshing after the stuffy and furnace-like atmosphere of Fillydelphia, the clean air filling my lungs as she breathed gently.

Huddled up with her was an earth pony, Rough Diamond.

A strange sensation, for sure. I wanted to tense up yet she only relaxed further. He lifted drowsy eyes in return and offered a warm smile.

"Hey there, my pink dream." His informal and smooth voice cooed out, stroking her side. "We've got hours yet till dawn, y'can sleep if y'want..."

"Nah," Glimmer rubbed her eyes with a hoof, before toying with his thick brown mane and giggling, "I'm happy just here. Never was one for lying around. Better to be up and active. Fixing something, doing one of a dozen little things I know. Jack of all trades, I can be, when I want to. Just get bored easily."

"What like?"

"Oh everything, helping with the crops, prospecting the hills, learning to shoot with my mouth, how to cook, or even just playing with all sorts of technology. Oh, and massage, can't forget massages, I know that too."

I felt her eyebrows wiggle, making Diamond laugh.

"I'll have to remember that one someday! Be more comfortable on a bed though, such a pity you're not allowed to take me there. I'd love to see this peaceful place you talk highly of. Maybe meet your friends, Coral Eve and her son? They sound lovely."

Glimmerlight lightly tapped him on the head with her hoof.

"You know fine I can't until I bring them around to you, hun. I could say the same in return for your caravan."

Diamond rolled his eyes. "Yes, yes. But really, that's not a good idea. They don't like folks seeing their full stock, you know? We have to maintain some degree of our secrecy. Plus, the boss is... well, to put it simply, I'm the good guy while he's the one who hashes out the really tough deals, let's just say. Doesn't take no for an answer."

"Sounds like a swell stallion." Glimmer muttered sarcastically, stretching as she got up. I could see her eyes dart towards somewhere in the woods for only a second while Diamond's back was turned, probably the location of Creaky Hollow, but the thick woods even when dead hid the dull spotlights they used to see. "You traders should be careful though, our scouts spotted a huge raider warband in the area yesterday. They say that it might be him. The Dragon."

Rough Diamond got up, walking to the edge of the hill they'd chosen to lie upon and placing a hoof over her shoulder.

"Don't y'worry about me and the boys, love. We know how to avoid them, good caravan drivers can outrun anypony on foot if we've got a mind to, and we've got enough firepower to see them off. Like my trusty little piece over there."

He nodded toward his pack, where a bolt-action rifle lay propped against a tree. Even I with all my unknowing of weapons and specifics could see it was very well maintained, despite clearly being remade a few times from various woods and metal pieces. The stock of the gun bore a chipped-in symbol of his cutie mark. Presumably just to identify it as his. Glimmerlight's eyes ran all the way from one end to the other and I could feel the approval on her face at the fine piece.

"I had noticed. I'd ask to take a few shots, but the timberwolves go after sound around these woods. Still, you should let me toy with her. Take her home for a bit and I'll give her a work over and upgrade for you in exchange for some orbs, maybe?"

Diamond laughed, pulling his mouth closer to her ear and whispering, "Not a chance. She's the other love of my life and I don't think she likes threesomes or swings the same way you do."

Glimmer snorted and laughed, playfully pushing his head away with a hoof.

"Aah, ya silly buck. Keep her all to yourself then, just wait till she desperately needs to go to some war and you'll wish your pal Glim had given her the once over with Steel Ranger trained techniques! Give me a good platform and I'll make her something incredible. But really... take it safe out there. Those raiders were awful close to the main roads out of here. You get that boss of yours to stay clear of them and stick to the hills, it's safer there."

Diamond nodded a few times as she spoke. "Don't worry, he listens to me. I've... well, I've been trying to talk him into a few things lately. Honestly, he's big and nasty, but sometimes I feel there's something else in there. He's a pony you could trust to do something. I dunno... no one else seems to see it but I keep thinking he's got another side under all the anger that makes him deal so harshly. Heck, he took me in, and the trade caravans are usually all about the stern merciless dealers, y'know?"

Glimmer nodded, leaning forward to kiss him on the cheek. "I don't imagine you get to be in charge if you can't recognise somepony's worth. Like, gauge them at a glance. Hell, I do that too sometimes! Just instead of gauging the size of your capability I gauged the size of your pe—"

"Heeey!" A smirk as he playfully butted in.

"Whaaaaat? I was gonna say personality." An innocent look.

"Sure." A deadpan stare.

"Honest!" A bright smile.

"P" and "e" don't even sound the same for 'personality' compared t'what you said." A rise of his eyebrows as he leaned in.

A few seconds passed of them looking at one another, before I felt Glimmer's mouth unable to avoid jerking and giggling... before both just burst into laughter.

"Ah, Glim. Hahaha! You know, I've been to a dozen villages over the years, met a good few mares along the way, I admit. Not that you're one to talk."

She seemed to shake out her mane proudly. No shame at all. "Live life to have fun. Wasteland's bad enough, why not have a beautiful moment between two ponies who just want to forget it all for a bit?"

He smiled. "Yes, good times with many, but I don't think I've met any as downright fun or interesting as you. I admit, I look forward to coming here every time. I don't mind admitting that I wouldn't perhaps overlook asking that when the trades are done if you could see about me coming to live, y'know... permanently? Part of me wants out of this trade, find someplace quiet to get away from the harsh life it entails. Things you see... I think I'm just wanting out of it."

Glimmer seemed a little taken aback. I felt her front hooves trying to hide the little nervous pacing they made.

"Well, I'm not going beat about the bush here, Diamond. I'm not a mare who's used to the whole 'settling' with one person, y'know? At least yet! I'm young, free, and I left that stuffy bunker to live without order and rules. Go wherever, live however, eat whatever, love whoever. To just go out and do what I wanted while I could, until the time came to think about anything more. But, all the same, it'd be nice to have you around, y'know?"

She smirked. Truth be told, I had to feel even a little happy to see the playful teases until I remembered who this was she was speaking to. That Diamond was seeking any way he could to get that village location out of her! He really was a master at this, his face looked genuine!

"I'd love that. Now, I've got to go in a few hours, so let's get something to eat and see about making a trade for some of those orbs, huh?"

Glimmer nodded, trotting toward their discarded packs for the brief meeting in the woods.

"Yeah, I've been running low lately, lots of things to get out! Better out than in, right? But here, first? I got you something..."

She began to rummage in her pack, watching Diamond for a second to take in the shocked surprise at this gift. Slowly, she drew out a long bullet. The tip of it glowed light blue from a soldered and filed down rough join. It reminded me of the things she'd stuck on the end of her rifle during the battles against Barb's raiders but in a much more condensed form, to be fired from the gun instead.

"Glimmer... what is this? It'll fit in my rifle, I know..."

"My own personal little creation! Learned how to do so from my father, it's a small magic charge stored in the tip of a bullet drawn from a targeting talisman on a high powered energy rifle. Basically, using spark connectors to channel the magic energy from it into a new small talisman that I then solder to the end of a bullet casing. Simply put, it's your wonderbullet!"

She floated it over to him with her magic, Rough Diamond taking it in his hooves.

"Glim... this, I mean... you're giving me it?"

She laughed, bopping him on the head.

"Course I am, you silly thing! Now it's channelled with the power and accuracy of a high intensity energy weapon's targeting system spell, so it'll fly truer than any bullet you've got and detonate on striking. They're impractical as hell because the stuff they come from is so rare and often put to better use elsewhere. So if you ever fight anything too tough to kill, anything that's got you on the ropes and about to stop you coming back to give me a welcome home buck in the woods? This'll bring you back to me safe the one time it matters."

It wasn't often I heard Glimmerlight being truly sentimental and heartfelt about even a loose relationship, but even I felt moved by this. Her way of showing that even if she was never going to properly settle right now, she wanted him to stay safe, to return to her. He simply stared at it for a few seconds.

"That's... a first. Somepony giving me something. You never see that with the boys..."

Glimmerlight grinned brightly, rubbing her nose against his. Heehee! That tickled! Stop it sis', come on!

"Just come back safe and I'll have a chat with Coral about seeing what I can do for when you decide to come join us and disappear from the world for a while."

Leaning inward, I felt her lips graze his.

"I'll make it happen, you deserve a break. Trust me, it'll be absolutely stormin'!"

Her mouth pressed in further, working hard with her lips as they fell to the floor and snuggled, the blanket being drawn over even as I felt myself begin to leave her body, life and memory...

So this was confirming it. He was finding a way to get himself into the village in order to know its location for Brimstone's clan. What a weasel!

With the thought of what he would do to her eventually in these orbs, I could feel my heart break even now for my poor friend.

The feeling of being snuggled was still there even as I came to with Glimmer, even tighter than I remembered. Warmer... closer... rougher coat...

Wait... what?

"Morning, sunshine!" Wildcard singsonged.

There was a half second pause... before both Glimmer and I screamed in shock at the large raider snuggled in between us under the blanket. What... what I... WHAT!? Glimmer fell off her side of the sofa, thumping against the floor while I somehow found the body energy to propel myself up and over the back of the sofa, my kicking legs disappearing to fall in a heap upon the other side.

I heard Wildcard lounge back and yawn, had he been sleeping there!?

"Aah they always do that, so come on! Today's the day! It's today!"

Glimmer and I found each other around the side of the sofa, her covering me against him while the crazed raider shifted and turned to sit up on the sofa, stretching. Mid yawn, I saw those scars on his face twist and do strange things to the shape of his mouth and snout. Running his cracked hooves through his multicoloured mane he got to his hooves.

"It's early evening." Glimmerlight muttered to him, slowly trying to back up toward the way to the front door.

Wildcard cocked his head.

"How do you know that?"

"What? It was late morning earlier and we weren't out for long in that orb so—"

"Do you know you were only out for a little time? What if it was... ooh!" He gasped, a hoof to his mouth. "What if it was a year? How do you know with nothing to prove it? Perhaps it was two days? Huh? Huh? Only makes sense right?"

He hesitated, before narrowing his eyes and trotting forward. Backed against the wall, too weak to do anything, we simply had to shiver and wait as he came right up close, looking directly at Glimmerlight. Suddenly, he sniffed sharply... then took a long sniff along her mane. I felt Glimmer aching to hit him before she jumped when he let his tongue lap out and lick up her cheek.

"Ahaaa!" Licking his lips as though tasting something, Wildcard leaned back and clapped his hooves. "I thought it was you! I remember you, little missy... just needed to get the tongue going to remember!"

"Of course, you're the bastard that burned our village!" Her muscles tensed. I could feel how hard she wanted to attack him, but he was far beyond either of us.

His eyes glinted, face twisting into a more predatory glee. "Aw, c'mon I can't take all the blame. That's arrogant you know? You being a yesman-pony-mare-thing? I don't like yesmen! But you got in on the action too, I knooooow... it was fun wasn't it? The houses screamed! I hadn't known a house could scream, I thought they were just a house..."

"Those were my friends! You locked them inside to burn!"

Wildcard paused for a second, before laughing outrageously and slapping her clean from her hooves. I went with her, Glimmer's hooves around me meaning I fell upon her chest. Before I knew it, Wildcard was leaning over us, going from laughing to snarling with drool leaking through his broken lips.

"I was having fun remembering it, you bitch! The HOUSES screamed! I didn't want it spoiled that it wasn't the houses! FUCK YOU!"

His horn glowed, one of those brutal machetes sliding from his side sheaths. Frozen in fear, I just clutched Glimmer whom I felt tensing, somewhere between anger and terror.

"I swear, every time you folks just think you know better, you gotta go ruin a pony's dreams, huh!? You get off on it or somethin'? Can you scream like a house? I want to hear the scream the houses made!"

He got off us, spinning the machete before immediately hacking into one arm of the sofa, sending stuffing flying everywhere. Screaming his head off, laughing and then wailing again. Finally, when the arm of the chair had been destroyed under the torrent of slices, he turned to us and grinned.

"You hear it? Did you hear that? That was so cool!"

Glimmerlight almost seemed to growl lowly.

"You're insane... what do you even want!?"

"Hey, hey!" He trotted up, pointing a hoof. "You think you can order me around like some fucking slave, huh? You think you got something that says you get to order me to answer? Cos' this is my world..."

His eyes opened, going wide and letting his mouth hang open... looking down at me before letting his muzzle glance upwards toward Glimmerlight, viewing every side of her head.

"Cos' I remember your scream. I don't cut it out of my head, no..."

There was a chill to his words, a deliberate choice. I felt for Glimmer, I really did. What I'd been through at the hands of Barb's portion of the raider clan couldn't have been anything to what the raiders likely did to her. How did Coral even stay sane without stripping memories?

"What do you even want, Wildcard?" Glimmerlight spat the words back, I could feel she was fighting not to hit him. I wasn't surprised. But Wildcard blinked a few times and sat back.

"Oh, now you ask politely. Well why didn't you say so? It's cool, I'll forgive you, big pot of forgiveness I am! I'm just here to be nice and give you a little heads up spoiler for my Pit." He nodded frantically. "Oh yes... just to tell you, the big red guy isn't gonna come back, y'know? Oh he's in for a good fiiiight... Shackles and I had like, this bonding session over all the fighters! He's got goooood taste."

He winked at us.

"Besides, I've got my own little surprise even he doesn't know. A wildcard, get it? Haha! Bet you can't guess who it is!"

"I wonder." Glimmerlight glanced to the door, lightly bumping me toward it. I'd been sat silent, simply listening and shivering quietly. Something about him felt more unsettling than normal, like some part of me was repulsed by him being even near me. I simply retreated into my own blank slave mentality. Just don't notice me, please.

"Well, don't guess cos' I won't tell! HAH! Anyway, go go go! They're coming to take him there and you don't wanna miss it do ya, little squealer?"

Looking down at me, I yelped and hid behind Glimmer. Wildcard just laughed, trotting away to the door. Waiting a few seconds, Glimmer followed with me in tow. Taking a few seconds to check I was all right, she just found me as I was. Numb and scared. A hoof on my shoulder, she turned to check for Wildcard through the door. Nothing. Good, I hated that pony. I just didn't know when he might decide it was fun to gut me!

"We'll be alright. He's gone now, we can—YARGH!"

Her words were cut off, Wildcard's machete coming streaking through the door in his magic to leave a ghastly slice over her shoulder. Screaming, falling to the ground and clutching the wound, both she and I turned to see him pop his head back in.

"See? You can scream like a house! HAAAAH!"

With that, he turned and pranced away, leaping up to click his hooves together as he left the cell. Pulling all the rags I could off the shelves and helping her to the front of the store, we sat by the door to await the Pit convoy while tying up her shoulder. It wasn't terribly serious... by Fillydelphia standards anyway. All the same, I kept adding rags until I could stop seeing red seeping through. Shivering, sweating, Glimmerlight ruffled my mane.

"I... I think that's enough, Murky..." She breathed out and hissed in pain while I tied a knot in the bandage with my mouth and hooves, feeling my 'slave tooth' as I'd come to know it aching all the more and wobbling in its socket painfully.

Taking a few breaths, she tried to offer a smile.

"I'll be fine. He's crazy. Didn't know what he'd do. Least I can still move it... just hope I can get a potion so it doesn't scar. I don't think the Brim look suits me, huh?"

I sat quietly, nodding. Only after a few seconds did I realise she was being light hearted and tried to force a smile.

"A-are you okay? You know? Like the o-orb?"

Glimmerlight seemed to think for a second, looking across as we saw slavers start to enter. It was time.

"We've got enough worries right now for Brim, Murky. But yes, I'm alright. Just sickened that I slept with and gifted a damned raider. I think it's obvious to see how this is going to end. But... thanks for helping me, Murky. I'm not sure I could do it without somepony here."

"H-huh?" I didn't understand.

"For sharing the journey like you— argh!" She adjusted her bandages, before trying to smile to me. "Like you promised. They've hurt you bad, but you're still the pony I know deep down who doesn't forget the promises he makes. Without somepony there I, well, I think I'd not do another one."

"I'm so sorry it's bad, sis'."

"Me too, Murky." She sat back silently, before her unhurt front leg went to her forehead. "I just feel like such a fool, so concerned about my own pleasure and fun that I didn't even see what was right in front of my eyes. I watch these memories and I just want to... to— fucking hell why can't I ever learn?"

As sudden as that, it was like a tidal wave of emotion coming from her.

"I wanted so bad just to live this free life of loving who I wanted and going where I wanted! But there's always somepony going to take advantage of it and now it's landed me in this fucking city! All because I didn't realise he was a damn raider! Coral even warned me and I... I just kept it up! Oh, Murky. We need to get out, I don't think I can live here forever knowing what it was I did that brought so many ponies in to die here! It's the curse of memory. Forget your mistakes and you're always doomed to make them again."

"I, um, I... it might not be all that? M-maybe there's something else? Maybe you did figure him out but they stumbled upon it anyway! Maybe, uh, you just removed it to forget that he'd fooled you at all before?"

I was grasping at straws, I knew. She was in some state, so the best I could do was simply trot forward and put my hooves around my big sister best friend forever and remind her that she wasn't alone.

Not that we had much time for a moment of bonding.

"Right, slaves! This wretched break day is here as declared by Red Eye in his eternal 'wisdom.' You will all be back before noon tomorrow."

My Master limped in. He was still caked in his own blood, limping with one leg in a splint while covered in bandages around his head. A huge rib compression vest was around his body. Brimstone had really gone to town, but My Master, like his chain, was eternal. He would always manage to find the way to get back to command. Seeing us leave our cell, he only grinned at us.

"Don't think you're getting off to visit that Pit, you've still got a shift left to run!"

Glimmerlight stepped before me, wiping her eyes and stepping up in my defence. As I'd learned lately, hurt ponies that cared were more willing than any.

"No he doesn't! Red Eye has declared a break and all up to date slaves can take it!"

"I wasn't talking to him, whore! I was ordering you!" He roared, striding forward and knocking me aside to shove her toward a group the slavers were organising. "You've been sick too many times to avoid shifts that you've quite the backlog to make up for. If you wanted to watch your raider 'friend' then perhaps you should have thought about that!"

"H-HEY!" She shouted, trying to move past him before being blocked off by the slavers, Wormtail included with his smug grin. "Murky! Don't go to the Pit! Not alone! Don't go off alone, please!"

I knew why she didn't want me going alone.

I knew why all of my friends thought that. That thought stung me hard, like they weren't trusting me. With good reason, I concluded.

But I felt a hoof on my shoulder, soft and gentle.

"I'll take him."

Bruised, swollen of lip and beaten badly, Coral Eve had limped beside me, returning from her own wearying shift. I saw Glimmer look somewhat surprised and grateful.

"You? Why? To watch Brimstone have to go through it? To watch how they try to kill—"

"I'm not going for that beast, Glimmer! Don't put words in my mouth. I'm going for Murky. The raider can die for all I care after what he did, but I'm not after vengeance. No, I won't let Murky wander off to think bad thoughts." She leaned down, turning away from a somewhat shocked Glimmer. "We love you, Murky. But we're worried about you, please understand we can't take chances."

I looked to Glimmer, I looked to Coral, before I finally nodded, trying to fight back a couple of tears. She was right. I felt so hollow, abused, and violated that the thought of where I'd be taken at noon tomorrow was still scarcely sinking in.

"O... okay."

"Good, my dear." She looked back to Glimmerlight, receiving at least a thankful and forgiving slow nod. At least when it came to me, they could for once agree.

Behind us, I heard a great commotion. Shouting orders and shock rods sparking, I saw them dragging and leading Brimstone Blitz from his own cell, ready for the Pit. His hooves were shackled thickly with massive weights while the burliest slaves grasped him tightly. The chains were so tight that he could not do anything more than simply hobble and shift inch by inch. Clearly, even at the risk of a slow and impatient journey, they were not taking any risks.

While My Master set to ordering the slaves yet to finish their shifts, I saw Wormtail sneer and begin to trot up to Brimstone.

"Sooo, the big nasty tough warlord, stripped of his dignity, eh?"

It was a pale imitation of My Master, the scrawny and weasel-like buck simply being a cocky little shi... um... yes, that word. Brimstone merely stayed silent, lowering his eyebrows at the irritating aid before him.

"Thought you were so big to go on a rampage? Well who was it that stopped you, eh? Me! You know why? Cos' you're just soft now. The Dragon's been de-clawed, that one little stupid buck is enough to make him start caring! Now look at you, aaaall in chains..."

He edged close, leering.

"I'll bet you wanna hit me, don't ya? Well get used to this, because you're our slave. Get used to not doing anything! You can look down and act all tough but you're trapped! Your hooves are chained on the floor, go on and move em! Try it! You can't hurt me, I'm one of your masters now! You can't do any—"

Brimstone headbutted him.

Slowly, the slavers looked to one another, to Brimstone, and then to the splayed out and unconscious figure of Wormtail, before simply shrugging and leading Brim away without a single punishment.

Okay. Even in these dark days, that made me laugh inside.

The fanfare and explosive sound of the Pit was like an old hated fear coming far too cleanly back to my mind.

In a convoy, we had been marched toward it through the dense smog of the city cooling off its infernos for a day of rest. The toxic stink was heightened, steam gushing from holes in the ground around us to mark the extinguished furnaces and forges. Marching past the FunFarm gates, I had seen that hateful Pinkie Pie cut-out still waving with that creaky hoof perpetually. It seemed to be welcoming me home. Once past the Petting Zoo and rollercoaster, we were directed toward the colossal ice rink and split up into various queues.

A building of wood and concrete, gaudy pink paint peeled from all sides and hung with long dead party lights. It rose tall, with massive gated entrances for the crowds and smaller ones on either side for, presumably, staff back in the old Equestrian times. The light from within lit the clouds above as huge floodlights aimed both in and out of the open-topped roof.

Around me, relieved and excited slaves met apprehension with bloodthirsty anticipation. Cheers, whoops, and great roars from those already inside being worked up by an announcer boomed across the FunFarm and hurt my ears enough that I clung to Coral while we limped inside. Slavers met us, far more than had been here last time. The tall sides for the stands were littered with makeshift guard posts bearing long rifle equipped guards watching every area of the crowd. Red Eye was taking no chances of another riot after last time, preferring to shove and push us onward to specified places rather than allow us free reign to choose our own entrance.

Even as we were thrown and forced into the tall gateway, I felt my body clench with familiar fear. Last time, I'd been in chains to be sent to my death. The sweaty and filthy bodies pressed around us only kept me uncomfortable and feeling much the same way.

"Once you are past the gates you will not leave until the event is finished! All slaves are to remain within the Pit's grounds until we move you out!"

Calls and instructions were shouted from above, over the entrance tunnel I saw a unicorn with a loudspeaker standing upon an old security balcony.

"There is a shoot to kill policy in effect for any misbehaviour by the order of Red Eye himself."

The entranceway widened, brightening up as the interior lights flickered over the inside ringed corridor that ran under the stands and around the entire Pit. Old stands of confectionery, fast food, and souvenirs littered every side beside symbols for toilets and foal changing facilities. But most surprising of all to me? It was all in use.

Slavers and even slaves had taken them over to offer their wares and acquired foods or goods from their own stocks. The toilets apparently worked, while the Roamer slaver bar had brought a portion of its drinks for purchase from those lucky enough to still own any caps. Slaves flocked around me, watched from above by griffons amongst the rafters that held up the stands, buying and selling frantically in a whirlwind of excitement before the event. Above me in the stands, I could hear ponies stamping their hooves and crying out in time with the counts of the announcer. The entire ring of the corridor around the Pit was a flurry of activity.

Amongst it all, I felt very small indeed.

Already, I could feel my chest tighten. This thick air inside wasn't helping me at all. My Master had given me a portion of RadAway before locking me in his office cell to ward off the rising effects from my collar, but under so much stress I was sure that the effects were accelerating every time.

We didn't talk. Coral and I could barely hear each other amongst all the haggling and cheering. I was sure Sooty would be around here somewhere. But our attention was drawn to the biggest stand, a huge twenty foot wide raised platform bearing six ponies that were frantically taking money and only giving pieces of paper in return.

"What is that?" I muttered the words, inaudible to people, but Coral must have seen my curious glance before bending down to my ear.

"It's the betting stand!" Even for my hearing, she had to shout. "That big chalkboard behind them is all the names of ponies involved today. There's two sets of games to come because Red Eye's here to view it and the last one didn't finish!"

Even the reminder of the last one made me shiver when I looked at the chalkboard. My name had been on there once, probably with the lowest odds in Pit history. Ponies had bet caps on the assurance of my death.

Oh Goddesses... I wanted to be sick again.

"They're still adding the name for the second bout, Murky!" Coral shouted again, looking up at it. "But Brimstone is number three on the first set of six. The odds against him are pretty high, word must have got out that Shackles and Wildcard want him dead for sure in there!"

"Hey! Get out my fucking way, you two!"

A heavyset mare was walking right toward us, carrying a betting ticket and placing a heavy bag of caps back on her harness. She shoved right by, knocking both of us apart and sending me to the floor.

"Watch yourself!" Coral cried out after her, receiving nothing but a rude shake of the mane when the mare deliberately ignored her. "You alright, Murky? Sorry, it's so busy in here..."

Getting back to my hooves, I coughed through closed teeth, the reason for that being all too clear when I looked up at Coral and saw her look of shock and sudden smile at what I held there.

The mare's entire bag of caps.

"S-sorry, it's, um, habit?"

"Well, well, well. Good to see you've still got it in you, Murky." She glanced up at the betting board. "Go on then, I know you'll want to."

They laughed when, nervous and stammering, I finally got the proper words out to be heard after waving my little hoof up at the betting platform. I was shoved from the side and made fun of for betting on the 'chosen death' by the 'big guys,' but I just did all I could to tune it out. Something felt wrong about betting on the deaths of others, but if Brim won then it would make life a lot easier to buy supplies for our escape!

At least one pony would be supporting him in the Pit.

That was what friends did? Right?

If the ring corridor beneath was busy and loud... boy I hadn't prepared myself to remember what the stands were like.

I almost fled instantly. The second I saw that cage before me, memories of wailing and begging not to die beside a metal gateway came back all too strong. No longer was her escape from the Pit that hopeful memory and all that was left in my mind was that crippling terror.

This was where ponies died.

This was where I'd been sent to die.

The colossal stands rose to the edge of the ice rink stadium near the roof, open to the cloudy sky above. They were almost completely filled with ponies crammed into a small space for their numbers. Below me, floorboards creaked at the weight when we were shoved and corralled by slavers into a specified area a few rows back from the cage itself. Ponies shunted me from either side until we sat down, even then trapped amongst a sea of bodies that stomped in time, crying illegible chants as one.

A converted ice rink, solid and grey with the ice long gone within the heat of Fillydelphia. Around it lay the cage that ensured combatants could not escape their fate of fighting to the death before ponies in the old stands.

Red Eye had been doing some upping of security, that much was obvious. The cage was repaired since last time, no longer with a roof access as last time. Griffon snipers were more prevalent, nestled in the scaffold framework holding up the roof above us, while guards patrolled up and down the stairways of the stands. Above us, every so often, a Pinkie Balloon reared its freakish watchful face in the gap above as they watched the surroundings. Occasionally, a griffon would swoop overhead and make me flinch. To one side I noticed Red Eye's chair awaiting him upon a raised balcony, already packed with his inner circle. Old Grizzly was visible, the rest being a motley collection of thick and thin, tall and short. One bore what looked like a bird of prey upon his back, chained to his raggedy armour that bore feathers all over it as decoration from a dozen different birds. Another elderly looking pony was actually blind by a rag around his eyes, navigating simply by touch. A couple were immaculate, decked in what looked like pre-war military dress uniform with greased manes and shining newly made rifles at their sides. All curious ponies no doubt acquired for selective skills to Red Eye's usage being treated to this day at the Pit.

I strained to see if I could spot Protégé among them, praying he was recovered. For a moment I thought I saw a black unicorn, but it was a mare bearing a cybernetic jawline and an armoured Stable jumpsuit.

But before me... the Pit.

Stained in blood till its concrete surface was varied in shades of red and grey all over, it lay behind the metal cage with the scars of past battles. Chips from gunshots, tears I recognised as auto axe swipes, and even a few bones shoved into the corners out of the way marked it. Above, twelve barrels were suspended containing weapons or hazards and linked to pressure plates beneath them.

"This is horrible..." I muttered to Coral. "Why are so many ponies here just to watch us all kill one another? I don't get it."

Coral had actually been looking around us to the crowds.

"Well, we're here. I don't imagine some of these ponies are looking to be here for their friends too. But yes, this is a disgusting monument to Red Eye's madness. I can't take his words seriously while this place exists."

Hearing her words, I looked at the crowd near us. There were many grinning and cheering for the fights to begin soon. But every so often I saw some clenched in fear, holding another pony sometimes. My heart went out to them, their friends were in there as well. No matter who survived today, there would be tragedy.

"Workers of Fillydelphia! Upon this day of rest given by our leader, Red Eye, we bring to you a double helping of this popular event!"

Stern's voice boomed across the sound system even as the crowd shouted their enthusiastic approval of this. How? How could they be so miserable and yet immediately find entertainment by this brutality? I wished I could think why, but I just hunkered down on the bench, covering my ears and leaning against Coral. I didn't like this. Too cramped. Too crowded. I needed space. Everything stank of the watered down alcohol the Roamer had brought over and of unwashed ponies crammed in while excited and active.

"But first, will you welcome your master himself. The one who makes this utopia of generosity exist to further our world... Red Eye!"

One shout by Stern and there he was, walking calmly to the balcony watching over the cage. Flanked by two of the mighty green alicorns, his inner circle backed off to allow him room for his seat. By his side I saw that hateful mutt, Winter. Motioning to Stern, he took the microphone.

"My wondrous workers, it is rare I have a chance to address you all so directly, face to face rather than through the impersonal medium of a PA system. I say 'thank you' so many times, but it never quite feels the same. And thus... thank you, for your sacrifice and your willing hearts."

Yeah, right. Even I could make a raggedy little snort about that line. Even if I had to clutch my throat and choke madly afterwards.

"I bring to you a chance for relaxation and for your own entertainment. The Pit is brutal and often tragic, but never forget its purpose as a choice for those who will it, and as a punishment for those who seek to undermine your efforts. Yes, workers. There are those in this world who would take what you have shed blood and sweat for and selfishly destroy it. Let their efforts before you today act as their will to survive and once again prove themselves in your eyes, not mine. With that said, I see no reason to hold your event any longer..."

There was a huge chorus of cheering to his words. Red Eye stood, raising a hoof and seeming to look past all our eyes one by one with a carefully calculated sweep of his head around the audience. Feeling that baleful gaze come upon me, I shrank back. He was my master too. He wanted this to happen, felt it was best to raise his army and punish slaves who got out of line. That made sense, right? He was the one in charge, the one ordering my life from afar, he wouldn't be a master if he didn't know best, right?

My head hurt. I buried it in my hooves even as Coral snorted up at Red Eye and wrapped a hoof around me. Why did free will have to be so complicated? I hated Red Eye, but I felt indentured to abide by his reality inside. Had I fallen so far?

Stern took up the microphone.

"As Red Eye commands, it shall be! Let the Pit event... BEGIN!"

The floor shook. Ponies stomped until my shaky slave tooth was wobbling and my bones seemed to rattle inside my thin chest.

"Our first contender! Hailing from Friendship City, we have Top Quartz! Is she harder than her name's crystal implies? We'll have to find out! Bring her in!"

The gate at the far end of the Pit clanked and slid open to reveal the dark behind. Squinting, I could see various dark shapes behind the scared little mare being shoved out. With the door slamming behind her, I could see the visible terror on her face. She didn't want to be here. Oh Goddesses protect her.

But to get out she'd have to kill six ponies. Looking at the white and grey earth pony below, I could tell she didn't have the heart at all.

"Her opponent, all too appropriately, is from that same statue of the old world! From Friendship City as well we have one disobedient slave that tried to steal food from all of you! This is Toolkit!"

The second gate slid up, a young buck hurled through it after clearly been having fighting to get away from the door. But landing on the concrete with the door closing, he was trapped. Shivering, he stood and looked across to his opponent.

Then the true horror sank in. I could see it in their eyes.

They knew each other.

Trotting forward hesitantly, I could see their mouths moving. This close to the front, I strained my ears to block out the crowd as they shouted over the sound.

"Toolkit! No! I... I thought we'd be put on the same team!"

"I don't know! I just don't know, Tops!"

They were friends. Already, I shivered, my mouth hanging open and trying to form the words to express the evil of this situation. They didn't want to fight, meeting near to the middle, they just looked from side to side, hearing the jeers and demands that they battle to the death. They were looking for a way out, a method to end this without killing the other!

The thunderous boom of an anti-machine rifle echoed around the ice rink, blowing a chunk of concrete near them apart so hard that the shrapnel made them both cry out and wince back.

"Enough delaying. Two will become one for survival in this arena, the crowd has an expectation! If a combatant is not dead within the allotted time limit then both shall die regardless!"

Top Quartz and Toolkit stood around one another, beginning to panic. I couldn't hear them talking, the shakes of their heads. Toolkit began to cry. The crowd brayed for blood from the two who had no wishes to draw any from their old friend.

Gradually, I saw them begin to realise the reality of their situation. After one more warning shot, I saw Top Quartz shouting an apology as she moved forward in a terrified and unwilling charge. It began hesitantly, worriedly, but for every small attempted strike the panic grew and the other began to hit back. Survival slowly overcame friendship as a strike became a grapple and a grapple became a savage fight. Rolling upon the floor, both screaming and lashing out with little skill, I felt my stomach turn.

Neither was a fighter. Neither had any idea how to kill quickly or efficiently. It would be feral, brutal, and slow. One second Toolkit was on top, banging Quartz's head across the concrete. Then she recovered, swinging him over even as her vision was blocked by blood. Hoof after hoof fell, crying and screaming in equal measure.

Toolkit blocked some, lashing out with a snapping sharp hoof that knocked Top Quartz off him. He rolled off, looking at his friend streaming blood from her nose and forehead and clearly hesitating. In that moment, she was back on him, driven wild by need to live that she simply bowled over the scrawny stallion and continued her unskilled gradual killing with beating hooves.

Tears dripped from my own eyes as I heard the distinctive crack of a skull. Toolkit went limp and hazy with blood pooling beneath his head. Toolkit lay very still.

Only then did Quartz fall backward, breathing hard... and scream.

Against her wail of anguish at the sight of her beaten friend by her hooves before her, the crowd picked up in delight. Some threw tickets to the floor while others leapt and whooped!

I heard Coral swear beside me, an unusual sound from her. This was so wrong!

"Our first victor! Survival of the fittest in this Pit, workers! Top Quartz shows her will to survive was greater than that of Toolkit! On to round TWO!"

This was sick. I'd been down there but I'd never seen an actual event in this way. There were ponies enjoying this!

"This time we've got Friendship City's rival Manehattan bringing us a contender! Years of working as a guard in Tenpony Tower led him to venture for a more exciting life in the wastes! Well he found it with Fillydelphia quite by accident! This is Shovels!"

The gate opened, releasing number two. Another stallion, tall and lanky with a filthy dark brown mane. A unicorn this time, he regarded the mourning mare before him with hesitation. Quartz lay over the body of her friend, as though she could bring him back to life by her light sways of his form and tears alone. I sent her and Toolkit's soul every prayer I could remember. Please, Goddesses, descend from on high and put a stop to this madness!

Coral wasn't even looking, averting her eyes in disgust.

Shovels was clearly more willing, as much as he looked aghast at this. The crowd chanted, 'KILL! KILL! KILL!' when they saw Quartz had her back to him, making me wish I could somehow tell them I wasn't with them! I had no wish to be associated with this! If not for Brim...

Using the time, Shovels edged toward a pressure plate, pressed it and immediately leapt clear. A drawn breath amongst the atmosphere while the barrel opened and revealed a long knife falling to bounce off the concrete and drop to the ground. The sound made Quartz turn, blood-soaked face looking on with terror while Shovels picked up the knife in his green magic. Slowly, he shook his head. He was out to live, even if he frowned at how it had to happen. I saw his mouth form the quietly spoken word, too quiet for me to hear. 'I'm sorry.'

It began again, with not a shred of dignity given to Toolkit's bleeding corpse upon the ground. Shovels charged, the knife at the limits of his magic's range while Quartz only waved her hooves in desperation, pleading and screaming for him not to! Before my eyes, no quarter was given, the knife whirled forward and slashed across her chest, drawing a thick bloody stream and an agonised squeal from the mare. A buck beside me screamed almost in my ear, 'GUT HER!'

I squeezed away from him until I was holding Coral tightly. Nearby, I saw two ponies holding each other in tears. No doubt other friends of those in there.

Quartz was not going down without a fight though. Inexperienced as she was, the mare had the guts to rush forward and catch the unicorn off guard. Running past the knife, she went for him until both of them stumbled backwards in a rough wrestling bout. The knife fell nearby as they fell to the ground, Quartz' blood blinding her opponent. Better fighter or not, he couldn't hit back while blind.

Furious and desperate, he rolled her again and again. I saw them nearby to a pressure plate before their next roll carried them right over it. With a clang, the lock on the barrel opened and spilled its contents. I gasped, the bright green radioactive goo (chemical or tainted? I had no way to tell!) erupted forth and led to both fighters diving away to avoid the grim death such a spill would allow. Scrambling away from the fluid gushing over the ground, I saw Shovels take a spill on his hind right leg and scream. Before my eyes, his skin melted away until the clean white of bone was visible even at this distance. His screams only went on and on, clutching at his leg with wide eyes, like he could somehow fix it.

Quartz made use of the time, taking up the knife and limping back to him. Looking upward to her, he lifted his hooves before she descended. Without elegance, she jabbed her mouth holding it in again and again, each stab puncturing his coat and drawing a yell. Ten or more times in rapid succession she did so against her helpless foe before one scream turned to rage. Grabbing her in desperation, a vicious headbutt dropped the knife into his magic, turning it on the spot to fire right into her throat and extended from the back of her neck.

The poor mare fell, dropping to the side with twitchy spasms in death. Beside her, Shovels tried to stand before almost looking down to realise how much blood was flowing from him. Pale and weak, he only managed a few trots forward before collapsing and dying as well.

The crowd was more than happy with this brutal performance. No, no more. I wasn't watching this! Even before me I saw how the pit was filling up with bodies. Untreated and without being carried away they leaked blood and left corpses around the area. By the end of both sets of six this place would be a carnal pit!

Before me, one of the two ponies clutching one another wailed loudly, clutching his female companion tightly for comfort, all too similar to me. My eyes were burning, my throat and lungs too. I needed air before I passed out.

"What an upset! A double way kill in this very Pit!"

Stern's voice offended me by making a game out of this nightmare, every pony that died in there I knew the fear of!

"The betting stand will collect for the first death, so supporters of Shovels you are in luck! Thus we move on with our next two contestants!"

She left a dramatic pause in a place I highly disagreed with, allowing the crowd to simmer and sort their tickets. Suddenly, I felt very guilty about my own bet for Brimstone. But it had to be done, that money could buy us some desperately needed things on the slave markets.

"First up! All the way from Hoofington we have an ex-gang member! By his own claims he left the Hoof because it was 'too easy' and he wanted a greater challenge! Let's see him in, this is Roaring Tiger!"

The gate opened and 'Roaring Tiger' came speeding out. An earth pony, skinny and somewhat muscular, he darted across the concrete floor before leaping and spinning in the air to land dramatically. Taking a fighting pose, he raised a hoof and cried out.

"Let whoever faces me beware, the Tiger's strength flows in my veins!"

The crowd liked that one, finally somepony eager to fight and a little charisma. Something about his nature felt off to me though, I'd seen Barb and Wildcard up close and the look in his eyes held none of the same weathered resolve. He thrust his hooves up even as Stern continued. The other team had lost two members now... I knew who that meant.

"His opponent! Second only to Xenith in Pit events won, we have the Dragon himself to face the Tiger! The Great Warlord of the Bloodletters! The Scourge of Ponyville! The largest pony you'll ever see! This is... Brim! Stone! Blitz!"

I expected a cheer. It never came.

The crowd booed. Even as the gate raised, as I saw my friend slowly stomp his way onto the concrete with little fear in his eyes, they jeered and spat. I heard ponies decrying him and shouting for loved ones long gone. Others seething about him being why they were here. I'd never thought of how those outside the Mall thought of him, but now I was seeing it.

The wasteland saw him as nothing but a monster and a beast. If it affected him, he didn't show it, simply moving forward to the centre with his eyes only on his opponent.

"An unpopular pony for sure, workers. But! If he is to win this set of six, he will equal Xenith's record! So there's a lot at stake here as our current highest rated fighter enters the arena! Can he still do what he once did? Or has the Great Warlord long gone past his prime? Let the next fight... begin!"

Roaring Tiger was bouncing from hoof to hoof, having gone a little quiet until now. He shouted across even as Brimstone advanced slowly.

"Get ready for the storm, raider! Hoofington gang gonna wreck you right here!"

Brimstone stopped and snorted. But his voice was low, simple and direct. Others might not spot it, but on hearing his bass-filled voice over the sound I recognised regret and an unwilling tone.

"Enough boasting. Lie down and I will ensure it does not hurt."

"Y-you kidding?" Roaring Tiger seemed to look around, before snarling. "You better lie down, cos' this gang's going to wreck you!"

He began to cartwheel and leap around the sides of the arena.

"You ain't got a clue how hard we got it in the Hoof, you're all soft out here!"

Landing on all fours, Tiger grinned.

"So get ready, the storm is coming! Better just give up now! It'll be easier!"

"So come do it then." Brimstone hadn't even moved.

"Oh I will, better start running!"

"I'm right here."

Roaring Tiger growled, whether or not it was like a tiger, I didn't know. But he scraped a hoof on the ground.

"Here it goes! Get ready, here I come! YAAAAH!"

He galloped forward, leapt, and spun before landing on his front hooves and flipping forward with a flashy and dynamic spinning kick! High in the air from an impressive jump, he came down to impact on Brim's side at high speed, moving his leg faster than my eyes could follow!

Brimstone didn't even move an inch as Roaring Tiger's hoof struck and sent Tiger falling backwards, dropping him as though he'd leapt directly into a brick wall. Brim hadn't even flinched.

Yelping out loud, clutching his hoof, Tiger looked up to see Brimstone stare down.

"I know all the gangs in Equestria, you are not of the Hoof."

Roaring Tiger didn't even get to finish the scream as Brim's hoof descended in one fatal snap of the neck.

The crowd went silent, murmuring to one another. That hadn't exactly been the fight they'd been expecting. I heard sighs and distasteful curses from those who'd lost bets on a cool-sounding name. Others simply bemoaned that there hadn't been any 'real' violence.

"Well, that wasn't quite all it was made out to be, Brimstone Blitz is our winner! Can he last the four more fights to a record-equalling victory? Bring on our next challenger! Number three from the opposing team, this is Long Trot! A caravanner and prospector that has weathered raiders, gangs, and beasts all over Equestria! Some say that he was also a hired assassin, but who knows for sure? Let's find out!"

Stern was clearly moving it quickly along past that unexpected 'disappointment' of a fight. The crowd had lost much of its bluster, but was beginning to pick up the pace again as the door slid open.

From within came running a tall and well-built earth pony. Dark grey with a light brown mane, he lowered his head and sprinted before any comment to even begin had started! From here, I had to squint to try and see his cutie mark, was it a wagon wheel?

Even if I couldn't tell what it was, I could certainly still tell the direction he was headed! He was making for the corpses of Top Quartz and Shovels, going for the knife! Brimstone clearly saw it too, realising he was much further away. Looking for a weapon of his own, Brim reached to the side and stamped upon a pressure plate. The barrel creaked and jarred open, before dropping a pile of a dozen little objects!

Brimstone leapt away, landing and rolling over on his side to get as far away from them as possible. Little beeping plates of metal with blinking red lights fell and scattered across a section of floor.

"Looks like the Warlord doesn't have the same luck! Anti-personnel proximity mines, workers! Anyone gets too close and you're in for a light show!"

The crowd loved that one, Brimstone having to dive away led many to cheers of laughter, stomping their hooves in approval as Long Trot yanked the knife from Quartz's neck with a horrid spray of blood. Between the green spillage of chemicals, the mines, blood, and corpses, the Pit was already beginning to gain its hazards quickly. Shifting closer to one another, I saw Long Trot take a cautious and stalker-like stance. Hearing the calls to knife Brim, I couldn't help but feel a pulsing will inside to want to shout back in support of him!

But something didn't make sense. Brim wasn't rushing in to attack. Why not?

Long Trot took the offensive, darting forward and feinting to one side before making a vicious slash at Brim. The larger pony had his eyes fixed on that knife, hunched and ready to move. Seeing the attack, he shifted backward, then to the side to avoid a follow up attack. Grimacing, Brim swept forward and threw a hoof toward his opponent, but the tall earth pony leapt out of reach.

"That's not right." Coral muttered beside me.

I nodded. "Brim's much faster than that, I... I've seen him take on ponies with weapons and just stomp over them!"

"That's what I meant. I don't know what's with the raider, but for his sake he better clear it up. They will have worse planned for him, every wound will count, he's still got three more if he wins this one."

"He will." I whimpered it, clinging to Coral's front leg. "He will. Please, Brim..."

Long Trot cautiously moved around with intent focus, keeping his front to any hazards in the area. This pony knew what he was doing alright. Brimstone snorted, charging forward and jumping, all four hooves off the ground, one swinging for Trot's head. Clearly surprised that such a big pony could move as quickly, Trot had to frantically dive away from Brim's crushing slam and pace a hasty retreat to avoid a huge buck that followed it. Landing on his back hooves, Trot ran up and leapt forward, making me scream when I saw that knife connect to the recovering Brimstone, drawing a gash along his side. The pony moved fast, darting in and out with the ease of somepony used to making those cheap dirty shots count.

The big raider roared in anger, drawing a cheer at the sight of blood from the crowd. Aiming another slash, Trot had to drop and roll away before it landed, seeing Brimstone's hoof swing around. For a second, I saw Trot's shocked face at the nearby mines when his evasive dives carried him a little too close for comfort!

My friend charged, hoof after hoof swinging and sending Long Trot into a very suddenly panicked retreat! This was more the Brim I knew! Rushing, whirling, and unstoppably piling into Long Trot, one strike drew a bloody spray from Trot's mouth and sent the knife spiralling through the air. Long Trot thudded to the ground, dizzied. Above him, Brim reared up, one hoof readying to slam down and end it!

Then I saw it; he was trying to end this as painlessly as possible. He wasn't allowing the savage rage to take over.

Unfortunately, this holding back was slowing him, losing the aggressive violence that gave him that frenzied speed and inner rage to become a god of battle on those who stood in his way. Even as the hoof took careful aim for the neck, Long Trot threw one hoof to the side and slapped it near an anti-personnel mine! The beeping sped up even as Trot rolled out of the way of the descending hoof and sprinted. Brimstone was trying to not be a raider down there, and it was costing him.

"Have some of the wonders of high explosive, raider!" Trot's voice shouted even as he moved.

Brim saw the mine, but with two hooves off the ground, he didn't have time to land and move before it blew. I yelped and covered my ears from the sharp crack even as Brimstone stumbled back and roared in both pain and fury. Shrapnel dug into his side, legs, and neck. It wasn't anywhere near enough to bring him down, but I could see that slight limp on him turning back to find his opponent.

I knew he wouldn't lose this fight. Long Trot was outclassed in speed and strength, but this was all about how many wounds Brimstone had to take before the tough fights with the likes of Wildcard began. What was he doing? Were it not my fear of those around me attacking for supporting the 'hated raider' I would have cried out to him, told him to please just live! Do whatever it took!

Shaking his head, clearly thinking the same thing, that this had gone on too long for a fighter of his calibre.

"Right, that's enough..." Only I likely heard him speak lowly, the deep tones passing to my ears even amongst the sounds of the crowd.

Brimstone put his head down and charged. Long Trot was stumbling for the knife again, but in full gallop Brimstone was so much faster on every stride. With a crash, the huge pony slammed into Trot, rolling over and throwing him a few feet away. Landing heavily, Trot barely got up and grabbed the knife before rushing at Brimstone! Dodging around one another, they clashed. Brimstone using his thick hooves to block the edge while Trot ducked and weaved. This should have been over ages ago!

Eventually, he seemed to find what he was looking for. Simply diving onto Trot, he turned it into a grapple, throwing the knife away. In here, Brimstone simply overpowered him. The crowd, sensing the end, cried for blood! They wanted him to throw Trot into the chemicals or drop him on a mine! Instead, he simply began pressing away Trot's waving limbs until he got a grip around his neck.

Then, he squeezed. Long Trot fought, kicked and struggled, but in that choke hold there was no escape against somepony so strong. Gradually, Long Trot slowed and ceased to move other than a few spasmodic jerks of his hind legs. Laying his opponent down, Brimstone stood... and stumbled.

The wounds on his side only kept seeping blood that dripped off his belly or down his legs. Ignoring the crowd's boos at the raider winning again with a simple and (comparatively to the poor ponies forced in before) painful execution, I saw him testing the movement in his body with a grimace. Some shrapnel had clearly gone deep.

Now Long Trot's body formed another pile alongside the other ignored corpses that would lie there until both bouts were done.

"BOO! WE WANT PROPER FIGHTS!" That same buck beside me cried.

"YEAH! THIS SUCKS! MORE LIKE THE FIRST ONE!" screamed another.

The crowd was turning against this, two fights with nothing but 'boring' deaths and little real violence was leading the bloodthirsty audience to protest and scream their displeasure. Up on the balcony, I saw little change in Red Eye's watchful gaze, stroking Winter with one hoof. But I saw him finally turn his head to Stern and mutter but a few words in her ear. She looked to him, then at the Pit, then back again before nodding. Taking up the microphone, she held up a talon for silence.

"You want a proper fight?"

"YEAH!" They chorused.

"Then you shall have a spectacle! The next bout shall be two on one! Numbers four and five from the opposing team will enter the Pit together to bring low this beast who has hurt so many of you!"

The crowd went mad, chanting and approving of this idea. This wasn't fair! Something was wrong with Brimstone and they were throwing two ponies at once against him?

I saw Brimstone stand up again from testing his leg and throw his head toward the opening gate. This... this is where it would really begin.

"Now there's some history here, workers! These two ponies were once of this beast's very warband! But he betrayed them! Turned away from the group and started killing them when paths crossed in Fillydelphia! Welcome... Scar Tissue and Pitfall!"

Now the crowd got really going. Two ferocious raiders charged into the arena, howling and whooping as they came. Both unicorn stallions, their filthy black coats were twisted and dyed with red and yellow, symbols of atrocity adorning both. One bore a cutie mark of a trident with a waxed-up brown mohawk mane, while the other had a set of upward facing stakes and a similarly coloured mane shorn off one side entirely to only leave one half on his right side left. The latter I guessed was Pitfall from the mark, making the mohawk Scar Tissue. They looked like brothers!

Brimstone clearly recognised them. Pulling his leg off the ground, he snarled and stomped.

"I thought you two had been killed off long ago in here!"

Scar Tissue snapped at the mouth almost like a dog. "We ain't dying till we got a shot at you, betrayer! You any idea how many of our kin you killed in that Mall business?"

Pitfall chimed in, his voice a rasping sound of somepony who smoked far too much. "Clan sticks together, forever and always! You turned your back on it! Now we're gonna put you down, old worn-out stallion taken out in place of the new!"

They both broke off to either side of their half in the Pit, cast a knowing glance to one another, and stamped on pressure plates simultaneously. Holding their hooves up with expectancy, the barrels opened and dropped their contents. To Scar Tissue, a trident with wickedly barbed points that was at least ten feet long. To Pitfall, a net covered in small fish hooks and a set of hoof-blades. Catching them in their hooves or magic, the pair armed up.

This was wrong, they knew where their signature weapons were. The fact they even had weapons for themselves was ridiculous! Somepony was playing with the rules fast and loose here behind the scenes. I shivered, praying under my breath.

"Please, Goddesses, forgive him and let him live. Please..."

The pair hoof bumped with a sadistic grin, turning back to Brimstone.

"Ready, chief?"

Brimstone only lowered his front half down, scuffing at the dirt and growling.

"Come on then, upstarts."

They didn't need any further incentive. Screaming their own battle cry, the pair surged forward, crossing over each other's path with fluid grace and flanking around Brimstone in the centre of the Pit. My friend surged forward against Scar Tissue, aiming to divide and conquer. But even as he ran, the net whirled out, projected over a long distance by Pitfall's magic, and slashed at his back leg. With a great cry at the hooks tearing skin and dragging his leg out, Brimstone stumbled and twisted, trying to free himself. One hoof sliced backward and using the hard edge against the hooks, simply tore it off. Face twisting in anger, he stamped it down and away from Pitfall's magic, only for that huge trident to come piercing in from the side. Dropping and rolling to avoid it, Brim grunted at the pain before coming back to his feet a good bit slower than I'd known him normally to.

Even by the time he was there, Pitfall had darted away, the net taken with him. Covering his retreat with that trident, floating and watching Brim should he try to launch at Pitfall recovering his weapon.

These two fought as one. Twins. Circling Brimstone, two ponies and two floating weapons, they surrounded him with a precision.

"Time was you two were just runts born into the clan." Brimstone muttered to himself, favouring his injured legs and body.

"Times change, chief! The old get slow, the dynamic young take over! After all, isn't that how you got in charge when your old dad got too slow to stop you?" Scar Tissue spat, before his trident flew in. Spotting it easily, Brimstone backed off to deflect it with his hooves. I tried to scream a warning, but behind him the net floated in and caught his back legs again to prevent his retreat.

Then I did scream as the trident's points dug into his shoulder.

Bellowing at the stab, much to the enjoyment of the crowd, Brimstone thrashed and whirled, sending the trident flying across the arena while stamping the net into the ground. He bled from dozens of small cuts now of shrapnel and stabs. Every time he went for one, the other would surge in!

Brimstone wasn't going to give up that easily. Even as the pair moved to recover their weapons, he took the chance to run to another pressure plate. Almost breaking it with his hoof, he had to swear colourfully and loudly (Luna's almighty what?) when the sight forced him to leap aside again. A strange long and thick bar shape dropped heavily before slapping onto the ground hard.

"Brimstone Blitz just has no luck today! For those who don't know, that is a bar mine! An anti-machine and wagon mine that only goes off when something of enough weight presses down on it, shooting upwards on its detonation with enough explosives to take out a sentinel robot!"

This was ridiculous! Now a mine that would only be set off by somepony as big as Brim was in the arena!? Why wasn't Red Eye stopping this? Looking up, I saw him only watching my friend with careful eyes, that cybernetic one blinking occasionally. Surely somepony as intelligent as him saw what was going on?

Scar and Pitfall had gotten their weapons back, advancing upon Brimstone again. They were much faster than him, wiry and lithe with a thin and tense strength. Wildcard was keeping his remnant portion of the warband well exercised even in Fillydelphia, that was for sure. Once again making a flanking move, they rushed for Brimstone. Between them Scar Tissue was clearly the faster, making a sprint to reach behind Brimstone. To my surprise, Brim simply turned and ran.

They didn't seem to expect it either, but they bounded forward. The crowd jeered at the warlord's 'craven cowardice' but after a second it all became clear. Leaping clean over the chemical spill with a grunt on landing upon wounded legs, Brimstone made his way to the far side of the Pit and backed himself against the corner. I was no fighter, I couldn't grasp why. But soon enough, it became clear.

As they caught up, they couldn't surround him in the same way. It was risky though, Brimstone had nowhere to run now as he gambled that against making sure he could see them both at all times.

"Trapped now, chief." Scar Tissue licked his lips.

"Trapped in the pit." Pitfall chimed in, making at least a few ponies in the crowd groan.

"Then come get me." Brimstone settled, ready.

Scar obliged first, that huge trident using its ten foot range to let him thrust from well outwith his own magic's range if he only used his telekinesis on the end of it for quick thrusts. Blocking and using his hooves as shields, Brimstone smacked it aside time and again. What was he trying? They could just keep stabbing until they got him! Pitfall sent his net surging in to wrap around Brim's front hooves, trapping them together! I saw the pain on his face as those fish hooks dug under his skin and his front body collapsed down.

"Bad plan, big guy. Goodbye!" Scar laughed and lunged with the trident.

Brim's plan came into play. Launching up with his hind legs, he twisted and grabbed the trident's shaft in his mouth tightly. I saw the telekinesis fight against it, Scar Tissue moving in closer to try and pull harder! Brimstone had both their main weapons locked on him now!

Even when Scar Tissue fought magic against mouth, Brimstone let go. The trident flew out of his mouth from the straining telekinesis and slapped right into Scar's face. Taking the opportunity, Brimstone launched off his hind legs toward the unsuspecting Pitfall. Landing awkwardly, he still managed to lift his tied front hooves and deliver a double hoofed hammerblow across his face.

The raider fell back, face gushing from fish hook lacerations. I thought Brim was going in for the kill, but instead I saw him use the dazed and helpless raider's hoof claws to cut the net off his own! He could end it now, the pony was out cold!

He didn't. I saw the look, the mindset saying 'kill,' but looking at a helpless pony before him, Brimstone backed off.

Behind him, the trident speared into his flesh once again. The raiders had no such qualms about attacking somepony like that. Tearing out with those barbs, I saw a nasty wound opened. Brimstone stumbled, staggered, and leaned against the thick concrete wall just below where the cage started.

"What's this? The big nasty warlord's lost his edge? Lost that raider feel? Well that's just gonna treat you rough then, isn't it?"

Scar looked at his brother upon the floor, now unconscious and clearly out of the game here. Grimacing, Scar Tissue shook his mohawk-bearing head.

"Seems he's out of it anyway, oh well!"

He bore a sick grin, before the trident flashed and went spearing into his own brother's neck! He didn't even look bothered! Drawing it and leaving yet another body to the mercy of the Pit's cold and increasingly stained floor, he turned back to Brimstone.

"That's how raiders act, chief! Do what it takes. They were going to make us fight after we killed you anyway! But you'll never not be one! No, now you're just a bad one! I guess I get all the glory then to bring you down! Always did want to challenge you when you got old and slow. Here's my chance!"

His magic lit up, drawing his brother's hoof claws to himself and wearing them, the long trident flicking back to keep Brim at a distance. I could see my friend stumbling. The wounds were beginning to tell. He still had two to beat and this one was already looking dodgy. Scar was unhurt!

"You want a shot at your old warlord?" Brimstone snorted, hardening his face. "Perhaps he's still got a couple fights left in him!"

It began. Brimstone charged, hooves sparking on the concrete floor, he tore toward Scar. The smaller raider crouched, narrowed his eyes and flung the trident forward. Lancing ahead, it jerked to the side when Brimstone deflected it with a hoof and leapt to swing a mighty hoof for Scar's head. Dropping and rolling to the side, Scar Tissue leapt to his hooves again and threw a slash with those hoofblades, missing Brimstone as he hopped backward and reared up to deliver a double-hoofed slam that only barely missed his elusive opponent.

Every impact brought a scream of delight from somepony around us, Scar's frantic running to retrieve his trident prompting many to urge him on! Internally, feeling nervous about supporting these pit fights, I still cheered for Brimstone. But I just couldn't help shake the sense that something was terribly wrong. He couldn't face being a raider, so he was turning away from it to his own suffering by not getting into that properly rage-filled mindset to unleash his real physical power.

Was I any different? Why didn't anypony understand I just wanted to leave as painlessly as possible? I was just running away all the same.

The trident spun wildly in the air, landing to point at Scar's opponent while they circled. Grimacing, both leapt forward. A clashing meet of trident, blades, and thick hooves mixed with narrow dodges and small clips that sent either fighter back a foot to regain their stance. I saw Brimstone's hoof catch Scar's shoulder and throw him almost right over. A hoofblade opened a thin slit along Brim's left foreleg. A dent in the trident from a particularly harsh block.

The two whirled away, breathing deeply. The crowd ecstatic at the tough fought battle.

Scar Tissue was good. Very good. Even without his brother, he had a lot of speed and a reaction time I hadn't seen since Barb. He maintained a youthful grin and bouncy stance upon his hooves while Brimstone was slowing, breathing hard, and dripping blood everywhere he went. One serious injury more could be enough to tip that into a truly wounded position, the mine and bladed attacks had really taken their toll.

Frankly, I had a whole new respect for Brimstone's constitution, to take as many slices and tears and still be capable.

"Giving up, old chief?"

"Not while I'm alive!" Brimstone spun, bucking full force toward his opponent. Scar, however, grinned and dove forward to roll beneath it, slicing upward. Noticing him almost too late to avoid being gutted, Brimstone threw himself to the side and swung to deliver a punishing blow I'd seen catch many an opponent out with its speed.

Scar simply ducked it.

"Is that it? I've seen you do that a thousand times in my life, chief! You know what they say about old dogs..."

The trident came flying down vertically from above. Catching Brim's knife wound from Long Trot, it dragged at the slit and reopened what had been slowly beginning to thicken. Brim looked more surprised than pained, having to quickly shift and move awkwardly to the side when the trident kept stabbing down again and again. I saw what Scar was doing, a pony couldn't properly defend upwards like a griffon or hellhound could!

"How'd you like some new tricks? Picked up from the griffons in here that Wildcard brought into the clan!"

Brimstone strained to keep an eye on the trident, dodging frantically, I heard him cry out in shock as he had to leap over that damn bar mine. Backing off, seeing it coming, he hopped up and over onto his back, catching the trident head between his hooves. Without any fancy thought, he simply drew it in close and smashed the offending weapon into splinters, bending the tips.

"All flair and no reliability." Brimstone muttered while he turned back and slammed his hooves together. In a moment of horror, I saw even the strong gesture make him wince and stumble on his front legs. All his limbs had taken horrific punishment, one back leg was bent and clearly not taking any weight.

"Hah, you think that's all I got?" Scar grinned back, his horn still glowing. Slowly, it built up and began to crackle.

My ears popped, a flash of light and an after-image of a stream of light, like lightning! All the way from his horn to Brimstone, where I cried out loud to see him half collapsed and clutching his chest. Only after a few seconds did I realise I'd lost my hearing completely. All around, ponies rubbed their ears while the slow rumble of the crowd began to grow again. A splitting headache began to form while my hearing returned. Curse my tainted birth...

"—new tricks, huh?" Scar's voice cut back in. "Little thing Wildcard taught me! See, we the young don't like to just do what you taught us. All brawn and never looking at what we can really do with magic!"

Brimstone pushed one hoof to the ground, trying to close the distance. But Scar Tissue only trotted backward.

"Ah. Ah. Aaaah! Face it, chief. You're obsolete to the new clan! Where magic and strength goes together! You—HAH!"

My ears erupted in pain again, Brimstone had tried to leap suddenly forward, but the same spell sent him collapsing to his side. Eyes watering from my own pain, I watched him breathing heavily.

"Interrupting me, I said you're past your time! A good magical shock does wonders against those getting a bit on in life... what are you, sixty-something now? How's that heart doing after all this time in Filly?"

Tapping his hoofblades together, he began to wander across, waving one in the air to announce the upcoming kill to the crowd.

"Just lie there, chief. I'll make it a raider's death. Nice and bloody, going down in a blaze of violence. Isn't that how you always said we should go? Pity you didn't move with the times, just sticking with that tired old raaaaah-raaaaah I'm a big raider shtick."

He began to charge, the hoofblades tip-tapping as they went. I saw Brimstone roll onto his front, facing away from Scar, gritted teeth in great pain.

"Well it's over now! Some way to go, being the old arrogant big guy! Have you even learned one thing from the ponies around you? No? Now you'll pay for that!"

Scar rushed forward, leapt into the air, raising his claws high, and screamed a guttural howl of death! I squeezed Coral's foreleg so hard I feared I'd break it.

His eyes opened.

"You could say I've learned one little fighting trick from a good friend..."

His whole body surged. From his shoulders to his rear hooves I saw muscles ripple and power that colossal body up to lean on his front hooves. As Brimstone Blitz unleashed the sharpest and biggest, most powerful straight-up buck I'd ever seen toward Scar Tissue even as he descended. A surprise attack with his full strength that collided with earth shattering force... into Scar Tissue's groin.

There was a crunch.

Simultaneously, myself and every single buck (along with a good portion of the mares) in the stadium made an 'Ooooooh!' sound and clutched themselves, rear legs crossing over protectively.

I even saw Red Eye wince and scrunch up half of his face, that cyber-eye blinking at a rapid pace while one hind leg pulled just a little closer.

Beside him I saw his dog, Winter, whine and cover his face with a paw while lying down.

The entire fight had seemed to stop dead. Frozen in time at that moment of impact before Scar slowly fell to the ground. Eyes so wide they almost seemed to pop out of his skull, he just lay quivering with an open mouth making little squeaky noises the likes of which even my filly-like voice couldn't match.

Brimstone grunted, limped, and stood above him.

"A raider's death? Bloody and violent? Consider that the violence. But you will have no blood, the Goddesses watch for those unwilling to follow that path any more... even if it renders them unable."

A hoof raised, I saw Scar Tissue's eyes follow it as he was unable to move his body.

His neck snapped like dry bark under the stamp. The life in his eyes disappearing seconds later.

Regardless of the lack of blood, the crowd shouted their approval once many of them had been done recovering and making sure certain things were still there. (Alright, alright, maybe I had, too... just to be sure.) I still heard boos, but that fight had pleased them.

"The Dragon wins once again! We are only one fight away from equalling the Pit all-time record after proving his worth against two at once!"

Finally, I allowed myself to breathe. Or at least, begin desperately sucking warm air through a cramped throat. My hoof toyed with the collar, feeling it chafing my burns and rad-sores developing all around my neck.

My body couldn't take this pressure. Already my chest was thumping hard and I could taste the rancid bile and tinge of metal in my throat. I needed RadAway the moment this was done. Maybe I could go to the hospital and trade with the caps from my bet? I didn't want to go to Sooty... no... no no no no.

Brimstone knelt down in the centre, taking his breath. Coral narrowed her eyes.

"I can't say I feel sorry for him. But if the next fight is anything like that then I can't see him getting by."

Horried, I turned to her for saying such a thing! But those bitter eyes only narrowed and turned away from me. I couldn't say anything, the history between them was just too dire.

"Well, workers... we come to it at last! The final bout of this first set of six! The Great Warlord is hurting, clearly not as fit as he once was—"

No! He was fit! He just... just wasn't fighting right!

Biting my lip, I saw Brim glancing around the crowd. He was looking for us! Without thinking, I simply stood up on the bench. Around me, some ponies hissed and swore at the sight of my wings. But stern glances from Coral kept them back. She had sat quietly and sometimes I swore almost enjoyed seeing what she would see as justice done to Brimstone, but she wouldn't let them hurt me.

More visible, his eyes found me. We couldn't say anything, but I knew that look in his eye. Somewhere between apology and gratitude.

Now I realised fully what it was. Earlier today when he had sworn not to let the frenzy take over. It wasn't that he couldn't fight without it, it was that he couldn't risk a fight getting so intense that it would draw it out of him by his very habit.

Please, Brim... just come out.

"So now we move to our final challenger! So without further talk... let us allow the final to begin! Bring them in!"

The gate slid up. Within the dark void I saw a shape and two eyes marching forward. Here they were...

But then my heart skipped a beat.

History was repeating itself.

Before me in that pit was not a pony.

Thick and stomping, strong and bestial. Barely fitting out the gate, he came. Larger even than Brimstone and not at all what I had expected to see.

He was a raider, yes.

But he was a buffalo.

My heart sank.

Huge in body, possessing massive horns and cloven hooves, the buffalo stomped forward under the screams of the crowd. Dyed hair on either side depicting the same raider symbols as Brimstone himself alongside foul abstract pieces of art I wish my mind could already forget. A thick spur of bone between his nostrils, while his horns were carved, painted and tipped with bronze.

"A brand new addition to our rosters! The final opponent is for a grudge match! Yet another of Brimstone's own warband come back to seek revenge! Stronger than any pony and so crazed we've had to keep him locked in magic enchanted chains as a secret weapon of war since he was brought here! But now he wants a piece of his old Warlord! For his feats, he was named 'Breaks Many Foes' but in the Pit, we simply call him... BOOOONECRUUUUSHER!"

The colossal figure reared up, so huge in size that he almost came to the height of the minotaur I'd seen! But far heavier. Opening his mouth, Bonecrusher emitted a throaty whooping cry before slamming his hooves down so hard I felt it even up here.

"This old leader shall fall before me for his betrayal of us all! Raiders do not forgive! For blood! For revenge of our fallen in the Mall! His broken body shall be cast down!”

The crowd were up on their hooves, stomping and yelling, their hooves pounding on the ground or the cage around the arena. I saw so many of them fighting with the guards to get back to the betting stands. Many were swapping out tickets up here in the stands!

Below, Brimstone Blitz lethargically pushed himself up and flicked blood from his limbs and body with a shake.

“I expected Wildcard... not you.” He growled at Bonecrusher, keeping himself held ready for anything.

“Wildcard gave me this chance!” Bonecrusher snorted in response and scrapped ready to charge. “We drew for it and I got number six! One of your own Big Four will destroy you in turn!”

One of the Big Four? But Brimstone hadn’t mentioned him...

“You are not one of them.” Brimstone’s words set a furious look on the buffalo. “Rough Diamond died, you didn’t get to the initiation before we were brought here.”

“You know I’d have passed!” Bonecrusher shouted in a voice like stones crumbling together. “I was always just waiting for the chance! You know I’d have made it to be one! I was the replacement! It’s always the way when one dies! Ever since Wildcard killed that wimp Diamond you know it was my place to step in for him!”

Wildcard killed... huh? I perked up, seeing the look of surprise on Brimstone’s face as well. That threw everything I knew for a loop. Internal raider grudges? Fighting over loot? But Brim clearly didn’t have time for over thinking right now, steeling his face.

“Keep dreaming. You’re a mindless idiot, Foes! You could never lead.”

There was a brief silence.

“Fighting is all that matters to a raider and I could FIGHT!” The roar came just short of the almost overdue charge. Lowering his head and shaking the very foundations, Bonecrusher rushed forward faster than I’d ever have wanted to see. Those horns gleamed and pointed right for Brimstone’s breast.

My friend dove to one side, scrambling madly as he landed near the hissing chemical pile that was starting to eat into the surface of the Pit. Seeping near to Top Quartz’s corpse I could see it eating and melting away one of her hooves. The Pit was cramped now with dangers and bodies! Stumbling over the obstacles, Brimstone got back to his feet even as Bonecrusher skidded to a halt and turned to snarl back.

Brimstone didn’t let him charge again. Screaming his own cry, he pushed the pain away and ran directly for the lumbering beast before another charge could be built up. Surging in with one, two, and then three solid slams to the face, Brimstone unleashed what he had upon the buffalo. I heard every mighty thump of hoof on forehead, before Bonecrusher twisted and threw Brimstone a good ten feet away. Landing, a sudden beeping gave rise to a quick slap of Brim’s hoof throwing a mine in between the two. The resulting detonation so close to the edge caught three slaves in the crowd with shrapnel and threw up a smokescreen to dodge the follow-up goring from the buffalo. The tempo was on, neither was messing around here!

Scraping his horn along the edge of the Pit from being blinded, Bonecrusher left a long scar in the wall before sliding to a halt and spinning to find Brimstone launching back onto him. They tussled for a few seconds, but to my horror I saw the reality. For once, Brimstone was well and truly outmatched in terms of sheer strength.

Bonecrusher threw down Brim’s attacks, raising his hooves up to grab and slam my friend into the arena wall. Braying loudly, he lowered his head and charged, butting Brim in the stomach and crushing him a second time before throwing him away. Arcing over, Brimstone landed in a heap, just pushing himself up to deflect a horn. The resulting charge still flung him another ten feet away to land near Long Trot's body.

Slamming the ground with his hoof, I saw the restrained fury in his eyes. He wanted to unleash the beast inside, the Dragon. But he was holding it back, shaking his head.

"You've lost the raider in you, Brimstone Blitz!" Bonecrusher stalked near him. "Time was you could stop a charge of mine. Now look at you!"

He surged forwards, drawing a cry of pain when one of those horns pierced Brim's thick skin and carried him across the arena to spin and slam down. I could see Brimstone holding a hoof to the wound.

No... no! Brimstone couldn't defeat him like this! He just couldn't! I remembered all too clearly what he said, that no matter what he wouldn't give in to the raider inside! It... it was his way to go out if he had to but show everypony he was different! The only way out! His only choice.

Just like mine. Why couldn't he have understood that?

"Murky?"

Why not?

"Murky!"

I blinked, realising I'd been crying, sitting hunched back in the seat amongst a sea of crying spectators. Coral Eve was looking me in the eye, shaking me a little.

I didn't say anything, but she saw the horrified look in my eye. She felt nothing for Brimstone, I could see that. She was almost calm, maybe even feeling he deserved this. I felt her shake me again, but I just trembled. What could I say? This was exactly the same thing, only now I was seeing it happen to somepony else!

Another horrid gore before he even got up. The concrete floor was leaving a trail wherever Brimstone was thrown and tossed. Rolling beneath Bonecrusher, barely avoiding the stamps, Brimstone limped and almost fell upon a pressure plate, seeking something he could use.

The barrel almost jammed, something huge inside it jerking and then falling with a heavy clang.

A helmet made of bronze and steel in the crude shape of a dragon bearing two great horns.

Brimstone's helmet.

Wildcard or Shackles, whoever it was behind the scenes doing this was taunting him now. Teasing him with the temptation.

I saw him stare sideways at it, frozen in place. To one side, Bonecrusher noticed it and laughed.

"You've lost who you are, Brimstone! No longer the raider, but you're nothing without that rage burning to drive you! A spent flame in the night. You know what you need to do to ever hope to fight me... but you won't."

He was right, kicking it to the side, Brimstone slid around and charged directly into the side of Bonecrusher. Roaring aloud, hoof after hoof fell into the buffalo, throwing everything he had to throw. The buffalo staggered back under the witheringly harsh hail. Almost to the wall, before the old clan member struck back. Launching forward, he simply headbutted Brimstone, stunning my friend before picking him up and body-slamming him into the floor. Raising him again, rising to two hooves, the buffalo presented my friend in his dazed state to the crowd, screaming his victory!

Spinning and swinging, Bonecrusher hurled him with terrible force into the wall right below us. Even on our side, the concrete bulged in and cracked enough to send fragments all over us in the crowd. Behind him, Bonecrusher turned to the crowd and raised his hooves, chanting old raider verses and oaths.

Quaking, crying and terrified, I saw Brimstone slump down... still breathing, but terribly injured.

"Murky, snap out of it!"

Coral's hooves shook me, I realised I was hyperventilating badly, my illness kicking up and making my vision go hazy. This was all it came down to. Death or pain! For all of us born with something we hated!

She shook me so hard my neck almost got whiplash.

"Don't get to thinking what I know you're thinking! That isn't the way! Not for you..."

Frozen with fear for my friend and feeling like I just wanted to slink off and do something, I simply turned and stared wide-eyed and blank to the older mare. Her eyes narrowed while looking at me.

"Not for him either. Everypony, get out of my way!"

She stood in the seats, forcing the jubilant slaves around us to the sides. Coral strode down the benches, over slaves even, until she was ringside.

"Get up, you beast!" She screamed at Brimstone from right beside him. Shaking, he looked up, as though surprised to see her. "You get up and do your job!"

His face was swollen, in visible agony and close to some horrible mortal failure.

"I am." He rumbled, speaking from half of his split mouth. "I will not live a raider any more. Breaks Many Foes, he was one of the most brutal fighters lacking only in leadership. If I must fall to him to prove that I will not turn to the raider to have forgiveness... then I will. I'm not like you or Murk or Glimmerlight who finds their strength from the goodness in your hearts. I will not turn back to the Dragon before all these ponies just to win."

I could see Coral's ire rising as he spoke, her horn sparked and grew in flashing light every time he spoke a word. Eventually, she screamed aloud and emitted a sharp pressure blast into the arena. It slapped right across Brimstone's face and staggered him to the side.

"Now you listen to me, brute!" She snapped, scowling at him. "You want to be forgiven by everypony for the things you did? You keep wondering about what it'll take? Well I'm going to tell you right now what you can do to fix it!"

Coral leaned close to the cage.

"Nothing!"

Shaking and feeling my chest tight and my head weary from lack of air on my rapid breathing, I widened my eyes at the look Brimstone gave her. Somewhere between crushing emotion and anger.

"You can do nothing, because no matter what you do, no matter what you live like or who you help and save, there is one pony who will never ever forgive you. Me! Consider me bitter and angry against somepony like you who assisted in saving my life from Barb, but you know what? I don't care! Oooh, consider that bad if you want and I'll probably agree that it's not my best trait, that I hold grudges and never forgive easily, but at least I accept it!"

Slaves around us seemed to back away from her and Brimstone.

"You're a raider. You were born one, and from that raider earlier I heard how you killed your own father to be the best one! Now you want to turn around and pretend you aren't one, to the point that you die to that beast over there?"

She pointed a hoof through the cage, Bonecrusher was raising cheers from the crowd on the far side, teasing them with what to use for 'the kill' from all the lethal areas of the arena. Brimstone turned and looked, oddly silent before returning to her eyes.

"You want to die? Fine, I'll probably smile rather than mourn for you. But I'm not letting you die like this. Not running away from who you are. For me? Oooh, hell no. For him!"

She reached through, grabbing his head and pointing it up at me. I locked eyes with him, seeing the look of shock. Likely seeing me so small, so afraid and vulnerable. It was taking all I had to stay there and not shrink away.

"That little buck tried to throw himself off a roof because he couldn't see any way to escape being what he was born as! So if you think I'm going to let you, somepony he for some reason truly cares for, throw your life away trying to run from the very same thing and prove his hurt little mind right, then you are seriously wrong, Brimstone Blitz!"

Pulling his face back around, she stood up on her hind legs to get to his height, staring her family's killer right in the eye from inches away through the bars without fear.

"I care for him. So even if it hurts me to ever help you I'm going to tell you right now. You will not die like this. If you can't beat him... then fine. But do not go out being a weak coward, only running away from what he is. You're a raider, Brimstone Blitz. You'll may or may not ever make the world think of you well again, and you better get used to remembering that. So get over yourself, turn around and be the pony you are. Prove to that little pegasus behind us that you don't just give up because you can't handle what you were born as!"

Her eyes narrowed.

"You go out there and you show him what learning to try again no matter what anypony thinks of you really means. You'll never earn my forgiveness through killing yourself, Brimstone. You'll never not be that Dragon inside. But you are not going to die and prove everything that is wrong with this right to the one innocent slave I've met in this damn city!"

Behind them, Bonecrusher roared, turning. Brimstone didn't even pay him heed. He looked up to me and, I thought, seemed to have something change in his look. He looked around at the ponies chanting for his death, chanting for revenge for all he'd done. Eventually, looking to Coral.

"I do not know that I can beat him... not now." He spoke slowly as he stepped back. "But if I must die proving a point then that must be all that I can do. Murky?"

I gasped, surprised to hear him shout to me. He looked down and picked up the Dragon helmet.

"Coral is right. We can't change what you or I were born as. But we can always push for more, no matter what they say. Not any crowd and not any sick bastard with a collar."

He looked to the helmet, hooves trembling at the baleful carved eyes and blood painted markings.

"If Glimmerlight was the point I turned... let this be the moment I never looked back."

The helmet was thrown on, standing tall and swinging to face his opponent, I saw him clip it around his neck and wring out his neck. His wounds poured still, but yet I saw Brimstone allow himself to push past it with a growl.

Bonecrusher grinned at the sight, clearly relishing more fight. Coral Eve stood watching sternly. I simply sat in amazement.

"Come back for more, huh?" Bonecrusher chuckled.

"You going to talk like Scar over there or fight?" Brimstone snarled, lowering his own horned helmet.

Seeing the sign, so did Bonecrusher. The way between them was clear of all obstacle.

"Let the Dragon die!" To a great cheer of the crowd, Bonecrusher shifted that massive frame and charged.

"Then come try it!" Brimstone roared in return, charging forward with a renewed strength. The two thundered toward each other, pounding the ground and building speed at a frightening pace.

I'd seen him fight a Steel Ranger and considered it the most brutal conflict in my life to witness.

I'd seen nothing.

The two leapt from the ground and simply collided, head to head with their horns interlocking in a crash that made the corpses and mines jump on the floor, some of the smaller ones exploding as they fell. Ramming, snarling and twisting the pair fell, got up, rammed again and flung hooves and horns at one another. Every strike a colossal thump that reverberated in my breast. There was no blocking, no dodging. They simply laid into one another like possessed demons of battle. Blood flew, sparks of metal on bone lit their faces, and each gave ground only to push back. Bonecrusher reeled, surprised. But I saw that grin as he flung his massive size around and collided with Brimstone to fling him away. Tumbling head over hoof, he slammed into the ground and rolled to his hooves.

Pausing, I saw the blood leak from his helmet. There was a shake of his body, before he raised both hooves to the sky and screamed an unearthly war cry carrying the rage of sixty years under the brutality of a raider clan. The hooves slammed down and drew into a charge back to his opponent and meeting the approaching buffalo halfway. Throwing himself up, Brim got him around his neck and dragged the huge beast to the ground. Wrestling and slamming Bonecrusher's head into the floor, he was smashed aside by his opponent like a rag doll. Time after time he flung back on and stopped the larger opponent from getting up until eventually their horns locked again.

Ponies screamed themselves hoarse around me. Many were on their hooves still, waving and leaping at the brutal conflict before them. Two immense creatures leathering each other for all their worth. I saw horns stab on both sides, until Brimstone gored the buffalo upon the chest. Driving him back for the first time, Bonecrusher hit the wall and bellowed in pain when Brim's helmet pierced deep. Raising both hooves, he crashed them down upon Brimstone's back twice to stun him. Catching the buffalo's stamp, Brimstone swept around and forced his opponent into the wall, slamming their head over and over, only harder each time until the concrete began to splinter.

Faltering and stumbling, Bonecrusher tripped and almost fell, stunned. But with a surge of his body, swung Brimstone right off the ground and horizontally swung him into the wall. Leaning down, he tossed and tried to gore my friend all over again, throwing him over the personnel mines. Landing, Brimstone kicked two of them with great speed toward Bonecrusher's face, exploding right on top of him and following it up with a charging hoof strike that sent both of them to the ground again.

This was simply a blur of motion. Hits arriving and being countered before either could register the pain. Berserk meeting frenzy. Bonecrusher's constitution was immense. Even streaming blood from his face, he was still up even before Brimstone! The shrapnel had chipped his horns and tore one brass tip free but even with a face full of metal, he moved to stamp again and again on his downed opponent. Crying with tears of stress and fear I watched my friend beaten into the ground with impacts that would have killed me from barely one strike. Then a rise of the head and Bonecrusher found a hoof impaled upon one of Brimstone's horns. The bestial scream sent shivers through me.

Brim struggled to his hooves, he was weak, but in those eyes I saw little but sheer rage and unleashed anger that had been held down all competition.

Was... was this really the way? To have to go through with it and always just strive on, no matter how you feel inside or how it makes you feel?

Brimstone leapt forward, a hoof surging out to stagger his opponent.

I'd been trying so hard so many times but I only kept failing by stint of what I was, a slave!

Bonecrusher caught the next attack, dishing out a vicious headbutt in return.

But Brim had been dying before me and still fought.

Spinning, he bucked the buffalo hard in the side to the crack of ribs, Bonecrusher didn't care, rushing forward and tackling Brimstone down to crush Brim with his weight!

Was it right to avoid the pain and hatred around you to just let it all end? To keep going?

Even before me, Brimstone struggled and lifted the colossal beast from him, grimacing and throwing himself out from under.

I saw Coral looking to me. She saw my wider eyes and seemed to almost smile.

"The road's tough. We've all suffered from where we began. Even with hope you might not make it in the end, we might not get out." Her eyes turned back to the Pit. "But it's always worth trying, Murky. That's what he's showing to you."

A great cry drew my attention back to the Pit. Both of them, reared up, were throwing huge strikes at the other. A devastating right hook from Brimstone that broke one of Bonecrusher's horns, a hideously powerful slam of a hoof from the buffalo that tore the right side of Brimstone's helmet clean away along with a good portion of the skin that tore below it. One after another, throwing their whole exhausted bodies into it. They just kept hitting, the crowd chanting numbers to the strikes. But gradually, I saw Brimstone's attacks lessen as he took more damage.

"The Dragon is over!" Bonecrusher screamed, raising both hooves.

"Maybe it is!" Brimstone roared back, striking Bonecrusher in the gut and leaping up to grab him around the neck. "But if he's going..."

Ever so suddenly, I saw one eye match mine.

"...then he's going out trying for the impossible!"

Pulling his opponent down, I saw Brimstone glance to me just for one half second, before beginning to fight the strength of the struggling buffalo. Slowly, he began to pull. Tugging, swinging, fighting, and bellowing every oath he knew he began to overcome the buffalo's strength with what he had left. His injuries bled more as muscles worked and moved, His eyes turned red from bloodshot. Veins stood out. Then he began to roar with one last almighty effort against something almost twice the size of himself.

Slowly, I heard the entire crowd go quiet, other than an open mouthed gasp, as Brimstone spun and spun until the momentum built and through his scream of unthinkable effort lifted the entire buffalo. He spun around without letting go as for one unbelievable moment, I saw a pony propel a whole larger beast above himself by the neck and body slam him right over the top to land—

I saw the bar mine.

No! NO! I ran forward! Like a pane of glass shattering my head cleared and realised the danger! Galloping to the cage side past Coral even as the buffalo descended, followed by the howling rage of Brimstone Blitz drowning out a shriek from the untouched freedom of my mind that cared for somepony else who had helped me come as far as I had!

“BRIIIIM!”

Bonecrusher landed with a slam that lifted everything in the pit a full foot from the ground... right on the bar mine.

My vision went white and I felt my body along with everypony else in the front row blown away from the cage as the full construct shattered and leapt free of its housings. Dust and smoke whirled free and coated everypony as they covered themselves. Bits of concrete and earth rained from above and pattered from the decimated cage that was dangerously leaning, ready to fall. Griffons caught themselves in the air from the disturbances and landed quickly to point rifles at the cage itself.

My vision only saw that much, bleary with shock and blinking from the flare that had gone off right before me. Ears ringing, I pulled myself out from below Coral Eve and struggled to the edge of the cage. Pulling myself up to look in, barely able to keep myself upright in grief, I squinted through the smoke.

Nothing... just nothing.

The crowd began to get up behind me.

Then they began to cheer.

“What a match!” Stern’s announcing rung across the area from mostly broken speakers. “A true epic!”

No... no this wasn’t right! How could they cheer!?

Through the smoke, I saw the huge pile in the middle. A buffalo-sized one, with no sign of Brimstone at all. They screamed with cries of ‘Did you see that?’ and ‘That was awesome!’ But I only fell to the lip of the wall surrounding the cage, crying and feeling part of me torn clean out.

“A second double kill in the ring with the almighty bar mine! What an... wait!”

I gasped, but as I watched... I saw movement.

Bonecrusher began to stand up.

My heart felt hollow. No, that wasn’t fair! Please, Goddesses in your mercy don’t do this! NO!

The crowd had gone wild in their rush to get to the betting stands and scream their delight at the turn of events for their favourite! They started to chant for him...

...before it fell aside to reveal Brimstone Blitz beneath it, having shoved the heavy corpse up and off of himself.

The smoke clearing around us at last through the open roof above now thick with curious griffons, my friend, Brimstone Blitz, unsteadily pulled himself up.

I could not possibly describe for the rest of my life the feeling inside me.

He looked like he should have been dead. One full half of his body was burned and scarred. The eye on that side was missing entirely along with his ear. His jawline didn’t look quite affixed right either, being slumped to one side in a way jaws shouldn’t be. Meanwhile, I was sure I could see bone under the blasted side of his torso. Never had I seen him look so weak to take even one horribly limping step and drop the mangled helmet from his head... before crushing it with one last gasp of strength.

You could have heard a parasprite's wing flutter.

I simply almost collapsed, breathing hard when I saw him turn his one remaining eye and mangled face toward me. I couldn't help but smile and feel ready to cheer, before the silence was broken by one lonely sound of hooves tapping together in applause.

One pair, high up.

"Congratulations, Brimstone Blitz."

Red Eye. He lounged back in his chair upon the balcony as though nothing had happened. His voice carried easily and smoothly across the devastated arena below him.

"Congratulations on your victory against all the odds. Indeed, against the odds, if my observations and judgements are not mistaken. I may have to have words with some of the Pit organisers after this is done. But even with this, I was curious to see how you would do. It seems my investment in you was not without true purpose."

He got up, trotting to the edge of the balcony and staring down toward Brimstone. My friend stood shaking on his hooves, not having said a word yet, and stared back.

"It cost me many lives to bring you in, but when I heard of your renewed purpose below that Ranger Initiate's protection I remember feeling only justified in the decision. You have changed, Warlord. Now before me in this Pit and before the eyes of Fillydelphia's loyal workers... you have shown me at least that there is another pony standing before me today after that little 'moment' with a couple ponies at ringside. One who might finally perhaps see a way to offer more to Equestria than as a beast of burden in mines and factories."

W-what? I sat cowed beneath my master's voice, looking from him to Brimstone in equal measure.

Red Eye smiled, reaching down to take up a small trinket and throwing it down into the cage. Glinting in the light, it landed amongst the broken rubble with pinpoint accuracy before Brimstone. Squinting my eyes, I could see it was his symbol.

"I offer you more, Brimstone Blitz. Normally six victories are required, but under such circumstances as that you have proven with a clearly tampered event I feel it only right to offer you this. To leave your slavery behind. To become a better pony as part of my forces. But not as some lowly grunt... no. You are a Warlord in spirit, Brimstone. I offer you command of a section of my army. These wastes are tainted by raiders the likes of which you know more than I ever will. Not all can be brought to the workforce."

Brimstone looked down to the symbol, a rank offered. Above him, Red Eye smiled.

"After healing, I can have you in the Cathedral within days, ready to make your ongoing crusade to purge this world. You have done such evil, let us not mess words here. But I offer you a chance to lead an army again, to rid Equestria of those who would do nothing but harm and misery unto others. A true course of redemption under my flag, that ponies all around Equestria would come to see you in name as a saviour!"

Red Eye seemed to expect Brimstone to say something. But my friend looked only from the badge to me... then back to Red Eye.

"Great Warlord, you need not toil in penance any more. You have done your time in hell."

My master smiled, genuine and knowingly.

Brimstone trotted forward, toward the badge. Wincing and grunting at his failing body, he leaned down to pick it up. Almost falling, he brought it to his eye to look at. His eye looked to myself and Coral Eve, the mare's expression unidentifiable as she stared back. But he held my gaze for a long time. Then one bloodshot eye turned back to Red Eye.

Before he grimaced and spat a wad of blood upon it. Casting the badge down, I saw Red Eye's hoof have to reach out and stop Stern's huge rifle coming to bear.

"Very well, Warlord." Red Eye uttered, his voice calm but for a slight disappointment even as Brimstone turned back to his waiting gate where I already saw healers waiting with potions. "Very well."

With a flick of his Stable cloak, Red Eye turned, passing from the event along with many of his congregation.

Left in the devastation of the Pit, I saw workers rushing out to repair it in time for the next bout, leaving the corpses and hazards behind. Around us a great commotion kicked up of slaves talking and slavers shouting. I felt ready to sleep for days.

"All slaves with betting tickets have five minutes to collect their winnings! Only the slave with a ticket may go! They must go alone!"

The call went out, starting a mass exodus of slaves rushing to collect their earnings from the winners. Watching Brimstone disappear, I let my thoughts drift. All the odds had been against him. He couldn't turn from what he was yet still he powered through and even in the end stood tall to stick with those he wanted to for a better life. Even as I turned back to Coral Eve, she softened and placed a hoof on my shoulder.

"If he ever does one thing I'll be glad he did, it's this, Murk."

"Y-yes... I've got, um, winnings?" I held up the ticket, possibly the highest earning one in the entire stadium. "But, um..."

"But you need to go alone."

I nodded. "D-do you trust me to go off alone even for a bit?"

Coral smiled and kissed my forehead. "After today, after you seeing that, let's see how you do just this once, Murk. I trust you."

I managed a little smile back. I knew it would be a long time before I felt the temptations leave. The moment this break day was over I would be back in the grind. But for now, after all that, I could let it go for an hour or so and not see every ledge as an opportunity in the recesses of my mind.

Yes... just forget about it for now. I was about to be richer than I'd ever been in my little life, after all.

However I didn't thank him for that. If anything, I thanked him for maybe putting me on the road to saving my own life a second time.

"While the betters for the last bout collect their earnings, let us continue for those of you waiting for the second bout! We shall see if such a sight can be beaten!"

I ducked and weaved my way through the thick crowds, hopping away from stamping hooves and even scurrying below various ponies between their legs to make my way unseen through them. Ahead lay the betting stand, being flooded by a great many ponies. Taking a second to allow the crush to pass by, I sat on the stairs that would normally lead me out of the ice rink's main entranceway. The guards cast me a glance at my proximity, but I just offered a nervous smile and patted the seat. I was just sitting here waiting! Honest!

Grunting, they turned away.

"Let us bring in the first contestant, our Number Seven for the first team of this event! Growing up way in the north's frozen tundras where your very blood turns to ice... this is Windchill! Let's hope she's stronger than that nervous face looks folks, for she is against one of our most popular fighters. Here is Number Seven for the other team as well! He's unpredictable, he is bloody in his execution and he has given us all such entertainment! It's Wildcard!"

The crowd cheered above, the noise filtering and echoing down into these tunnels I waited within. Well, they had said they drew straws for who fought Brim, didn't they? Wildcard must have lost out. What a ridiculous and terrifying pony... his surprise 'wildcard' entry being a buffalo...

I spotted a gap at the betting stand. Time to go claim my prize and then run as fast as I could back to Coral to wait it out and close my eyes to any further horror. No pony could see how much I was about to earn for my friends to use even if I—

I had to try and chide myself. I couldn't think that now.

Trotting over, I heard a sudden shriek above from the Pit and an approving stomp of hooves from the crowd. Stern made the announcement. Wildcard had made his kill brutally and quickly. That poor mare...

Squeezing through, I tried to hold up my ticket. Wouldn't everypony please let the little skinny pegasus through please? One snorted at me and pushed me behind him. Come on! Just because I had wings...

"Well that was fast, workers! Let's move right along! Our next match will be team one's Wildcard against team two's Number Seven!"

I paused for a second, then laughed and shook my head. Oh come on, Stern. Everypony knew that Number Eight came after Number Seven, right? Windchill had been number seven! Even I could count to seven. It was in my...

I froze rock solid.

...name.

"Come on, Number Seven! Get in here!"

No... no there was no way. She was just making a mistake.

A hoof lay on my shoulder. From out of the shadows and gaps between ponies, three lithe and dark coloured raiders emerged and grabbed me even when I tried to run. Shades! Barb's Shades!

"Oh you're not going anywhere, little pony!" One of them sneered at me even when I cried out and struggled, but no pony paid any heed. "Wildcard told you, didn't he? You'd never guess his surprise entry from behind the scenes..."

I screamed. I screamed for Coral, for Brimstone. For Red Eye even, to hear me and stop them. But telekinesis and ropes grabbed me, dragging and pulling me through the crowds toward the stairs leading down, the ones I'd been meekly guided through what felt like so long ago. No! Please no!

My hooves beat at them, but their indistinct forms twisted and scuffled back until I felt a hoof crash into my face. My nose, still fragile and hurt after My Master's beating, sent a wash of pain through my head and dizzied my vision. Cowed, I slumped and held it while they pulled me down into the fighting pits, whimpering helplessly.

"Wildcard was kind enough to give us a home, you really think some of us wouldn't just slip out of that Mall? That's what we do. When we heard he wanted somepony to fetch you for this place, we were all too happy to oblige. The Clan avenges its own!"

"Please... not the Pit, I... I can't fight..." They hurled me upon a dark stone floor around various other fearful-looking ponies.

They just scoffed, grins showing through the darkness. I knew this place, it was the waiting rooms before a match! Rotten benches and small cells to hold troublesome slaves lined the walls while the bloodily stained ramp that led to the main Pit gate was at the far side. I heard trotting coming down it.

"Isn't that the point? We're raiders, kiddo. Don't expect mercy or any sort of begging to work. You killed our Clan leader, this is revenge. Nothing heroic, just a simple reworking of the roster behind the scenes and then throwing you in with the boss..."

"Please..." They were fading away even while a gruff slaver came looking around the slaves, trying to find me and presuming I'd just hid away.

"Bye bye, feathers!" Their laughter only echoed lightly and faded away when they melted into the shadows. Even from beyond the grave, Barb's influence was against me.

"There you are!"

A hoof fell on my shoulder. I pleaded, begged him to check with Red Eye, even! But a crop raised and fell before I was dragged between his assistants. Every terror, mind numbing horror from before was coming back. There was no Littlepip to interrupt this time! Coral was stuck in the stands! Brimstone could barely even move after his runs! There was no pony to help me this time! Struggling, I beat at them, fighting... but again and again they fought me off and carted me up, before throwing me into the light.

I heard a gate slam, and a crowd roar so loud I almost screamed at the thudding headache.

Behind me, a maniacal giggle when I dared open my eyes.

I was in the Pit... and Wildcard was my opponent.

It felt like my life had come full circle.

She hadn't saved me. She had become something false to what I had believed.

Of course it would be the Pit to have it happen. That was why I'd not succeeded. My destiny would not let me die in a false belief. I could almost feel my cutie mark jangling and laughing through those gnashing shackles.

"Ooooh! Look who thinks he can take me on, huh? You a big tough stallion now? Are ya?"

Wildcard pranced and trotted in equal measure around the corpses and chemical spills that now crowded the floor of the Pit toward me. Down here in the middle of it, I had to fight to not breathe through my nose, it was a carnal pit now. My hooves felt damp from stepping in blood, the flies had descended, and even at a distance I could feel my chest thumping hard and driving my windpipe shut from that radioactive green sludge.

"No! No, I don't! I'm not meant to be in here! I... I give up! You win!" I backed away into the gate. Ahead of me, Wildcard laughed and leapt atop the huge corpse of Bonecrusher, his two machetes (from a barrel, presumably) held in his telekinesis either side casting thin shadows from the massive floodlights centred on him right in the middle.

"Aw, you want out, poor little pony! HAHAAA! NO CHANCE!" His face twisted from mock care to fury so quickly, before seething and stalking toward me. "You come into my ring, insult my skill by declaring you can beat me by coming here and then you have the balls to say you were just wasting my time?" One eye twitched. "You little shithead! C'mere, c'mere-c'mere-c'mere!"

He started galloping forward. Shrieking, I ran around the edge. Sprinting and crying all at once, I put my head down and tried to stay away from him as best I could. The crowd laughed and stomped their pleasure, but I was more concerned with the tap-tap-tapping of machete blades on the ground as he taunted me while chasing.

"Come here little Murky! Wildy's comin' to geeet yaaaa!"

I looked back to see him leisurely playing up his chase, acting to the crowd and with his tongue hanging out in delight. I screamed when I felt myself trip, then again as I saw it had been over Roaring Tiger's broken neck. The corpse fell to the side and swung lifeless eyes toward me. Scrambling back, I tried to climb the cage, but a slaver's baton only knocked me back in. No! No, let me out! Not like this! It would hurt! I didn't want to die like this!

Then the pain began, I felt a horrid tear upon my flank. Falling backwards, squealing aloud, I tried to clutch myself and only sat still with wide shocked eyes at the immense rip in my skin that bled upon the floor. I... I couldn't scream more, I just stared in disbelief when the pain crawled and spread. Instead, a low and fearful moan escaped my mouth toward Wildcard. The maniacal raider stood back, licking my blood from his giant blade and shivering in delight.

"P-please... don't do this!" I begged him, gritting my teeth. It hurt so much!

"Not when you taste like this! Oh it's good! Want some?"

The machete extended, while I crawled and pulled myself away. Ahead of me, through the cage I could see slavers throwing themselves upon a commotion. Coral blasted at least two away, running and trying to tear open a section of the damaged cage. I heard her screaming my name, but they just kept coming. A baton swung. She fell.

"You turning down my offers again? It's cool, man, it's cool... acquired taste and all. Coulda said 'No, thanks' though..." Wildcard wandered off to the side, giggling and keeping an eye on me even while I pulled myself past Top Quartz and Shovels. My leg leaked a trail behind me, every movement sending flares of sharp pain across my body. Yelping and crying aloud, the crowd seemed to enjoy the sight.

I desperately wanted someone to come and help me. Glimmer! Glimmerlight to... to cut the power and make it dark! Or... or Protégé come back and stop the event! Mister Peace! He could destroy the entire Pit!

But there was no sign of any of them. I was alone. Truly alone.

My leg was going numb from blood loss. Worse, I could feel myself breathing in less each time. Coughing and spluttering, I tried to suck in more oxygen to keep myself going. In the middle of the arena, they were treated to a little pegasus struggling to even breathe properly.

"I thought you'd like my surprise, I did tell you I had a wildcard entry, kid!" He grinned, looking around at the crowd. "They like it... everypony likes seeing pegasi get cut up. Something about the way you flop... oooh, it's artistic!"

The machete dropped in front of where I'd tried to limp to. Squeaking, I turned the other way only for the second to block me off again. Oh Goddesses, please lift me free of this! Not like this! I turned and galloped, crying out at the pain of even moving my cut leg, and falling across myself. That cry turned to a higher pitch when something dug into my flesh and pulled hard. Twisting, I saw a large slender hook dug through my other flank, sunk in and pulling so hard my body's flesh was shifting off my figure! The feeling as my flesh lifted and pulled the rest of me back, the hook tearing at it inside! I wanted to flail, but the movements hurt so much! My hooves struggled, trying to pull at it while the string attached tugged me slowly across the floor, screaming as I went. It hurt so bad... why... why in here?

"No trying to run! I got a lot more for you!" Wildcard's magic drew the hook out of me, squirting blood as its barb on the tip ripped my flesh.

A horrible sensation took over, my back legs... I... I couldn't feel them! I'd lost so much blood from my little body that I couldn't properly feel them I... I... I...

I coughed, it grew into a hacking convulsion. The stress and lack of air from proper measured breathing was getting too much. In front of everypony I flopped and vomited blood, clutching my chest, my pupils shrinking. A feeling like thick liquid in my throat as it started all over again... my illness had gone unnoticed for far too long and now it was doing its job. Seething through my scabbed neck, it was killing me as much as Wildcard.

"Oooh... radiation is it? Well now, that gives me an idea! The crowd'll like this one! HAH!"

I was being dragged across the pit, trailing blood and unable to even properly breathe. Juddering and coughing up wads to try and get my windpipe clear, I felt my vision go hazy. M-maybe if I could d-drown in it it'd be less p-painful...

I was so scared, in so much pain...

I wished Brimstone had never saved me. It hurt so much now in front of the hundreds who cheered for my death like they would have weeks ago.

He dumped me beside the chemical pile, within feet of the hissing liquid. I squirmed, seeing the steaming liquid pop and fly nearby. Thoughts of seeing a pony flayed to the bone by it came to mind, and in a moment of desperation I lashed out.

One of my hooves struck his jawline before he began talking. His eyes went wide as the movement made him bite his tongue hard. Wandering back, clutching his mouth, I saw his eyes fill with rage, of that unleashed insanity lurking inside him.

"Ooh... y-you little brat! My tongue! I taste with that tongue! I don't have a spare! You're going in that fucking goo! Right in! Hooves first so you feel it the entire way! Fuck you!"

He charged forward, both machetes lifting from the ground! I felt the chemical pile right behind me. I'd... I'd only get one chance at this! He was running so fast, heedless and right at me! My lungs contracting, jawline covered in red from leakage out of my mouth, I swung up to get my hooves facing him, if I timed this wrong...

He stopped.

Then he laughed. Stomping his hooves and even dropping his weapons, he laughed as much as the crowd and rolled onto his back, howling with mirth.

"You... you actually thought I'd fall for that? HAHAHA! That's brilliant! Oh you actually thought you could survive this!"

Rolling back up, wiping his eyes, Wildcard sauntered nearby, before dragging me away from the chemicals with his magic.

"You never even think about that after me there's five others? You wanna know why you wouldn't beat me? Because fuck you, that's why!"

His hoof struck my face, dizzying me. I felt myself lifted up, before the whole crowd. Telekinesis caught my upper body and lifted my beaten, bleeding and dying sick body before them. I felt ready to pass out, my mind reeling.

"You insulted me by thinking you could win! But hey? It's cool man, I'm cool with it! It's like... philosophy of entertainment, right? You make the crowd think I was gonna fail! Cool man! I like it! Really!"

There was a pain. A pain like no other. I'd been stabbed before, but this was so much more. A piercing feeling, a push and bulging like I'd eaten too much before it emerged.

Under the approving crowd, I looked down from hanging in his magic to see his machete blade protruding from my stomach.

He'd... he'd impaled me.

I couldn't even scream through my throat, just a low and painful moan at the three feet of cold metal right through me. I felt him close to my ear, whispering.

"You probably thought this little part of your adventure was over, right? That you'd hear the moral of the story and that'd be it for another while?"

"P-p-plea..."

"Well, I don't play by the rules of drama, kid. There's no hero to save you. You likely had it in your head, 'Oh, I almost died last time from falling, there won't be any big scare again for a while, right?' Cos' stories work like that... preservation of impact, right?"

I felt a cold touch on my neck, the second one. The crowd was chanting, but everything had fallen away. There was just me and him... and I was fading quickly, mortally wounded. I felt the pain begin to kick in, spreading and clenching over my whole torso as everything inside me rebelled at the blade pushing through them.

"But you see, I never did like that. Gotta innovate, y'know? So here's a curveball for you. What if you died now? How would the little story in your head like that?"

"N-no..."

"Yeeees... they're all watching you. Some might want this, sick bastards they are like me. But most might be screaming at me right now to let you go. Only no matter how loud they swear and scream, I'll never hear them. Why don't you scream for them all right now? One last scream before I pull?"

Before me, through the cloudy eyesight, past the dulled sounds of everyone watching me in this Pit, I saw Coral slamming on the cage, pulled down by slavers as she tried her all to no avail.

Brimstone's words were the ones in my head though. His first ever words to me.

"Put on a braver face there, don't let them have the pleasure."

My mouth stammered, wanting to scream for help. But I knew I was alone.

"Come on... do it!"

I could feel my body failing, everything going numb.

"DO IT!"

I couldn't hold it back... so much pain! I couldn't even breathe.

"Oops!"

The machete blade drew, I felt my neck open and something leak over my chest. A horrible gurgling, a numb feeling of falling to the ground. Quivering, in enough pain that my mind simply reeled and looked to the sky with strange clarity to where a hole in the cage had once been. I couldn't even raise a hoof to try and wish for her to please... please just save me.

She didn't save you.

Killing the Slave

"Game's over, my little pony! You didn't find your precious freedom."

"If you don't mind, what was it like?"

Y-you mean?

"To die."

I did not fall.

That caught me by surprise. I simply... was. Hanging, drifting without moving anywhere. What had happened? I remembered pain, blood, lying on a hard floor amongst bodies of ponies and trying to move my hooves. I... I'd wanted to catch the blood, try to put it back in!

What had happened since then? I couldn't see anything! It felt like there were two unexplainable forces in my head, tugging me one way or the other. But I didn't move. Was there anything to move? I couldn't see or hear myself. No weight.

Something tugged one way, then the other. I saw patterns without eyes, inconceivable and impossible shapes that bore my journey to everywhere. But still those forces. Was it my soul? Every inch of my non-existent body was shivering. How did that make sense? My mind reeled, my perceptions experiencing claustrophobia, vertigo, and loss of balance all at once while I was hurled and thrown by forces I would never understand or truly be able to describe in words that did any justice.

A painful light. The one thing I could see. Burning hard and bright like metal being welded, radiating waves of aching reality above an encompassing dark void of calm. Both sucked at me, tearing me across distances until I was nothing but a thinly-spread and ruined shell, unable to truly grasp the events affecting him.

Slowly, the pain grew all too much. It hurt me. It hurt so bad.

I hadn't even realised I'd been hanging onto any sort of ledge when I let go and whirled my way into the void below.

I fell. No, I didn't fall. I travelled. No up or down or point of reference. I simply moved. Something taking me somewhere, a force I couldn't fight.

Time passed. Minutes, hours... days. I had nothing to think about, simply so long within this place that would occasionally shift me into another plane of the same darkness. I learned the colours of nothing and I saw the unthinkable distances of shadows. Where had I come from? A city. A painful city of chains. I was not chained any longer, that I knew. But why was I here?

A whipping sense of turbulent nature grasped me. A leering face and a thick blood-stained blade. He'd killed me! That was right! Was this what happened?

Was I to meet with the Goddesses? I could not comprehend the form of their afterlife!

Time passed. Nothing changed. Nothing other than the one sense I had left of a distance so unimaginably large from the world I'd known only growing bigger and bigger, until I could no longer even remember how far I had travelled away from the harsh light.

A solidity was approaching. Something else. My mind focused on it, having spent the last vast stretches of eternity simply praying and hoping it was over. It grew bigger, more forceful. A thicker harshness in the void.

Even while I was sped toward it. I looked back to see the harsh light.

It was impossible to see, the eons of life so distant to me.

Washing over me, I realised I no longer remembered why I was here all over again.

My ears pricked and twitched. I heard a light whisper of wind and the hiss of drifting ash. Almost to my own shock, I heard myself groan. A smell entered my nostrils, dry and sandy. An aching glare began to show through the cracks of... my eyes?

Slowly, gasping and twisting, I found myself lying on my side and rolled onto my back. A sensation of movement! Of presence! I was somewhere!

Through my ears, I heard a whispering. On the wind, a voice carried.

"...ttle ponies..."

Was somepony there? I sat up and groaned when my eyes shot open to meet the sun's radiance. Down from above, even sheltered by the clouded sky, it hurt and stung so much that I squinted and brought a hoof up to cover them while sitting up. Below me my hooves staggered and reacted sluggishly like a drunkard. I expected to be in pain, but there was nothing.

Just a numbness.

Then even before I was able to see where I was, I realised the truth.

I couldn't feel anything.

No, that wasn't right. I felt pain in my eyes from the light and a dull sensation of touch, but my nerves were numbed and without proper textile feel. When I rubbed my own face I couldn't feel it! Staggering, yelping out loud, I fell even while trying to stand up quickly in shock. I didn't even fully feel anything but the light pain of falling upon my chest. I tried to gasp, but no air entered my lungs. I wasn't breathing! I could breathe by habit, yet there was no air to take in... but I was still alive!

Twisting, shivering, and scared, I finally got my eyes open to look around me. Please, somepony tell me where I was! Why was I even here? What brought me here?

The sight would have stolen any breath I had away. Around me, expanding and disappearing to the horizon, I saw freedom itself.

The Equestrian Wasteland.

Rolling dusty hills of drifting sand and dead vegetation, over rotten expanses of fields and plains. High cliffs far in the distance rose high and bore the scars of balefire. Down from above, a brighter sun than I ever remembered cast jagged shadows from every outcrop, ditch, and dry riverbed in a world with all colours stolen from it, left with but an earthy dry tone from ground to cloud.

Wisps of wind carried little cyclones of dust across the wastes, raking dead leaves or setting dry twigs rocking in the breeze. Around me it was the only true motion other than the lethargic clouds above. No matter where I looked, I saw nothing but everlasting wastes from the hillside I had woken up on.

Hesitantly and shakily, I began to stand up. Having to visually watch my hooves and ensure they were as they should be, I got to my hooves and cast my head around. I could see for at least a few miles in every direction, to each cliff, hill, field, and forest. There were no settlements or indications of life. Not even a brahmin.

"...fallen, no news, wastelan..."

Was that my imagination? The wind? What I'd thought were words disappeared on the light wind, barely audible.

"Hello?"

The words were spoken loudly, having to push my nerves to shout against the quiet expanse. But the world ate them, allowing only an almost silent echo.

"Hello? Is anypony there?"

Louder. I shouted, turning this way and that.

Absolutely nothing. My words were lost to the wind.

A strange sense filled me. This was freedom. I wasn't in Fillydelphia anymore! I was in the wastes! I was free! Free to go anywhere! Do anything! There were no chains, my body felt fine, and nopony nearby to take me in! My chest no longer felt tight, the swelling in my breast having subsided in this cleaner air while every injury seemed to have gone. My nose felt straight again! My radsores were gone!

A quick glance over showed me my wildest dreams. My fleece was repaired! The whip marks and scars were all gone! My wings still didn't move, but the pain had stopped. I just felt normal. Free of pain.

Free!

Wasn't this what I had always wanted?

If so, why did I just feel lonely?

Staggering to start with, I began to trot. I didn't choose a direction. I just went forward. Maybe once I got over the next hill and stood atop those far off cliffs, I might be able to see some sort of settlement.

My hooves sunk slightly in the dust as I moved downhill. My ears remained perked up and listening for anything in the distance. But nothing other than the thin blows of wind and my own light trotting met them. Moving from dust to rock, I stopped only briefly to check the position of the sun. I needed shelter before dark!

Thankfully, it was just before midday. I had plenty of time yet.

I climbed another hill, descending it quickly before tackling the next one. Every so often I trotted over to some rock formations or a lonely dead tree. Trotting around them, seeing the crispy blackened tree bark or hunting for any signs of somepony's old camp, I always found nothing. I climbed a rock once, struggling against my numbed sense of touch until I stood atop it. Even looking around, I saw little other than distant peaks of some huge mountain range, bereft of the snow I had always imagined. This land was sick, but in the absence of anything else living it simply seemed dead. Like I was wandering over a grave of nature itself. There weren't even any signs of ruined houses or farms.

My journey continued. I didn't feel tired, just scared. Nothing happened, but the lack of event was chilling. A fifth hill passed, then a tenth. Before long, I had counted twenty long ascents and stumbling trips downhill. I kept trotting for hours to reach the higher cliffs and only then began the steep ascent. I thought as I travelled, thought of this new life and what I would make of it. I needed to find somepony and figure out my way to someplace safe! Or the way to Shattered Hoof and see if my mother was still there! Was Shattered Hoof even nearby? What if I was on the other side of the planet?

How had I even got here? The last thing I remembered was pain. So much pain. A desire for peace and then a terror so great as to make me shiver. I had died. Oh Goddesses, he'd killed me!

I froze, fighting between the lack of air assaulting every instinctive habit I had and the subconscious need to hyperventilate! He'd killed me! I died! I'd been sent to the afterlife, hadn't I? It was an eternity!

Tears welled up in my eyes while I stood upon the sharp cliff-side. Pacing in place, I looked back across the ten miles or so I'd trotted and shivered badly. Was this a punishment? But I was free? I didn't understand!

Turning, I galloped up the cliff. I needed to know! It would get dark soon! The sun was just nearing the edge before it would get dark! I had maybe an hour at most! I had to find something from here! Skidding and slipping, I rushed to the edge of the cliff, high up enough that my mane blew and my ears had to drop down to protect themselves from the whipping gales.

Panicking, I turned my head in every direction.

Nothing.

I saw a massive cluster of boulders in to one side, about twenty miles away and so thick they looked like a rock forest. A dry seabed lay just beside it before meeting more rolling hills with sharp rocky outlets if I kept my head turning. They gave way to a dead forest of sharp branches and a drop below sea level beyond that. To the other side lay nothing but plains expanding until the hazy heat of the wasteland warped my vision. The same mountains I'd seen before covered the rest of this massive vista across the wastes. I was surrounded by a varied and incredible terrain scaled in ways I never had dreamed of or noticed during my time as a slave in the wastes, and yet I saw nothing.

Not a single smokestack or empty house. No wildlife, horrid beasts, or any ponies of any sort.

"Hello! Please, if anypony's there, help me!" I screamed from the cliff until I choked and gasped, drawing air that wasn't there. The feeling was becoming increasingly unsettling the longer it went on. I could feel wind but there was no air. Why wasn't I choking?

My worries, however, lay with the prospect of being left alone in a pitch dark wasteland all night. Who knew what came out of its lurking holes then? Thoughts of being chased by feral zombie ghouls when I couldn't see were mixed with lurking eyes watching from the distance in my imagination. The sun was descending!

I had to make a choice. I chose the forest. Coral and Glimmer's village had been hidden in one, maybe I'd find one too!

Turning, I cantered downhill. I wanted to gallop, but I couldn't exhaust myself. I'd cover more ground at a canter.

I just couldn't stop shivering! A desperation was overtaking me. A lonely ache in my heart filled with the paranoia that I was simply all alone forever! I didn't even know this place! Why was I even here? What happened? The last thing I remembered was just a lot of pain and fear! Sweating, I thought hard. I'd tried to kill myself, but Brimstone had saved me! What had happened after that? I felt like I'd known a few minutes ago, but it had drifted from my memory almost immediately.

I just didn't know. It all turned blurry and then I was here. I just couldn't remember. Had I died in my sleep? Just passed away like many slaves did?

The thought terrified me in its sheer simple logic.

Reaching the bottom of the slope, I set out across the bumpy fields, weaving between wild clumps of hedge and bracken. My mind twisted, hurting inside. Wait, there was terror! Had somepony kill—

He'd killed me!

How could I forget that? He'd killed me and now I was gone!

Sweating, I kept my head looking around. Passing across a dry riverbed, I clawed and struggled at the crumbling sides until the harder rock let me pull myself out and continue my journey toward that silent forest. I wasn't going to make it, the sun was—

Looking up and blinking, I saw the sun was resting just before midday.

Hadn't it just been about to set? What was going on? I turned my head, looked to the place I had just seen it. But every time I blinked it seemed unmoving, as though it were resetting forever. An eternal daytime.

Staggering, trotting away from it like I could somehow escape the sun itself, I just shook my head. I had to look back at the ground and try to ignore it. Stumbling over every rock I couldn't feel with my dead nerves, it took me guiding every hoof by sight to keep going over this rockier field.

Up ahead, the forest loomed, high trees arching over one another with empty branches rustling lightly. Splintering cracks at the wind bending their decaying trunks gave off unearthly sounds that broke the wind drawn silence of before.

It took me many hours to reach the forest. The distance was deceptive and the way was slow. But I didn't feel tired, just scared. Scared of being alone in a world with nopony else to see.

What was going on?

I couldn't remember why I was even here. What had happened again? I remembered being in Fillydelphia, but then nothing.

What had happened that brought me here, again?

The twig snapped under my hoof. Freezing on the spot out of sheer habit, I glanced around to see if anypony had heard or spotted me.

Nothing. Just empty shells of trees clustering around me thickly over a dark brown earth. The light from above sent spidery webs of light through the thick branches. Even through the clouds it seemed to light up clearings and pathways for me, with the dust spiralling into the dull beams.

I'd wandered the forest for so long now. Three times I'd sworn I saw the sun about to set and pulled myself into the bracken to try and hide before sleep. I hadn't gotten any. Every time my eyes had closed, I'd opened them simply to see the angle of the sun was constant, waiting for me to get back up. No tiredness or drowsy feelings fell across my mind no matter how many cycles I saw.

So I simply trotted onward, my quest to find something to make sense of all this. Many times I had stopped to press my eyes shut and try to remember everything or simply to cry. It was pathetic, but it had been so long without anypony around me. I'd never been truly alone in my life! Never been without order or direction. I didn't like this!

Sometimes I would gallop for hours until I fell over my own dulled hooves. Pain penetrated the numbness, I had discovered.

Typical.

My ears perked up. A breeze of wind carrying through the trees. I'd heard words now and again, unnerving me with a single hint of presence in this dead world. I was truly alone, yet something was out there.

The thought scared me as much as it reassured me.

"...ssacre... rbu... rry..."

Looking around at this ongoing forest, I tried to make any sense of it or locate some sort of pony-made path. But there were no tracks. Not even any animal routes. Even the trees seemed to lack nests or old holes for birds! Not a single piece of living wildlife had appeared. Not even a skeleton! Just trees. Ever thickening trees. Trees that shifted and brushed, growing closer and closer until I was having to squeeze between them over rotten and muddy swampland to proceed. Soon, I was having to pull myself up and over, or clamber under, huge roots that arced up taller than a pony. They spread from trees thicker than the giant stone pillars in Fillydelphia.

Was this all freedom was?

I wasn't sure that I enjoyed it as much as I'd dreamed. I just felt beyond the reach of anypony. Was I supposed to be enjoying this feeling?

What if it really was like this?

Panicking, pacing on the spot, I made a gallop forward. There had to be something! The forest would end soon! Somepony would be up ahead in a settlement or cave or something! Pulling through twigs and bucking dead wood to the ground, I clawed and tugged my way through. All the way my mind fretted. Slavery was so much pain but this was beyond sanity! There had to be somepony! My friends! Glimmer! Brimstone! Anypony!

Up ahead, I saw some light through the closing squeeze of trees and swampland. Yes! Light! That meant something causing it!

My back legs kicked, I threw mud up, and tugged long dry vines out of my way. I felt my body crushed between trunks as I slipped and fell between them. Crying out and flipping over, I let my frail body roll out to the dry ground. Gallop, Murky! Gallop! Light! Somepony was out there!

I broke the edge of the woods, landing with a dull thump on the dusty plains of the Wasteland once again. Pushing through the ache, I looked up with a smile!

Before me, the endless plains of the wasteland greeted me, the horizon ringed with high mountains and forested hills. The sun shone just enough through a crack in the cloud cover that it had sent the light I had seen.

"No. No! Please, come on!"

Cantering forward, looking desperately from left to right, I saw the forest I had just left arcing down to the edge of the sea. All the water was gone, replaced by a horribly endless dry flat land.

There was nothing.

I fell to the ground, hopeless as every muscle in my body sank.

"...dead... ope los..."

The words sent shivers across my body. The world itself was taunting me! The Wasteland in its horrid glory torturing the only pony left in it with the sounds of a hopeless dream to meet somepony out here!

My memory reeled, how long had I been here? How far had I trotted? Oh Goddesses, had it been a week?

"Somepony!" I cried it, galloping forward. I fell, got back up with great effort through the numbness. "Anypony! HELP!"

The wind carried nothing, no voices. I galloped forward into the plains, cresting small hills, a desperate charge in any direction! I travelled still, counting down miles as I screamed and begged somepony to just be there!

"PLEASE!" I looked behind rocks, climbed trees as best I could, hunted in a cave, and even moved into the mountains before the heights forced me to turn back with a storm of wind. I found myself amid the plains, alone and not tired in the slightest. Set to wander eternally through this featureless land of no memories.

"Somepony please help me!" Atop a hill, I spun, shouting in all directions. "Is anypony out there!? I don't know what's going on!"

"...pony who... ir drea... fell to wastes..."

My head shot up, screaming after the wind as it whirled away with a voice.

"I don't know! I don't know what happened! Why am I here!? I don't want to be alone!"

Frantic, trying to reach out and grab the wind, as stupid as it was, I fell. Falling, rolling down the low embankment in a spray of dust, I coughed and curled up to wait. To wait for eternity as I saw the sun once again reset and refuse to allow me the sleep that would remove the waiting.

"Lost?"

My eyes shot open. Lifting my head, I looked around rapidly. I couldn't see anypony.

"Wh-who's there?" I felt my words stammer and tumble badly. Every feeling I'd gotten of meeting somepony for the first time and being shy heightened to an unimaginable degree after this isolation. How long had it been? A full day? No, longer. I couldn't remember! It felt so short.

That voice though, wasn't it...

Only when I stopped looking did I hear them again.

"Behind you, Murky Number Seven."

The voice didn't sound strong, but even its presence frightened me. Spinning around, I saw him and almost screamed, falling backward into the wastes and numbly scrambling away! A small pony standing before me, having sneaked up!

He was a wretched shell of a pony. Tiny, frail, and with legs so thin I could see the edges of bone even while they shivered at the effort of simply keeping his body up. A ruined black fleece was draped across him, stained and doing nothing to hide severe injuries. Whip marks adorned his back. I could see dripping blood from them. His face held huge radsores that seemed to swell out of the skin with soaked up radiation and weeping pus. Behind them I saw sunken bloodshot eyes that had known no sleep.

A horrid ruin of a pony, mistreated and hurt, yet it advanced on me! Rolling over, I tried to run and fell on my own face. Why had I lost feeling? I simply crawled low, scurrying to roll over the lip of the hill.

“Come back!” That rasping voice from a bloody and thickened throat!

“S-stay away!”

Bandaged wings fell limply by his torso, leading to burns and parts of his filthy dark green coat falling out to reveal bruised skin.

Then it hit me, where I knew that voice.

It was me.

It was me right before I’d come here. Broken, battered, and edging so close to death. I could even see a trickle of red from the edge of his mouth.

“Stay away!” I simply cried out and backed off, this broken form of me advancing with hazy eyes. Was I really that bad? Had they hurt me so much? It looked like a moving corpse that dripped blood from its very neck and stumbled on stick-like legs.

“I’m you, it’s all right.”

“What’s going on?” I shouted back, holding out a hoof, moving backward every time it came closer. What was this place? Why was I here? I didn’t understand anything! Goddesses save me from this nightmare!

“You came.” This ruin of a pony limped forward, trotting unevenly as he circled my own numbed but otherwise cleaner and uninjured body. I felt unable to move, just following ‘him’ with my head as best I could, realising I could not escape him. Despite that limping, every time I blinked he was closer, always moving just enough to keep up.

“I thought I’d never find you, thought you hadn’t come at all. I was getting worried.”

My own voice from that mouth sounded raspy and thick with gurgling bile. A hoof went to my chest. That disease had hurt so much. I was finally seeing it in myself here. Yet ‘he’ sounded uncaring and settled, as though speaking from experience or sudden relief.

“Welcome, though. I’m so glad you followed ‘us’ here, albeit accidentally. I don’t understand that.”

“A-accidentally? I don’t know what you mean!” I shook and took a step back as I saw those lifeless eyes with pinprick pupils.

“By choosing to come here into the peaceful reward for slaves, of course. You act like you’re lost and scared, but isn’t this what you wanted these last days? No pony will ever hurt you again. Never hurt us. There’s no orders, no slavery. No cold nights or great hunger. No pony will ever tell us what to do ever again. I... we... you... it’s finally over.”

My eyes went wide, falling to my haunches.

“Y-you mean?” I bit my lip. “No, no this has to be some sort of... fever dream! Like this is what I’m seeing while fighting to survive a horrible injury! I can’t be—”

The slave before me shook his head before nodding at the last words. My hooves went to my face. This couldn’t be true. Not just like that!

“Yes, you are.” He moved a hoof to his chest, sitting down. “You died. Wildcard killed you and now it’s all over at last. It has ended. It hurt, but no pony can hurt you ever again!”

You have peace at last."

I could only feel my eyes tear up again. This wasn't what I imagined.

"But it's what you want." The form before me smiled, knowing what I was thinking. "Look me in the eyes. Isn't this what we always wanted? Who better than yourself to remind you? I'm a part of you. I know it's what you wanted, seeking an end to the pain. They won't take our dignity."

Nodding my head, I sniffed. "Y-yes. W-will there be any more?"

"No!" The ruined pony shook his... my... head and smiled. "It might not be your fantasy, but this is freedom."

"It's not how I wanted it. My fri—"

The Ruin (I couldn't help but give it some title) interrupted me sharply, standing up.

"You don't know what freedom is, Murk! You wanted to taste it. That's what your Master told us long ago, remember? After his griffon stopped you? He told you that you needed to taste freedom! Well here it is!"

He swung a hoof around. I could see that passion even without pupils. The same I'd once shown and the delight to have anything for myself. I didn't recognise myself, but I saw it in him.

"This waste, it's one of the ways you can face where we go now. But this is dying a slave, eternally wandering without orders. What kind of pony needs to be shown the truth by himself? You're just confused, a lost part of me and us that doesn't quite know how to properly die. Listen. Right now, this is not on the cusp between life and death. There is no life to go back to. This is simply between peace and pain."

His tone had taken a dark turn, moving closer across the dusty hill to stand before me.

"Have you really locked all those wishes away so much in your terror that you cannot even remember them when they are shown to you? We can take our freedom right now, Murk! He can't catch us this time! Be lost to the open eternity away from pain and torment. I'm so sorry it wasn't how you wanted, but it's finally here in some way. Peace or pain, Murk. This is it. The time to make the choice."

"T-to live or die?" I stammered back, sweating.

"To die a slave or die peacefully, Murk. It's the only choice left. We can't go back to the light of life any more. It became too much. Our body simply passed on." The Ruin lost its smile, sidling up beside me. "Now, to simply lie down and take the horror of this barren emptiness of purpose... or follow me, the part of you that knows the pain like no other, and that knows you can find peace from this wasteland with a simple jump."

Soundlessly, the dust before me yawned out and parted. Yelping, I fell back as ledges formed and dust swirled into the void opening up. So deep that the edges of stone simply disappeared into a misty nothing below! It wasn't solid black, instead a hazy tone of the horizon reflected closer than the eye should ever be able to comprehend. True eternity below me.

Then I noticed the Ruin hadn't moved. He simply seemed to rest in the air above the hole as though walking on solid ground. That battered head of mine turned back at me.

"Do you want to die a slave? This is the way to escape. Give yourself to the peace and allow yourself to fall as far from the painful light as you can. Take the chance and make that one choice to throw yourself into that place where you want to feel no more pain. Somewhere their chains will never find you and you can finally know rest."

Every joint ached as I shivered and sweated under stress. This was all too much for me to take in or to understand. What kind of decision was this? For peace? I wanted peace. If I was dead, I didn't want to die in pain and remembering all the hurt...

"You can forget all that." Its eyes narrowed, knowing me. "If you remain here, you will spend eternity a slave. You noticed that in the forest. That panic without anypony around to give you an order? You're still a slave here, Murk. But fall, leap to the void, and we will escape those bonds at last. To a place our cutie mark can no longer even tell us our destiny. No matter what it tells us at all."

I moved closer, looking down to the contrasting warp of colour and form that betrayed a fall long beyond measure.

"It's not empty. It is a place of peace. You need only make the journey to the place we truly want, further down. Further away. You tried before, remember?"

The colours shifted, becoming that of gravel under fresh rain. My face twisted, tears dripping free into the pit.

"Just lean forward and it all ends forever. The story of the born slave who escaped to a peaceful afterlife, Murk. Tragedy turned to albeit only bittersweet freedom, but it is the best we can have."

I stepped back, trotting away from it to lie on the ground and face away from the gaping hole. Pulling my hooves above my head, I shook it again and again.

"I don't know! I just don't know! I'm sorry, I'm so scared and I— this is all..."

The Ruin of my own body at the will of My Masters trotted over. I felt his wasted hooves beside me before one settled across my back.

"It's alright. It's okay to be scared. I'm scared too, but I'm the part of us that felt so much of it. Please..."

The hoof lifted my head up, trying to smile through cracked and dry lips.

"...an end to a life of abuse and pain. All with but one fall."

I glanced back, before turning to him. This was all so much. I needed to know.

"What will I find down there?"

The Ruin paused, then patted my shoulder.

"The beauty of this being our own spirit and soul around here? I can show you. You can show yourself."

The entire world shifted. Like somepony unravelling paper from a foal's model, the surface of what I saw around me peeled and faded. Staring in wide eyed wonder, I saw mountains lift and silently breeze into the sky while rocks folded and surged. The ground slid from beneath my feet and left me standing over nothing without falling. A sense of weightlessness overcame me while reality as I knew it hid and reshaped, sliding silently into a new form in the moments that I blinked. By the time I'd rubbed my eyes to even check if I were seeing this right, I was no longer in the Wastes.

Around me, lush green grass slid against my unfeeling legs. The sky above shone bright through patchy white clouds cleaner than I had ever known! I slid, almost falling before I realised we were on a sharp incline.

This was the world in my dreams. Equestria of old.

From tall mountains, marble white structures hung. Colossal and distant, they gave way to spiralling towers topped with purple and gold. The glint of clean unbroken glass shimmered like the sea's surface across the cities upon mountains like the one I'd seen in the pictures in Stable Ninety Three! Ponds and rivers flowed gently around open forests. Near us, small homes sent thin streaks of smoke into the sky through cream brick chimneys, each with space of its own upon the high hills that made up the mid ground between wondrous snowy peaks and deep valleys of a colourful world. Rainbows shimmered above waterfalls while I saw natural built fences leading the way along gravel paths to every incredible corner or home below the mountain cities!

A world of unparalleled artistic beauty and peace. The sound of wind, water, and brushing vegetation crafting a deliciously calming melody into the air.

The Ruin stood beside me just behind a rock, smiling thinly through that battered face. A broken nose reacted oddly to the movement, before casting a hoof outward.

"The peace we can take, Murk. That you can live in forever. Safe and secure to do as you will."

"This is incredible..."

"This is the reward, for when a slave has finished his or her toil, their death is but their contract finally breaking and permitting them their freedom. Most find it naturally and happily. You... I... we're not like that. Born slaves who sometimes need a little push more. That feeling holding you from falling, that is the slave in your mind, Murk. But from what we saw, dreams can show us the way to here."

I almost didn't listen. My eyes simply travelled around at this world of colour and beauty.

"All this?"

"All this. That could be your home there if you wanted. Go! Take a look, see for yourself what awaits."

That was an offer I couldn't turn down. My numb body shifted and staggered but I found my way to the indicated living area. Just a little cottage surrounded by a low river built of light-coloured wood. Nervous, I passed through the open door to find my dream home.

One whole room, a thick bed near a small fireplace right next to soft cushions upon the floor to relax upon. Woodwork furniture surrounding the carpeted floor in patterns that astounded every artistic part of my mind! Frames set upon the walls bore my most treasured drawings, and a cabinet housed all of my belongings to tell my tale. Warm food sat ready on a table by the window, while large windows let light stream upon my home. What took my attention more than anything was the back that opened onto a fantastic view of the valleys. An open balcony sat waiting for me to spend my days sitting in peace, drawing this beauty for eternity! There was even my journal waiting.

"All it takes is one word, one agreement, and it's all yours for real, Murk."

The Ruin trotted in behind me, every step breaking the illusion to a dark rot beneath his hooves. The hideous brutality done to my body that he now displayed clearly overruled even this illusionary visit to paradise.

"Forever," I muttered to myself, moving onto the balcony. Pausing, I closed my eyes and simply took in the serenity and relief. My body felt at peace. There was nothing to worry about in this world. Absolutely nothing. I could just sit here and draw my thoughts and feelings forever, with nopony ever wanting to hurt me ever again.

The thought was so tempting.

Allowing myself to smile toward my ruined body staring back at me, I leaned down to pick up my journal. Maybe just one drawing...

I squeaked out loud, almost crying out in terror as it simply broke apart in my hooves.

Hopping back, I put a hoof to the wall to steady myself, finding it tearing apart and bending like a fragile and damp piece of paper!

"What's going on!?" Staggering back again, I placed my hooves to the chair, the fence. All were broken under the lightest of touches!

"Nothing is wrong, Murk!" The Ruin trotted up quickly, his deathly cold touch pushing me back from the walls. "You don't need to notice this. This is peaceful, right? Fragile or not, this is peace for you where you might do as you will!"

"B-but I c-can't. This isn't right! It's just pretend, like a model!"

"Peace or pain! What is an illusion to an eternity of enslavement in your own death, Murk? It's better than nothing!"

I crossed my hooves, biting my lip and looking around. A tightness in my chest born of stress grew and grew. How could I trust him? But he was me! Was this right? I didn't know! I just didn't understand any of this!

"You cannot be free and live with your mind seeing all, Murk!" The Ruin insisted, his hooves on my shoulders and that stinking mangy blood-coated body of mine closer than I found comfortable. "This is all we have! The peace of eternity in our own make-believe dreams or the pain of always feeling alone and without direction without your master to guide you! We have to choose how our soul dies. Surely you can see this is the better option! Please! For our sake! Make it end!"

He was pleading me! I was pleading me! Was this really all I had? I... I...

Something was missing. Something huge.

Sniffing, wiping an eye I sat back and covered my face. An ebbing feeling in the back of my head, like I was on the cusp of remembering something important kept slipping just away from my tongue. I could be here! Safe! Blissful peace to draw and rest forever without anypony around.

Without anypony...

That was it.

"I can't." I saw the Ruin's eyes widen as I looked up. "I want my friends."

Something caught my eye. Without even waiting for a reply, I glanced around him to see a trickle of liquid on the wall from behind one picture. Accelerating as it descended, more followed with drips and slick oil coating the wall, like paint thinner drooling and sapping the colour into a hazed light grey.

Only now did I see truly how this world lacked true colour. Spread outward, the liquid bubbled and dropped the picture from the wall. One that held me standing alone in the bottom left with my wings outstretched, looking blank. Behind it I saw a shining surface, like a mirror forming from liquid metal that was spreading the colour, sapping wetness all over the wall onto the ceiling and floor.

The Ruin grabbed my head, turning it away from the sight that transfixed and confused me in equal measure.

"Don't look! Don't look at it!"

A scream echoed across the valleys. The oozing liquid that consumed the entire wall and sought to sap all vibrancy from an already distorted world pulsed and shook with a low aching groan. But I knew the scream. That long drawn out howl of a whole life's agony! Trying to force my head past, I almost fought with the Ruin. Let me see!

"Don't look, Murk!" He screamed to me. "It will only hurt you! You don't need to see it! That is your memory trying to infect and hurt you by showing you the pain surrounding them in Fillydelphia! You can escape it! Please, come with me! Don't give it the chance to enslave you!"

"I want my friends!"

"They're lost to you, Murk! Let go! Life is over!"

There was a wet crunch. I heard blood dribble. Unable to pull my eyes away, I forced past the skeletal form of the Ruin to look into the strange shimmering apparition that had spread from where an entire home wall once was.

Now there was but a framework, a dripping wasteland style ruin, coated in writhing, colourless liquid filled with a malign life! Within it though, I saw something. Me.

Lying cast upon gravel under a storm of rain, I saw the picture of myself, broken and lifeless. My limbs hung like a castaway rag doll. Yes, I had known that scream! The one that had burst from my lungs against all the pain and abuse of my life when I had fallen! Now I looked upon the result. I saw my death. My self inflicted escape from the pain. If I could feel my own body, I might have felt sick at the very sight of terrified eyes wide open even in death, showing the very last frightened stare that had led me to jump. Wildcard had been the one to kill me in the end, but that didn't hide that I had chosen to fall by my own admission.

"See, Murk? It is only the painful memories! Even if that wasn't how it happened, it was in your mind still! Such thoughts don't disappear just because you failed once and everypony was sad! They linger. They hurt you forever. It's what has brought us to this choice. I beg you, Murk, turn and come with me now before it hurts you with what is to come! Do what you wanted. Run away and we can rest as one forever unto eternity alone and safe."

"I... I can't. This is me and..."

"We are you, Murk!" The Ruin pulled at me. "We can still stop this. Leave before the pain comes, your memory trying to reach you and find you no matter how deep I take you! Only by jumping once more can it truly be escaped! This world could be beautiful and yours again, for all its fragility, but you have to go now! Just one word, Murk. One agreement and it's all over."

I saw large bubbles surge across the surface of the liquid images. It began to spread, seeking me. My hooves remained still. I couldn't take my eyes from my own crushed body.

"Come on! Before—"

Another scream burst from the images. Somepony else. Who was that? I knew it! It was female! Locking my eyes on as I saw motion come across my own corpse in the rain, I found myself ignoring the frantic pleas of the Ruin even while the void emanating from the wall sucked around us. The air chilled, the harmonic hums deadened.

The scream came again as somepony galloped and almost fell when she skidded to a halt beside me. A mournful howl of loss bursting from her mouth. Gentle white and two tone pink, who was she?

A sharp pain burst in my mind. Something tore free as I felt my peripheral vision go black. All I could see was this mare. No, not just some mare! Glimmerlight!

She picked me up, holding my small body that limply drooped by its neck and limbs in her own front hooves. Her mouth seemed to simply stay open in shock and motion to cry and scream over and over as though in denial and horror. An outpouring of emotion the likes I'd never seen from her as though everything had just fallen and destroyed something she held so dear. Pressing her muzzle to my neck, she rocked my broken body as though by some miracle of wishful thinking I might return to life.

"There's nothing but pain in watching this, Murk! Don't do this to yourself! Your memories are trying to make you feel guilt and keep you where you were, remembering what you were in Fillydelphia!”

I heard the Ruin, he was right beside me, but his voice was far off. Nothing made sense! I couldn't feel anything amidst the horror overtaking me and showing the result of my mindset as it brought me to this choice. Beside Glimmerlight, others emerged.

A huge figure, rippling until he was visible. Brimstone! He simply stood watching Glimmer's anguish, unknowing of how to react to this. His head bowed low, his shoulders slumped. I saw Coral Eve knelt beside Glimmerlight. She reached over to draw my eyes closed even as her other hoof wiped the tears from her own eyes. Three ghouls, two little fillies who stared in confused worry nearby to a shivering bearded figure of Weathervane, gritting his teeth and shaking horribly as though some inner rage was ready to snap.

Then off to one side, just scarcely visible, I saw the blinking red light of an eyepiece removed and dropped to the floor, before a young black and red unicorn dropped onto his knees in despair at the sight before his eyes.

Hooves grasped at my neck, pulling and struggling. My eyes felt locked. I couldn't move at the sight! Was this what I'd done to them? But why? I was... I wasn't anypony! Just a little slave who didn't do anything! I wasn't important! Don't mourn over me! Slaves just go, it's how it works!

A grasping, invasive, and unpleasant feeling washed over me. The growing sickness sinking through my skin out of the visions and images that became more real as though I could reach out and touch them the more I watched. I tried to lay a hoof on Glimmer's shoulder but no matter how far I stretched my hoof, they always seemed so far away.

They all bore that same look, like they'd lost something important. What? It couldn't be me! What had they lost?

It took seeing them turn and leave one by one in differing directions for me to truly realise.

They'd lost hope.

Only then did I see one more figure starting to appear who stood over my body and cried their heart out. One who had been missing, who was—

“Murk!”

My head was turned. The entire world of Equestria I had seen, this paradise was a chaotic mess of wet glistening madness, enveloping it and crushing the paper mountains from their fragile state. The Ruin held my face. I wanted to turn! Who was it back there! Who? I knew them, but I'd forgotten!

“MURK!” The Ruin screamed in my face. “You have to make a choice now! The pain is pulling you back into a personal hell of slavery! It will hurt forever! Don't you want us to have peace? We wanted away from the pain! That's why you jumped! If you keep trying to remember, even the empty wasteland before will give way to something much, much worse and there won't be any turning it back!”

My mouth hung open, looking everywhere. Reality was bending, chains forming around the world, and a searing pain on my cutie mark beginning to tell. Wincing, I tried to turn back but everypony was gone from the window into unreality.

“I don't know! M-my friends! Where are my friends!?” I screamed out, begging him to tell me!

“They're gone, Murk. I'm so sorry! I know you wanted to be free with them, but it's impossible now!”

He paused, coughing harshly. I realised this horror was catching up to him as well. Of course, he was me.

"It's impossible. There's only one choice left to us, Murk. Fall into peace! Make the choice! For your own sake please do it, Murk! Just tell me you will and this will all stop. You are the only thing keeping us here, the only part of your mind that sticks and stays when it should move on! One word..."

Everything tore at me. Even while every thought made me want to cry, I strove to just understand. All of this was sanity crushing, impossible choices that determined my afterlife and what it would be! Choosing to forget everypony forever to make the pain stop and just say goodbye or to face being a slave forever with an incomplete memory of tragedy and heartbreak? I felt too small to decide! I wanted somepony to decide for me! A friend to talk to and get advice! Just run away and—

"No!" I screamed it to be heard, stomping a hoof. "I don't want to forget them! They made me who I was for the first time, taught me how to laugh!"

Somehow, without turning I knew. Their faces fading on by around me. Those smiles, those harsh times when we had saved one another or been there when another needed us. I hadn't realised how much my death would hurt them.

I'd undervalued myself.

Slowly, I closed my eyes and shook my head.

"I'm... I'm sorry. I don't know if I can... if I can just figure all this out then..."

He shoved me away. The Ruin snarled and knocked me clean onto my back, his wiry form showing a brief surge of strength before staggering and coughing badly. If this were not the warped world it was, he looked like he should be dead. Did I really look like that?

"If you won't choose because I'm showing you what you can have, Murk..."

The world began peeling again, a sensation of falling further! Screaming, I dropped over the edge of a hole in the ground into pitch darkness. A burning sensation tore at my body even as I reached out to grab the ledge before I fell, like a fire was sucking me in! My hind section was tugged, pulled, and yanked at harshly like some supernatural force had grabbed me! Crying out in shock, I gripped as hard as I could!

"...then I'll show you what you'll get if you don't!"

The Ruin's face distorted into a mix of rage and terror, rearing up to stamp both hooves upon one of mine. Crying out, I let go with one, my mind struggling to comprehend all this! Pain soared through me, a void below and a twisting darkness over an idyllic world all around me! Sensory overload made me wince and close my eyes, pleading with him.

"I just need time! Don't let me fall! Don't!"

"Your whole life is down there, Murk! Every painful memory and horror inflicted upon you! If you fall to there, you will never get back out again unless you choose to let everything go for the one refuge a slave ever gets! It's our reward for service, don't throw it away! If I must force you, the one part of us, of me, that doesn't want to rest and let it end, then I will! Maybe then, you'll finally see why it's our time to let go!"

I shook my head, trying not to look down.

"DON'T!"

"Every one of those ponies you called friends were going to die! That's what slaves do! Holding onto them now is just hurting you more! It's pointless and painful! Don't you remember how every one of them was falling? To rage? To regret? To a feral state? They were all falling the same as you! You can forget them and clear it all from your mind! You'll be happy!"

His face pleaded, begging me as he leaned over. Holding onto the one hoof that was keeping me from above this new pit, I felt his hoof begin to let go! I saw no eternity below, only raging fire and the sound of clanking chains. My face screwed up. He was asking me to forget my friends! To go to this eternal peace meant losing everything I'd found from them!

"No! I won't!" I screamed up at him. "I want peace, I really do! But not now! Not until I know they're safe! Not till I somehow help them from how I hurt them! Please, give me a chance to somehow reach them just long enough to help them!"

Behind the Ruin, I saw the colossal city on the mountain falling, shaking the very land as it crashed through the thin earth and plummeted into a void. Everything was coming apart from that shimmering liquid that flowed and closed in on us as much as it did upon every aspect of Equestria. The paradise was falling from the painful memories tearing at this pretend world.

"You can't! You're dead! Please, decide so I can pull you back up and we can go together into one peaceful state at last! It doesn't have to hurt any more! Why let the tragic tale of Murky Number Seven go on? Why more pain? Why more slavery and illness after beating and loss? Fighting it will only show you horrors that will torment you forever onward! Let them go!"

"I can do something! Somehow I believed once, I want to believe again! Let me try!"

Thrusting my own hoof to him, asking him to take it, I saw the Ruin glance at it. Yes! See the little bravery in my eyes! I'm thinking the same! I can face a bit more pain, just till I see that my friends were safe and got out! Maybe not with me, but I couldn't go not knowing! I could endure until I saw them escape!

He saw my thoughts. I saw that hesitation, that moment that another part of what clearly was my unconscious mind think about it. In the whirling decimation of reality, he closed his eyes.

"They were good friends..." He muttered quietly.

"The first we had. We can't let them go."

His eyes squinted, before hardening. I saw fear in his eyes, a terror that I felt all too often that had scared me into running away. That had scared me into trying to take my own life. He wasn't malicious, he was just simply afraid. My fear.

"No."

What? What? No, please!

"No? Why! I just... but I just told you! We can do this! Why!?"

My brutalised self took hold of my one hoof. The pain increased, tugging me. I felt chains creeping over my back legs. My throat tightened from the feeling of a collar.

"Why!?"

He shook his head.

"Because I have to prove to you why we can't ever win against them! Why we need to fall away now! I know you Murk. I know more about you than you yourself know. I am you. I am the you that forever remembers, that cannot forget. Unlike you, I know the full truth. The things you have forgotten in your efforts to make it easier."

I jerked, falling backward. He made no effort to hang on very hard at all. He was going to let me go!

"You've done this before, forgotten all just to relieve you of the hardship. I will remind you if I have to, why you have always chosen to forget and let memories blur to nothing. I'll show you why need to let go and fade away."

He let go.

Falling. Truly falling at last. I reached for him, but I saw only his sad face watching me go. Witnessing my fall into the chains of my mind that coiled and bound around my life and memories. Screaming, howling for it not to happen I was pulled and dragged into the very darkest recesses of my life and the agony filled oblivion that awaited me.

"Remember the life that you hate, the life that you led, and the place in life you were given. It even started this way! You've forgotten those who mattered before!"

The wagon bumped and rattled, jolting us all inside it about hard. We might have been hurt from it all, had we not been as tightly packed as we were within the damp passenger hold.

Scared and whimpering at the flares of lightning through the small holes that dropped freezing rain through them, I felt her hold me tighter. I didn't like this. It scared me. It scared me a lot! So she just held me close.

My mother.

"Ssh, dear. It's all right. The storm can't get you in here."

Her voice, rhythmic and calm, was all that stopped me from crying aloud. Hugging close to her chest, I buried my head in her shoulder. I didn't like travelling. It took ages and was scary when it wasn't boring or smelly. But her hooves wrapped around me and hummed gently in my ears to calm me. I liked it when she made music like that, just for me when nopony else could hear it.

"Where are we going, mom?"

The wagon lurched again. It was a flying wagon, pulled by huge griffons that looked really nasty. All the slaves had been pushed into it for us to be taken somewhere. I didn't know where. The masters never told us.

"They're taking us to another place for work. There were too many of us back at Shattered Hoof."

"Will it be a nicer place?"

She was silent, instead just smiling down to me and stroking my mane carefully around a big bump on my head. I felt her pull my little jerkin down, hiding my wings.

"Why do I have to hide them?"

"Because other ponies get jealous of your wonderful little gift, my dear." I felt a kiss on my nose. "Someday you're going to fly away from all of this to somewhere better, my dear Murky."

"I don't understand."

A squeeze. I liked squeezes! They were soft and warm! Nuzzling in, I forgot all about what she'd even been saying just to rest here snuggled up to my mom. Life wasn't good and sometimes she cried for reasons I didn't know. My mom confused me though sometimes. She'd look really really hungry even though she always had food to give to me.

"Just remember that you're different and special. You're not like them and they will hate you for it, because you've got something they all want."

I nodded a little, before yelping and grasping around her tightly when the wagon slammed and almost rolled. Ponies swore and the rumbling of us back on solid ground rattled beneath us. Slowly, the wagon rolled to a halt and hoofsteps above us dropped wood splinters atop our cramped heads.

"Everypony out! Come on, move it! Time's wasting, we're paying for the wagon by the day!"

A door on the side of the wagon was torn open after the unlocking of a thick set of bars. Dull brown light drafted in alongside a surge of icy wind and rain. Slaves around my mother and I groaned and shifted, pushing against one another to stand. Why did they put so many ponies in one wagon? It wasn't nice.

We were told to go outside. Trotting beside my mom, I obeyed quickly and quietly even when the really, really cold outside evening met me. Slaves were being told to stand in a line across a muddy field in the lashing rain, the little foals like me hiding beside the ponies that took care of them. Our master had an umbrella magically held above his head while the slavers wore thick leather covers or goggles. I wanted a pair of them. They looked cool!

I didn't know this place, so I just pulled myself against my mom's leg and shivered. I could see dark shapes of big steep hills surrounding this place, a wall surrounded it made of black wood and there were rocks. Lots and lots of rocks! If I squinted real hard against all the water dripping in my eyes, I could see a large barn and a small wooden house; the glow of a fire within it.

Looking that way let me see the pony striding toward us, the one whom my master was meeting.

"Got the lineup all as you wanted, my good sir!"

"Good nuthin', you're late!" The new pony, an older stallion with a long grey beard spat and didn't seem to care about the rain. "Expected you here three days ago."

"Now now, sir. You know the wastes and what they're like. Bloodwings en-route!"

No there hadn't been.

"Whatever. They're here so what you chargin'?"

Our master strode back, leading this new pony toward us and trying to avoid the muddy puddles from his white suit. The scruffy looking stallion just snorted and almost seemed to purposefully stomp in them as he went, he cast his eyes over us with distaste.

I pulled myself closer to my mom, feeling her hoof wrap around me.

"I'm scared, mom."

"It'll be alright, dear. Just stay quiet."

Now closer, our master swung his hoof over the line.

"Well, five hundred for the stallions and mares. Three hundred if they're older than forty. Pretty good prices, I hear that Appleloosa's selling them for over seven—"

"How much for the kids? Rock farmin' don't take much strength bar the few and I gots them already covered."

Blinking and casting an eye back to us, the suited stallion cleared his throat and motioned hastily to his slaver crew to back off a little.

"Well, a parent and foal discount I could surely—"

"Don't want the parents, don't need 'em. Just the little ones for the little rocks."

My mother's hoof pulled me right under her, clutching tightly as I saw most of the foals look a little unsure to their unsettled parents or guardians. Some tried to protest, before the sharp crack of a whip sounded out.

"Havin' trouble keepin' em in line? Thought you was 'fessional."

"You mean professional?"

"Yup, 'fessional. How much?"

"Well..." This wasn't how deals had gone before, I could see him look unsure. Please don't pick me, please don't pick me! "I'd say perhaps two hundred seventy-five. You're investing after all, right?"

"Two hundred."

"They've been kept with their parents, grown better cos of it, so there has to be a premium, I can go to two sixty?"

"Two hundred."

"Well, how many do you intend to buy?"

"All of em."

A ripple of panic spread across the entire line. Slavers moved in, whips flying, and mouths cursing when hooves beat us into submission. I felt my mother jerk, even though she'd been silent.

"Don't worry, Murky... don't worry, it'll be okay. I'll sort this."

"I don't wanna go. He's nasty!"

"Well, sir..." Our master coughed into a hoof, before noting just how mucky it was and grimacing. "Given you are purchasing so many, I can afford to lower my prices. Two twenty-five, no lower."

"Done."

The suited stallion held out a hoof to the farmer, receiving only a little harsh look before retracting it. Money began to change hooves. Then it started.

Slavers moved forward, prying foals from parents' grasps and throwing guardians aside. The sound of children wailing mixed with grown ponies begging and screaming that it would be okay filled the air. Even the rampant shouts could not silence it. A shadow fell over us. I heard my mother plea before magic grasped me and whisked me from under her. Immediately, my mother grabbed me, holding onto me even as they struck her and tried to pull her away. Crying, wailing, and keeping a hold of her, I tried not to go! I didn't want to go! Why wouldn't they let me stay? I didn't understand!

Two others joined the slaver, my hooves slipping and lashing out with my little strength. One hit a mare's eye and sent her staggering back cursing words I had never heard before! Galloping forward, I leapt into my mother's hooves once more.

"What's all the fuss?" The farmer wandered toward us all slipping in the mud and trying to stay together. "This what you call a foal?"

"Well, Murk has yet to have his growth spurt and—"

"Not payin' two twenty-five for him. Hundred, max."

"NO!"

Even when the slavers closed in to push us apart, my mother surged past them, holding me to her side and falling before the farmer.

"Please, sir! He's too young for this! You can clearly see how weak he is! Buy me too!"

"Don't need a mare. Get off him, belongs to me now."

"I beg of you! He's my son! I... I'll be whatever you want! You can have me for any kind of slave that you require, no matter how bad the job! Y-you don't need to feed me! If there's anything—"

"ENOUGH!"

A magical telekinetic slap threw my mother down. Screaming, I tried to run to her side until a rough-coated leg caught me around the waist. The farmer lifted me up even while our master strode to my mother after striking her.

"You don't get to make demands here! You're nothing but a slave! Just like he is! You're merchandise. You don't get a say. If I say he goes without you, he goes! You don't get to offer yourself, not your services and not your body. If we wanted that from you, we'd take it. A slave has no bargaining chips in this world. Take her into the wagon. The good sir has made his purchases. One hundred shall do to just be rid of that runt."

Even while the slavers grabbed her, dragging my thrashing mother away, I fought myself against the heavy weathered muscles holding me off the ground. I begged him, hit his face with my little hooves and tried to squeeze free. They were taking her away! I wanted her! I wanted my mom! Let go!

"MOM!" I simply screamed, pushing out my hooves toward her.

"You're different, my little Murky! You're different! Mommy loves you! It'll be alright!"

I couldn't do anything but cry and repeatedly shout for her, even as she was carried inside the wagon. The sight was replaced by that of our master, bringing the change for me to the farmer. Finally shaking hooves, he leaned down to me.

"Don't you worry, little foal. It's just business, nothing personal. She's right though. A born slave? I'm sure you'll get along just fine here. Juuust fine. Let's go lads!"

Sweeping up and away, he climbed atop the wagon. Surging their huge wings out, the griffons began to trot. I couldn't see inside the wagon, but I could feel her in there. Whining, struggling, I kept screaming to the sky even as the wagon lifted up into the low clouds of the thunderstorm and carried her away from me. Further and further away.

"Pipe down, you. Now let's get you to work."

"I want my mom!"

"You'll get your job! You're a slave, nothing else!"

He simply threw me, threw me toward the ground. Curling up in fear I simply saw the rocks I'd spend my childhood days pushing from now on.

I tried to stand, I really did! Tried to stand and will my wings to flap! I'd chase after her! Find her! Getting up, I tried to climb up a rock to get a better start!

His hoof simply threw me down. I landed...

...on a wooden floor.

Scorching heat flowed over me, like the furnaces of Slit's factory. I had to blink and choke on toxic fumes before opening my stinging eyes to see the dark red wood rotted below me. Something was tight around my chest. What was?

I looked up, finding myself amidst a thick hewn cave of dull metal seams and dark timber blocks holding it all up. The walls were filthy with blood and sticky moisture. Warped torches flicked in unreal ways at the edges around a huge opening that looked out into an immense quarry. What was that around my chest?

A harness. I was harnessed to something!

A sudden weight began to pull, a massive draw on my harness that tugged me downhill. Scrambling, I felt my entire torso stretch from this impossible weight tugging me inch by inch. I looked behind me, panting hard as I saw a colossal iron cast cart filled to the brim with gem-encrusted rocks. It must have weighed ten tons!

What scared me more was what was behind it. This shallow incline it was pulling me down led to a sharp drop into the quarry! I could hear echoing sounds of mining and slavery all the way down! I'd fall!

"Scary, isn't it?"

He stood before me, the Ruin. Trotting slowly alongside me as I was slowly pulled downward and gasping in pain when the harness bit into my flesh and torso.

"Get me out of this! Please! It's going to pull me over!"

"Down there's eternal slavery, Murk. It won't kill you, but it'll ruin you forever! That word is literal, now! Remember what even your mother told you, you're different. Other slaves might escape to a peaceful afterlife but you won't, you don't know any different!"

Straining, clenching my teeth and squeezing my eyes shut, I grabbed a rock and pulled. The cart slowed, the strain on my frail body pulling like a torture rack if I left it any longer!

"I... want... out!"

"What you want isn't right! How can you die in your own mind and let your soul go to the Goddesses to create your paradise without knowing what freedom is, Murk!? Look at what you were just shown! All the times you've forgotten all but the vague details of! You are different, even our mother told you that!"

"ARGH!" I simply screamed as I slipped, the cart dragging me metres at a time until I dug my hooves in and fought back. I could smell the fire from the quarry, like My Master's metro hell below ground made into an unreal unending nightmare! "But my friends—"

"Your friends matter nothing! They didn't save you, just like she didn't! Has that not taught you anything? What if Brimstone got so angry he hurt one of you? What if Weathervane turned feral and killed Coral? What if Glimmerlight chose to forget you? Littlepip only showed you the truth! Nothing changes! You were only different in that you saw it all happen from a false hope by a grieving mother!"

"Just let me try. I want to remember them! Live with my dreams!"

He leaned down, that broken nose leaking blood before me. My hooves slipped and ground across the floor as the weight only seemed to increase. It was going to pull me in!

"Dreams? Dreams of what? Some freedom from a destiny to escape? You know what your destiny is!"

He turned. I saw my own flank and the shackles set there.

"Don't you even remember why you got it? The same pattern you've been repeating day after day your whole life? The first time you first had your hope broken to remind you that these things seal the deal. Slave for life. Remember?"

"Hey, get out of the way, squirt!"

I staggered from the sudden shove upon my flank, squeaking and yelping when I clattered and fell. The bowl I carried dropped and clattered loudly on the ceramic tiled floor of the farmhouse, rolling away on its side beneath the tables.

Rubbing my tiny hind sections and wincing in pain, I stood up quickly from the damp floor and swung back at the queue. I'd been first here! I felt my tiny wings flare out in anger and frustration quite without my decision.

Looking back at me and lowering their eyebrows, the bigger slave foals just grinned. Threatening me to dare making a scene out of this. Seeing them backing one another up, I let them win. The bigger slaves always won. They'd been bigger when we were brought here, and in the years since they had grown much faster than I did. But they had taken my spot and skipped ahead to get food first! I'd finished my work earlier to get here on time!

"You gonna try something, Murk? Gonna cry or fight? We all saw we were here first!" Rock Hard, the colt who'd found his cutie mark actually doing rock farming here as a slave, sneered at me.

"You weren't," I pleaded while picking up the bowl and shaking the dog hairs from it. The master's hounds had more freedom than we did and left their hairs everywhere! Sometimes they stole the small bed of hay I had in the barn.

"Master doesn't believe you. He says pegasi lie! So pegasi get to go last all the time. That's the rules now!"

"He never said that!"

"Nuh uh. He said it once before!"

"When?"

"When you weren't there!"

They were making it up, I knew. But they were right that he disliked pegasi. Everypony seemed to. Dejected and under their triumphant laughter, I wandered to the back of the queue to wait.

By the time it was my turn, I got some thin watery soup with a couple of bits (I had never dared ask what those bits exactly were) in it left over with no heat in it at all. Sighing as I found a corner to hunch down on, I saw the two seats taken by Rock Hard and his friend, the other slaves milling around on the floor like me.

Not that I really got a chance to eat.

"Where is 'e?"

Every slave jumped up when our master, ageing and grim from his mane turning grey, surged into the room from the back door, letting the cold wind in as he came. His twisted face glared around at us all.

"Where's that useless little runt?"

They would have pointed me out anyway. Setting my bowl down with a sigh, I trotted out with my head lowered. I could hear the other slaves 'Ooooooh'ing under their breath. They knew I'd hear the humiliation.

"Here Mas—yargh!"

Barely able to finish my sentence, a hoof struck me across my big ear. Stinging pain sent me to the ground; whimpering and holding myself away from him.

"What kind of pegasus doesn't even know his damned compass points? I told you t'move them there rocks to the south field! You've moved 'em to the ruddy west."

"B-but Master, no one's ever taught me what's south or west and y-you p-pointed and—"

"Just shut up! Get out there an' fix it! I don' care if it takes you till mornin'!"

I saw Rock Hard taking my meagre meal right before my master dropped me upon the hard earth outside and slammed the door shut.

Bemoaning the loss of my daily meal, I let my head droop. Now I wouldn't get anything till tomorrow unless I tried to steal anything again. Maybe I could get some of the dog's when it was sleeping. That hadn't been so bad last time.

With a sigh, I took a breath and turned. I'd done wrong and my master wanted it corrected. Nothing for it but to simply obey. Making off at the trot toward the west field, I simply tried to ignore my protesting stomach.

Evening was setting down, an orange glow coming over the big wall that surrounded the rock farm that cast long shadows behind each of the bigger boulders. Up high in the hills near Whitetail Woods, the wind came all the time, over the wall and right over all of us. Sometimes so strong it blew me over. Really it had nowhere to go. The farm was set back against tall hills with sheer edges with only one pathway really leading away from it down the valley, so it just got trapped and sucked everypony all around. It made rock farming hard, as it would tonight. Strong winds hardly helped when you had to push a rock into the wind after all.

Aside from the farmhouse and the barn, there were only a few huts for tools or the dogs. An old collapsed windmill lay nearby as a source of firewood or repairs to the master's wall. That defence was too tall for us. Glancing at it while weaving around the rocks and deciding where to start, it was nothing but a perpetual reminder of how I couldn't leave.

Looking down, I came to the first rock I'd moved earlier. Best get started.

My hooves already hurt from doing it earlier. My back ached and really I knew this was going to take even longer. The south field was uphill (Was it south? He hadn't told me again.) from here, so rolling was going to take forever. But I put my head down and got going.

Slowly, I began to stop thinking. Just head down and get by the shift, that's what mom had told me. Let it blur or you'll go mad waiting for every shift to end. But I couldn't exactly not worry. It was getting dark now as the sun went down! Darkness in the wasteland was scary! Last time I'd been out here a really scary bat thing had chased me all across the fields until the master had shot it! Then he'd made me stay out to finish the job even longer!

This just wasn't fair! I wanted to be inside! I wanted food! I wanted my mom...

But slaves didn't get to have anything.

The rock shifted, rolled, and began its journey before my pushing hooves. Slipping on the cracked ground occasionally, I made the slow way across the farm to the south field. It took a good ten minutes to get it there, ten minutes of sweat and grunting behind the smaller rock, even with trying to buzz my wings for extra push behind me! Finally setting it down, I fell back and sat for a few seconds to get my breath back.

Ahead of me lay another eighty or so rocks to do.

Simply groaning, I let my head fall into my hooves. This was so unfair! Why did it have to be me?

For the next half hour I shifted rocks, managing two larger ones in the time period to get them out of the way first before I was too tired. The smaller ones would come later; I could fetch a saddlebag from a hut and simply carry those. Nosing myself in behind probably the largest of the ones I'd have to move, I strained. Every muscle pushed, my rumbling tummy protesting the extra work on no food. Feeling it move, I let it fall before pushing back in again, seeking to flip it once again. Turn by turn, I began to get it up the slope. I could hear the slaves chattering in the barn while the master spoke with his wife inside, surrounded by those mad dogs he kept. I was just all alone out here with this huge boulder.

It fell again, I moved to shift it again.

It fell again, I moved to shift it... and felt something else shift the other way.

The entire rock had hit another one I couldn't see! The entire weight fell back toward me, almost crushing my hooves before I jerked away and flung myself to the side! The rock cracked down on the pebbles below, sending them shooting off to ping from other rocks. Then it began to tumble.

Sparked, I rushed to catch it! It'd take forever to get it back up if it fell all the way down! I mentally pleaded with it, 'Please don't, rock! Please! Please! Pretty please! I'll stroke you nice as I push you please don't—'

It did.

Rocking over, it fell downhill. Bouncing and spinning wildly, it struck other rocks and flew into the air before landing hard to kick up the dirt. I chased it, galloping downhill as though I could actually do anything. To my relief I saw it strike one of the biggest rocks in the entire farm with a sound almost akin to a gunshot, stopping on the spot as it fell, breaking in half.

Breathing out slowly, trying to get my heart to stop beating madly, I almost smiled. Halves were easier to push.

Then the bigger rock started to shift, dislodged from its odd position, and I felt my heart instead sink entirely.

"No! Don't!"

As though it would actually listen. The rock fell, rocking and finally beginning its thunderous journey downhill! I felt the ground actually shake as it clattered and picked up speed with unstoppable force! Outpacing my attempts to chase it, the boulder rumbled, bounced, and finally slammed against the master's wall, tearing the wooden construction apart and sending splinters flying high into the air. Undeterred, the boulder made good on its quick getaway over the ledge of the valley, disappearing into the huge depths below. I heard it crash again and again on the cliff-side, echoing all over the hills.

A warmth washed over me, stunning me on the spot to forget about the rock. Standing still in the rock farm's field, I simply gazed forward.

Before me, through the gap in the wall meant to keep me in, was a way out.

Through that hole I saw the setting sun, escaping itself across the horizon while casting that heat across the land. It may have been dulled by clouds to a vague shape, but I could see it clearly enough! It lit the path, the remnants of light in the dull daytime of the wasteland, caught in the long valley that led away into the distance.

I was alone, with one way out before me.

My mom was out there somewhere. Freedom was out there! No more rocks. No more beatings and nasty dogs. Food of all types! The kinds I dreamed about eating someday! It couldn't be that simple could it? Didn't I need to ask permission first? Could I really just trot forward and that would be it?

The setting sun hung there, slowly sending its light to disappear, as though Goddess Celestia herself was calling to me, drawing me forward. I could go unseen, slip away before they came to check! I could hide in the valley and then keep galloping!

I could...

I could.

One leg began to step forward. Then another. Then a trot began. It grew to a canter. Drawn toward this new feeling, toward something I could feel I wanted more than anything else in the world. The warmth of the remaining sunlight spreading over my tired body seeming to ease my muscles into a gallop for the way out!

Behind me, I heard the farmhouse door burst open. I had to scream inside my mind to not look back! To tell myself, 'You can go for the sunset!' Jumping rocks, I sprinted for the hole in the wall even while cursing and shouting followed me. I heard somepony chase me, but I had to keep going! This new feeling drew me in irresistibly! Even past the tiredness mixed with panic and hope, I felt a strange tingling, like a sparkling somewhere somewhere behind me.

There was a huge world out there! Crossing to the wall, I clambered and pulled myself through the wreckage before setting hoof outside it for the first time in years! Behind me the thumping of a galloping pony grew nearer, I had to get away! How?

The thought of the boulder going over the edge came to me. The winds were strong, maybe if... if I could...

I galloped with my head down, letting my wings spread. Then with all the might I could gather I started to flap them, swishing up and down as fast as I could make them go! The feeling was all too natural, I knew what I was doing with them! I could leap off and nopony would catch me! I just had to fly! FLY!

I hopped, bounced, and tried to launch myself a few times. Lifting a foot from the ground, I dropped again and stumbled. The chasing pony, my master, got nearer! I could hear him shout, but I kept going, rising a little higher each time before falling back. Just one good gust of wind, please! I could—

Every hoof seemed to jam together, something catching them and tying them up on the spot. The crash of thick spheres into my forelegs made me squeal while I fell and slammed into the hard gravel road. Looking down, I saw a set of bolas my master had thrown wrapped around my legs. Please! Please, Goddesses help me lift up! I tried to rise again, my wings fluttering with all the strength I could, gritting my teeth as I began to move up... up...

Down. He caught me, dragging me to the floor harshly and knocking me on my back.

"Get off! I want to be free! I want out of—"

"SHUT UP! JUS' SHUT UP! Get back inside you lil' useless runt! Never 'oughta bought you! Nothin' but useless!"

Dragged by the bolas around my legs, I squirmed and fought, but a few clips around the ear calmed me. Looking back, I saw the sunset disappear over the horizon, feeling every inch of disappointment while I was dragged away from it. Dragged back inside. My wings kept trying to fly, buzzing and flapping to struggle against being pulled back. I couldn't help them!

Growing tired of the resistance, my master turned back, using the bolas cord to throw me to the ground again.

"You ain't never getting out! Think I'm gonna let you just leave now? You're stayin' here whether you like it or not till I either sell you to somepony else or let you just die! You're a slave! Get it now? Slaves don't escape! Slaves stay here!"

"I... I want to be free."

He slapped me across the mouth. Other slaves were gathering around me, his wife with the hounds made herself known too. They all watched as he struck again and again.

"You are not free! Say it! You are not free!"

"I... I'm not..." I faltered

"And the last word!"

"...free."

He leaned back, shoving my head to the ground and casting his head down my body to my wings with disdain.

"Fuggin' things. Ought to—hm?"

His eyes shifted with surprise, further down my body. Shaking and allowing my eyes to come out from behind my sheltering hooves, I looked back myself as everyone else wandered to look too.

Upon my flank, still shining a little, my cutie mark had appeared at last.

The disappointment that surged through me was unbearable.

A set of shackles, gnashing and laughing at my pitiful attempt.

“Hah! Now there, don’ you see? A set of manacles for you. You get caught, you get brought ’ere and reminded. Now yer own body’s tellin’ you that too! Cos’ you were caught, see? Because you’re realisin’ it! You’re a slave forever.”

I felt tears draw down, I rubbed at it, pleaded in my mind with it. Please go away! I didn’t want it!

Was I really meant to be one forever?

I’d been caught and gained my cutie mark the moment I’d realised I was going to be in chains till I died. Oh no... oh no, it wasn’t fair...

Snorting above me, my master turned to the slaves.

“Right, enough bandin’ about. Them wing things are gonna be a problem someday or ’nuther. Rock Hard, you an’ yer frien’ drag the runt to the barn. I’m going to go get my tools. Not having a hundred caps just fly away, useless or not. Rest of you fix that damn fence, watch em with the dogs while they work, love.”

The last words were clipped off to his wife. Ponies moved into action, but only when the two slaves grabbed me did I really wake and realise what was happening. What did he mean my wings were a problem! What was he doing? I fought back, but they handled me roughly and dragged me up the hill toward the barn. My master was waiting in there with a bag of tools, no emotion on his face, just a blank look of doing the job.

I pleaded, struggled as I saw an anvil waiting there and heard the command to grab a wing. I saw a hammer! Screaming and wildly thrashing, it took them some time to push me down. High-pitched and terrified, I simply kept begging. Rock Hard hit my head but I didn’t stop. I tried to pull my wing away as I felt it rest on cold metal from one pony holding it over with his weight. Exposed and vulnerable, I saw my master come closer. Every prayer I knew screamed from my mouth, but Rock Hard dropped his weight and held me there. Alone in a dark barn with three ponies seeking to break my wings! Tears fell and my head writhed, but my body was held still.

I felt a hoof press down on my wing, holding one portion of the thin hollow bones still. “Get off! GET OFF! DON’T DO THIS!”

The hammer raised. I realised that I couldn’t escape. This was happening.

“DON’T! PLEASE DON’T!”

“Shut up, slave.”

He grunted and swung, I—

—launched to the side with a scream so shrill and pained that I hurt my own ears. Rolling and yelling again, I threw my hooves to my sides to find my larger body and its ruined wings already there, albeit unfeeling all over again.

Then the weight of the cart caught me and sent me scraping further down the mineshaft. The cave was widening as I neared the quarry edge, the rock taking on the shape of chains and manacles carved into the very walls and roof around me. The sound of clanking manacles and surging fires of industrial slavery met my ears louder than ever.

Fighting for purchase, numb after the memory and crying out as the weighty cart tore at my back muscles from the unmanageable weight, I managed to stop it for just a few seconds at a time, straining with all my worth. My flanks felt heavy, until I realised it was my cutie marks seeming to pull with a weight of their own!

“You’ve always simply been a slave, Murk!”

The Ruin trotted back and forth in front of me, grabbing my numbed and aching head to look at my own cutie mark upon his devastated and bleeding body.

“This told you so long ago! Think about it! You’ve only repeated this pattern every time!”

Images flared along the walls of the cave, forming in fire and washing into the next ones like moving rock. I saw myself pausing as Brimstone ran off under gunfire. Ragini taking aim at a fleeing slave. Protégé tearfully having to pull a trigger. Myself and Unity surrounded by slavers in an alicorn shield. Wildcard pouncing Sunny and I. Me running right into My Master’s embrace.

“So many times, Murk. So! Many! Times! Hope has risen and fallen time and again all the way from the beginning!”

“I... wanted out!” I strained and tugged, feeling the minecart lean out over the edge of the hellish quarry.

“You can’t have freedom! The moment you went through those gates you entered the climax of your life! Your choice, Murk! Your choice! Now you won’t make the one choice to save yourself! Master Protégé had to make one for you to try and give you freedom! Every time he asked, you jumped! Succeeding in surviving the parasprites to get back to him because he asked you to. Infiltrating a full Ministry slave house to get a sanitiser because he asked you to. Taking on a full gang of raiders and fighting at his side because he expected it of you! You’ve always followed your master, no matter what you think!”

“B-but that’s not true... no! H-he was a way to maybe get out! To learn from!”

“You’re deluding yourself! You are the only part of the being that is Murky Number Seven that doesn’t want to simply rest into the peace we seek! The only bit that hangs on! Say the one word, agree, and we can die peacefully and end this! You were always the little voice inside me, Murk. The one little hope that refused to be snuffed out. But look at me. Look at the wounds and the sickness! I’m the pony that saw Fillydelphia! I’m the one who threw himself from that roof! I’m the one who is glad we’re finally dying into peace! Let hope die.”

The Ruin staggered forward.

“Those gates marked the end. There never was any hope after them.”

Tall, ringed with razor wire, and guarded by magically charged fences, I saw the gates unto the last place of my life.

Amongst a lacklustre haul inside the caged wagon, I curled up behind the rotten hay and tried to keep the jerkin I’d acquired pulled over my wings. They did not have to know here!

“Shipment incoming!”

“Pass on by! Shit lot.”

“Shut your face and just get out the way.”

The wagon began to move again, pulling itself into the heat of Fillydelphia. So Master Red Eye had bought me, finally brought me to the huge slave city I had heard about it many times in hushed whispers between slaves. Some said it was a paradise where you could earn your freedom and got to participate in sports and see events while drinking alcohol!

Others said it was a living hell come to Equestria.

Now that I saw what lay before me past those gates and the gigantic wall, I truly realised which was true.

Columns of slaves with numbers greater than that of the largest slave camps I'd been to moved around as small teams amongst the industrial nightmare. Massive factories or wire pits in the ground spilled heavy smoke that clogged the streets. Masked ponies with long rifles stalked overhead gantries between the ruined shells of homes while the noise of machines and forges rung or roared in the thick, hot air. Streets fell away into long hills within the wall that went to lower concourses or rose up to old parks. A full city of rises and falls on varied levels of urban building inside one almighty prison of slavery!

Pressing myself as far into the hay as I could, I fearfully witnessed the boils and welts of long-term slaves here. They coughed and staggered on wasted limbs, looking all ready to collapse and spasm until death. I realised this was bad. Very bad.

"Come on! Get them out! Stern will be here soon to give them the talk!"

Doors clanged open. Stun rods threatened those who were slow and I had no wish for them to uncover my wings by accident, so I rushed out first to stand where we were told. Upon a long, bloodstained clearing of concrete we were lined up, sweating and nervous. Everypony among our group looked around with worry.

"Stand upright, big ears!"

A baton smacked into my rump, sending me bolt upright in an instant. I withheld my words. They hadn't asked me to speak! A good slave didn't talk.

Then we waited. Minutes passed. I could see the slavers getting impatient.

"Where the fuck's the griffon?"

A sudden trotting perked my ears, leading me to cast my eyes to the side where a frantically galloping pony moved up to the slavers. Unable to avoid it, I may have eavesdropped.

"Stern won't be here for awhile. Them bloody Rangers are at it again. Old Grizzly just says put them to work someplace for now and bring them back out later."

"Son of a... right, fine. Master Grindstone's lot are shifting stuff in that factory over there. Send them in and I'll come pick them up when the big bird's back."

They agreed, before turning to us. Hastily we were coerced, pushed, and struck until we got properly moving. My first experience of true slavery. Of being made to break your body to the limit under a hateful glare of Master Grindstone. Of feeling the burns as forges spewed molten metal out. Within ten minutes, I was crying and hurt, unused to the conditions and unable to have acquired any protective gear yet.

We were taken back and forth around the factory to jobs as needed. Pushing massive molten crucibles or sorting the cast nuts and bolts for manufacturing. Slaves shoved me around, nothing unusual at all but altogether unhelpful in this. A true trial by fire into life in Fillydelphia when I felt my head spin at the fumes.

I fell back, overwhelmed. They could whip me. I just couldn't take it. This was too much!

Hooves wrapped around me. I expected pain, but instead I felt somepony lifting me back up gently, albeit urgently. Eyes closed, I sought to open them, but everything seemed to warp and slow down. I still felt somepony shifting me, but it all began to blur into itself until I was standing back outside in a line. The feeling of somepony lifting me lingered, but quickly faded.

I must have fallen unconscious and been dragged out. My body certainly hurt enough for it.

"My name is Stern!" Before us, a tall griffon strode. She carried a massive rifle that swung on a strap every time she spun to us. "And this is my town. You are workers. You work toward the building of a brighter tomorrow for all ponies in Equestria. A New Equestria to be populated by Unity. Your gift to the world shall be the sacrifice that gives it that chance. You can choose to, or Red Eye can give it for you."

This sounded rehearsed, at least partially. But I kept my eyes low, avoiding Stern's, well, stern eyes.

"But most of you don't really care about the future, do you? I see it in your eyes. You don't give a crap. You just want your 'freedom' don't you?"

I remembered a sunset, but nothing else. Maybe once I had.

"Listen closely, then, because I'm going to tell you how to free yourself. You earn it! It's your choice. You can toil in our mills and factories or remain in the workhouses until you die a slave's death! Or... you can volunteer for more dangerous jobs. There are rewards for such things. Red Eye is nothing but generous! As such, you have three options!"

Three talons were raised, one dropped. "Stable Recovery. Many Stables remain around here and we require ponies to seek their resources and riches. They have security teams or dangers of their own, often unique and unpredictable. Not to mention those Steel Rangers who seek them too. Don't get ideas of asking them for help. They would slaughter you just as easily as they would a Stable Dweller."

She looked along our line, seeking to meet eyes. A few granted it, but I whined and hid away.

"Two years. Two years of work with that and Red Eye promises your freedom along with a tag to know you will never be brought back in." The second claw dipped. "Or you can work in our crater! Radioactive metals and materials are always in demand. Six months of full days and we shall provide radiation treatment before allowing you, once again, your freedom."

The third claw dropped. "The last option, fight in our Pit. The arena of combat where if you survive six events, usually about six weeks in total, you shall be granted a place of honour within our growing army! Such choices I am honour-bound to give. These are your only choices! They are lethal, dangerous, and often painful, but such is sacrifice for Equestria! You may of course join Unity at any time, to lay your hooves at the feet of the Goddess upon Equestria, not to a false deity I know some might believe in."

Celestia and Luna strike her feathers down for such heresy! But every one of those choices sounded nothing but terrifying. I'd never manage it, they all needed strong ponies! What to do...

"Aside from that, there is no way out. Get used to it. Aside from death, of course. But there are few methods of death in here that do not involve a horrible end. Don't try to rebel. Don't try to run. Workers remain here to pay their due to Equestria. That is all you have now."

She snapped around, as though to attention. I noticed her armour was covered in muck and blood, fresh from battle. Stern must have come here right from the fight earlier. Standing in the line, I shivered, but I knew this was all I could expect. Ponies like me were never granted anything easily.

Slavers began to move along the line. Stern meanwhile watched them progressing with distaste. Some ponies were taking forever to choose. Most chose Stable Recovery. A few cringed and tearfully agreed to the shorter crater work. One stamped and demanded they show him to the Pit.

“What about you, little one?”

Squeaking, I looked up. Stern herself had advanced forward to speed the process. She glared down at me, easily many times my size.

“What is your choice?”

“I... I...” Stammering, tears coming to my eyes at her intimidating presence and the stink of blood from her body. “I’m t-too weak for all of them! I’ll... I’ll just work in the city, mills, or factories o-or workhouses. I’m used to it.”

Stern angled her head, as though not expecting me to answer as such. Griffons had such a strange method of looking at you sideways. Struggling to get breath, I found I was the last to pick. Even other slaves seemed a little surprised. They all looked like weathered wastelanders though. I wasn’t like that.

“I was b-born a slave, Ma’am! My cutie mark tells me I’m to d-die one too as my destiny. But I don’t want to die in pain! I want my freedom, but I’m too scared. Too weak. I just want to stay safe. I... I’ll take the normal work, p-please...”

“You choose to be a slave forever in Fillydelphia? To give your life to Red Eye’s work for a New Equestria and Unity?” Stern’s voice was curt and simple.

“I will work with Unity, yes.” I said. I didn’t need to lie to her. It was just the truth. I was Red Eye’s now. “For now, I am nothing but a slave to Fillydelphia.”

There was a brief silence of speech as the ambience of the city hammered on around us. Eventually, the big griffon nodded.

“Send him back to Grindstone. They need the extra workers anyway.”

“Yes, Ma’am.”

That was that. A simple tug on my neck to lead the way back to that factory.

That one pull to begin the end of my slave life in Fillydelphia forever.

There was a flicker, as though the entire world had just blinked. Even while the slaver pulled me, the feeling vanished and all the aches and pains faded away to numbness. I was still in Fillydelphia, but everything had just... stopped. Ahead of me, the masked slaver hung on two legs, mid pull. I saw Stern with her arm cast in an order, the slaves moping toward their destinations and still clouds of smoke in the air.

An eerie silence came over it all. The world had frozen, all but for me.

“This is it.”

The Ruin’s voice echoed around me, before I saw him trot over the concrete ground. Moving between slavers, he came to me and kept trotting around me.

“You made the choice. ‘For now I am nothing but a slave to Fillydelphia.’ You accepted it, Murk.”

I had...

I had.

I couldn’t stand. I simply fell down as the numbness crept more and more over me. To every side, the world shifted and tore. Factories became taller, the slavers turned to darkness and glowing eyes of malice. The great Wall of Fillydelphia shot up into the clouds, higher than any perception could imagine. Fires grew and expanded to spill across the streets and turn Fillydelphia to an inferno.

"This is the hell you chose, Murk. That I, in my terror, chose for myself!"

Everything began moving again, but abstract and demonic. Screams warped and curved like the wind around buildings while factories moved in circles, creating materials only to melt them down and create them all over again.

"You left your mother, you gained your cutie mark of slavery, and then you found your destiny here. What kind of life is this? Now it's over! I am sorry I had to show you these, but now you have the one choice Murk. It must be now! You teeter on the edge of eternity to a soul that believes only in Master and Slave! Say it... please..."

Shivering, hearing slavery become an undying cycle around me that would continue for eternity, I fought between two terrors. My friends or my own life for slavery. How could I choose?

"I can't just forget them all!"

"But you can!"

"It's all my life..."

"Yes, all your life. Just a slave. All you've ever been and all it seems you ever will be! Why will you not choose, Murk? Why can't you see! You're nothing but a servant to everypony else!"

To my eyes, I saw every slave shift and change. They were me! All of them me! A host of Murky Number Sevens being whipped, pulled, and abused by these brutal taskmasters. All my life summed up into one hell.

"Now given the one last choice and you still don't know how to choose for yourself. You've condemned us all, Murk. You've condemned yourself! There is no life to go back to, I've told you this! Now you are going to fall!"

A sudden weight clasped around me. I sought to move, but with my body numb I couldn't do anything! The ground yawning open below me, I fell farther below the surface of the hellish Fillydelphia! Down into the pits, past caves, and huge machines carving into the earth! I saw thousands of ponies, all looking like me in some state of horror that I had once endured every day! They toiled endlessly at walls that regenerated when not being hewn at! I fell away from the Ruin who had given me the last choice I could never make. I never had made choices! Not about my cutie mark, not about my road to freedom in Fillydelphia...

...not to let it end and drift away from it all with him.

Faster and faster I tumbled, drawn by the weight of the mine cart. I hadn't even seen myself reattached! Farther down than Fillydelphia had ever gone, it dragged me into the black.

The impact splintered my senses beyond reality. To the bottom of the quarry as that immense mine cart bearing the weight of my own world crashed to the floor and left me alone at the bottom of eternity. Lying there, looking up I could see nothing. No light, no life and no hope. This was my reward.

Alone and scared, I lay there.

Curling up, I heard the slavery continue... and continue... and continue. I shouted, I cried, and I wished I could find the choice to dream. This was the end, the true end for me, and I could do nothing to change it.

I did not know how long I stayed still before I realised it wasn't going to change or end. The fear truly began to see in. This was the end of the line.

No power to change. Nothing alone anyway. I had nothing! If only I'd had something, anything to help me like I had when in the end portions of my life!

I j-just needed s-something, anything. Couldn't there be one thing? Had I really found nothing in my life to hold onto? If only there'd been just... one... thing...

Please... one thing, hasn't there been anything?

Without a warning, the first thing to remove me from my nightmares, I felt my eyes begin to squint, as though a bright light were trying to break through their tightly closed eyelids. Gasping, choking on having no air, I opened them to see myself still in the pit of slavery, but ahead of me there was something amiss.

One pillar of bright whiteness, beaming across the floor to me as something shifted in it that tore through the darkness around it. A form, slowly trotting toward me filled with a radiance I hadn't seen since coming here.

Then a voice, familiar and daring.

"How about a glimmer of hope?"

She was there. Stepping forward slowly, drowning out the chains and pickaxes to a dull noise behind the angelic calm injected into my afterlife. Slender legs to a figured body bearing a long two-tone pink mane. Perfectly white and clean with bright azure eyes and a comforting smile upon her face.

My mouth gaped, shivering in disbelief, I watched as my friend came toward me. Seeming to almost glow where she was, looking like she had before Fillydelphia had hurt her too, Glimmerlight offered a smile and extended a hoof. This was how she saw herself from the form she had once had.

As though in awe of one of the Goddesses themselves, I lay and stared upward without a word while she came closer. Was it taunting me? Teasing me with what I had lost forever? Shivering and scared, I curled up even when I felt her kneel down beside me. Her horn glowed before the absolute proof of her existence beside me was given.

Her hoof reached out and ruffled my mane.

"You've held on, Murky. You did it."

"I... I fell! Everything! I couldn't choose. So I'm d-damned and—"

"Sssh..." She leaned forward, kissing my forehead and gently leaning against me. The shock of feeling somepony else touch me penetrated the numbness around me. A warmth spread, vanquishing some of the ruin from my body.

"You're the one part of yourself that refused to give in and accept that you couldn't be free, Murky. I know your memory. I've read it. You amongst all these forms of yourself, you are the one part of your soul that always came back to the surface time and again to try and make a bid for true freedom."

"But I'm not!"

I writhed away, almost startling her. Hopping up and staggering to my hooves, I waved one around me.

"Every time! Every single time I thought I had something I was only deluding myself! My own mother being taken! Choosing to slave forever in Filly! My cutie mark! I've seen the truth, Glimmer! This was a contract to my life the moment it appeared on my flank! This is just the end of it! I always hated it! Hated what it represented. I almost hated you when you said it looked beautiful..."

I slumped down, facing away from her. To my surprise, I heard a short laugh and a sound of her mane whipping back and forth as she trotted forward. Glimmerlight was shaking her head.

"You've never seen?"

"Seen what?"

She lay a hoof on my shoulder, pushing me to my hooves.

Then she pushed my own head to look at my flank, pointing with a hoof.

"This is a beautiful cutie mark."

"It's shackles of my life!" I turned back to her. Please, Glimmer, stop making me look at it!

Glimmerlight only pressed my head right back and pointed again.

"Have you never noticed the one detail that matters? The one thing that changes everything about your life? That those shackles... are open?"

Simply staring toward my own mark, that hated symbol of slavery, there were a few moments of silence. Everything dulled. Nothing but me and that icon before me.

The shackles... were open.

Open.

Twinkling, like the light of a small star, something stirred within me. Sparks flew, a light that had long gone out relit, and a pushing realisation grew and grew as I looked at it properly for the very first time. Like a foal the moment they get one and feeling everything just click into place with wondrous joy and a purpose fulfilled.

The revelation hit me like a tidal wave, sucking me up and hurling me into my own life and every single moment. Glimmerlight's voice rung in my ears, her horn searing its light to throw me into my own memories.

"Remember everything, Murky. See your life the way you've never seen it before!"

A thunderstorm! A muddy farm and being torn from the grasp of my mother. Every other foal had gone along with it but for one that needed to be grabbed and pulled away many times. He had defied the instruction his masters had given to seek the pony he wanted to be with!

"You've been resisting ever since you were a foal."

A little hoof struck an eye, the foal galloping away from what was wished for him back into her embrace. Even with failing, his mother's words made so much more sense. That he was different!

"She told you that you were different, special! That you were going to do something they were all jealous of! She knew that someday you would grow to fly away from all this! To fly after that wagon taking her away!"

A rock crashed down the valley, striking a wall and smashing it to tinder. Behind it, a young slave stood and stared toward the world suddenly open before him. Lit from the sunset, the warmth and hazy orange carried him forward without permission to seek that which he wanted.

"You didn't get your cutie mark because you were caught, Murky..."

The sight of a young foal galloping with a smile I never even knew I'd been wearing that day! Galloping and hopping, little wings buzzing and trying to lift him higher! Every effort thrown toward an escape that he was throwing everything into!

"You got it because it was the very first time you had tried to escape! Your mark is not for slavery, Murky. It's for freedom! To break the chains!"

Fillydelphia loomed, the sunset's orange become a thick red. Slaves were lined up before a bloodstained griffon. Each slave, in fear, sought the methods of freedom through service and slavery to a grim contract. But as that griffon approached the smallest, he looked up and he spoke to her.

"Stern was surprised at you, remember? Thousands had chosen that out of fear, but despite the shaky voice, she saw the look in your eyes!"

He spoke up, scared and whimpering. But in his eyes I could see a glint, something unknown to me from inside! His mouth moved, but it spoke a different tone than what the Ruin had repeated back to me.

"Just listen, Murky..."

My own voice.

"For now, I am nothing but a slave to Fillydelphia."

Then I heard it, what was different.

"For now."

I'd always known.

"You always had that will to escape, Murky! You did it before you even had us around! Before I even set eyes on you, you proved to yourself that you're ready."

I saw myself atop a helter-skelter gazing toward the wall, standing before a mirror decked out in my escape gear! Then I saw that sight it had shown me long ago!

A little foal pegasus, me as a colt, standing with innocent little wide eyes filled with tears, my two stubby little wings flapping. It had been that very first escape from the rock farm!

"Ready? Ready for what?"

Glimmerlight was still there, right beside me and guiding me through more recent times, the flow of memory and dreamlike stars carrying those images around me. Her voice flowed toward my ears, gentle and like music...

"You've come such a long, long way..."

A little slave who meekly obeyed everything even a normal slaver ordered him to do, who ran away from mere gang members. When faced with merely having to steal his own journal back, he simply lay down and cried.

"And I've watched you from our very first day..."

That same little slave, battered but standing sat before a sick unicorn upon a couch. She had heard them, what he intended to do to help her. Then, inside a bunker, he fought off ghouls to rescue a small filly from imprisonment, to free her! A daring escape into the crater to carry home the items he needed to save the mare's life.

"To see how you might grow. To see what you might do..."

He sat between a giant stallion and the rescued mare. They teased him as he drew, making him blush and yet laugh. Then the dark of a Stable. Even under the waves of battle and danger, the moment his eyes saw the light pouring in the doorway from up ahead he zoned out, trotting forward toward it with dreams and aspirations overcoming the terror inside him from that horrid place!

"To see what you've been through..."

Atop a rooftop, a black and red unicorn and the little slave faced each other, an aimed gun and a pleading to not move or the gun would fire. Heedless, he charged forward for that zipline with no hope at all! Galloping directly into a bullet just to try and get there! Crashing into his small body and sending him reeling to the floor, I saw the unicorn rush to catch him and try to save his life.

"...and all the ways you've made me proud of you!"

It began to speed up. Image after image. From the pits of slavery amongst parasprites where he volunteered himself to save a young couple. From where he took upon a mission to acquire a sanitiser for better aiding those who needed it. Right into trying to help free those trapped by raiders amongst a brutal firefight inside a mall, taking on their leader himself!

"It's time now for a new change to come. You've grown up to see a new life has begun."

From escaping his Master time and again to freeing that one mysterious mare from incoming danger! Escape after escape while on the run, constant efforts to get away from his Master even under the darkest days of his life. A mindset that never gave up and always found some little hope to hold onto!

"To go where you will go. To see what you will see..."

Against whizzing images, so fast I could not see them but every single one of them a whirling mass of escape, chase, and a decision to defy! Every theft, solution, or evasion he'd made by himself slowly fading to show me that one moment of him looking up at his master and telling him no! Of my tirade against him after saving Lilac, the words that had rung true to my mind whether I had an icon or not!

"To know you will be free!"

One blurring surge of memories, escape attempt after escape attempt. Every time coming closer and closer from a desperate charge out of a rock farm, to a prepared plan away from the FunFarm, right to a war-torn rush away from a Stable! Always toward the sunset! Always toward that one symbol of freedom that I saw in every image of running, evading, and smiling as I was surrounded by those I would make my new life with! More and more flying by of each moment that mattered fading toward that one symbol before my eyes that defined my life!

"For it's time for you to fulfil your destiny!"

A pair of shackles, broken open.

A symbol I'd always carried and never realised, shining with purpose and potential right before my eyes! I was back in the pit, but standing taller. My body was somewhat numb, but I could feel the ground below me. My eyes firmly centred on that mark that now meant something entirely different amid the light of Glimmer's magic and fading memory spells. She stood there, smiling at the shocked look upon my face.

"I... I never knew..."

Glimmerlight trotted forward, resting a hoof over my shoulders. Glancing to myself, I saw the blackened ruin that had spread over my body throughout the bad memories gone. I was just the normal pony as I always was, cleaner and healed in his own stitched woollen fleece.

"You gave us hope as much as we gave you help, Murky. Don't ever think that you were just a burden or a tag-along. A little symbol of innocence and purpose toward freedom like you was just what Brim and I needed to get going. I'd never have tried to reconcile with Coral without you around to help me. Did you really think we would leave you alone to this?"

"But I... I'm dead. All this time I never realised what it meant and only now see but I'm already... g-gone..."

Glimmerlight shook me a little, leaning closer.

"Listen, Murky. It doesn't matter when you realised this. It always matters, even if it's to go into the great beyond. Where you've come from doesn't change anything. It's where you want to go that matters. What you do now is the deciding factor. Will you use what you know to save yourself? To escape these chains on your soul from a mistaken destiny forever?"

Looking up, past the whirling circles of slavery to the red glow of Fillydelphia far above us, I bit my lip and shivered.

"I... I d-don't know if I can. This is all so—oh my. I mean, my cutie mark means freedom! It's so much to take in, and I don't know if I can do it or-or feel it as I should now and... I'm so weak."

"You don't have to do this alone, Murky." She rocked me with that hoof and squeezed her cheek against mine. "You've got me with you. Always. When I said best friend forever, you better bet your skinny little cute rump I meant it. The others all feel the same. Nopony wants to see you die."

My eyes bolted open, a surge of will to seek freedom anew picking up by that last word.

"Y-you mean?"

"Yes, Murky." She grinned and looked skyward, up the immense trial before us. "Up there is the light beyond the slavery, beyond the darkness of all your memories and hardships. Past all that which pulled you down you can find the way to your own choice. A way out of this nightmare. We're all doing what we can. It won't be easy, but you can bet the others will help."

She took my hoof.

"So let's get you out. Let's escape the wilful death that so much of you wants and bring the real Murky to life once and for all. Let's escape the slavery that's bound you so long inside!"

A resurgence of courage, yes courage, spiked up in me. There was a way. A journey to the freedom of my soul, to life or salvation I did not care! But I had my best friend with me. I would make it!

"Yes. Let's!"

Cast into the pit of despair, farther than ever before from what I craved, I now knew that it was not the end. Glimmerlight and I. Me and my chosen sister. Two simple ponies with nowhere to go but up. Around us, every single form of myself that worked the walls turned and squinted through sunken hopeless eyes to the one part of me that hadn't yet given up. Cast in Glimmerlight's glow, we were one small aura of light in the darkness.

This was the moment I took back my life and became the pony I was meant to be. The moment I would throw off the chains for good inside myself.

"No matter what happens, sis? Thanks... for everything."

"Pfft, you sound like I'm not going to drag you out if I have to. I haven't finished hooking you up with a buck yet."

She winked at me. Despite a blush, I smiled.

Then we took off. A gallop toward one of the cave entrances surrounding us. All around us, the staring slaves looked shocked. A sight they had never expected to see. Something that scared them, terrified them into dropping all their tools.

As we ran across the long flat quarry bottom, I saw that fear turn to shock as they realised what we planned to do. Within seconds, it became an anger, a desperate fury as every other part of me wished to remain in death. A clatter of chains and tiny hooves, they leapt forward and charged for us from all sides!

Glimmer's horn flared, casting light further out. The wrecks and failed hopes of me winced and stumbled, crying out as they covered their eyes or shrank back as though burned.

"This won't hold them too long! The parts of you that still believe you want to die are strong, Murky! It's deep rooted, not something that just disappears. You have to make it happen and get out of here!"

The cave was just up ahead. I ducked around blindly, flailing limbs that rose from the darkness alongside radsore bearing faces of torment. They clawed into Glimmer's aura, looking to grab a hoof or a tail.

"Get out where? Where do we go?"

"Towards the light! Always towards the light, you'll know where!"

Passing by the entrance, the crowd of slaves poured in after us. The cave circled around the edges of the quarry, rising with every metre. It was time to begin the ascent out of this nightmare once and for all. Struggling to keep up with Glimmer's longer strides, I felt one bite at my tail. Squeaking, I pulled it away just before the jaws snapped shut. Were they me? A savage and dark part of my mind that sought to pull me into this sort of thing?

Toward the light. Where was the light? What was the light?

From everything I'd seen the answer wasn't long in coming. Diving through the cave and beginning to climb upwards in a ring, I shouted to Glimmer.

"The sun! The source of all light! The thing I first chased! That's what I need to go to! To see!"

"Sounds like—argh!" Glimmer cut her words, diving forward when a tiny crevice unleashed a tide of slaves. Pouring forth like black liquid, they slipped through the dark shadows of the slick cave and launched at her. Spinning, casting her horn toward them, they fell back with a growl. I pulled at her, helping my sister up to keep moving!

They were coming from everywhere. In some unreal way I recognised them all as each day of slavery I had done, each a unique pain or memory of a thousand tasks. A tide came from behind us, clawing over one another in their fear to stop me. Every time I looked away, more appeared.

"They're going to close us in!"

Glimmer threw one off, pulling me now into a side cave with a rising floor. We had to keep going up, the only direction that mattered! Around us, the cave darkened until we could no longer see the walls but merely hear the rush of slaves chasing us.

Then, like running out of a black cloud, we found ourselves in a wide void filled with mesh flooring and cage-like corridors held up by thick clanking chains. Around us, there was naught but a view to eternity surrounding this metal maze, a view that shifted with blurry images of my life, told through hazy colours shifting and turning in the mists.

"Your subconscious is one messed up place, Murky!"

"Tell me about it!"

The entire construction swung as we entered on it. This made no sense. We'd been in a cave, but the moment we'd entered this side passage it had disappeared. We climbed cages like stairs, dove under chains that hung or barred the way, and always kept moving up. Slaves clung to the outsides, hooves pushing through toward us. Some battered the metal, trying to break into it. The entire construction swung from the chase across it, arcing back and forward to throw off our balance. Sometimes I could have sworn we were now on what was once the wall.

Eventually we came to a blank area, a crossroads with nowhere to go. Slaves poured through gaps in the corridors surrounding it, trapping us in the junction! I could hear their cries, somewhere between a scream of agony and fear-driven rage. Every so often, a blood chilling plead or beg would come through the sound.

"Um, any ideas, sis? We're trapped!"

"Look up!"

Casting my eyes skywards, I saw the light above, like a small trapdoor!

"I can't fly!"

"No, but this is your mind, Murky! Your memories! Isn't there something that would work here you loved very much? Something you yearned for years after?"

Shivering, terrified by the new rush of emotions and the thrill of escape, I looked into her eyes and saw that look that would always reassure me. She knew I had a way out of this. I just had to know it.

Something I knew would work.

I closed my eyes, remembering every little delight of acquiring it. Bouncing happily around another room full of cages and locks with a buck so enthusiastic he had seemed to almost sing his delight at making it up for me! One I'd gotten rather caught up in myself.

Thank you, Blunderbuck...

Opening my eyes, I reared up, angling my back, and kicked out my front leg. With a whirl and snap, the mouthpiece whipped in front of my face, as though it had always been there! Glimmer grabbed me, holding tightly when I bit down, feeling the satisfying whoosh of the air-powered grapple rocket off my side and snake its way into the light. I didn't need to hear a click to know it would find its target. Yanking back on the mouthpiece, I sent Glimmer and I soaring upwards even as the slaves clustered below. I'd have laughed if I could! Now we were moving! Up and into the light faster and faster! Far quicker than my grapple gun had ever moved me! My mane whipped. Glimmer dug her head into my shoulder from the surging wind passing over us while we left the dark quarry behind for good!

The light grew before us, larger... larger... encompassing us until it gave way to a flickering reality! We passed through it, moving to somewhere else...

All upward motion ceased, both of us being dumped down where we were. Falling on top of Glimmerlight, I still made a grunt of surprise and pain from the short fall. We'd landed upon a hard concrete floor in darkness.

"Good job, lil'bro. Knew you had it in you, but where are we?"

Helping her up, I had to squint as her horn lit again. The light didn't go too far, casting only about ten feet either side to no avail. I saw only a chipped and stained concrete floor before the ambience of darkness took over once more. Backing against one another, I gulped as I saw what the stain was.

"I th-think I know where we are, Glimmer."

"This will take you past the trials of your life, Murky. You're trying to escape the memories that hurt you and the things you fear. It's that fear that's trying to make you give up. So, where is this?"

I didn't have to answer. He did for me.

"Welcome back, Murk! I didn't expect a rematch so soon!"

The floodlights blasted into life, blinding me on the spot. Crying out loud and covering my eyes, I slowly let them refocus to what I had feared. Around me was a huge concrete arena topped with spiked metal and darkened stands where shadows warped and moved in a mocking form of an audience. The entire roof was enclosed within the quarry's caves while the stains around me were blood. My blood.

He stood before us. My killer. Wildcard stood atop a pile of corpses, all the ponies (and buffalo) I'd seen die in the Pit across both times I had been there. The huge form of Bonecrusher surrounded by Top Quartz, Shovels, and the rest. I even saw Blood and Daff.

"I've never got to kill somepony twice before! You know they say the sequels are always worse, right? Wonder if the same is true with murder. What do you think, huh?"

He slid down the corpse pile as though it were a child's slide, skidding at the bottom across the thick blood seeping away from it and rolling to his hooves with a bow. My body began to freeze. He'd killed me! I couldn't fight him!

"You can do this, Murky. It's not about combat! It's about overcoming what scares you!"

"He killed me, Glimmer! H-he made me scream and hurt me before—"

"Listen to me! You can do this! You're braver than you—ARGH!"

My mind reeled as I saw the blood leap up, snaking around her legs as though it were alive and drag Glimmerlight far from me! Throwing her into the wall, it surged off the ground and formed a sort of blood cage around her. Slowly, it began to steam, growing boiling hot that scalded her everytime she tried to push by.

"Hush hush, girl!" Wildcard skipped through the arena, grinning to her. "Let the little buck talk, it's rude to interrupt! You don't get to play any part in this! Now c'mere little guy!"

I stepped backward, my mind was still reeling at the sight of blood coming to life. Below my hooves I felt its sticky pools squirming like living water.

"I said come here!" Fury crossed his face the moment my hoof moved backward. "You're not doing what I'm telling you? I own your life, cos I killed it! Get back here!"

Shaking my head, I turned to run. I could hear Glimmer screaming for me to just see through how he scared me into wanting to fall again, but he just overwhelmed me. Anywhere I galloped to, he was there, defying reality to be just outside my peripheral vision every time!

"Over here!"

I dove away.

"I meant here!"

Rolling away, one machete drove into the concrete.

"Or here!"

A hoof flashed out at me. Scampering away from it, I bit down hard on my grapple gun, trying to smack him in the chest with it, but instead knocking me back onto my rump with the recoil as it only soared past him. Lightning sparked from his horn, striking the ground beside me. Crying out, I froze at the sight of him waving a hoof happily from nearby. His horn was lit, ready to aim properly this time.

"P-please, let me go! I just want to live!"

"Aww, ain't that cute?" Wildcard trotted forward, shaking out that multi-coloured mane. "Usually they tell me they don't want to die rather than they want to live. Somethin' different, huh? Share it with uncle Wildcard, c'mon!"

"I want to live! J-just let me go! I don't want to fight."

There was one difference between then and now. I didn't feel tears in my eyes.

"You only kill! Just treat it like a game! Why can't I just have a life? Away from ponies like you!"

Wildcard stopped trying to work something out of his teeth with the machete and blinked at me. Then he began to advance, his voice low.

"Like me? You thinking I'm something bad? That there's something wrong with me? Fuck this, I'm gonna stick you right now, little pig. You saying I'm crazy!? Ain't no water below the bridge, that isn't gonna be your fucking blood, kid!"

He charged, raising the machete before sending it crashing down. I screamed, covering my eyes.

Red clouded my vision. The colour of blood and the sound of something hacking through flesh met my ears. He'd done it again. He'd...

There was no pain. Cautiously, I moved my hooves away.

Before me, having dove in front to take the strike to his own body, Brimstone Blitz stood between Wildcard and I. The machete had sunk into his shoulder, streaming blood terribly. But his cold eyes met Wildcard's from mere inches away. The crazed raider seemed, for once, stunned.

"I was like you once, Wildcard. Not any more. If I need to sacrifice my own body to prove something or to protect somepony, I'll do it."

"You old dog, nothing you do can save him from the place he's in! Best just accept the crazy, embrace it, and fall!"

They collided in a sudden and mutual blur of motion. But so close, with his weapon stuck on Brimstone, Wildcard had no chance. Hurling the smaller raider away, Brimstone charged and leapt upon him, pinning the raider down. He seemed stronger than ever, his mane greater in colour, and his body more lean and muscular than I'd ever seen it. Like he was somehow younger, less ragged.

"I'm not going to let age take me until I know I've done what I need to, Wildcard!"

"Get off m—"

"Shut up! I let you get to him once before. Never again! He doesn't ever have to fear you again, know why? Because he has others willing to stand beside him who won't let him pass into the darkness so easily! But there's one much bigger reason that matters to you right now."

Brimstone turned back to me.

"It's that he's got me, and even way down here I'm not going to let you get anywhere near him again!"

One of those colossal hooves rose. Wildcard struggled and squirmed, but beneath the full might of a warlord in his prime he had no chance! With a roar, the final blow descended, shattering Wildcard to splinters of ebbing black that flew in all directions before melting to the floor. Along with the blood, it sunk out of the arena.

The flood lights dimmed, the crowd falling silent and lurking away as the light began to draw down again, only one remaining in the far gate. The one I'd once watched what I thought was a legend from.

Slowly, under the sudden silence, I trotted toward Brimstone Blitz. His wound seemed to have disappeared. Toward the side, Glimmer began to gallop over, the steaming blood cage falling away to the drains like all the rest.

"Brim..." I held a breathless wonder in my voice, speeding up to stand before him with a smile. I was so glad he was here. Our guardian, the huge pony I realised for all his fury I did at my core feel safe around. I couldn't help it. I ran up and hugged him.

Or, well, hugged his leg anyway.

All the same, I felt the other giant hoof curl around me.

"I promised you long ago that you were one of us, and by my own life I would see you free, Murk. Be it to a new life or as a release from an untimely death, I won't turn back on that. Back in the clan we took oaths like that seriously."

I felt his head look up, to Glimmer.

"If there's anything I've learned lately, it's that we can't change how we began. We can only make what we will of it for our future. I almost threw my soul away in years past to the rage, but you two... you've brought it back. Given me a reason to learn what caring is again. If only by memory here, I will always protect you."

"Thank you..." Glimmerlight wiped a little tear from her eye. I felt Brimstone motion me to get off his leg with a rare smirk.

"We should go. There is far yet to travel, more trials await! Wildcard was the fear of your death, Murk. They all will mean something to you. I am with you however, from now on until the end."

How typical of me. I couldn't help the crying from happening. Only this time of joy and absolute delight to know they were with me.

"Then what are we waiting for?" Glimmerlight beamed, pointing toward the gate. "Let's do this!"

"YEAH!" I leapt up and cried out, punching a hoof in the air. Then hesitated, blushing at the 'trying not to laugh' look they both gave me. Glimmer ruffled my mane with at most a snicker.

"That's the spirit, lil'bro. Come on!"

All three of us galloped onward toward the gate. The arena faded around us as we went, the light remaining the only indicator of our path! The ground began to rise, sending us galloping uphill, every inch a satisfying rise from darkness! I could do this! I could escape the slave in my mind! Passing through the gate, the momentum built, my friends at my back and the light before me atop the stairs growing into the black void below us!

We ran into the light.

Then the light went out.

I stumbled and almost fell. Had I gone deaf? I couldn't hear the others! Turning from side to side, I tried to run into them! To find them! But there was nothing!

Had it all been a tease? To think I was succeeding?

"Glimmer!"

I ran another way.

"Brimstone!"

We had just been running up! I couldn't even see my hoof in front of my face now! Terror began to build under such enthusiasm, a low worry of things crashing down all over again like they always had.

Then I felt a motion pass right by me. Squeaking, I leapt after it, trying to catch it! But the feeling wormed away, floating into the darkness as though it were always a part of it.

"Scared?"

The voice seemed to come from nowhere. Turning from side to side, I wished my eyes could see properly, but what night vision I usually had was gone!

I felt a brush against my flank. Leaping away from it this time in fear, I almost tripped over something I couldn't see!

Right. Two could play at this game. I hunched down low, treading lightly.

"Oh, don't even try. You never could beat me at this."

Wait...

Oh no.

As though sensing my own realisation, a single eye opened before me, predatory and followed by a mad shining white grin in the darkness.

"Hello again, filly."

I fell, back-peddalling frantically away from the sight. My hoof went to my shoulder, which suddenly ached with the hot pain of a knife blade searing right through it. There was nothing there, but I still felt it as I had before! Twisting the cold metal against my bone and muscle!

Through the darkness, he advanced, warping and twisting through all the shadows I now saw in his wake. Long, straight hair that sent wavy distortions around him and seemed to gel with the magic bleeding from that dark horn made it impossible to really see any outline of the raider that still made me fear the dark!

Barb.

"You don't know how wonderful it is to see you down here. You thought you were such a hotshot pulling one trick and quipping off, huh? Ooh, we don't like that in the Clan. We don't like little pipsqueak fillies thinking that can act bigger than us! Especially me."

I felt something under my hoof, like a rock! I threw it! The object seemed to simply vanish through him. Barb slid past my vision, appearing right beside me as what I thought was him simply faded into nothing.

"Not got any fancy tricks left? Fool me once, kid. I hope you know what gutting involves now, because I'll show you how for what you did the moment you truly realised how screwed you really are! Don't think the whore or the traitor will come for you. They're wandering themselves miles from here, each thinking they're chasing me."

He winked.

"Unicorn shadow magic. It's a wonderful thing; bless Luna, eh? Face it. Your friends are dead the moment I decide it down here. I am the darkness, filly, and in your mind the darkness is everything! Now gallop. Gallop and scream because I'm going to be coming for you and I want to hear you beg as you flee the inevitable!"

A knife pressed against my shoulder! That shoulder! I had no choice. I had to go, it was run or be impaled! Taking breaths with no air entering my body, I stood and sprinted away while trying to avoid tripping over every desk and door frame! I fell into the corridor, struggling to see, and wishing I could maybe find Brim or Glim in this maze! Was this Stable Ninety Three? I thought it was!

Laughter sounded behind me. The stalking hunt was on! Trying to control myself from screaming, I crept as best I could down random corridors, trying to always get away from him! I heard things, buckets being knocked over or doors sliding open and closing! I could track him by the doors, right?

Ahead of me, a door opened. He must be up there!

Turning, I ran right into a sweeping wave of darkness that curled along the wall and ceiling, as though he was running off the ground within the shadows themselves!

"All the shadows are mine, filly! You can't trust any of your precious sounds now!"

This time, I screamed. The glint of black metal caught my eye while I turned and galloped away. He moved slowly, savouring the hunt. It gave me time to rush up some stairs. Up! Always up! I'd have to find the way out of the Stable, right? Was that the game? I needed to fool him. Get him to move away, use every ounce of hiding I could!

Watching either side of me, I stepped back into the thickest shadow I could and lay down quietly. Nearby, I could hear his laughter down the hallway. Curling up, I hugged myself and tried to staunch the pain of my shoulder. It was agonising now!

Then I felt the shadow hug back.

"Throwing my voice isn't that hard! Two tries down. Next time it's the blade in the back for you!"

He threw me out, surging around me. I never once saw his actual physical form! Just eyes or a wisp of hair trailing in the shadows themselves! Every corridor I looked at seemed to have something! The entire Stable was Barb!

"Oh, now you're getting it!"

No matter where I went, he could always see me... always catch me...

I started to fall to the floor, holding my shoulder as it began to bleed all on its own. Some wounds, some fears never died.

"All you can do is wait until I have my fun. It's not nice being smaller, is it?"

His voice rang around me, echoing off walls and reverberating from every corridor at different times. I couldn't locate him! I couldn't escape him! He was my absolute peer!

I was just too small, too weak at anything to win.

"No you're not!"

My eyes bolted open. I felt someone else gallop up to me, sliding to catch me before I fell in hopeless loss. A buck's voice. I felt firm but gentle hooves hold me up and cradle my shoulder.

"Even those who didn't know you long were those you made an impact on, Murky."

Through the darkness, I tried to squint until he finally came into view. I felt a cooling water poured over my shoulder and the tingling magic of a healing potion applied. Then I finally saw, the light of the magic working upon me making his glasses sparkle before optimistic and calming eyes.

"Doctor Weathervane bid me to take that oath to help others, Murky," said Caduceus, "I'm not going to go back on it. Especially not for those in dire need."

If I had any air in my lungs I would have been breathless. Sitting right before me was a buck I'd barely known, but had felt such a connection with as a friend before Barb stole him from all of us.

"He hurt you, Murky. Some wounds go long after the pain has faded from the body, but we can't let them dominate us! If in life I fixed your body, in memory I shall help fix your fear. The fear of those stronger than you. That's what he represents to you now!"

Behind him, I saw another shadow swish past, laughing while it circled us. A predator waiting to strike. Caduceus held my shoulder strong, the pain dying off, before laying his other hoof to the side of my face.

"You were a wonderful little buck. Somepony I was happy to die fighting alongside for the rescue of those in need. You gave me the courage, because I could look at you and see that even the weakest of us was still standing up to do it. I went for Glimmer, but I stayed because of your inspiration to stick by your friends! You are a brave pony, Murky!"

We stood together. Then he simply hugged me. Falling into the embrace, I couldn't do anything but simply say the words I never got the chance to.

"Thank you..."

"You're very welcome. I'm sorry I couldn't say goodbye, but there are more important things than that now. Murky, listen carefully, he—"

"Is more than he'll ever amount to!"

Barb's voice bounced from the walls. I could feel him coming closer, sense his strike was nearing. I began to shiver, but Caduceus shook me gently.

"He is nothing but your fear of those better than you! But what have you to fear from him? You beat him! In the end it was you who ended his reign of terror in that Mall! You who saved Protégé's life and the lives of many others by throwing yourself against him!"

"Nothing but luck! Now both of you, nothing but unlucky bucks! I hope you're ready!"

The darkness swelled, I saw only briefly a glint of a dozen knives in the darkness, all closing upon us. We had to move, but Caduceus only held me still!

"All he has is fear, Murky!"

My eyes closed tightly, but the words reminded me of that horrifying moment as I saw him strike down a pony I sought to protect! Of how I had run forward without fear to launch onto him! Of outwitting him in the end! I had won.

I had won and he was gone! He was no threat to me anymore!

I was not afraid!

I opened my eyes even as I felt the knives all land and sink into both of us. The darkness penetrating and surging inward for the killing blow in a nightmare of gore and pain.

Nothing landed.

As my eyes opened again, I was standing with Caduceus, holding one another tightly in support of the fear we'd both had of this ghostly pony. But now, aching my eyes a little were the panel lights above that had come on. The entire Stable was bathed in light, revealing to me nothing but a pathetic sight.

A tiny form of Barb, skinnier than even me. Without gore, but as though he had been blown into fragments and only the barest form of a pony remained. Unable to move, cast upon the floor, I saw eyes showing fear himself looking up at me, before what shadow remained slipped away beneath the metal plates of the Stable's floor, disappearing forever.

"Thank you, Caduceus. I'm—I'm sorry we couldn't—"

He stepped back from me, breathing out with relief. But he shook his head.

"It's all right, Murky. I knew the dangers when I went in and I don't regret doing it. But right now, it's you that we have to help. I'll follow you along with Brimstone and Glimmer to aid you."

A thick galloping from around the Stable corridor's corner gave way to just those two ponies rushing forward, hearing our voices. There was a silence, Glimmer simply stopping on the spot as her eyes found Caduceus standing beside me, a hoof on my back protectively.

The joy I felt as I saw her rush over and dive onto him so hard he was blown over to the floor was more than I had known in so long. Even Brimstone couldn't help but crack his stern face into a little smile at the sight of those two laughing and holding one another tightly. A miracle to meet just once more.

"Caddy!" Glimmer almost squealed the name, rubbing her cheek against his. I could see little sparkling tears around her eyes whenever that huge mane of hers was out of the way. Giggling from her attentions, Caduceus had to properly fight to keep his glasses on and get to his hooves.

"Oh, Glimmerlight! Your mane!"

"Oh I know. Welcome to how I should look, you lucky buck. Thank you for being here, for helping him! Thank you..."

They shared one more tender embrace, one that I felt Glimmer's magic dragging me into. The type of moment we never had been able to have in real life.

Brimstone made a small sound of approval, clearly not willing to join a group hug, before casting his eyes down the corridor. A stream of light began to show.

"The Stable door. Right there with the light. We should get moving; the shadows and nightmares seeking to stop him won't rest long. I can sense it. The surface isn't far away now to get back into Fillydelphia and out of this underground world."

Separating, sticking close, we each nodded and began the journey again. With my friends by my side, I felt spurred on! I could properly do this! Rounding the corner we saw the door, casting white light into the dark Stable that the ageing panels above simply could not give. A natural light, one of life.

Our group galloped forward, me in front of them all as we dove through it like we had once before on the hills outside Fillydelphia.

For once, the light did not go out. Instead it shifted and became a harsh orange glow. A wave of heat struck me as we passed through, a familiar one.

Blinking to clear the glare, I almost gagged on a poisonous tang to the... well it wasn't air. I still couldn't feel myself breathing. But a thick, smoggy cloud rolled across the area, blocking all sight and burning my throat and eyes.

It was a feeling all too familiar. I knew exactly where I was.

The smog lifted, revealing the industry of Fillydelphia, a massive below-ground chamber of impossible heights and scale between thick pillars and bearing, unending machinery that whirled and ground all around us. A vast mechanism of unknown purpose and incredible complexity. It rose up the pillars and spread under the metal grating of the floor.

But the noise.

My ears flattened. I dropped to cover them, noticing even my three companions wince when the slams, grinds, and screeches of metal washed across us. Beneath the sights, smells, and sounds of Fillydelphia's industry we were stricken, given only to a slow crawl through this mechanical maze of lethal squirting steam and shifting pistons.

"Keep moving!" I heard Brimstone shout above it. I could only nod and try! Pushing ahead, filled with a purpose to overcome all these trials, I cantered forward even while I felt my eyes turn wet from the pain in my head.

Through each corridor we turned, the noise only grew. Small oddities in it perked my interest, however. Every so often there was another tone to it, something else that didn't sound quite mechanical. Turning my head to the side, I looked at the nearest machine, staring deep into its complex workings.

Then I screamed.

Within it, growing from a spinning cog, I saw a pony's face twisted in pain upon the very metal. On each squealing turn, I heard a cry of pain and suffering. Noticing one, I then heard the others, upon so many surfaces they were melded into the very workings of this vast room! Shifting faces and hooves between tearing metals and white hot welds that bore an unending existence as part of the machine itself!

Around me, my companions saw it too. Glimmerlight looked beyond horrified, stepping back against a furious Brimstone.

“There has to be an end! Push through! Don’t let it distract you!”

Caduceus rested a hoof on the metal, I could see the carer in him aghast.

“But we—”

“Get moving!” Brimstone pulled him away, pushed us all on! I galloped myself, only now beginning to realise how familiar that voice was. I knew who it was. Veering around whirring spindles I saw a long straight corridor lined with lathe machines that cracked with a sound of bone while they worked. Under this chorus of metal agony I ran, knowing they were right behind me. Find a way up! Always up!

The noise peaked, a grinding howled into the air before I felt a huge slam behind me. The impact threw me from my hooves, dumping me upon the ground before I could look back. A huge slab of metal had crashed down from a lifting arm above us! The centre of it was filled with mesh wire, separating me from my friends! I ran back to it, hopping up to try and press through the mesh, but it was far too small! Brimstone began slamming against it, while Caduceus tried helping me, before opening his eyes wide.

“Behind you!”

Feeling a cold sweat under the blistering heat, I spun.

Before me, forms of ponies were dredging themselves from the floors and machines. Dozens of them, all rising and shaking themselves off. Formed of metal and flesh upon their bodies, they were simply part of the great machine themselves. Necks cracked on spindles and blinking red and yellow eyes turned to look at me before I finally recognised them. Every one of them.

Every slaver I knew.

Wicked Slit gnashed her serrated mouth to lock the jaw in place as she fell from between two cogs with a tinny clatter. Whiplash juddered and let his glinting eyes fall upon me, a length of industrial wire in his mouth’s flesh that had been wrapped over a rounded pipe. The rock farmer, one I’d never even known the name of, slid forward on rusting plated legs. Hive, Wormtail, Mosin, Sooty, Grindstone...

They all were there.

Then they spoke, as one. A combined voice echoed and funnelled by the whirling machinery into a voice for the entire room.

“Welcome home, slave.”

Glimmerlight pressed her face up against the wire.

“Don’t listen to them! It’s just the next trial, Murky!”

The metal began to move, forcing my friends backwards, further from me! I tried to chase them, but it only moved faster as I ran between the pillars and leapt molten metal to catch them!

“You’re alone! We’re here to bring you back. Welcome you as what you should be all over again, just another little cog in the machine!”

Slit shivered forward, her mouth moving in perfect sync with every other slaver. Spreading out, they began to circle me.

“We’re where you belong, Murk!”

“With us! The ponies who own you!”

Whiplash began to trot forward faster. I leapt back. What was I meant to think? What did I do to win here? I didn't know! Hooves tried to grab me, rising from the machine! The slavers from the Mill! I felt myself being dragged! Weighed down as they closed in, a mass of master after master who had owned my life seeking to drown me into the very spinning wheels behind me!

"DON'T! I'm free! I should be free!"

"You should be here!"

Wicked Slit grabbed my leg, pulling me! Then I felt Mosin clamp a wrench-ended hoof over my tail. They began tugging me toward an opening in the machine that seemed designed just to perfectly fit me! I struggled, knocking nuts or bolts from their faces, but the pieces flowed and travelled back to where they should. An unending machine I couldn't change!

"Yes, here!"

"We're your real family, Murk."

I screamed, covering my face as they descended. But I felt a pressure build, a feeling like my ears had to pop. Growing and thickening the air with the sound of sparking, a sudden wind blew over me and heralded a fierce shockwave ripping across the machines, tearing parts free and throwing the slavers back. Some shattered into parts or got caught in the cogs and pistons of the machines around us!

Stunned, lying upon the ground, I looked up to see the sparking emerging from a horn glowing brighter than any I'd seen since the Pit.

Coral Eve stood atop one machine, her face bearing a mask of anger and determination. Her mane braided in intricate wooden clasps I'd never seen her own outside Glimmer's memories.

"You all know nothing of what the word 'family' truly means!"

A clipped electronic scream belched into the air. Slit, Hive, and a half dozen others got back up as their bodies reknitted and reformed, charging forward. With a toss of her head and a cry of exertion, Coral sent them blasting back across the foundry floor to slam into the wall blocking the others! Suddenly, a crash as Brimstone broke the barrier down and dropped it upon all the slavers! The impact lifted dust from the ground before he, Glimmer, and Caduceus charged toward me as well. Coral landed beside me, helping me up.

"A family isn't what you're told to accept. It's what you choose for yourself. A bond between ponies, no matter their origin or how they met. It's what you mean to one another..."

She looked down to me. Even as the others approached, that fury settling to a smile.

"...to help fill the gaps in each other's lives."

I couldn't help it. Even in danger, I leaned forward to hug her tightly, feeling her return it and wrap her hooves around me tightly.

"I knew you'd be here too, Coral."

"I know, my dear. I know."

Surrounded by my friends, my family I'd chosen for myself, the mechanical slavers paused and retreated, even falling apart. Slowly, the noise began to fade, the machines shutting down. Glimmerlight moved closer to me, exchanging a knowing glance with Coral, before stroking my mane and pointing. Up ahead, I could see a great set of stairs leading to the surface! There was maybe just one more room to go through! Fillydelphia's top level was almost near! From the bottom of that dark quarry to here. Such a rushed journey.

We were so close, but we couldn't be stopped! Every task my friends had helped me overcome, now that they were all here.

My gaze lifted up the stairs as we neared them. I placed one hoof upon the steps and felt a chill run right through me.

"It's all right, Murky. We're here with you." Glimmerlight nudged my side.

"You've stormed past all this! I dare say, this will be easy." Caduceus smiled to me.

Only, I was shivering. I had looked upwards to the great doorway out of the foundry ahead. Tall and made of concrete, they bore a symbol at the top. The one that mattered most, the hardest one to get around.

A single loop. The eternal chain.

"H-he's in there..." My hooves felt frozen to the spot. I'd never truly beaten him! H-how was I... what if he... oh no..."

"Murky, hun." Coral passed a hoof over me, pulling my eyes to hers. "I saw you stand up to him. We all did, but I saw you say that one word, just remember it. Remember the one that matters! If you can say that, then you can win. You knew you'd have to come to face him eventually."

"I... I know! But he's... he might be my—"

"No!" Coral's voice snapped out, almost reprimanding me on the spot. I blinked, looking up at her. "Remember what I just said. Family is who you choose. Whether or not he was responsible to begin with, what matters is who you choose. We're all here for you now, all your friends. We won't leave you to yourself. But he might separate us. He may force you to do this alone. We'll all be rooting for you, even if you can't hear us."

"Damn fuckin' right," Brimstone muttered, earning him a little glance from Coral.

"Language, big guy."

He smirked, holding up a hoof. "As if Murky would ever be able to repeat it anyway."

A little laugh passed around the group. I allowed myself a chuckle.

They had carried me this far. We couldn't stop now. I had faced the trials of my own fears, of my death, of those stronger than I, of the life that was expected of me, but now I knew it was for the greatest of them all.

To face My Master. The true symbol of everything that had held me down. Master and Slave.

"Thank you, all of you. L-let's go."

We ran up the stairs. They went on for a long time, the huge door only getting bigger as we ascended from the pit of machinery, heading for the surface! Every step forward I felt the fear grow. I knew I would likely be terrified, cry, and struggle, but I had to try! He would always stand in my way before any escape!

We never even stopped for the door, high above the ground. We pushed right through it and into his lair within my mind.

What struck me was the silence.

After the deafening machines, the moment I passed through that door there was nothing but a still silence amongst a dark chamber. Fans above turned lethargically, beaming dull red light into the room that chopped and cut every time a fan blade shifted past. Almost like the ruins of an ancient castle or cathedral, the pillars continued to rise into a dark abyss above us.

Out of that darkness hung chains.

Everywhere, like rainfall held still, they hung filled with hooks or collars from the ceiling to become almost like a forest suspended five feet from the floor. They swayed gently, clinking against one another or upon the ruined marble pillars and (for those that reached further down) floor.

A strange little sound made my ears prick up. I'd heard it long ago. What was it?

"...ews... derly stal... uth..."

I glanced around, looking down and to my right, it seemed loudest there. What was that?

We stood as one group, waiting. Shaking my head to clear these odd distractions, I held close to Glimmerlight, casting my eyes to every shadow that might hold something. Through murky windows I could see the hazed light of Fillydelphia's outside world. We were on the surface! At the far end, I could see a doorway that led out to it. We were so close!

I knew it would be more than simply running over there though.

It wasn't.

"Num... ber... Seven..."

Every few letters were pronounced harshly, mockingly. The voice emanated from all around, rattling the chains as they surged and quivered in response to the sickly voice creeping through them.

"Little... Number... Seven..."

Slowly, the dark ambience began to lift as a cloud above cleared and let more of the washing light pour through the windows. A set of steps to a plinth lit up, shining from polished stone leading all the way to a throne. A shifting mass below it, I gaped in horror as I saw myself. Many forms of myself all broken and laid low below the throne itself! My Master was sitting atop my own suffering! Made of ringed chain cast into the design, the throne curled round, rising to his own symbol above.

Within it he lounged, adorned in dark armour made of Ranger plate fragments and milled steel, a lordship of slavery at the height of power. Chains led from many hooks on it to the slaves bearing my face below his throne, ones he would pull or tug to get to them to move!

"Fillydelphia, the city of slavery. Look to the places you have come from. This is not just your fears, little Number Seven, but the legend that is this place! Red Eye was not the first to make something of this place."

Of course, I knew that from what I'd heard, that meant he knew it. I heard Brimstone snarl behind me, saw Coral's horn light in sparks. They were ready for a fight, but he only grinned at them, rotten teeth showing around disgustingly wet and cracked lips.

"Slavery is my destiny, you worms. I take what I own, and I own you!"

I knew the one word I had to say. The one that everyone has trouble saying, even to their friends. That one illogical word that is so simple, but that we all struggle with.

Here, it meant more than ever.

"N-no!"

I stepped forward. Coral was right. I had to tell him and show myself that I could overcome him! His eyes glared to me, uncannily familiar eyes reflected by every version of myself I saw groaning and crying below him.

"Not any more! I-I'm leaving! Escaping you!" Trotting forward, I stood before his throne, throat tight and shivering, but standing tall! "Just like I told you, but now I realise that my hope didn't have to come from anyone else but myself and from my friends!"

I'd told him! I'd told him no! We would pass this!

He only smiled and gestured. A rattle was our only warning, as every chain in the area writhed like a snake, collars gnashed and hooks scythed. A cry of warning was all I could offer before they hurtled down, surging around my friends! Surging around me! Brimstone fought at them, while I dove over the group, rolling on the ground to escape them! Coral's magic exploded forth as the battle against his chains began.

Caduceus and Glimmerlight were back to back, tossing them down or grabbing them in Glimmer's magic. Nearby, Brimstone tore them from the roof, finding them coiling like living creatures even afterwards! More dropped. Collars grabbed Coral's hooves and she shattered them upon the floor! Ducking, diving, and dodging I felt a hook nearly sink into my leg, deflected painfully from one of my little hooves! Grabbing one, I swung from it a short distance before running around a pillar, I could trap one!

My head turned away, hearing something again.

"...landers! ... he bloody mass... ealed at... st"

Distracted, a collar snapped shut around my back leg. I tried to grasp it and pull it off, but even when Glimmerlight ran to aid me I saw her wrapped around the waist by multiple chains and lifted high. Brimstone was covered in them, tearing and smashing but being slowed and weighed down. One by one we began to get caught and distracted. Caduceus cried out and thrashed ten feet off the ground while Coral's horn made a flare and burned out on the spot!

Finally, My Master moved.

"This is the reality of my legacy, Number Seven! Slavery is not something you choose to leave. You are here forever! You do not leave till I tell you, and I never will."

"Murky! This is just him trying to tell you who you are, but he doesn't choose!"

"Of course I do, little mare! I am his Master! His bloodline. Slavery is in us, Number Seven!"

He advanced, the chains dragging me across. I felt a collar shut around my throat tight enough to hurt! I didn't need to breathe, but my windpipe was still crushed.

"You can delude yourself as much as you want, but I am the Lord and Master of Slavery. Fillydelphia was and is mine. You came here to come home, Number Seven! To find me!"

His words seared into my mind, like they were not even simply being heard. Everything left a burning mark upon my thoughts! Struggling, I felt every limb clamped down! We were so close, it was just out there! He climbed out of his throne, stomping over to me down the steps.

"I... I want out! I don't accept you!"

"Too bad."

I heard a scream of pain behind me. Coral's horn had flared even brighter, trying to attack him. But hooks dug in and the magic imploded upon herself. Brimstone roared even as they cut at him and held him immobile. My friends were going to be torn apart by the chains!

"Face it, Number Seven. The only thing you can do to save them is to accept me. You've never been able to beat me. Every time the circle has simply completed itself and you have been returned worse than ever. Isn't that how it's gone? The Eternal Chain. You've seen the pattern again and again and again. It's all one loop and it's gone on since the start."

His hoof lifted my head up. Glimmerlight's cry of pain sent my eyes watering, the chains condensing around her.

"You can—argh! You can fight him, Murky! This is what you came here f-fooor!"

"How can you fight what you cannot take away? You know I'm telling the truth; that in the beginning, I gave you life."

*"Lying or not, it doesn't matter!"* Coral screamed from behind me.

I stared forward into my own eyes upon his face, that same scar aching and bleeding as I felt it form upon my previously clear forehead.

"There is nothing better for you out there. Born a slave and meant to be a slave, whether or not you have some little mark that promises you anything more!"

"What you were born as doesn't change what you try to be!" Brimstone roared, striking down a chain even as more grasped hold.

My neck tightened again, stopping me speaking. His hoof stroked my chin.

"You want out, but you don't know how to do it! You haven't a clue what freedom is! Now you will be cast down! No pony in this world can understand truly understand where you came from but me!"

I screamed! Every chain digging into me, unable to speak, feeling him stop me doing so by the command of the chains that my own mind conjured! I screamed because he was right! I... I didn't know and there was no pony—

"Wrong, Shackles."

A red glow erupted out and around us. The chains in the air recoiled, hissing as they moved and steamed. Forced back, they let go of me. Around me, I heard the metal shriek and jolt away from the magic surging forth.

With those two words spiking through my brain with enough hope and sudden feeling of safety, the collar snapped right off! I fell, rolling down the stairs away from him in his angered bewilderment at who distracted him! My friends dropped to the floor, each casting off what chains had been seeking to crush them.

Pained, shaking, I looked up. We all did.

Standing before me, I saw one little glint of red in the darkness that trotted forward. Dark coat emerging from within it to stand before me with his horn glowing a bright red that shielded and protected us.

*"He has me,"* said Protégé, *"somepony you have no power over! You might try to cast your chains around him and his friends, but you cannot cast them around me!"*

Lying upon the floor, looking up at him, I saw the one eye on his right look down to me with a small comforting smile. I wanted to throw myself at him, seeing him alive and well here after so much worry!

"Th-thank you for coming."

Protégé offered only a gentle nod, before his gaze turned to before us, where the black form of The Master stood in a wide stance, his chains surging and twisting around the entire room, just waiting for a chance.

*"Oh. You. The upstart himself. The little colt-cuddling wretch who thinks he can do so much 'more' for Fillydelphia. Don't think you being here makes any difference. You can protect him, but you cannot make him free, if you even know how."*

He trailed a hoof over the shield, leaning in close to it, closer to Protégé's face.

"Don't forget. There was a time when you called me Master."

"A time long past, Shackles!" Protégé bit back. "If I proved anything it's that a pony can escape you! I took two years, but I won't let another pony be drawn into your nightmare ever again! I will have you cast from this city if I can, to forever remove your stain of evil from a place that might be better! A place free of the hell you created before Master Red Eye dethroned you!"

Each of my friends were moving up beside him, I got back to my feet to stand directly beside him, feeling Glimmerlight on my other side.

"A time yet to come again, upstart!" He slammed upon the shield, a deep thump surging around it with more power than seemed natural. Protégé winced as The Master leaned in. "You're still within these walls, within Number Seven's slave mind. In here you will be mine again. Just as he always will be!"

The shield shimmered back, growing and forcing The Master back. As one, my friends stepped forward, all but me. They sheltered me, standing with Protégé as they fully stood up to him.

"If I need to nurture and protect him until another two years pass, I will, Shackles! He is strong, stronger than perhaps I was at his time and definitely more than you will ever believe! In here, in his mind, I believe in his ability to make it happen."

Protégé turned to me.

"He's proven everyone wrong about what his limits were, to come from nothing to do the things he's done. To save my life when he doesn't owe anything to me for what I've put him through. That's the mark of a real pony under all the tears and terror. Something you would never understand or be able to spot, Shackles!"

Every day I would never truly understand everything that drove the only friendly 'master' I'd ever had, but right now I was simply glad he was here, no matter what the circumstances between us were.

"Damn right! Now he's not alone either!" Glimmer almost grinned as she said it, seemingly tired of waiting her turn to pipe up! I could see her magic joining Protégé's, expanding the shield and mixing the red with her own azure gem blue!

"We didn't bring him this far just to cast him back down to your sadistic ways!" Coral's horn lit, a thick ocean blue that seemed to gel all too well with Glimmer's and wrapping across the shield.

It wasn't just them. I could see an unearthly glow around Brimstone and Caduceus as well! Adding their own power to the growing area around us, forcing the chains back, making The Master have to retreat closer to his throne!

"By their doing or mine, he shall not be yours!" Protégé stepped forward. "There is nothing you can do that will stop what I believe he will someday do from happening, Shackles! Such a pony deserves to be free! His own destiny tells that and by all the power I hold in this city I will see it happen!"

I felt a rumbling, a sudden surge of power from each of them in my breast. They all stood, protecting me from the chains that sought to take me from him! They all believed in my destiny, one even I had forgotten!

A destiny that awaited me, but one I had to take for myself!

I ran forward, moving past Glimmerlight and Protégé to be before him! Facing up to him alone wasn't the way. There was no shame in saying what had to be said under the protection of my friends. That was what they were for! Travelling up the steps, always upwards! Toward him and rising all the time, I brought myself before him, and took a breath.

"I will be free! You can say what you want, but I've got enough good ponies, good friends who care and help me to be able to say to you what I need to in order to make it happen!"

My body shuddered. I could feel the slaves on his throne shaking their heads, the Ruin somewhere in the shadows begging me not to. But everything I had worked for and strived to reach all my life led me to have to say this to the one pony that it truly mattered!

"I've got my whole life left to live and I won't live it in chains! I guess what I'm trying to say is... is..."

I took one glance, to see Glimmer and Protégé both smile and nod, before taking that one momentous breath.

"You are not my master any more, Chainlink Shackles!"

Even aside from the sudden look of shock for once upon his face sending a swirling vortex of joy, hope, and relief through my heart, I felt the floor shake and the glow from each of my friends condense and brighten as it all fell into me! A tingling all over as the shield faded from red to blue to a light green and kept pushing further and further! With a snap, it broke and shattered outwards, severing the chains for all directions and casting Shackles back into his throne as it collapsed and dissolved below him! The windows of his slavery worshipping cathedral blew out and brought the sunlight into it, a strong orange that drove away shadows and brought life to this place of misery!

Under the twinkling of falling stained glass and the rays of sunshine, I stood encircled by the broken chains along the floor. I stood while he fell. Something had broken inside me, some restriction.

Then, even as this moment of wondrous calm came about and we began to come together, I heard it again. That voice on the wind, near my foreleg. What was it?

"...the trut... real tr... she is sti... tore hope..."

"Murky, you did it!" Glimmerlight interrupted my thoughts, galloping up to me and tightly hugging me. Breathless and stunned, I grabbed back.

I felt Coral's hoof stroke my mane, felt Protégé rest one hoof on my shoulder proudly, and after letting go of Glimmer was immediately taken in by Caduceus for another tight hug. Brimstone caught my eye, smirking as though knowing how silly a hug would be. He offered a respectful nod, a lot from the big earth pony.

"Now, Murk," Protégé moved before me when I let Caduceus go, "we have to get you out of here. Back to the life you have and to strive to make it better. We have to get you to the sunset, over that wall, so I believe."

"Thank you. Just... just thank you!"

He smiled gently, turning me to face the cathedral doors. Through them I could see the long road to the wall and the glow of the sunset coming from above it through the shattered windows.

Then the doors slammed shut.

A fierce rumbling across the ground shook the debris of chains and glass, so much so that we fought to keep our footing! I even felt myself grab hold of Coral to keep my little hooves standing!

"You think it's that easy?"

The voice was everywhere, all around us. Shackles' fallen form shook, jerked, and began to lift, simply floating up and turning.

"You think that Fillydelphia is but one pony's vision or dwelling? That it is simply a place by which they make their own rules? You poor naïve fools."

The rumbling turned to a full earthquake. I heard walls cracking, felt every bone shaking terribly, and felt the crash of a huge pillar collapsing. We ran. Nopony even had to say to go, but we rushed for a hole in the cracking wall at the top of the stairs that once led to Shackles' throne.

From below us, the chains flew up, surging like flying snakes in the air as they tore through walls and pulled window frames apart.

"Even before I made it into the greatest it ever had been, Fillydelphia was a city of slaves! I was not the first and I will not be the last! Generations of Master and Slave time and again throughout history in this one shell of Equestrian life. Forced into their factories and drafted to war, the ponies here knew slavery before they even understood the word! Nopony ever escapes it."

I screamed as a massive pillar slammed between us, separating Coral and I from the rest of my friends! A full wall began to crumble, revealing the outside of Fillydelphia in all its hellish glory! Wall by wall the entire building came apart, lifting Shackles' body past it, wrapped in writhing chains that flew out and began to tear into nearby factories and buildings!

It carried him up amongst them as I saw the huge industrial cranes turn and take on a life of their own, swinging around upon their weights to bring beams of iron crossing over one another. Around us, the entire city of Fillydelphia itself was a living, breathing machine casting its metal and winding machines upward around the cranes, extending across their great arms to lock and slot into place. It was building something between them!

"Beating or escaping a Master is but one thing! Being able to take that freedom from the city that had always enslaved is another! You do not face merely Chainlink Shackles. You face slavery itself by coming here. The slave city! Fillydelphia itself is not somewhere no upstart, no destined pony, and no well-wishing friends can simply leave. There are always the same things. The city. Its Wall..."

In the distance, I saw the great wall shift and rise, nearly blotting out the sun itself, while the factories roared and swelled as though in anger at anypony daring to escape.

"The willing masses..."

From every crevice, I heard them before I saw them. Even as we regrouped away from the collapsing cathedral I saw thousands of slaves, all bearing my face crawling from the ruins and machines to appear before us.

"The Master."

The monstrous moving nightmare before us did not create a shape so much as an icon. A great monument before us. A visual pattern of slavery in one condensed mass with a single hole at the top between the crane heads where the sunset showed. A sunset that turned to blood red through a filter of cracking energy.

Before us, immense and stretching hundreds of feet above our heads, the very personification of slavery around Shackles' body and Fillydelphia's very industry beamed down upon us. The smog from factories turned in mid-air, flowing down into the streets and igniting upon furnaces to set everything ablaze! On either side of the street there was no other way out now as the fire streaked through the clouds to surround the cathedral, barring all ways out other than directly toward the new structure forming above us. The smoke whipped up, travelling to the sky and forming around it to allow that baleful red energy to highlight itself.

A single great eye of crimson, staring down upon us.

“Red Eye may be different. He may have plans greater than the slavery that has defined this city since the raging balefire, but he is the one that brought forth its potential to entrap. It is his Fillydelphia that will hold you in behind his wall under his authority! You cannot leave.”

The immense eye seemed to turn, a beam of red glaring down upon us and drawing upon our muscles like weights.

Protégé saw us fall, collapsing as though all the weight of industry and authority had fallen on our backs. He turned to move, but that red glare fell upon him.

“Not even you, little ‘prodigy.’”

I heard even Protégé cry out, falling to the floor as the slaves surrounded us. Even Protégé couldn’t say anything against Red Eye’s authority! My mind was reeling, the weight dragging me down for all my will to stand!

I felt a force grab me, lifting me up high. Even briefly, I heard a scramble of electronic noise near my right foreleg. What was it? I couldn’t think much for now, as I was lifted high into the air, brought before the eye itself, so bright and crackling with energy of the surrounding machinery in this colossal scrap-built icon that my eyes stung and my skin seemed to burn!

“You, little slave! You are nothing! Wishes and crying will get you nowhere from Fillydelphia!”

“NO!” I screamed back even as I felt my body crushed in its telekinetic-like grip. I wouldn’t be a slave!

“Will or not, you are trapped in this city!”

That electronic sound screeched again, louder and forming words that I couldn’t understand, like they were trying to get my attention! But opening my eyes to see Shackles’ leering face within that red glow, slavers both even if history saw them enemies, drew a chill across me. How could I compete with an army of slavers and a fortress!

“You can want out all you want, but it is nothing but pain that awaits you back in life. I tried to tell you. You will be a slaver’s plaything no matter where you go! Better to die. There is no choice! Not for you! Not any more!”

“I... want... out!” I struggled, trying to find some way to free myself before outright howling in pain when my body felt crushed! I knew what would happen if I were ‘killed’ here. I would be sent right into the oblivion awaiting below all over again! My ears screamed in pain atop my head, a rush of static refusing to go away. I heard words, a familiar voice. I just couldn’t... make it out...

“You have lost, slave! You can’t fight the chains in your mind! There’s no pony left to save you now! Your little ‘sister’ is lying down there screaming! Your surrogate mother caught beside her! That guardian brute cannot move! The dead one is far from you! Even your preferred ‘master’ cannot save you! There isn’t any pony left to call, little slave, and your words can do nothing!”

Suddenly... clarity. I heard words even as its tirade continued.

“...landers... truth... ealed about Ar...”

“No pony to stand against Red Eye’s authority! No pony can change the wastes, slave! Not one!”

The static and words reached a peak, drowning out even him as I struggled and cried out, feeling my vision going dark. But those words I had heard, I knew them! Yes, they mattered!

My eyes shot open, the pain fading for just a moment, as I drew my right foreleg close.

“No...”

My hoof fell upon the broadcast button. The PipBuck had always been with me, but now it meant something to be there to be touched! The static washed through the air, expanding and growing to an almost deafening volume, my faith pushed all into it!

Then the voice finally broke through the static and breaking up signals. That one voice I needed to hear!

“GOOD EVENING, WASTELANDERS! This is DJ Pon-Threeee, and have I got news for you! Major update on the situation at Arbu and Bucklyn Cross! First and foremost, let me say hallelujah! Sounds like our Wasteland Saviour hasn’t fallen to the darkness after all!”

Narrowing my eyes, I looked into the red glow and Shackles dead on. The broadcast continued, on how the truth came out. It washed across me, rekindling a faith that had been lost! Days of aching and worry over losing her legend coming back to me! But that grip held tight, crushing me tighter and tighter. I heard a voice saying that it didn’t matter! Striving, I finally shouted the rest of what I had tried to say.

“...there is one who can!”

Exploding into rage, it simply and ferociously clung to me in my defiance!

The red glow shattered, bleeding light at odd angles as a full crack came across it. A second later, the harsh report of what I knew was a revolver rippled through the air. A metallic scream from the construct threatened to burst my eardrums. Another shot tore into it. Then another and another, six in total, smashed into it and broke me free. All holding sensations gone, I fell. Tumbling, seeing the inferno of Fillydelphia below me, I shut my eyes in vertigo inducing terror.

Something gently caught me, and with expert control I felt my fall slow and then cease. Instead of collapsing, I was lifted to the ground in the middle of a glow, a colour I would never forget. A colour I had once seen long ago at the very beginning of my waking eyes.

Then I felt my whole body tense as it laid me to the ground.

There, before my friends who groggily got to their feet.

She was there.

Standing amongst an aura of magic, lifting the dust around her from the effort of lowering me, her horn gradually dimmed its glow. Dirt settled back to the ground in the wake of such magic, before I felt a cold chill of disbelief when her eyes turned to look at me.

She was just how I imagined, how I remembered, and how I’d heard. That revolver she carried that I’d heard of, so iconic to her as a hero, was floating at her side. Her shining new PipBuck on her right hoof just like mine.

Perhaps five seconds had passed of me just standing in disbelief, staring as though everything that had just transpired was gone and there was but us alone. Yet it felt so long, my stomach turning between the relief of the radio message and the betrayal I had been made so clear of. What was I supposed to say? Was this her? Truly? How?

“I’m s-s-sorry...”

It was the only words I could think, as I staggered toward her while afraid that every step would somehow be wrong.

“I heard so many things and-and they said what you did or were working for Red, um, Red Eye and-and...”

Stopping, my hooves crossed. I lowered my head and averted my gaze. My words fell over themselves. Blushing, I tapped my own forehead and shook my mane out. She stood patiently, her mane falling and lightly drifting in the winds from fires all around us.

"You were my hero." Finally, I found my stride. "You were my icon. The pony I put faith in to give me purpose! You sh-showed me what it meant to defy! I just needed somepony to believe in. That was you. You saved me in the Pit, you inspired me, and you got me by tough times."

I rubbed my eyes, screwing them up and looking away.

"But then all that horrible stuff happened and... I was so reliant on seeing you as perfect that when I lost that belief I just... let go, because I'd staked everything on an idol. An idol that wasn't even in my life anymore, and I was ignoring the very things right beside me."

I felt a hoof on my shoulder. Glimmerlight's. On the other side, I could feel Brimstone move up. Coral Eve stood into view, and smiled. Protégé removed his eyepiece to look at me. Caduceus shifted beside Glimmer.

"You gave me a spark to get going. And I'll always be thankful for that. But it's not you, somepony far away, that I need to believe in now."

I finally looked back at those who had pulled me from the brink.

"It's time to start believing in my friends... and in myself."

Ahead of me, amongst that strong magical glow of her horn, through the smoke and fiery haze, I was certain I saw her smile, and nod.

A surge of light washed over us, bringing me out from that one gentle moment to the gaze past the inferno surrounding us. Behind the machination of industry looming before us, behind the red gaze, I saw the sunset glow with radiance. Dust blew around us seven ponies as I saw even my hero turn her head with a stern look to that which opposed her.

And as that dust settled, the fires were blasted back by what I now felt as a stronger power within this nightmare. A form of magic beyond that of anything holding us down.

One I knew came from all of us, because we were together.

Narrowing, the spotlight of crimson seared toward us, weakening and hissing as it could not rest upon us for long.

"You really seek to escape to the sunset? Nothing lies there but another failure, and a life of slavery eternal."

The words hurt my ears, but as we turned, atop the wreckage of the Cathedral and standing before upturned brick walls, we saw our final challenge ahead. Fillydelphia in all its living mechanical glory, with sparks flying from raging furnaces that cried with pony voices. A huge street that ran away through the wreckage toward a colossal wall miles high on the horizon, abstract from the reality and blown to its mythical way in which my own mind saw them!

Above us, between scaffold and factory roofing, lay the scrapheap baleful gaze itself that focused directly upon the seven standing before its defences, and a growing mass of slaves willing to try and stop the one part of them that wasn't quite ready to give up yet!

"You have no hope to to make it over that wall, Number Seven. That life is gone!"

I galloped up to the top of a piece of scrap, standing before it all.

"I will do this..."

Beside me, my hero stood and magically sent six large bullets spinning into her revolver, her eyes clenched ready with all the adventurous spirit that carried her!

Behind her, Brimstone Blitz stomped through the smoke, bearing his armour across his body and the great horned helmet offering but a wink from the barely visible eyes.

To my left, Glimmerlight hooked something onto my battle saddle for me, before picking up her own long rifle and grinning to me. I turned to see Rarity's Grace sitting ready upon my side.

Beyond her, Caduceus bore a wealth of potions and the same sub-machine gun he had used to try and save lives in the Mall.

Coral Eve's horn sparked and lit the air with a hiss of ozone and burned air. A gentle nod gave me all the reassurance I needed that she'd hold it up as long as need be.

Protégé shifted to beside me, his own design of revolver swinging up ready. He shared a knowing look with me.

"...because at last, with them, I believe I can!"

Immediately, I took off, leaping from the scrap to charge directly forward into the cauldron of hell awaiting us that would try to prevent our escape! Behind me, between a mix of encouragement and war cries, my friends followed! For once I felt no fear! Only a determination, backed by my friends, those I trusted, and those that inspired me both in dream or reality! A light went with us, passing around us and throwing back the flames!

Ahead, under the bellowed command of their master in the sky, shadowed slaves rushed forward in their masses. Driven before their masters and the authority above them that clamoured and sought to stop us!

Brimstone Blitz picked up a pace, his armour rattling madly as he tore in front of me, lowering his horns. With a sickening crash, he impacted into the slave crowd like a battering ram, sending dark forms flying in all directions to explode into a black mist. Tossing his head from one side to the other, he broke their charge before the rest of us hit.

I heard the rattle of gunfire and the surge of magic around me. Dark forms rose and were slapped down. Protégé fought by my side, picking off those who tried to block my path, keeping me moving forward toward the sunset!

"Keep pushing, Murk! We'll protect you all the way there!" He cried out, slapping a slave from his back and spinning to throw them within his magic into another. Then he pointed ahead, "Coral, clear them!"

Wind almost blew me off course as her powerful magic crashed upon their line and threw ten or so of them far away! I ran for the gap, seeing Brimstone amongst the main mass of slaves, taking their attention and crushing them with a cold fury of controlled anger!

We seven ponies held back a tide of my inner dark thoughts, each of them showing the strength that kept me going even now! I felt Caduceus rush up beside me, bearing a potion to help my ailing pains and bring life to my numb body to keep going! I yelped when a ruined form of myself grasped my leg, diving from the crowd. Caduceus threw himself at it, wrestling it off me.

"Keep going, Murk!" I saw two others leap upon him until Coral's magic again sent them flying from the studious earth pony! Taking a potion for herself and her likely splitting headache from all this use, she was being covered by my hero standing there atop a splinter of upturned wreckage!

She fought... oh wow how she fought!

Horn flaring, her revolver fired and reloaded with blinding speed, punching through two or three into mist even in one shot! Boulders and scrap whirled about her powerful magic, crushing or slamming them back. Her eyes lit with the confidence of a legend!

"Come on, Murky! Stop studying those flanks for your drawings, we gotta move, hun!"

I gaped a little as Glimmerlight pulled me along while Brimstone hurled an overturned wagon and cleared the next portion of street! Staggering backwards, my eyes on the Dweller herself until I simply had to turn away. I saw her look to me for just a second with a small smile.

Galloping beside Glimmerlight, her rifle knocked a slave from leaping through a window as she took us around a line of carts to hide from the majority of the slaves. I fired as well. Rarity's Grace sending one dark form back to the abyss I'd crawled out from, before my grapple hook slapped into one slave in the chest, crushing that one horrible day it represented in my mind!

The red eye above us kept its focus upon my path, drawing all the slaves of my mind toward me! Brimstone fought at the front, backed up and kept going by Caduceus and Coral. Protégé ducked down behind the carts with me and Glimmerlight, looking around.

"We'll just hit the bottom of the wall if we keep going! There's no way up it!"

He reached out, snapping off three shots and hitting two slave forms that rushed for us. Glimmerlight's rifle cracked and struck a third, before she looked up.

"Up... yes! Murky, the buildings!"

Having been watching my hero fight further off, I turned to look to what Glimmerlight now pointed at.

There was one way. A way born of hope.

The buildings rose toward the wall's brink, towers, and scaffold linked by scrap, like it should have been there all along. The way out I'd dreamed might exist when I first ran for it!

"Can you make it up there?" Protégé looked warily at it.

There was no other answer worth saying.

"Yes."

Both of them nodded, Glimmer smiling and hugging me to hear such positivity for once. Behind us, I heard a cry of pain, Coral's magic overloading again. Caduceus ran to her, dragging her into cover with us. The Dweller herself was nearby, holding off the great mass alongside Brimstone, our two best warriors here.

If I had to go any time, I had to go now. Take the chance.

Dare to dream.

I nodded to Glimmerlight, hooking up my grapple again, I'd need it from now on. I knew they couldn't come with me, but I knew where they'd be waiting for me... most of them.

My eyes fell to Caduceus, helping Coral to take a potion. He caught the gaze and after a quick glance up. He saw the reality too.

Shifting closer, I felt us simply hug closely once more.

"Thank you, C-Caduceus..."

"I'll always be in here, Murky. For you and Glimmer and all the others. We didn't have long, but it was enough. No regrets. Take care of Weathervane for me, huh?"

Sniffing, I nodded into his shoulder.

"I w-will..."

Each of my friends backed up a little. Brimstone and my hero came closer, backing off to use the thinner area between carts in the street against the overwhelming numbers. I went around each one of them, to Coral, to Brimstone, and lastly to Glimmer. Each of them I thanked, each of them I hugged tightly. Turning, I saw that little mare standing just nearby.

She smiled at me with pride.

That meant more than any dream of her I'd ever had.

"Come on, Murky." Glimmer nudged me and whispered, "Doesn't Protégé get a hug too?"

How could she still be joking that at a time like this! But yet he was standing there, watching the wary slaves approaching. Soon they would need to fight again. I had to go now!

"You've come far, Murk. I hope I've done at least something to help you, that I have been more than but a master to be hated for sending you against your will."

Long had I looked to him with a kind of trust, feeling safe around him or knowing that he would not harm me like all the other masters had. I knew what he was. Just like me.

Hell with it. Glimmer could laugh if she wants.

I simply moved forward and wrapped my hooves around him.

"Thank you... just... just thank you! Please be okay, I... I tried to stop Barb and—"

"It's all right, Murk." He surprised me, returning the gesture. "Let's just get you out of here. You need to go now. Go to the sunset! Make that last gasp and rise to see the world through different eyes!"

Letting go, I saw them all there, before flipping my mouthpiece around to fire.

"Thank you... all of you."

I turned, hearing the voice of slavery sounding their last charge to reclaim me, and I fired my grapple. I had no wings to fly, but I would still rise! Rise to the sun ahead of me! I would fly with or without wings!

With a jolt, it shot up, spiralling true to latch upon a building. Behind me, the cry of battle joined as they guarded my back with all they had! Zipping upward, feeling the rush of air as I bit the button to pull me in, I soared skyward!

Higher and higher, before I came to the top of the building, clambering over the lip. A red glare fell upon me, that hideous icon watching me.

"Pointless!"

Shadows warped, slaves grew, and chased me! I tore off across the rooftops, leaping vents and sliding down air ducts to keep moving. Leaping between the buildings and always going up. I climbed fire escapes, leapt onto scaffold metres away, and travelled through ramp after ramp! The ground fell away, higher than any building in reality as I neared that huge wall!

Above it, just poking over, I could see the lip of the sunset appearing.

"Your dreams won't follow you! Fillydelphia will cast you down again, and again."

Nothing but empty threats and a life I wouldn't accept! I wasn't going to listen, no matter what voice it was! Sprinting over a jury-rigged extra floor like at the orphanage, I fired my grapple while on the move, pulling me onto the next tower! Then the next! After that I leapt to a large hanging girder from a crane, galloping up it! I felt a sensation all over. A warmth as though there was feeling was returning to my body once again! Every metre rejuvenated me, made me feel more alive.

I was above the red eye itself now. Behind me, the rooftops were crowded with every day of slavery in my life chasing me! Thousands of pained faces determined to keep me from the life they wanted away from! The wind picked up, throwing into my face, trying to cast me down, but I kept my footing and rushed straight up! Almost there! I could see one more jump! The wall filled my vision, I just had to get up there! Spinning around, I started to climb across a fallen tower's roof over a narrow stretch of metal. It led right to the edge of the wall!

Something crashed into me upon the thin metal pathway I ran upon! Falling, a weight landed on my back. Scrambling, pulling me to the edge, I turned to see the Ruin fighting with me.

“Don’t go! Please Murk! Don’t go! Don’t take us back to the pain! No more!”

Yelping, I fought its wiry strength born of frenzy! But it clung onto my back, raking at my mane, trying to pull me over! I saw his eyes, pinpricked and desperate, the last gasp of a fractured mind trying to pull me back in; reduced to pleading and begging in its fear of me succeeding.

Something I’d always done.

“PLEASE!” The terror in his voice, my voice, was all too apparent. “It hurts so much, there will be more pain! I don’t want it! Not any more! It can’t be escaped!”

He threw his full strength to simply try and pull me from the precarious area, knocking us nearby to the edge.

“You can’t dream, it won’t let you!”

“Then...”

I gritted my teeth, trying to knock him off me.

“I dare to!”

My back hoof shot back, crunching him between the legs. With a hideous cry, the Ruin staggered away and fell screaming into the fires below. Exhausted, I tried to pull myself back up proper.

Having just bucked my own subconscious in the nethers, I really hoped that it wasn’t a metaphor for something.

But the way was clear! I stood, staggering in the wind and heat that was beginning to harm and sting my body as feeling returned. Crying out at the pains in my hooves and legs, I staggered forward. Then trotted... then cantered... then galloped! Up... up! UP! It was so close! The sun filling the sky with its heat and the light of life just above the lip of the wall! One! Jump! Away!

Screaming as loud as I could, remembering every single lesson I had learned from my friends and every time I had done something, I rushed forward and leapt.

Stretching my hooves out, I saw the lip. So close, so very close! Aching my joints, I reached for it! Just grab it and I’d be over! So high... just one desperate shot!

I saw my hoof pass by it... missing by over a foot.

Then I felt the gravity of all the pain below begin to pick up.

Pulling me down.

No... no...

Then a shape before me, a figure suddenly stretching down toward me from on top of the wall! A hoof reached out, grabbing around mine as her face became clear amongst the blazing sun that covered the entire sky behind her!

“Come on, Murky!”

Unity cried out the words as she pulled me over, straining her all and yanking me toward the sun, pushing me onward with no time to say anything more but to smile and give me the last energy I needed to push that last distance!

Over the wall, flying onward, I soared into the sun itself born upon the wind that flowed with me, pushing me toward life. The feeling in my body seared, pains all across flowing down veins and muscles! I felt the burning of radsors and the thickening within my lungs and throat! Lash scars and knife wounds upon the bruised and battered body I possessed! A feeling in my gut and neck like hot metal!

Then air, actual air flowed into my breathless body, forcing me to take that first gasp, and then a long scream as the pain flowed over and over, pulling me away from limbo, feeling was life! The light was getting brighter, turning to white and sending me shooting forward, all the way back up the fall into darkness I had taken! I juddered, squirmed, and burst—

-upright screaming as oxygen poured down my neck and my eyes shot open. My back arched, lifting me from the firm bed, crying out in shock and pain. Above me, a spinning silver orb shone and cast sparkles all over my body. It whined and flared before making a snapping noise and dropping out of view.

I flew upright, my scream ending in a choking cough...

...as I fell right into Glimmer's embrace.

"Murky! Oh! Yes! MURKY!"

I felt the tears running onto my shoulder from her, as I blinked and tried to get my bearings. My body hurt so much. I could feel bandages wrapped around a lot of me along with tubes poking out of my front legs, but blinking my eyes, I finally saw where I was.

Around me, I could see the familiar wards of Hearts and Hooves Hospital. Glimmer held tightly onto me, short maned and bruised all over, but her in the flesh. She cried and stroked my mane over and over. Behind her, I could see a damp-eyed Coral, her horn still glowing. Come to think of it, so was Glimmer's! To the other side of the bed, I could see the ghastly figure of Doctor Weathervane looking almost stunned and relieved all at once, before hastily reasserting himself with a smile. His horn too, glowed.

Behind him, Brimstone Blitz stood further from my bed, his body a mess of scar tissue and bearing only one eye. He had barely healed, but apparently enough that he wasn't going to lie down when I was... here...

"Murky, you're alive. Oh gods and goddesses you're alive. Thank you... thank you, Weathervane!"

Glimmer was lauding, completely lacking any of her spunk or normal wittiness as she kept hugging me and shaking. She looked a mess, as though she had been brought from a brink of loss and despair.

"I thought-I thought you were just gone, oh Murky..."

She just kept holding onto me, and I onto her. My own eyes teared up, wrapping my bound legs around her and swaying gently.

They'd brought me back.

I was... alive.

"Thank you!" I tried to hug them all at once, failing utterly, but I had to say it, had to try.

They'd helped free me. Below me, I saw my cutie mark sparkle a little.

The shackles, as always, were open.

"See! We told you it would work!"

"Piss anchors!" Weathervane snapped. "It shouldn't have worked! I only agreed to it because even half-dead your big 'guardian' promised to snap me in half if we didn't try!"

I lay back, Glimmerlight sitting on the bed beside me and holding my hoof. I was exhausted more than any time before, my throat was dry and my head spinning from medicine I'd been given after waking. But the argument had gone on for a few minutes now ever since Weathervane had retrieved the now dead orb.

They had used the healing megaspell Brim and I had recovered from the ghouls. Its massive power seeking out the one spark of life left in me to hold onto and give me a chance to save myself. It alone had not saved me, even if it had healed my body. It had simply held me in there long enough to give me a sliver of a chance. One I could scarcely believe I'd had the strength to pull off.

Not that the megaspell had been the only thing that saved my life. Allegedly, the moment my 'corpse' had been tugged from the Pit, Brimstone had rather caused a stir in the Pit's under levels, taking the potions he'd been given and pouring them down my throat. Whether they helped or not was unknown, but he'd taken my body to Hearts and Hooves afterwards, Coral and Glimmerlight finding him soon after they heard the bodies were taken there.

I couldn't imagine how they must have felt.

The entire time, they had spent their rest day with me. Glimmer had gotten my PipBuck and sat it playing the radio near me the entire time, trying to spot any life of memory inside me. I owed her more than I knew.

"I fucking told you lot! The spell requires four unicorns to work!" Weathervane was casting a horn over me even as he argued. "It's that simple!"

"Apparently not." Glimmer smirked. "Maybe it just took three who genuinely cared? You did care didn't you? You know what they say magic is after all."

"Fuckbuttering dinglecunts, I've told you a dozen shitting times! It's not about the power! If it were I coulda' done it on my own! It's about unique magical signatures! It requires four to work! It... hm?"

There was a pause as he looked over me. I felt everypony in the room freeze a second. Glimmer must have felt me grip her hoof a bit tighter. What was...

"Well..." Weathervane stroked his ruined beard. "Murk, would you sit up, please?"

Glancing from Glimmer to the ghoul and back again, I shakily started to move. Lying here with them, I'd been trying to grasp the new feeling of being awake and... free. But now I strained my body upright. I felt different all over, more well-adjusted even through the pain. No longer a tug toward the ground or my hooves from the chains weighing on my soul.

Sitting up, I felt very strange. Oddly... balanced.

"Well, would you look at that..." Weathervane peered at me, but everypony else before me just looked to him. I felt a creeping horror.

"This might prick a little."

What?

His horn zapped. I felt an electric shock run right through me, squeaking out loud and grabbing Glimmerlight. I made a long gasp and turned to look at Weathervane in anger, wings flaring out in anger as my face screwed—

...wait.

Before me, Glimmer's face lit up and her mouth went wide. Coral's eyebrows shot up while even Brimstone's remaining eye seemed shocked. Beside me, Weathervane grinned and lifted the bandages away before offering a mirror held in his magic.

Spread to either side of me. My... my wings! They were out! Standing on their own! I simply opened and closed my mouth, making squeaky little noises and trying to turn in my bed until Weathervane had to hold me from hurting myself around my bandages! My wings! My wings! I could move them, even if it hurt a little and... and they were slow but... I could move my wings!

"Seems the megaspell sort of overdid it. Very sorry. If you want me to make them go back down I'll—"

"NO!" I screamed, not even getting the joke amongst my excitement. I grabbed the mirror, holding them to look at the little things as I sat up properly and let them flourish. Either side of me, they spread their dirtied and uneven feathers.

Jittering when I flexed them slowly, not quite flaring fully or clasping properly yet, but I saw the delight on my face, a look I hadn't imagined I'd ever show again. My mouth only kept growing and growing into a massive smile that burst out into a laugh. I had wings!

"They're beautiful," Glimmer breathed out. "Aww, they suit you like it was always meant to be, Murky!"

Coral smiled, moving behind to look.

"Because they were. Our little Murk's a new pony now for sure. Now isn't the time to fall, my dear." She smiled. "It's to soar. This marks a change. You hit the bottom but now you've bounced and you'll come back strong. I know it."

Weathervane tapped the edge of the bed.

"Well, yes, it's pretty fuckin' great, but he needs his rest now. They won't fly, sorry to break the moment, but he'll be able to work on moving them now. Now come on you lot, shoo. Patient time is now. He's got a lot of fluids to take in before I'll let him out of here."

They began to troop out. Brimstone stopped by the bed, lifting a hoof. Smirking back, I tapped his with mine. Coral kissed my forehead as she went, before handing me my saddlebag filled with my journal and other things. Weathervane offered a rare smile to me alone as he went with them to collect some materials.

Glimmerlight was left with me alone as I pulled out my journal. I had a lot of drawing to do. Somehow I knew I would be able to now. Watching me, my sis' just smiled and ruffled my mane before turning to leave.

I felt something near the bottom of the saddlebag.

A statuette of Littlepip, given to me by Unity, made of scrap metal bent into place and bearing words below it.

"Wait! Glimmer!"

"Yes, Murky?"

I held it up in my hooves carefully, seeing the image of one who had so fought to save me standing upon it.

"What does this say?"

Her magic reached out, lifting it from my hooves as she moved back into the ward briefly. With a little glance to it, she smiled and returned it to me, her magic tossing my mane with a smirk as she told me what they said.

'I believe in you! ~ Unity'

Glimmerlight left me looking at the little bronze item with a mixture of a endearment and wonder upon my face. I heard Weathervane again arguing with Coral outside about the damn megaspell. 'It needs four, not three!' I heard again.

I felt my wings flutter a little behind me. Stiff and sore, barely responsive, but they were there! Then, I simply hugged the statue close; a tiny, almost unnoticeable sense of that belief reaching my heart.

“Thank you...”

Footnote: Perks Upgraded!

'Lucky Break' becomes 'Signature Item' – While once it may have been a little charm for good fortune, on true realisation it has always been something that matters all along to you. Something that truly belongs with you. You regain your +1 to Luck and now also acquire +1 DT whilst bearing your item.

'Confidence Boost' becomes 'Freedom of Will' – You took refuge in your friends before, but now you see yourself for the pony you truly are inside! While their support will always be with you, you can now stand on your own. You gain +2 Charisma.

'Path of the Lightbringer' becomes 'Virtue of Hope' – You merely followed before, but you have been helped to see that the true strength isn't in those you are inspired by, but rather how it helped you remember the real virtue lying in your heart. One that had always been there. You regain the small boost to health when reduced to 10% or lower once per encounter, but now you also receive +1 to all SPECIAL statistics while below 20% maximum health.

Footnote: Perk Attained!

Pegasi Balance – Finally, your life has come full circle to once again bear the wings that made you what you were at birth. No longer are you as clumsy and off-balance without their natural weight and movement to keep you steady on your hooves. You gain +1 Agility to your statistics.

Mad Gallop – Less chance to be hit with ranged attacks while galloping

Somepony Old, Somepony New

"Don't you know you get presents on your birthday?"

"What's it like to be given a second chance at life?"

Honestly? I didn't see it like that. A second chance implies I was just starting from square one again, like a... resoo... resurip...

"Resurrection?"

Yeah, one of those! This was different. It felt more like something had unlocked inside me and a new wave of thinking had come over me. Everything that had happened while I'd been fighting for my own soul and life amongst the dark hallucinations of my mind just seemed to blur. It became hard to remember the specifics, like a dream.

I didn't need it though. On my back I bore a symbol of what had changed. This wasn't starting again. This was reclaiming the pony I was supposed to be. The wings and cutie mark I'd now sat on my body like patient reminders. I'd hated them, but they hadn't abandoned me all this time even if I hadn't seen them for what they were.

Now I knew.

This was the point of change. The part of my life when I lay in a hospital bed and began to dream freely again. I'd taken on the slave in my mind. Beating it back and bringing that part of me to the surface that truly wanted freedom. Now nothing was going to force it back down ever again. We'd stalled, we'd struggled, and we'd suffered greatly, but with my revival a clarity of purpose came over all my companions as well in their relief. As though their hope had been rekindled at the sight of my own breaking of the chains. Glimmer talked more of the things we'd gathered, how we could convert empty bullet casings I brought into small, explosive lockpicks. That sort of thing. We knew that the escape was back on.

"What about, y'know... him?"

Chainlink Shackles?

"Yes. You could actually say his name now? No more 'My Master'?"

Yes. That was the breakthrough. The moment I looked at him and saw a pony, not simply a master. Don't get me wrong, Shackles terrified me to my core and I knew given half a chance he would seek to break me all over again. But I could look him in the eye and defy now. I could be honest and truthful when I said that I was going to escape. That I had found the purpose that drove me, to forever hope for a better life out of this slavery hell we were all trapped in.

Of course, that hardly meant that the trials were over for any of us.

"Hmm?"

Even as I woke filled with hope and found my friends spurring their relief into an energy for an escape plan. Even as we began to gather tools in secret or work out routes in our heads, there was something else coming to the fore in Fillydelphia. I had once seen slavers as a great singular force, but events of not too long ago had shown me different. Times were changing.

Their great game of intrigue and politics was emerging. That which was old was to be given new purpose as I found my life mirroring that of a certain somepony once again. A revelation that brought their internal struggle closer to me than I might have ever realised.

Even as my friends and I took refuge in Red Eye's day of rest, the past was about to make its intentions very clear.

A blank page sat before me.

The charcoal tasted foul in my mouth, as ever, but it was the fear underneath my skin that really affected me. What if I couldn't do this still? What if I made a horrible block pony? I'd spent a lot of time in recovery trying to work up the courage to try this and yet I still couldn't bring myself to put charcoal to paper.

Curling my thin blanket around me, feeling my body ache and sting under bandages, I rolled out my neck and felt a couple of stiff movements on my back. It still hurt to move them for my muscles hadn't been used there in many years. The sensation was somewhere between relief and a long strain every time they shifted, the sort of thing you'd feel after a long exercise.

Yet still, the knowledge they were there gave me a little hope. Taking a deep breath, I leaned forward. The charcoal shook, unsteady and nervous. Could I do this? Really, could I?

A hoof wiped the worried sweat from my brow. I had to try sometime. He wasn't going to beat me forever! Not after all I'd been through. I was going to take back what was mine!

Leaning down and bringing the charcoal tip to the centre of the page, I hesitated to draw one more breath, and drew a line.

Shaking, yet straight, it lightly scrawled upon the paper, gaining ease with every inch until I let it flick up at the end, becoming a curve.

I almost dropped the charcoal from the squeak of delight!

Leaning back down, I caught the end of the curve and wrapped it around. Winding and lightly whipping off here and there, it became a more knowing shape. Yes, yes this could work!

I fell away into the moment. Free from their confines, my wings habitually spread out a little unsteadily to balance me. Wincing on one side of my face, I leaned down to keep drawing. Black shapes formed and gelled together. A strong 'almost circle' there, with current lines drawing back for a perspective, yes! At the end I started adding the detail with little flicks for the mane and then filled it in with shading! Big long lines around the edges for the light glowing from behind them, and then come back in to add that glint to their eyes with tiny circles to show light!

Eventually, I realised it had all formed into something that became life.

Feeling oddly exhausted, I sat back. Before me lay the proof of my release and if anything the one image I remembered from that dream above any. The one sight that had saved me at the very last moment.

Before me I had drawn Unity reaching out toward me off the page, her hoof outstretched to try and grab mine. Biting my lip, I lightly touched my own hoof to the drawing.

“Thank you...”

“Hmm?”

The deep and rumbling voice made me jolt upright and turn. Across the ward, near the door, Brimstone Blitz looked up toward me. I still wasn't quite used to his scarring. I kept wanting to somehow wish he could regain that lost eye or make his body less warped and burned on that one side. Almost out of sick humour, the blast had taken off his ear that wasn't scarred.

“You say something, Murk?”

“Oh, um, no. Just muttering to myself.”

I rubbed my hooves together awkwardly and felt my ears droop back. Feeling my wings mimic the movement, I realised they were going to be an expressive side of me that was going to take a whole new world of getting used to. Getting them to fold completely down wasn't so hard, but getting them back out from being folded back was occasionally a nightmare of little strains and pains. I hadn't been able to fully outstretch them yet either. Weathervane had promised that would come in time, instructing both Glimmerlight and Coral on how to help them exercise by gently aiding their movement with hooves.

Brimstone glanced across for a few more seconds before returning his gaze to the corridor outside. He hadn't left my ward since I'd woken, remaining permanently on guard against anypony coming this way. I didn't want to imagine what he'd do if anypony he didn't like came to try and visit.

Not that it mattered. Fears and horrors could wait. I could draw again! The more I stared at Unity's caring eyes upon the page, the more I began to be delighted that I could do it! My mind was doing backflips with ideas and concepts. What to do first? What best represented how I felt? Something big? Doodle madly on a page? There were so many I had to get out of my system! I even thought about asking Brimstone, but I didn't imagine the stoic earth pony would have much to say.

Oh wait...

I began flipping back through page after page. Masses of drawings flew by until I came to the one I wanted.

Before me, I saw myself standing happily with my wings outstretched. Just to my right, Glimmerlight stood mischievously and playful with Caduceus politely smiling from beside her. A drawing I had started long ago and had somepony well overdue to add in.

Behind myself and Glimmerlight and toward the left of the picture, I began to sketch. Little faint lines to get my bearings first. They became more frantic, more emotionally driven. Their size seemed to tower over myself, almost like a colossal shield around us. Ripples across the shape of a pony to draw it out and give the form definition took shape.

Having to be quick, I only glanced up a few times to check before putting my head down to work all the more.

I had to erase a few lines, rub them out with the edge of my looser bandages and redo them, but that didn't matter! My mind fell away into the drawing, my greatest release and calming activity as I started to solidify the lines. The outer shape I made really thick, trying to get the right impact of presence. Even just seeing them made me feel as safe as I was with...

...with him here watching over me.

Upon my drawing that I was quickly thinking of as a family photo, our great guardian now resided just behind us. Brimstone Blitz stood with us. Tall, heavy, and stern, his eyes nonetheless held a spark of intelligence and knowing. Even without a smile, I could tell he was at better peace with us than anywhere else.

My eyes looked up from my page, seeing him sitting at the ward's door perpetually terrifying every nurse that happened to wander in without noticing him.

I could see the same look.

The guardian had found his calling at last, just as I had found mine.

I screamed in pain.

"Oh, hold still!"

"I—yargh! Ow! OW!"

"Come on! I've got to learn to help you with this as well."

My wing twitched and stung, my back and side muscles twitching and making spasms. Glimmerlight's hooves gradually let the wing sink back down again without allowing it to snap back onto my side. Eyes watering from the effort, I sank down on my front and relaxed to allow it to droop off to the side. Then yelped and squeaked as Glimmer began to knead around the base and stretch out the length of my wing.

"Just think of the end result, when you can swish these babies out and woo everypony you want. Now, try to lift them. Come on, you've got to start doing this more naturally yourself."

Lying on the hospital bed, I sighed and closed my eyes. The muscles felt distant and dull. Sometimes my wings followed emotive response, like when I was shocked or happy, but manual movement just wasn't as easy. Glimmer had been helping me try to get them to flare right out and up, but the process was slow.

Seeing my little wings making tiny flaps and not quite coming to their full expansion, Brimstone grinned and chuckled to himself.

"Anypony got a photo of that little Stable Dweller? Pretty sure that'll get those wee things right up."

My eyes bolted open as I felt a blush form. I hadn't even thought about that, uh... 'problem.' Oh dear. Glimmer was going to have a field day sometime in the near future.

Now however, she just laughed and patted my back before helping my wings to ease back to my sides. I may have been embarrassed, but I was enjoying these hours of rest and recuperation with my friends. They had been permitted to stay due to Red Eye's rest day and so far as the rest of Fillydelphia knew, I was dead. No slavers would come hunting for me and Weathervane had provided me a secluded room. I knew we could trust his staff. All of them were fiercely loyal to Weathervane above anypony else.

Really, I'd spent the majority of my time trying to work up the courage to do those drawings. Now that I no longer felt like I depended on her efforts to define me and my own goals, I had instead felt a healthier and simpler respect for what she did out there. Sitting listening to the DJ talking of Littlepip going 'off the map' on some legendary quest had set my imagination alight. I'd even drawn her a few times battling dragons or finding some huge artefact that could cure all the taint, including my lungs. I'd have liked that.

As though on cue, I coughed.

"Looks like it's time for your medicine, then." Glimmerlight ceased her chuckling to lift a measured portion of RadAway to me from across the room. I knocked back the small amount, a specific level of it the nurses had set out for me to avoid wasting some if it wasn't needed. At least in here they could keep an eye on me and give me just as much as I needed to preserve stocks. I hoped I could get some to take away.

Taking the cup from me, Glimmerlight glanced again to my wings. She'd been the most fascinated and delighted by them (bar myself, of course) of all my friends. While I thought it was simple happiness for me, many times she'd mentioned that she wished she had them. Briefly, I had wondered what that really said about Glimmerlight.

I felt her hooves sorting my feathers and trying to help it all move better, muttering away as she did so.

"Leastways I know to get you a feather comb for your birthday now." She paused, blinking a few times. "That's a point, when is your birthday anyway?"

"I... I don't know..." Biting my lip, I felt my wings drawn in, nervous. "Nopony ever told me really."

"You don't... I mean—huh?" Glimmerlight looked up at me, then to Brim, then to me again. "Are you seriously telling me you have never had a birthday in your life?"

Shifting, I sat up and rolled my neck.

"What do you mean? Of course I have. I just don't know when it is but it happens each year. Isn't that what you mean?"

"Murky..." Glimmerlight moved around, looking me in the eye. "You do know that ponies have, y'know, parties for birthdays, right?"

They did? Aren't birthdays just like a day that denotes the precise time of birth each year? Glimmerlight clearly saw the confusion on my face for she only shook her head and took a deep breath through her nose.

"Well!" Her hooves grabbed my shoulders. "If you don't know, then why not make it today? Your first day of being awake to who you really are! What better to choose if there's no other choice?"

"You can do that?"

"Sure! Who says not to? I had my birthday a week early last year because I couldn't be assed waiting! So welcome to your first known birthday, Murky!"

I just sat and blinked. Was this allowed? Glimmerlight only laughed and hugged me gently.

"Just you wait, lil'bro. I'll show you what a birthday's meant to be, to welcome you to the day we head back up. I did a little inventory in the Mall earlier. We've got a little food, some stored rainwater, a few large shells, makeshift mining tools, and after a little persuasion, we even got your battle saddle back off Blunderbuck... minus the pistol I'm afraid. The moment you're better we are back in the game!"

She ruffled my mane, seeing the hopeful smile. I couldn't wait! I loved that feeling of checking things off my lists and seeing our little escape armoury grow!

"Him being better shouldn't be a real problem by the end of today."

The rough voice from the doorway caught our attention. Doctor Weathervane trotted in, bearing a small medical saddlebag no doubt intended for me. Lifting it onto my bed, the ghoul began to wave his glowing horn across me.

"The megaspell did its work pretty damn well. Better than I could have hoped. Back when I spent days on those pissing annoying intricacies, I always figured it'd fuck up somehow."

"I... I never said thank you, for using it to save me." I could feel Glimmer's hoof around my shoulders. My near death had hit her hardest of all. "S-sorry it had to be it, your life's work and all."

"My life's work is to be a healer, kid." His horn travelled to my back. "I'd be a pretty fucking awful doctor if I let a pony die just because a spell was a one use thing. Who am I going to wait to use it on? Just didn't think it would work at first, was all."

His horn changed its glow a little, picking a few potions and tablets from his saddlebag. I recognised the foul purple potion he'd given me a lot of already. Seeing my look of disgust, he chuckled.

"The worse it tastes, the better it is for you. Get it down that throat. Now, most of the superficial damage is healed. The cut on your flank and the piercing on your leg have pretty much faded. I'd keep the bandages over your midriff and neck for the time being though. Those were the worst wounds. They've closed and so far as I can see, the internal bleeding around your abdomen has ceased, but I don't want to take any chances with removing the healing bandages yet."

I snuggled a little closer to Glimmerlight. I didn't want to think about those injuries.

"Your wings have come along nicely. The real problem is in your scapulars, marginal coverts, and alulas. Very fragile things, pegasus wings. Capable of the most furious of movements and immense wind stresses yet so very light and easy to harm. I had to lecture the Wonderbolts back in the day to stop those hotrod sods trying to showboat the day before their events. One scapular strain or pinched alula and the whole thing shuts down. So keep on gently stretching them out."

Biting my lip, I nodded. I had no idea what all these fancy words meant but I decided it probably meant 'the bits that hurt'.

"So don't strain them and you should see a gradual healing take place. I think I already told you not to expect any flight ever to come of it?"

"Y-yes..." I turned away slightly.

"Mm. That is unfortunate, I know. Your growth development is likely already finished, Murk. So the muscles around your scapulars near your body don't have any significant expansion left ahead of them. But, just keep working at them and we'll see what happens. Now, I should think it best you get out of bed for a while."

"H-huh? You mean... leave?"

"Yes. Leave the hospital." He began setting out a small series of potions. "Pegasi have a certain trot to them, their wings are not simply tacked onto any other pony body. Remember how I knew what you were the second I saw you wander that skinny arse into my lab? You've got to get a trot going as part of your recovery, it'll help the muscles. If I still had the physio pool I'd have thrown you in it, but it's pretty much my own personal pool with how fuckin' irradiated it is these days."

He looked as though he was unsure about adding something else.

"Well, that and the slaver inspection's soon. Always complaining about me using too much to save a life as though they fucking know how. Moronic, cock-guzzling dildochickens! That they are! You don't want to be here when they arrive and I don't want to risk Murky in the radiation below to hide in the basement. You're best to leave while the route outside is clear."

"Then I'm going with him." Brimstone immediately spoke up, having been on his silent vigil.

"Me too." Glimmerlight nudged my side lightly. I couldn't help but smile. Much as I liked being in here away from Fillydelphia in my mind, a trot with my friends would be good. The industry was quiet today anyway. Coral Eve had returned to the Mall to rest, her injuries from trying to save me at the Pit still hurting. She had brought the news that Shackles seemed oddly absent and the doors were wide open to come and go as you pleased.

"Good, just make sure he trots right. None of this head down bullshit I've seen him doing. A pegasus should stand with their head tall to have the optimum muscular layout. Why do you think the Wonderbolts had that big, proud stance? It's a pegasus thing. So you two keep him doing it or I'll make every medicine taste worse than brahmin shit every time you come here, got it?"

I had to laugh, for I'd spotted the grin on Weathervane's face. For all his bedside manner, I could see he was happy to have gotten back to his speciality with pegasi. I could only hope it helped him against the growing anger and flickering light of sanity inside. He left me with a small amount of healing potions that Glimmerlight made sure I took. The tingling in my belly, back, and neck from their effects healed up a little more of the horrific wounds as they took effect. They had already closed over but there was much damage to repair before I felt fine.

Then I had a realisation, something I had forgotten. I shouted out to Weathervane. He turned at the door.

"Hmm?"

"I... I met some ponies. Friends of yours!"

"Friends?"

"From before. Um, ghouls! N-Nurses Splint and Bedlay Bloom with um..um, Windtail Breeze and Baton... Baton..."

"Baton Round?" Weathervane's voice lifted a little, a genuine unknowing in his eyes lighting up. "They're all still alive?"

"Yes! I found them as slaves. I just thought you'd w-want to know. They're still alive. In the metro, I mean. Splint's keeping them going. They're on the route we're taking to get out."

Weathervane looked genuinely stunned. As did Glimmer and Brim. They'd never heard me talk of these ghouls. The ghoul turned in the door, leaning on the frame for a second.

"I thought they died decades ago. If they're still alive, then..." He looked up. "The metro is Shackles' personal nightmare, Murk. If they're down there they can't last long."

"No... they didn't look in a good way."

"Slaving motherfucker..." Weathervane muttered to himself, following it up with a curse so foul I saw even Brim wince. "I will have to get to them, they were good friends. Thank you, Murk. I will see what I can do. If it's the last thing I do I will save them. Such good ponies do not deserve that. By what remains of my life as a healer I will save them."

"We'll help them if we can, Doctor." Glimmerlight nodded to him. "We owe you more than life itself for what you've done for us."

"Sounds like you're heading that way anyway, not that I could talk you out of that stupid fuckin' plan... but thanks."

He trotted off. I guessed he wasn't one much for optimistic moments. I wished he'd just believe someday that he could take another life for himself out there. Right now, however, we had to get moving.

But I had one more thing to do before we left.

Glimmerlight had brought me my fleece from the Mall, expecting me to wear it. Picking it up from my little pile of belongings on the side table and offering a little smile to my statuette as I did so, I brought out my thread and needle along with a small pair of scissors nearby we'd used for my bandages.

"Murky? What are you doing?"

Glimmerlight watched intently. Even Brimstone cast a glance now and again. Lifting my fleece, I held it to my side before going to work with the scissors and needle. Strengthening areas, repairing the collar and legs of it, and patching any holes with black thread, I made it anew. But then I took to the sides, digging in and scything chunks of wool out from it. A new sense of self-confidence came over me, a declaration of who I was as I slipped it on carefully and let my wings spread through the holes.

Glimmerlight smiled brightly as I turned to her with a little grin, strapping on my PipBuck by the whipcord and slotting my goggles onto my head. My saddlebag went over, neatly fitting over my wings with the straps.

"I'm not going to hide who I am anymore, sis." I spoke with more pride in myself than I ever had, swishing my wings a little stiffly until they settled in. "Sha... Shackles tried to make me resent the kind of pony I am. I w-want to show myself that he was wrong."

Glimmer helped me off the bed, taking my weight as I unsteadily trotted a few steps forward before finding my balance properly.

"I'm glad you finally see that, Murky. They're a part of you and I can't imagine you without them."

Joining Brimstone, we set out. Glimmer giggled, bumped my shoulder and continued.

"Besides, just imagine what it'll be like to show a certain red-maned unicorn when he sees them."

"Glimmer!"

We hadn't gone too far from the hospital. With me trotting slowly and Brimstone still noticeably favouring his injured side, our walkabout wasn't exactly what you might call fast. But the chance to simply wander and talk with my friends on a rest day was something I'd dearly needed. It gave me time to voice my feelings and concerns to them or get a reassuring hug when I needed it over what happened in the Pit and afterwards. Not to mention telling Glimmer of my dreams, and thanking her over and over again.

Fillydelphia itself had come out of the storm. The ground was damp, but above us the dark clouds had parted to bring sickly yellow tinged with Filly's red haze. In comparison, it felt almost as close as this city could get to a sunny day. With the forges silent and the slavers mostly indifferent to those who wandered free, there was a strange peace I'd never truly known from this place.

Of course, we weren't going to pass up this chance.

Open to explore, we headed toward the emergency exit from the metro I had climbed out of once before. Climbing through the rubble to find the ruined staircase, I pointed into the darkness with a hoof.

"This is it. The ghouls, Weathervane's friends, they showed this to me. It'll let us get into the metro quietly with a few ponies along with us."

Brimstone cast a dubious glance to the dark hole and its crumbling spiral staircase riddled with holes.

"Doesn't look steady. If we've got us three, Coral, two foals, and those two other mares you know the last thing we need is it to collapse."

"Um, y-yeah..."

"Doesn't matter." Glimmerlight lit her horn to look down herself and dropped a stone in. Numerous seconds passed before I heard it hit the bottom and nodded to let them know. Glimmerlight pointed to a big stone pillar beside us from the old building that housed this part of the metro. "We'll send Murky down first. He'll fire that hook of his back up and we'll tie it up here to lower everypony down one-by-one in a harness. They sent me to work in the place they make their battle saddles once. I think I could maybe get their stronger ones to sustain even Brim's size. If they can support ranger armour I'm pretty sure they'll support you."

"Good. You get that then." Brimstone nodded in approval, before waving us away. Last thing we needed was to be spotted here. "Just keep in mind we'll need to bring all our kit with us as well, that's one more lift. Now let's get out of here. We don't need to attract any attention."

I went back out first. The building the emergency staircase was sat in was an absolute wreck, not unidentifiable at all other than perhaps as some sort of construction for the metro system, one intended for staff only. Just down the road I could see the much larger public metro station on the surface. Shackles' guards hung around the top of it. Even the memory of what laid down there frightened me.

We'd have to go in there at least once. Sunny was trapped in that mining hell down there and I was not leaving without her. Not her or Unity. There had to be a way to find her. I wasn't abandoning her after what she'd done for me. The moment I was better, I'd see about sneaking into the metro to evacuate Sunny through this hole. Shackles wasn't going to bash me into submission now. I had wings!

We decided that we should head back to the Mall. Shackles wasn't there for sure and I knew a way to sneak out now anyway. We'd head back, count out all the cool stuff, get to hear Glimmer talk about the cool things she would make, and then I'd get to—oooh yes. I'd get to check things off the checklist! Eee!

Glimmer chuckled, seeing the light bounce to my trot. Ruffling my mane, she leaned down to me.

"I'm glad to see you smile, Murky. Keep that hope alive, you smiling makes all of us want to."

"I will. I mean, I'll t-try." I offered a grin to seal the deal. Glimmerlight nodded curtly and resumed looking ahead. We weren't being bothered and Brim's presence made anypony who looked at my (proudly) displayed wings with distaste think twice before causing a problem. All the same, we tried to avoid attention. We had enough enemies in this city.

To avoid just that, we took the other way home, passing around near the old pegasus skyport and sticking to the smaller streets. I trotted behind them, with Brim leading the way. All the while, I simply tried not to look at the control tower. I didn't need to remember that now.

Beep!

My eyes jolted open further, stopping on the spot. Raising my PipBuck to my eyes, I glanced at it. Didn't it only go off at heights?

Beep! Beep!

The sound was quiet. Likely only I heard it. Ahead of me, Glimmer and Brimstone moved out of the building. Glimmer was chatting about something to him, but I didn't pay any attention. Just something about what we needed.

Beep! Beep! Beep!

The sound picked up, before my PipBuck's screen seemed to flare, spark, and struggle to display something. Wincing away as a part of exposed circuitry popped, I worried if it was breaking.

Instead, it only flickered more. Squinting and looking close, I saw something appear upon it. A set of words at the top scrolled by quickly. Then below it a symbol began flashing. The smashed screen flickered a lot, but it looked like a set of three party balloons.

A little chill passed through my body. I knew what they were. No. Nooooo no no no! That creepy ever-watching pink demon could stay out of my PipBuck! Just because they got Sundial doesn't mean they'll get me!

The balloons warped and disappeared, being replaced by what looked like an arrow.

I looked up, but it only pointed to a blank wall.

Glimmerlight really needed to have a look at this thing. Some circuit probably blew out. I'd never been to this area of Fillydelphia before. Maybe its map systems were freaking out from some old Pinkie-related broadcast in the air. Best just to ignore it.

Not so easy. As I trotted to catch up, I saw the arrow changing and constantly pointing backward in one direction. It occurred to me that perhaps it had been pointing to something on the other side of these houses we trotted amongst.

Carefully, bending low and sneaking forward, I poked my head out into the road. A few slavers half-drunkenly staggered down it and the occasional converted home into a small slave den cast light onto the tarmac, but otherwise nothing. Looking down, the arrow pointed across the street and down the road a little. Then I saw it.

Standing taller than the rest, there was some form of government building. It held the same strength I'd seen on many of the Ministry related constructions, with thick corners and sometimes even unbroken windows. Yet it was not a Ministry Hub, for I could see a large sign on the outside bearing a book. It was a library.

The arrow on my PipBuck pointed relentlessly toward it, no matter which way I held it. I just didn't get it. I wondered if I should get Glimmer and Brim, investigate what this was to

A sudden shout disturbed my thinking.

"You! Get away from us!"

Glimmer!

I didn't even think. I simply turned back into the alley and galloped toward my friends. I heard a group of voices all shout out. Weapon safeties clicked and hooves stomped. I heard Brim snort and grind his hooves upon the ground in warning.

Then I burst out of the alley into an almost completely destroyed warehouse. The roof had flown off long ago in some balefire-driven shock wave, leaving it a featureless skeleton of gantries and girders where the flimsy walls had once been.

Within it, I saw Glimmer and Brimstone surrounded in a half circle by slavers. At their centre stood an altogether annoyingly familiar figure. Wormtail.

"It's not exactly hard to track two slaves when one is about four times the size of anypony else." He stopped, looking over toward me. "Oh hello, what have we here?"

Skidding to a halt, I found Glimmerlight quickly blocking the way between me and him.

"You're not having him!"

"I don't think you all have much a choice. See, my own master tasked me to find you two. He wasn't particularly pleased with the result in the Pit. Seems he wants you eliminated, but now I see a much better prize we all thought gone to bring home to master."

He leered at me. I shook, the thought disgusting and terrifying me. I wouldn't. I wouldn't!

"As if you can just take him while I'm here." Brimstone snarled at the scrawny figure of Wormtail, who only seemed to fake a pout and make a snorting laugh.

"You can try."

A dozen large rifles and even a double shotgun battle saddle spun his way. Brimstone's eyebrows narrowed.

"You think you can wander? Oh sure, the normal slavers might not go for you, but I come from a much higher authority. One who can get a griffon to spot you from the air. One that wants his pet back. Now come on, little runt. Daddy's waiting."

"N-no!" I stomped one hoof, before squeaking in surprise as my saddle's mouthpiece whipped out accidentally from the movement. The slavers laughed, but Glimmerlight had my back.

"He's not going back to him. Not after what's happened! Murky's no slave any more. Don't bring this to violence because I promise even if you kill us all I'll make sure I get you somehow before it goes down."

"Of course you will, my dear. But you see, I have twelve heavily armed allies at least twenty feet away with their tongues on the triggers and you have a half dead raider with no weapons. Hand him over. I'll maybe see that you at least find a home, my dear."

"Not a chance."

"You don't have much a choice, you know! Hah!"

"Want him, you gotta take him." Brim lowered himself down. "If Glim doesn't get you, I will."

"Yes, yes, of course, but hooves don't do well against guns. Do learn how fighting works, big boy, before you try and act like you understand it."

For a second, I thought Brimstone was going to simply charge for that one remark. However much it his condescending attitude infuriated me, he was right. We didn't even have space to retreat.

Stalemate. Only they could end the stalemate with a victory whenever they wanted!

So... not a stalemate at all then.

"Come on, little slave. Maybe I'll even let your friends live if you come here. I'm sure the Master wouldn't mind that once he saw he was getting you back. Come on. Just trot over."

I looked around. Anything to grapple? Just old bars, nothing above them. Nothing they couldn't shoot me long before I managed to tug anyway!

"I said come on! Just obey and trot forward. Do I have to shoot one of them to get it through to you? Do I?"

I paced on the spot. I tried to think, my wings shaking a little by my side. The same look was on Glimmer's face.

"He is not going back to him!" She grit her teeth. "He's realised who he is and he is not that monster's pet slave!"

"Oh for crying out loud, must you make this so tiring? Blockhead, shoot the mare."

"Yis, boss."

The rifle came up. I saw Brimstone look to dive, his instinct to protect Glimmerlight kicking in. I think I screamed. I knew he was too far away.

The gunshot snapped out.

The rifle seemed to flare, but not from the barrel. A bright spark from the stock nearer the slaver's face sent the weapon spinning away. My ears stung from the sound, but even while recovering I began to hear where it had come from. Behind and above us.

"Stand down! All of you!"

Glimmerlight had winced back, expecting the pain. We met eyes in disbelief, before both turning to the real source of the gunshot.

Behind us, atop a set of gantry stairs from a far entrance, we saw him. His revolver floated just near a blinking red eyepiece to aim down its scope, his red mane blew loose in the light breeze around his head.

Protégé trotted forward down the stairs. Keeping his revolver trained on the group of slavers. He wasn't wearing his armour, just the scholarly vest and day clothes. As he passed, I saw his eye briefly turn to me and acknowledge my presence before returning to Wormtail. The weasel-like aid to Shackles had clenched away from the disarmed slaver on the gunshot and now strove to keep his presence up.

"Wormtail, you don't have authority to go around shooting workers. Especially not valued ones."

Wormtail merely snickered, wringing out his neck.

"I'd heard you were back on your hooves. Looking to make up for how you failed at the Mall, eh? Trying to make up for all your bad planning by acting hard, pointing a gun at another slaver?"

"You know as well as I what transpired there. Just as you know why I keep this drawn."

I saw some of the slavers actually grin. Suddenly, I got a sense that something bigger had suddenly transpired in the background. Protégé wasn't paying us much attention despite saving Glimmer's life. Ahead of us, Wormtail calmed a little, shaking out his neck again.

"Well I'm afraid this is a stupid little move for you again. See, Chainlink Shackles doesn't like you, and you've just revealed yourself, on your own, with only five shots in your revolver. I'm sure no pony would be able to find you after you mysteriously disappeared."

"Not going to happen. Murk and his friends are coming with me. You know I've been put back in charge of the Mall. They will be protected."

What? YES!

"Only until Chainlink is healthy again, since that brute over there got near him! Don't you smirk, raider! You've got a day at most before you'll be kicked out all over again! The slaver council isn't too happy with you. Not that it matters. Didn't you hear me? You aren't leaving here alive! Shackles told me you were back on the trot, aiming to save your little favourite runt."

His eyes narrowed.

"He also told me if I got the chance to simply kill you and dump your body in the taint. See? That's why it's good to have allies. Something you don't know."

The weapons aimed again. They were all Shackles' lackeys, I knew it! What was Protégé doing? He had to know he couldn't win!

"Hm, funny." Protégé smiled. "I happen to have a friend in a very high place too."

There was an odd silence. Nopony really got what he meant. I saw it first, a small red dot creeping over Wormtail's face. Reaching his eye, it made him squint and yelp from the glare.

"There's a helpfulness to having a sworn griffon bodyguard who's a handy sharpshooter too, you know? You give one order, she'll pull the trigger. Murk here can attest to her accuracy on the move, never mind your head standing still."

The atmosphere seemed to change. Wormtail looked a lot less confident all of a sudden. Glancing from side to side, now he was the one having to really try and think.

"You... you..."

"Goodbye, Wormtail. I'll no doubt enjoy your presence again later."

"Insufferable... everypony, let's go. Shackles will want to know the runt's alive! You didn't save him, upstart! You can't save him! You're alone in Fillydelphia now, Protégé! Just a slave playing at slaver! Just you wait!"

He turned, trotting away. Almost disappointed, the slavers obediently left. Only then did I notice how much I was shaking. Thank the Goddesses for his return! Trotting over, I saw Protégé let out a relieved breath of his own.

"Thank you, ma..." I coughed a little over my word. No using that any more. Even if he is the only one I ever perhaps respected back. "Thanks."

He turned back to me. Out of the moment, I began to see how rough he really was. His normally ponytailed mane was loose and his clothes loosely fitted from a significant loss in weight. I presumed it was from the treatments to cure Barb's poison.

"Wormtail is a coward. If he thinks his own skin's in danger he'll always back off. He relies on hiding behind Shackles' power. I'm just glad you had that PipBuck on you to track once I got out."

I could see a heavy swathe of bandage over his neck just like mine. Seeing my own, Protégé's face turned from relief to concern.

"Murk, I heard about the Pit. They said that 'the pegasus' had been in there and it's all they talked about. Even Master Red Eye was rather perplexed by it. I am most grateful to see you're alive, for the longest time I... I thought..."

"As did we." Glimmerlight cast a hoof around my neck. "A few miracles and a lot of self-discovery involved perhaps, but he's still here trotting with us. Thank you, Protégé. You mentioned you were back in charge of the Mall?"

He nodded curtly, then winced from the motion shifting his bandage. Of course, he hadn't had a megaspell to help it.

"A temporary judgement. I know the Mall so I've been assigned to merely care for it until Shackles is healed himself. Not very long at all. Grindstone has convinced the council that the riot and its outcome was my doing. He and Shackles played their cards well. Make no mistake, there is a great game of intrigue and politics coming to light now. Something I know of but cannot prove beyond my own words."

He cast a glance to Brimstone.

"It seems you did more than you may have thought. Allegedly, once he got back to his office after your attack he collapsed. He must have just been trying not to let it happen in front of the slaves."

I couldn't help but see a satisfied little smirk across Brim's face.

"He will return as walking wounded in a day. Shackles is no weak pony. Until then, I have overseer duty similar to Shackles' own limbo period before he was handed power over the Mall. Somewhere I advise we return to now rather than be exposed."

"No argument from me." Glimmerlight nodded. I could sense how relieved she really was.

"Good, then let us make swift pace. I have no wish to meet another group of those loyal to Shackles and Grindstone."

Behind us, Ragini bounded across the remains of the warehouse. A gut-wrenching feeling hit me as I saw her broken wings clasped to her side. She was ground-ridden. There was a brief moment as she saw my wings half spread where I saw confusion and shock in her eyes. Before I could think of any words, she hid it under a veil of professional blankness.

With her there, we began to move off. Falling back in pace with me, Protégé glanced over and saw my wings. I noticed he kept his voice low, respectful of Ragini's presence.

"I'm glad to see that the ghoulish doctor's treatments are helping, Murk. Please, would you do me a favour and attend my office upon your return?"

"Um, y-yes?"

He looked surprised, as though expecting a 'Master' on the response.

"Good." He picked up his pace, trotting ahead to lead the way naturally. "I have missed our talks."

The mall was bustling. Ponies were coming and going in a constant stream with hazy eyes. Shackles' influence finally being lifted was like a brief haven for them, even if just for one day. Most took the chance to grasp what little freedom to wander as they could, enjoying a day free of toil to get some food or simply a change of scenery.

Protégé cast a disapproving eye upon the quality of the slaves. Most regarded him with something of a curious glance, some asking if he was back forever. I saw one slave plead that he be with them again. Red Eye's apprentice could only offer that he would do what he could within one day.

When he saw the plaza, I almost felt like he was going to break the stoicism he bore to look upon what had changed in horror.

"This isn't what I wanted."

Likely only I heard it, the pain in his voice. With a deep sigh, he turned to me as he moved to the stairs back to his office.

"Please, do come visit. I want to hear in your words what has happened. I'll give you a few seconds to settle."

He spoke quickly and curtly, before swinging to leave. I was left with Glimmerlight and Brimstone, both rather quiet at first. Naturally, it would fall to Glimmer to break the silence a little.

"Well? Let's get in there and get to work. Got a lot of planning to do."

We trotted into the plaza more fully. Cells were laid open with a skeleton crew of slavers waiting around, however the main draw was a series of tables set up around the area manned by slaves themselves. The slave market had come to visit the beleaguered residents of the Mall, seeking to gain from their wish to escape harsh control. Trinkets, foods, purified water, and clothing were all laid out and being furiously haggled over. Sooty wasn't to be seen. I presumed he was above this now, or that several of the traders reported back to him.

We returned to our cell, finding Coral waiting for us. But even as they trotted in, I looked to the balcony above, seeing a brief glance of Protégé passing by it to his office. Something felt different about him. He was quieter, less poetic and optimistic of purpose.

I felt a hoof on my shoulder. Glimmer.

"You go see him, Murky."

I turned to her with an aim to cut the joke short but saw only a calm seriousness.

"We can handle checking all we have ourselves. Go see how he is. That pony saved our lives as much as you saved his. I know you'll want to catch up, but could you just leave your PipBuck here a moment? I want to try and see if I can't load a stored map from Aurora's files onto it."

Biting my lip, I looked back up for a second before nodding.

"Thanks, sis."

Feeling her pat my cheek comfortingly, I hoofed over my PipBuck and left them to it, trotting toward the stairs. I knew the way just fine, but even so I felt an odd nervousness of confronting him once again. As though I didn't know quite what to say or where to start. Things had changed and it had been so long. I wasn't the same pony he once knew.

Would he be the one I knew?

Carefully cresting the stairs and poking my head out to watch the corridor (too near his office for my liking) I began to trot toward the office door, and found that Ragini stood on watch outside it. I didn't imagine Protégé was taking any chances with another attempt on his life. She regarded me as finely as ever. (By which I mean as though I were something she'd accidentally stepped on.)

"Want in?" Her voice cut into the air, as though trying to use as little syllables possible.

"Y-yes please." I nodded, stepping forward as she nodded to the presumably unlocked door. As I passed her, I saw the ruin of her wings by her sides and knew from horrible experience the true meaning of it.

"I'm... I'm sorry for what happened to you, Ragini." I looked up at the huge griffon. "I know what it feels li—yargh!"

She grabbed me by the collar, pulling me right up to her beak with fury in her eyes.

"No you don't, flightless! Don't you dare tell me you know how it feels to lose your wings! You've never tasted the air above the clouds, never felt the rush through your body in a straight dive or the satisfying ache the day after a challenging flight! Those feathers of yours do not know what it is to be a flyer! So don't you come here with your magically healed little shaking wings by your side and have the nerve to say you know how I feel!"

She dropped me. Landing on my rump with a yelp, I cowered away from the furious griffon, her face screwed into anger alone.

"So answer me two questions, flightless. Could what you got for your wings work for me?"

Shivering, I shook my head.

"Then fuck off with your concern. I'm one of the Talons. We don't want sympathy.

Second question..."

She bent right over me, turning her head to the side so that her eye could better stare at me.

"Did any of those that did this get away?"

"Y-yes."

There was a pause, then she seemed to smile. It was not a nice smile.

"They had their little revenge pacts. The Talons don't let this sort of thing go unanswered either. Eye for an eye. Thank you for telling me this, flightless."

Her back leg knocked the door open rather too sharply before harshly inclining with her head.

"Now get your scrawny ass in there."

Afraid to even voice any further words, I darted inside and closed the door readily, taking a second to breathe on the other side.

"I see Ragini still adores you, Murk."

The moment the door closed, he spoke from across the room. I turned a little too sharply to see him amidst a state of devastation. Protégé held many books in his telekinesis, trying to sort out the mess that Shackles' slavers had made of his office. Bookshelves were tumbled over, papers spread out of cabinets, and all his furniture shifted around. I even saw one row of books simply thrown across the floor.

Oh wait. That bit had been me...

...oops?

"It's, um, all right. I guess I'm sort of used to it now." I trotted forward, allowing my eyes to fall instead to him.

"She has a lot of anger to get out, don't take it to heart. Anyone not in her contract has been getting it from her lately."

Protégé turned back to me, setting a dozen books on his desk. I couldn't help but be struck by how little energy he really gave off. Every time before I had seen him, Protégé had a certain presence, a spark within him that had controlled any given encounter. Yet now, he moved slower, favouring his neck with any movements around the tightly wrapped clean bandages. His eyes looked tired and his mouth seemed to fight to not allow for a frown to come over him. I almost wanted to just start telling him it would all be all right somehow.

"I must thank you personally, Murk." He sat atop a stool nearby, indicating another across the room if I wanted it. "There's no other way to put it. You saved my life by taking on Barb. I heard what you did to him and all I can say is... I'm glad that I was right about you. There is certainly more to you as a pony than many saw."

Taking a careful seat, I toyed with a small book that had been in the way.

"I just got lucky."

"Nonsense, Murk. That took bravery. Even now I look upon you and I see a different pony than the one that I last saw calling me 'master.' Something has changed you, I don't need to see your wings recovering to know that. There's one crucial difference I spotted the moment I saw you again, and again the moment you wanted in this door."

"H-huh?"

Protégé allowed a small smile to cross his face. "You turned to me and you looked me in the eyes. You've never done that before, not like that. Please, tell me. What changed?"

I nodded, placing the book down. "Yes, yes I have changed. There's a... I-lot..."

I felt a pressure behind my eyes. What I'd been through. Of being broken, forced into work, held down and made to call Shackles 'Master' again and again. It all flooded back in one tidal wave. Clenching my eyes shut, I wiped away the little dampness that had come forth. I heard Protégé shift, leaning forward in concern.

"I told you once before that I was willing to hear you out, Murk. That offer still stands."

Looking up, I tried to hide the wetness in my eyes with a hoof. I was stronger now. I could see I was not meant to be a slave. I could see I was meant to be free. But that didn't mean it all didn't still hurt terribly. Sniffing, I began to tell him everything from the start. Since the moment he had been crippled; and I held none of it back. He was a very good listener. I might have sniffled a few times, or stumbled and repeated myself, but he was patient and only interrupted me to clarify some things or to ask intelligent questions.

Eventually I spoke of the mostly faded nightmares and dreams I had travelled in my near death. Protégé leaned forward, closely interested as he heard me talk of my past with my mother and of how I gained my cutie mark.

"That's what changed, it all stemmed from this one thing." I wiped my eyes and looked across the room, turning slightly that he could see my cutie mark. "It means to be free. My life isn't to be in slavery, it's to escape from it! Coming to Fillydelphia was nothing more than me reaching the end of the line, the place I would escape from and begin my life for real! The friends I've met here were what I was to truly find. A family I chose for myself. I want to be free. I've said it so many times but only now do I really... well, understand it. I have to be free."

There was an odd silence, before Protégé nodded slowly.

"I see. Believe that by my power I would want it for you, Murk. I gained my freedom to choose my path, so I can but say I wish the same for you in return. However, Shackles will not want it of you. What you have been through under him."

He looked away.

"I know what it's like. Perhaps not to the same malicious extent to focus on you above all, but I know the weight of his authority upon my shoulders and now he seeks to do it again." He slowly drew himself up, opening his eyes. "You can gain your freedom in Fillydelphia, Murk. So long as we can keep you from him then I believe you can last the two years to—"

"I will not wait two years more to lose my life, Protégé!"

I snapped up, standing and facing him.

"Don't come back and tell me that I am just to go back to slavery!"

"I cannot simply release you, Murk. You know this."

"I've seen what I need to do in my life now! How can you stand there and tell me that I've to endure Stables and risk my life for years to 'earn' my freedom that I need to seek for myself! After all this, after all you've been through, how can you tell me that it's right?"

"Master Red Eye offers only these options, Murk! I can help you—"

I stomped a hoof hard. "Not for two years of this! I won't last two years! I thought you were better than this when we last talked! That you wanted something better that wasn't going to be pain and misery simply to get what I have always been denied! You can—"

"Enough!"

Protégé snapped at me, standing up. Yet even as he did, he sighed, looking away.

"I'm sorry, I didn't mean to shout. I said I could help you, but you didn't let me speak. I spent a long time recovering, Murk. A long time to think, to read, and to speak with those I could. Old Grizzly predominantly visited in lieu of my master from his attentions to the final preparations for the cathedral and Unity. I would have spoke with him, told him all of what happened, but there are greater plans at stake now.”

He trotted closer to me.

“I have a way I can help you, Murk. To make this journey easier to bear. If you will but listen?”

I was breathing hard. The emotions of slavery in the past few days had wrung me hard and I felt ready to burst out at anything. But I nodded and sat again. Protégé sat upon the floor near his desk, lifting the eyepiece from his face.

“There is something happening in Fillydelphia, Murk. Something you saw an example of when Shackles betrayed us both and from what Wormtail was saying. It is being called the great game by some, a power struggle as they sense Master Red Eye’s final victory drawing near. Every member of his staff seeks to be in the most advantageous position to reap the rewards or bask in the power that it shall bring.”

“I... I know. I’ve seen Shackles’ meetings, he made me serve for them.”

“Then you know what kind of seriousness they give to this, Murk. Intrigue and hidden politics are crossing over into a mess of loyalties and back room activities. I shan’t drown you in the specifics, but due to my position of favour beside Master Red Eye they see me as a threat. I have precious few allies left, yet many seek to discredit me. My time is rushed and I am fighting a losing battle to keep my own interests solid while maintaining my responsibilities.”

He spoke even as he wandered the room. His magic began to lift more books, replacing them on shelves before leaning down with a painful grunt to try and lift a bookcase. Without thinking, I went over to help him.

“What—ergh... what are your responsibilities now?”

“Logistics.” The bookcase snapped upright. “I am to help direct Master Red Eye’s material supply and personnel reserves as his supervisor. It is... without recognition. A demotion for sure.”

We both leaned back on the bookcase. Glancing over, I could hear the disappointment in his voice. Here was the pony I knew who once dreamed of making something better out of all this, now denied that link to the very ponies he sought to help.

“I don’t understand. You said you could help me. What does this have to do with their arguments?”

Having trotted back to the desk to begin picking up his notes, Protégé turned back to me.

“As I said, I had a great amount of time to think, read, and talk. Hearing of what Chainlink Shackles did to you, forcing you to admit his ownership of you made me realise and see the way out for you.”

He turned, trotting right up to me, placing a hoof on my shoulder.

“I can offer you a new task in Fillydelphia... by my side.”

My eyes shot open wider. “Wh-what?”

“Murk, the ponies who control things in here are often not nice people at all. Yet if one requests a pony join them as a personnel liaison and assistant it is up to the slave to decide. It never gets brought up much because no slave would want to go with it. Shackles trapped you in it, but you hold the power to choose to accept me as your new immediate...” He paused, clearly not sure about the word. "...master."

My mind reeled somewhat. Was it really that simple? I knew I could say yes and avoid Shackles forever now! He held no chains over me to stop me simply agreeing!

Yet something stopped me. I could tell how much Protégé saw this as something only for good but there was one thing that mattered before I simply agreed.

"My friends can come too, right?"

There was an uneasy silence. The look on his face said it all, the look that wished I hadn't asked that. Protégé didn't need to say a word.

"You want me to come with you and you alone? To abandon my friends to Chainlink Shackles?"

"I know, Murk."

"You want me to just-to just go from one master to another! To ask me to be your slave

—"
Protégé looked up quickly. "An assistant."

"A slave is a slave!"

My outburst seemed to have surprised him. I knew I could say it now, my mind felt more free! All the things I wished I could stick up for and say suddenly felt able to be said!

"How can you expect me to leave behind my friends? Can't they come? Please, tell me they can come somehow! Be your team! We can all help you!"

"I'm afraid that's not possible, Murk. I can't simply take such a chunk of his workforce away. The rules of Master Red Eye's organisation do not allow it. I am sorry, Murk. I know this is harsh. But I'm sure they would want this for you. When he returns, Chainlink Shackles will destroy you. Think of what you told me, what he wanted Sooty Morass' despicable outlet to have you for."

That struck deep. I trotted back from him, any exultation and bravery replaced with fear. This was toying with my mind, giving me choices I wished I didn't have to make. H-he was right. I didn't want to go there. I'd come to realise so much but it all felt so fragile. If he got a hold of me again...

I sank down onto my haunches.

"Murk, you don't have to decide now."

Protégé moved forward again and sat before me. His eyes showed genuine care as he set a hoof on each of my shoulders.

"This is all I can offer with what I have now. You have so much to offer and I could help you find it. You would be more independent and active with me than you would ruining your body in some mill or factory. You will still be able to participate in the salvage programs to earn your freedom, but you will be away from his ownership. Safe with me. Please, I only ask that you think it over before he returns and I am forced away from the Mall."

"I... I will..."

"Thank you, Murk." He closed his eyes briefly. "If it's worth anything, I am so sorry for what happened. I wish I could have been there to help you."

He got up to trot back to his desk. Behind him, I let my head droop. Every bit of logic said I should agree, but leaving my friends behind to serve a new master... even if that master was Protégé? To help Red Eye's efforts still? Wasn't this just what I'd been seeking to get away from?

Unless...

"You could come with us."

My voice was barely a whisper, just enough that I saw him stop.

"Murk?"

I got up, moving one step closer.

"Come with us. Join us. Protégé, you're too smart a pony to not have noticed what we're trying to do. You have to have known that we're trying to escape someday. Look at what's happening. The ponies after your life? Being put into organising what spare parts go where? All instead of what you wanted."

I moved a little closer, this time resting my hoof on his shoulder instead of his on mine. He didn't move, simply staring ahead.

"You're a better pony than anypony else working for Red Eye. You can come with us. They would allow it, I'm sure they—"

"Stop, Murk."

His voice cut in sharply before mine, tapering to a gentle tone.

"Please, Protégé. If you're free with us you could do something better out there! With your help we could—"

"I said stop." He trotted forward, the eyepiece floating up to his face as he made for his desk. "I have a path I chose for myself. The day I ceased to be a slave I chose to stay and share in his dream. My place is here in Fillydelphia. By his side."

"Even while he promotes slavers like Shackles above you to do what they do to us?"

I stood before his desk as I saw that quill and parchment roll out, no doubt a message. He hesitated and looked up only briefly.

"Master... Master Red Eye sees fit to choose. I... trust him. It's his decision."

Biting my lip, I watched him begin to write. I saw the weakness in his eyes, the tiredness and the harm across his body. I remembered the scars.

My voice was quiet, fragile in its hushed tone to ask.

"Are you really sure you stopped being a slave?"

The quill stopped, but he did not look up.

"...good day, Murk. Enjoy your time of rest."

That was that. He went back to his message, leaving me nothing but to turn and leave his office.

I trotted a little morosely down the stairs. Heading back to the plaza, I was a little surprised to find Glimmerlight, Brim, and Coral Eve coming the opposite way. Behind them I saw Blunderbuck in tow.

"H-huh? What's g-going on?"

"Turn around, lil'bro! We're going out!"

I didn't have much choice. Her magic picked me up mid trot and spun me 180 to follow their direction. In my confusion, I didn't even stop trotting the entire time.

"G-going out? Where? Glimmer what's going on?"

She just ruffled my mane, glancing to the smiling faces of the others. Even Coral Eve held a little rare grin.

"Red Eye's day of rest, remember? You really think I'm going to miss a chance to attend the Roamer Bar when it gets opened to slaves? I've got a date with some serious ethanol!"

“Ethawhat?”

Her eyes glinted as we passed out the front of the Mall. Only now did I notice that she carried a new saddlebag filled with unknown items.

“Liquid fun, Murky. Liquid fun. Besides, we’ve got something to celebrate.”

Glimmerlight seemed rather lighter of heart than I’d ever seen her lately. Even with her bruised body and great deal of exhaustion, she somehow found the energy to make a flighty trot toward the Roamer ahead of our group. Sometimes she would skip in circles until we caught up.

“Been so long since I’ve had a proper booze up! Wonder if I can still down it with the best of them?”

She chirped and hummed all the way there across the gravel fields of what was once Fillydelphia’s main park. Up ahead I could hear a crowd of voices, scratching music, and the clank of ceramic objects fairly repeatedly. The Roamer sounded busy, but only after we rounded a large dead bush and saw its light across an empty pond did it truly sink in.

“Behold, Murk!” Blunderbuck wrapped a hoof around my neck and swept the other one out toward the bar. “Fillydelphia’s prime establishment of alcohol, drunken hijinks, and absolute fun!”

It was much bigger than I had expected! The only bar I’d ever seen was just a small tavern a slave caravan carrying me had once stopped at. But this was a full converted building! I saw two floors lit up over the old cobbled road with crude letters made of all materials bolted onto the abandoned third floor. They flickered with Hearths Warming lights wrapped around them and dropped a rather garish mixture of colours mixed in with the warm light exuding from the building. Outside, everything had spilled out to accommodate the slaves taking the time to visit. Benches and makeshift tables spread almost across the road, filled with riotous ponies gulping drinks and laughing amongst themselves.

I just gulped. It looked pretty crowded in there with numerous ponies already showing the effects of the drink as they staggered around.

“Aw yeeeah!” Glimmer shouted and hopped up onto a bench to gaze down at the Roamer. “Now that’s what I’m talking about! That, my friends, is where you can really feel alive and free.”

Coral Eve just shook her head and muttered something about certain ponies never growing past their teens. The others trotted forward toward Glimmer. Brimstone actually seemed to be grinning a little himself.

“Aye, can’t deny it’ll be welcome. Even if it is that water they call ale.”

“Seemed to get me plastered just fine last time.” Glimmerlight pouted up at the big pony, who simply shrugged.

“Then what does that say about you, Glim?” Brimstone didn’t even turn his head as he trotted off, still limping on the one horribly scarred side of his body.

I had to stifle my laugh into my hoof at the sudden look of having trotted right into that one on Glimmerlight’s face, before she stomped a hoof and stuck out her tongue at Brimstone’s back. Then she turned back to me as Blunderbuck moved forward, carrying another of those saddlebags.

“Hey, Murky? Wait out here with Coral, she’ll bring you in soon.”

"H-huh? Why?"

"Can't tell!" She grinned brightly, patted the saddlebag, and galloped off while shouting over her shoulder. "It's a surprise!"

I exchanged a look with Coral, who simply nodded to me. I opened my mouth, but she cut in before me.

"Not. Saying. A word." She pronounced it all cheerily and patted my head. "Just wait a few minutes, Murky. Then we'll go in and meet them."

Confused, I looked to my other friends disappearing into the Roamer. The crowds parted before Brimstone while Glimmer and Blunderbuck waded in behind him. Away from the noisy crowds and clank of tankards, Coral and I stood waiting patiently. In the dark of the evening, I saw her eyes stare across the city.

"What is it?"

Coral kept looking. Only after a few seconds did I realise it was toward the direction of the Alpha-Omega Hotel. Coral sighed briefly and patted a hoof on the ground.

"Just... just hard to ever stop thinking. You see them lying in a cot, so vulnerable, and you promise to yourself that you'll take care of them forever. Not a minute goes by I don't wonder what he's doing. If he ever looks out a window and wonders the same."

"We'll, um, do it? Right? The, uh, escape thing." Why did sounding inspired have to be so wordy and hard? How did Unity do it so easily? "And, uh-uh, we'll get them all out. You and your son, Lilac, and Unity, and-and Sunny! We'll all go out of here, yeah?"

Coral Eve chuckled at my awkward little speech.

"You've been nattering on about escape ever since you woke up. It's adorable."

I didn't have any say in the matter as she rubbed my cheek and stood up.

"But it's just the sort of thing we love you for, Murky. You're the dreamer. The one who wants it harder than any of us. Now come on, I'm sure they're done. There's a time and a place for emotional little moments, but now isn't it."

Coral trotted away and I rushed to keep up. I felt my wings ache slightly as they half fluttered in excitement.

"Done? Done what?"

Coral just smiled as we entered the throng of ponies. She led the way, pushing a path through them and checking back to ensure I was following her. Truth be told, aside from being nervous around such cramped and smelly slaves (not that I was exactly anything but the same), it wasn't so hard to navigate, I could just move through all the little spaces. Soon enough, we entered the doorway and I felt a wave of heat slap me in the face. A mixture of sweet alcohol, body odour, and old oak drove through the room to the doorway by the fumes of a roaring fire against the far wall. Unable to see much over the ponies shouting, singing, drinking, and flirting all around me, I strained to figure out where I was. The biggest crowd was around the makeshift bar while others clustered in small seating booths at the edges. Where were we—

"Murky! Coral! Over here!"

My ears perked up, pulling Coral toward where Glimmer had seen us. This was crazy! What were they up to before I came... in... oh my...

The crowd had parted just enough as Coral and I moved toward Glimmer's voice on the edge of the room and I witnessed what awaited. The sound seemed to fall away as I just stood and gaped. Many other slaves around were watching with bemusement as well. Before me stood a sight I didn't quite understand but felt such a connection to.

They had gotten one of the side tables to themselves. Hung between the wooden poles on either side, I saw a little half-ripped string of multi-coloured flags, and below that, a bright red cover draped across the table itself. A few small boxes sat there wrapped in rough, coarse rope over different colours of plastic bags that shielded my eyes from whatever they were. But in the centre there sat something I'd never seen before me like this. A cake! Small and likely looking as though it were made from condensed oatmeal with only a single bent candle, but still! A cake!

Blunderbuck lounged back with a great big grin as he pulled a string on a little device.

With a sharp crack that sent a few squeals around the room (not in the least mine) he shot a few strings of multi-colored paper into the air. After a few awkward moments of detaching myself from Coral, she chuckled and nudged me toward the table. Glimmerlight stood before it, lavishly indicating it all with her hooves like a salespony and wearing a ridiculous sparkly pointed hat tied with a string under her chin. Come to think of it, so was Blunderbuck.

"Wh-what is this? Glimmer? Coral? What's going on?"

"Welcome, Murky!" Glimmerlight trotted up quickly and pulled me toward it. "I told you that you could choose today as your official birthday from now on. Every birthday needs a party!"

I just kept blinking. A birthday party? Such a thing existed? For me? I couldn't stop staring around all the individual paper hangings and balloons tied to the table. No pony had ever given me a party for me before.

"While it may be informal, it's all you deserve after everything lately. Come on, my dear, sit down." Coral Eve nudged me forward again, her and Glimmer having to direct me through my wide-eyed shock.

"Yeah! We got presents, a hat for you to wear, then the drinks. Ooooh yes! Brim had a few words with the bartender to get the reserved seat. He can be very persuasive." Glimmerlight flung herself into the recessed seats and tapped beside her for me to move to.

I couldn't believe it. I just couldn't! A birthday party for me! My first one ever! I loved my friends so much!

Only thing was I had stopped and stared again, before being unable to stop myself seeing what sat there and attempting to stifle a laugh. My eyes had turned across the table once again, where they had found Brimstone Blitz sitting at the back dwarfing it all. He sat hunched over in the room, face as twisted and scarred around his one eye as ever... and bore another of those tiny ridiculous hats on his head.

Seeing the sight, no doubt Glimmer's doing, I couldn't help but chuckle. She joined me, winking up to the big pony. Brimstone just let out a long and deep breath.

"Kids..."

Somewhere in the bar, somepony had gotten an old jukebox working. Accompanied by a cheer from the bar, the happy bopping music spread into the room. It was an upbeat and relaxed tone, one that set everypony to more smiles and laughing than I had known slaves capable of.

I had been pushed in beside Glimmerlight at the back of the recess, furthest from anypony else and surrounded by my friends, while Coral had shifted opposite me closer to Blunderbuck. It wasn't difficult to notice she had chosen the chair furthest from Brimstone, but the mere fact that she was willing to put that aside to be here for this spoke volumes of where her real loyalties lay with us. If I hadn't already done so, I'd have let my respect for her become boundless.

Despite the seediness of the Roamer and the gradual decline in sober ponies in the room, I couldn't help but feel a cosy warmth in this place. The oak décor and hanging lanterns before the big fireplace set a quaint tone.

"Hey, so... gonna open these babies any time soon, Murky?" Glimmer nudged my side and nodded toward the boxes on the table. We'd just been chatting about the bar and stuff lightly while I had pondered what they were.

"Oh? Sorry!" I bit my lip. "I didn't know I was meant to!"

A hoof ruffled my mane fiercely. "Aww! Don't you know these are for you? You get presents on your birthday, Murky! Now come on! Those pressies won't open themselves! Dig in!"

"Aye. You get started on them and I'll fetch the drinks." Brimstone pulled himself up and stomped off with a thin smile to the bar. I couldn't help but notice him removing the hat the moment he left.

"Typical Brim." Glimmerlight muttered with a shake of her head. "Just as little idea about parties as you. Now let's get started!"

Feeling oddly unsure if I was doing everything right, I pulled the nearest one toward me. I was quite surprised at the size of it, so much so that it rather hid me behind it when I pulled its weight across the table toward me!

"Going for the biggest first? I like your style, Murk!" Blunderbuck grinned madly at me with a rub of his hooves.

Blushing, seeing the others smiling (Blunderbuck most so. Why was that?) I pulled it onto the wide seat beside me and started to tear at the coverings. My hooves ripped a couple pieces off, before a new feeling I'd never known started surging through me. Sheer satisfaction at tearing open the covers of the present! Ooh, I liked this feeling! The paper and plastic bag coverings ripped and pulled off to reveal a thick cardboard box beneath it. Excitedly I threw it open... to find a smaller box inside.

Huh?

Tearing this one out, I opened the lid and found another box below that. Then another. Then another! Again and again until a thin wooden case rested in my hooves after at least eight boxes that now littered the floor under our table. The others were laughing. In the past, I might have seen this as a joke at my expense but I just giggled on each box and relished the opportunity to rip into each new one! Only now I sat with this small wooden case that I slid the top from.

Oh. Oh wow.

"I can install it for you when we get back to the Mall, Murk!" Blunderbuck beamed brightly across the table at me. "Too short notice to put it on before we had to leave for here, but I figured I'd use the big box anyway!"

In my hooves rested a little spur of metal with a few tiny pistons and a ring on the end. I knew what this was! It was an Ironshod battle saddle aiming reticule mark four! I'd adored these things ever since I saw my first one on a slaver's saddle!

"Thank you, Blunderbuck!" I laughed madly, hugging the little piece for my treasured saddle. It'd look so cool flipping out with the mouthpiece to flick in front of my eye for aiming properly! Sure it was only a couple of little metal pointers in a thin circle but it'd let me aim that grapple hook so much easier now rather than just hoping! Eee!

I wasted no time on grabbing the next present. It was thinner and surprisingly weighty, but shockingly well wrapped. This one seemed to have been done by an expert. My hooves struggled to find purchase! Across the table, I saw Coral throw me a sly smirk. Oh, she knew her business with presents.

Even so, I finally found an edge and dug in with my teeth to get the string off. Bit by bit it came apart to reveal...

...a book?

It bore upon the cover a huge map of Equestria under some massive letters and a gigantic word that made my mind spin. I didn't understand.

"But I... I can't read."

"Try opening it." Coral gestured patiently with her hoof and I did as asked.

Pictures! So many pictures! Photographs of animals before they'd become mutated! Huge vistas of Canterlot Castle and that idealistic little country town I'd seen in the Stable! There were images of earth ponies, unicorns, and pegasi in depth along with flowers, insects, and even types of buildings! I kept flicking from page to page, staring in wonder at the pre-war... well, wonders!

"This is an encyclopedia, Murk." Coral leaned around the table and pulled me closer to plant a kiss on my cheek. "It will let you see the happier times and give you plenty of ideas on what to draw."

"Thanks, Coral."

"You're welcome, my dear." She sat back again, clearly finding the sight of me flicking through every page rather satisfying. There was a bird, and then a few pages after a huge picture of Celestia and Luna themselves! I couldn't wait to look at more of this!

Brimstone returned, carrying a tray of drinks and mugs filled with very strong smelling liquid. Setting it down at the edge of the table, he took a seat again but did not pass any out. I presumed the drinks were for after the presents. However seeing what ones had been opened, the big raider grinned and tossed a package toward me.

"Catch, kid!"

Yelping and swinging my hooves up, I barely managed to grab it. Clearly Brimstone had never been an expert at wrapping for it felt loose around whatever was inside. The package wasn't huge but I could feel something sloshing around like liquid. With a brief glance at Brim's encouraging face, I began to pull the packaging from it with little trouble.

Below it, I felt hard leather and saw a stitched brown design with a waxed screw cap. A real proper wasteland wanderer's canteen! Eagerly, I unscrewed the top to see what he'd put inside it. With one sniff I knew precisely what. That one substance I needed almost as much as water these days.

"That RadAway you need should stay safe, Murk." Brimstone voice's rumbled over the table with a slight slur from his partially disfigured muzzle. "Keep that topped up when you can and it'll let you take some when you need to without anypony knowing you even have it on you."

I... I...

I couldn't help it. I felt a few bits of damp tears in my eyes. My illness was still with me, but he was helping me to make it easier. Letting me feel more normal to just swig from a canteen every so often.

"Th-thank you, Brim." I wiped my eyes even as I smiled and saw him turning his head a little more to let that one eye see me.

"Heeeey, c'mon!" Glimmerlight patted my back. "No need to get all tear-filled yet! There's still one present to go!"

Indeed, there was one left. I sat the canteen down beside me on the seat to pull it across. It wasn't large or heavy, but the look in Glimmer's eyes led me to really see her eager for me to open it. Taking one breath, I pulled the paper free and yanked open the old faded box she had no doubt scavenged to put the gift in.

Within it lay my PipBuck.

"I... h-huh?" I blinked a few times, before Glimmer's magic lifted the PipBuck free of the box for me.

Only then did I see the changes. The whipcord had been replaced with actual buckles taken from clothing, and fed through the metal holes to let it hold to my hoof without needing to retie it all the time, while the top looked a lot more clean. She had even been filing off the sharper edges and procured a button from somewhere to replace a missing one!

"The trademark once-over by your good friend, Glimmerlight." She winked at me, knowing where I'd once heard of the concept before. "Go on, turn it on!"

I was already delighted and ready to thank her immensely, but the instruction led me to stare down and hoof the big button I knew would normally activate the device. A little hum and a flicker of dark green gave way to the main screen springing to life. Immediately, I saw what was different. Less of the screen was damaged, and it was almost evenly lit now! Before the picture had faded in and out, not that I'd ever even really looked!

"I gave it a good fix up with some of our spark battery and talisman stuff we stole for the escape. I've fixed the geographic locator spell talisman too, so now that the map function actually works, so we can use it underground in the metro. Tried to make the light stop going on and off but couldn't quite manage it. The screen diodes were just too worn."

"W-wow."

"That's not all! I've fixed the rad-counter inside it, so now it will let you know when you're in a bad spot. Oh and one other thing."

Her telekinesis flipped over the PipBuck to see the worn back that would normally hold against my hoof; the sole smooth part of the entire half-destroyed mess.

"I felt this only right."

On the bottom, I saw that she had somehow engraved a little set of drawings upon it. A set of open shackles with... wow.

Upon the PipBuck's back there lay a rough image of a sundial inside the curve of the shackles. One mark for both of us. I knew the others may not have understood Sundial like Glimmer did, but it hardly mattered.

This was a true gift. I actually managed to make Glimmerlight gasp for air with the tightness of the hug I gave her.

"Thank you, thank you, thank you! You're the best sister ever!"

"Woah! Y-you're welcome! Hehehe! You deserve it. Old and new. Matters to both. Happy Birthday, lil'bro."

There was a moment, out of the corner of my eye, that I saw a strange look on Coral's face at the sight of us before her. It looked almost... relieved.

"Thank you. Thank you all. I... I-this is-I just..."

My chest heaved a little, looking at the assembled items and finding the feeling inconceivable. They had gotten them for me, all because they cared, wanted me to see better things, or help keep me going. I kept smiling even while crying right in front of them, holding onto Glimmerlight and just rocking back and forth.

Across the table, I saw Blunderbuck sigh and dump a few caps into Brimstone's waiting hoof.

"Told you he would." Brimstone winked at me (or was that a blink now?) with a little chuckle even as he spoke to Blunderbuck. They had been betting on whether I'd cry with joy? Oh come on.

All the same, it let me keep smiling, wipe my eyes, and sit upright again. Glimmerlight's eyes were fixed on that tray of drinks with a predatory glee.

"Now, methinks it's time for—"

"Hold on!" Coral's hoof shot out and almost playfully slapped Glimmer's away. "Aren't you going to get him to blow out his candle and make a wish first?"

You did that? I got to make a wish? Glimmerlight seemed to think so, grinning across the table as Coral slid the cake to me gently. This close, I could see it for what it really was: condensed oatmeal coated in a thin layer of hastily melted chocolate. I could tell baking wasn't any of my companions' talents, but that didn't matter. I had a birthday cake!

The single candle on top wafted to and fro. Okay, let's do this! I knew just what to wish for.

"Hey, Murky?" Glimmerlight edged closer, whispering to me. "I think anybody knows you want out of here."

"Um, yeah?"

"Well then, make that wish something special and close to you. Make it shameless or selfish if you want. Doesn't matter. This is your little moment to wish for something, and you don't need to tell anypony what it was. Just have fun."

Ruffling my mane, she leaned back again and left me to the candle. I could see faces watching us now and again with confusion or rolling their eyes in the crowds, but who cared? Right now it was just me and this candle and one little wish in my mind. My hoof rested upon that little statuette as I took a short breath and blew the candle out.

Glimmerlight and Blunderbuck cheered, all of them clapping hooves as I looked up and grinned. Blunderbuck produced a knife to cut it while Glimmerlight eagerly began to spread out the drinks. Brimstone's mug frothed over at the top, containing something he grinned and almost completely downed right away. The others seemed more than content for the fiery liquid that no doubt was contained in their glasses and mugs of no uniform design.

Much to my surprise, Glimmer's magic passed one in front of me.

"Um..."

"Hmm?" Glimmerlight looked down from eagerly taking a first long swig out of her glass and sighing with satisfaction. "What's wrong?"

"Th-this is, um, alcohol?"

"Fillydelphia's finest fire water, Murky!"

"But, uh..." I looked from person to person. Even Coral sipped hers with a thin smile. Gradually they all stared back. Oh dear. "You see, I... I've never had any before."

There was an odd and somewhat shocked silence.

Then Glimmer grinned with that unmistakably mischievous look.

"A small-bodied and hollow-boned pegasus just coming off a medical flushing out who's never touched a drop of alcohol in his life before?”

Her gaze turned to the others as the mug before me lifted itself in her magic’s glow to my hooves.

“Oh, this is going to be good.”

Mugs clanked across the table.

“Cheers!”

We all drank. The fiery liquid stung my throat and made my eyes go wide. The first time I’d tried it I’d nearly spluttered it everywhere from the coughing. But as I kept trying more it became easier. With each sip, the drink went down with less worry.

The cake was cut by Blunderbuck and passed out. Even a small coating of thin chocolate was enough to make it feel special and sugary in my mouth. I’d never had chocolate before either! Turned out all this had been bought with Brim’s arena winnings. Technically it was my bet, but given I’d stolen the caps anyway so I could hardly complain; especially not when it bought all this!

“You know-heh, you know what I’m going to do when we get out?” Glimmerlight leaned back in the chair, slouched as she began on her second drink of the night. “I am absolutely going to finally go to that spa in Tenpony. And you...”

Her hoof nudged my shoulder.

“You are coming with me. Get you a proper day of relaxation the likes of which you’ll have never known!”

Coral chuckled across the table. Even her bitterness seemed to have filtered away but for one night. “I may have to do the same. I heard once they did wonderful hot spas taken from the powered boilers in Tenpony. Definitely have to get one of them.”

I nodded furiously. That sounded lovely!

“Hah! Can even see if we can’t get Murky a wing preening if they’re up for it!”

“Oooh!” I grinned widely. “I’d like that!”

I felt Glimmerlight’s front leg tap my side. “Might have a nice happy ending, that one!”

“Yeah, I think so. That sounds great!” I smiled widely, then wondered why everyone at the table burst out laughing. What? Had I made a joke? Hehe! I must have!

Blunderbuck seemed to have a strangely specific taste in drinks, only downing some of the grape-coloured stuff from glasses. Rolling the glass around between his hooves, he cast a glance over the table at me.

“You know, I was just thinking. Murky Number Seven’s the full name isn’t it? You still gonna wander around out there calling yourself that? Number Seven?”

There was a brief silence as they looked at me. Well, as silent as a bustling loud bar could get as the slaves around us steadily got more drunk. Eventually, I shrugged and sipped the oh-so-wonderful drink again! Hey, since when was there so little left?

“I, uh, dunno?”

“You could choose anything you want, Murky!” Glimmerlight dropped down her empty mug, lifting another across to her. “Got any ideas? What about something the wasteland sees as heroic? How about Littlemurk?”

The joke was awful, but I laughed anyway. My cheeks felt rather flushed. Why did I find that so funny? I felt like I was blinking a lot too, getting ready to think of a name idea when Brimstone leaned across the table over the large number of empty tankards before him already.

“Aye, I dunno about that. If Murk gets the wish I’m betting he made on that cake, there’ll be a few ‘little Murks’ galloping around before long!”

“Hey, I didn’t mean with he—” I shut up quick. Why had I said that? Oh dear, my mouth was betraying me. It had just slipped out!

Even Coral allowed herself a giggle from it. Glimmer laughed loud enough that I saw numerous other ponies glance at our table. I just sat and blushed deeply, hiding it as I lifted the big tankard suddenly before me with both hooves.

Across from us in another recess, I heard a raucous song start up. Much of the bar began to listen in as the group of miners kicked up.

Drinking, drinking, drinking!

Drinking till we’re drunk!

Standing up, falling down!

Getting in a fight!

Bucking someone’s lights out!

Falling on the floor!

Waking up next morning...

They stood, waving their hooves, and rose their mugs.

Then getting drunk some more!

The mugs clashed together, spilling ale everywhere as they cheered. Ponies clapped and took up the song themselves, repeating it louder and with greatly less consistency in the lyrics. I waved my hooves and shouted along with Glimmer and Blunderbuck as the song picked up amongst the bar.

Falling back into my seat, I stumbled a little on the way down. Wow, this... this, what did they call it? Alcohol! Yes, alcohol! Wow.

I fell against Glimmerlight to get a sense of balance and comfortingly rubbed my head against her shoulder.

“You’re all the beeeest friends I ever had. Do you know you’re all my very best friends?”

Glimmerlight looked as though she was fighting to not laugh madly. Come to think of it, so was the rest of the table. I’d told another joke! Ha!

“We know, my dear.” Coral chuckled into her hoof, sipping further on her drink.

More songs broke out, mostly tales of screwing over the slavers accompanied by much stomping of hooves and banging of cups on the heavy tables. The noise was giving me a headache, but with every sip and gulp the pain faded away. I clambered over the chair toward Coral, and with great effort convinced her to do the little hoof clapping game I’d seen her do with Lilac. We shared tales of times past and spoke of how awesome life would be outside the walls.

Eventually, the drinks Brim had brought ran a little dry and Glimmerlight and I took our turn to fetch some. This was awesome! Ponies seemed to love my wings and more than a few mares even gave them a stroke as I wandered past. Why weren’t ponies like this more? I flared them out and waggled them a little, hopping from hoof to hoof as I went past, leaving them laughing behind me. Glimmerlight brought down a small tray for me to carry, fighting through the crush at the bar herself via her own rather unmistakable means. Leaving her to get the rest, I made my way back to the table.

“Oi! Watch it, short stuff!”

A hoof clipped my ear. It took all my serving skill to not drop the tray as I stumbled away from the buck and plopped it upon the table before... oh, hello floor, how are you?

"Fuckin' lightweight ass, I'm trotting here!" The buck shook his hoof at me and stormed off to the bar. "Stupid winged rat."

I lay against the table a little stunned, clutching my ear. Glimmerlight watched him go.

Then Brimstone got up. Glimmer briefly moved before him.

"Oooh, oh no! Brim! Down boy! Leave it!"

He wandered right past. "Just getting' a drink."

I lifted a hoof from the ground. "But I got the... drinks."

The huge earth pony wandered past us, still rock solid as ever without any hint of losing sobriety. Momentarily broken from my haze, I watched Brim move without any trouble to the bar itself and sit alongside the same buck who'd struck me. I was the only one who might be able to pick out their conversation as the others set about organising the new drinks Glimmer had brought.

Apparently, the buck hadn't noticed Brim was with us when he'd passed. He instead leered at the mare next to him, putting his hoof on her shoulder a lot and giggling at everything she said before he slid a drink toward her. They chatted for a few moments before she left to rejoin her own friends.

"Good catch." Brim grunted to him, apparently an off-hoofed comment.

"Oh, fuck yeah! Thinkin' I might get lucky tonight! Hey, mate? Mate, you drinkin'? Or are you drinkin'?"

"Aye, do I look like a softy?" Brimstone grinned at him, before tapping the bar (upturning a few drinks in the process) to attract the rushed ponies serving us all. "Bottle of the hard stuff, few shot glasses. My new friend and I have some more serious drinking to do."

Both Brim and the buck laid down their caps and a large bottle of orange liquid was placed before them along with a bunch of tiny glasses. Why so small?

"Your accent, mate. Northern? Fuck, wish I had that, get the mares that much easier!"

"Aye, it used to." Brimstone began to pour a couple of glasses and the pair downed them in one quick gulp.

"Ah well! Least I know I got that piece of hot flanking waiting for me. She's still looking over."

To my surprise, Brimstone laughed. Something was wrong with it. I knew he was faking, Brimstone never laughed out loud like that. His hoof went to his new 'friend's' opposite shoulder and patted him.

"Aye, aye..."

Then he pulled. The buck hadn't a chance to struggle as Brim got him around the neck. Still sitting up, Brimstone didn't even look away from his drink. The buck choked out loud as his throat clamped shut.

"...and if you've any interest in being conscious to let that happen, you'll listen to me. That little pegasus you knocked over? Sure, he can be a little ear-sore at times but this is his first, and knowing this damn city, possibly only little party. If you come near him again, I'll eject you from this place without using the door. If you make him cry, and trust me that isn't hard, then I will remove your ability to perform for a mare ever again. Do we understand one another?"

The buck made a noise.

"Good."

Brimstone dropped him, allowing the buck to clatter to the floor and choke, grasping his neck. Leaving him to lie, Brimstone took all the drinks (including those that the buck paid for, I noticed) and returned to us, giving me a little wink with that one eye as he sat down again. Glimmerlight, having been chatting to Blunderbuck, turned and marvelled at the bottle now present at the table.

"Oooh! Brim! How did you get all that?"

Brimstone just grinned. "A new friend's gift to Murk. Pity he won't be joining us. Couldn't hold his drink."

Glimmer's magic excitedly began pouring the warm coloured drink into the shot glasses, pushing a couple in front of each of us. Coral, however, gently refused hers.

"I think, if that's the direction this night is going, I shall take my leave."

"Aww, c'mon!" I patted my hoof on her shoulder. Hey, I only missed once!

Her hoof patted my cheek. "Darling, given what you're like after only a portion of one pint, I believe the night will be a little wild for a pony such as me. Somepony has to be together enough in the morning to get you all up. You just have your fun."

Glimmerlight nodded a few times. I saw her cheeks were bright red and not from a blush either. Before her lay at least twice as many drinks as I'd had. What she said about her drinking wasn't kidding.

"Not a problem, Evey! We'll look after 'em!"

Something in Coral's eyes twitched at the name before relaxing.

"Good night, all. Enjoy your birthday, Murky."

Coral took my presents with her, just to keep them safe and gave me one more hug before she left.

"Never was a heavy drinker, our Coral." Glimmerlight rested her head on a hoof. "Now, let's get down to the more proper birthday style drinking!"

Blinking rapidly, I gazed at the little shot glass before me. The ale wasn't the real stuff? Then why did I already feel all happy inside?

"Let us see if it makes you as wild as this whiskey claims you pegasi can be. To Murky!"

"To Murky!" Brimstone and Blunderbuck repeated it, as did I before I took it in a single gulp just as they did.

Oh my.

When I had finished squirming, blinking, and opening and shutting my mouth like I'd just swallowed a hot coal, I found the glass already refilled. My head went all fuzzy. Another!

"To freedom!"

"To freedom!"

...

"To better days!"

"To better days!"

...

"To, um, something else!"

I wasn't quite sure how it all happened after that. Who were these other ponies that joined us? Glimmerlight had brought some 'new friends' she'd met who now crowded around the table with us.

“...and then I threw my tongue down ‘is throat until he filled that damn bowl with every bit of gruel he could! That is how you swindle free food in here!”

The table cheered and I threw my hooves up at the old tale. Her speech was slurring a little, giggling madly as she fell against the buck beside her for a little support. I couldn’t help but see that her hoof was lightly stroking his chest as she did so.

Things all got blurry again for a while. Glimmerlight, Blunderbuck, and I were—wait what was I doing?

“Glimmerlight, what am I doing?”

“This is called dancing, Murky! Shake dat flank!”

Oh. Oh yes! Music! That was it! The ponies all leaping from side to side and stomping upon the floor knocked me from side to side without really meaning to. Quite easily the centre of attention on the Roamer’s main floor, Glimmerlight stopped dancing just long enough to lift me up with her magic and put me on a flat surface.

“You dance here, Murky!”

The lights span around me as I hopped from hoof to hoof, my wings flared out as much as they could in their stiffness. Hey, hey, drink makes you tall! Everypony was shorter than me! Oh wait, that’s a table.

She’d put me on a table! Everypony was dancing around me and some even cheering up at the little pegasus bouncing about on top of it. Why didn’t they care I was a pegasus? This was great! Glimmerlight joined me on the table and we linked hooves to dance back and forth as the slaves stomped their hooves in time with the flighty music of two slaves who’d somehow found some pots and a flute.

Spinning, I felt the entire world all melt together. How many hooves did I have on the ground again? Oh wait a minute, where was my back left hoof? Oops!

Staggering, dizzy, and falling, I dropped from the table into the crowd, finding myself caught by everyone below.

“Hey, everypony!” Blunderbuck shot a hoof up. “It’s his birthday!”

The crowd cheered, before with a lurch I found myself launched into the air! Wheee! I was flying! Dropping, they caught me and threw me up again on every count!

“One!”

“Two!”

“Three!”

“Uh, how old is ‘ee?”

“Just keep throwing!”

Laughing each time, I eventually fell into Glimmerlight’s hooves where she pulled me close and hugged me tightly, her cheek resting against mine as she looked sideways toward me.

“Doesn’t your good ol’ sis’ throw the best parties, huh?”

“Your parties are dizzy.”

The moment her hug was released, I moved forward. Wait, no. Sideways. Sideways was good! I could do sideways still!

Glimmer chuckled and hiccuped as she caught me and took us back to the table. I crammed in among the ponies that had sat there, with Glimmerlight beside me. On the other side, that same buck she’s stroked before made a bit of an effort to be alongside her. I could see the wonderful stuff I now knew as whiskey was about half-empty in the middle of the table. More shot glasses were handed out and the talking only kept going. Sometimes I didn't even know what I was nodding to with my half-closed eyes. My cheeks felt like they were burning and I occasionally hugged whoever was to my side. She even hugged back! I liked this mare.

My journal got produced from my saddlebag under the table. I had to chuckle as I fetched it, seeing Glimmer's hoof wandering a little with the buck's thigh. That's my sister! But I had something much more important! I could draw ponies! I was gonna draw everypony at the table! The mare beside me and all other ponies present crowded and leaned to see my drawings. They loved them! I flicked past them.

"Ooooh! Look at that one!" The mare beside me pointed with her light purple hoof. "You are one cheeky little buck!"

The table laughed, Glimmer winked, and I grinned widely. They liked my drawings! I showed the rest, getting lots of 'Ooooh' on each of the really good ones. Then I started to draw them all around the table. The charcoal slid a little madly but each of them finally came together. Masterpiece! The table cheered at the finished result, while the mare beside me whispered in my ear if I might do one of just her in a nice silky dress.

Well, who was I to say no?

The table loved that one, as did she. I even got a kiss on the cheek for it!

But then the table's topic seemed to change. My drawings had drawn the topic of conversation to the subject of mares and bucks. I leaned against my new best friend as I listened to them chatter. Talk of fine flanks and, well, rather more specific things drifted to and fro. Glimmerlight was more than willing to share her own stories. Even I could spot that buck beside her watching places other than her eyes as she leaned forward to talk. I was pretty sure she did too, if that 'tail under the chin' trick I knew she loved was any indication.

"First times!" Blunderbuck shouted. "Come on, everypony's got a story, right? Share em and laugh! I got a good joke for that one too, but you go first! Someone go first!"

A resounding cheer met this idea, the table apparently in the mood for a cheeky chatter. A stallion beside Brimstone started and told a tale of him and a caravanner's son during him hitching a lift. Glimmer elbowed my side a few times. I didn't know why. I was too busy drawing little swirly shapes in my journal while listening. The mare beside me jumped in next, wrapping a hoof around an already sleeping buck beside her and saying hers would count for both of them.

Blunderbuck lay his hooves upon the table.

"Oh, you should have seen her! Lovingly figure!"

"Yeah!?" The table egged him on.

"Yeah! Long and slender! Coloured cream with streaks of black! I'll tell you all, she bucked hard!"

Wide mouths and laughing responded to his mad grin.

"Hit all the right spots too! Went off soon as you touched her!"

He smirked wider, before slapping the table.

"And the mare who carried that pistol wasn't bad either!"

Everypony burst into laughter. I didn't get it but I laughed anyway! A few more shared shockingly detailed stories of their young forays, before Brimstone (behind a near forest of mugs and tankards) just grunted.

"Killed her father, broke two stallions' heads. She always fucking hated them."

There was a confused silence. Brimstone just shrugged.

"Raider logic. Strong is good to grab."

Glimmerlight shook her head with a grin. "Moving right along, I guess I could say there was the tale of a fellow initiate in the Ranger base."

She grinned widely, before telling us of him. He was a pretty high flying student of the Rangers, and the only one in their young group who was as good with magic technology as she was. So much so, they shared a lot of projects.

"Now, we were out on a training exercise! Got shackled in the tent together. Oh we'd had a few moments hidden in the lower levels before, we kept it all hidden and stuff. But then while on patrol duty we stumbled across this old cellar filled with all the wine! Literally, all of it! Ever!"

Everypony could see where this was going, but they still waited eagerly.

"So we may have been a little inebriated, but I don't consider that bad! I remember what I was doing and fuck knows I wanted it anyway! He did too! So eventually, I just turned and did this and then said to him..."

She grabbed the buck beside her by the cheeks.

"You gonna just stare at my flanks from behind all night or are you gonna do something with them?"

Then she leaned forward and gave him one smacker of a kiss, pulling him into her. Oh, she was clever. The table cheered them on, the stunned buck recovering admirably fast to take advantage of the situation and let his own hooves wander around her back. The story took a little pause as Glimmer proceeded to apparently try and suffocate the poor buck. Eventually, with a circling hoof on his chest, she moved back. I saw her quickly wink at the flustered-looking buck.

"Exact recreation there, honest! Gotta be authentic, y'know? As for the gory details, well, I dunno if you'd all want to hear them."

Never had I heard a group of ponies demand something in greater enthusiasm. My own will for freedom paled in comparison. She didn't disappoint them either and lay with her head resting on the buck's chest as she told them all. I simply sat and laughed when they did, hearing these tales of other ponies and their first experiences felt really cheeky and fun! Why hadn't I ever felt like this? I honestly blurred out a little, missing most of it, but seeing everypony so happy...

"What about Murky?"

My eyes shot open fully.

"Yeah, what about the little guy? What's his story?"

"Come on, lil'bro! I'm sure yours is cute as anything!" Glimmer's knocked my shoulder. "Surely you've had a little moment with some slave you cuddled too close when staying warm?"

My front hooves rubbed together as I sat up, surrounded by some eager faces.

"I, um, I haven't."

Glimmer blinked. "Never?"

"Nope."

"Not even a little cheeky thing close to it?"

I just shook my head. Glimmerlight seemed a little stunned, as did many of the others. Then she clapped her hooves. "Ideal!"

Wrapping a hoof around me, she patted my pocket with the statuette in it.

"Then why don't you tell us all... what you would do? Lets see, you thought that little Stable Dweller was cute, huh? What about if it were her?"

Oh. Oh my. My cheeks went bright red. The room seemed to be more than a little spinny right now and I was finding it hard to find the words to tell them why I wouldn't say! I just bit my lip.

"Um, oh. I don't know if I—oh dear..."

I spied the still full shot glass before me and in a bid to escape sitting awkwardly, I downed it to pass a few extra seconds of thinking and...

The taste rolled down through my body and up into my head. Liquid fun? More like liquid courage!

I stamped a hoof on the table to balance my shaky body and rose onto my hind legs upon the seat.

"Well... first...!"

The table threw up their hooves and cheered.

Best. Birthday. Ever.

"I don't want to set Filly on, um... fire?"

"Yeah, that's the word!"

"Yay! Okay, okay."

I cleared my throat.

"I... just want to start a flame in someone's heart!"

What a night. We stumbled and rambled through the ruins of the park to return to the Mall. Glimmerlight trotted back and forth dizzily while leaning on benches and walls to see her through. Me? I lay on my back atop Brimstone (who seemed still utterly unaffected despite drinking four times what we all had), waving my hooves in the air and singing my heart out, with Glimmer doing accompanying vocals!

"In my heart I have... how many?"

"One! One big fucking one!"

"...one big fudging one desire!"

The Mall wasn't far ahead. Even as I giggled between lines, I could see it looming up before us as we came toward it. We had left only after that bottle had been drained. Glimmer had disappeared with the buck not long after my grand tale of passion! Brimstone had been the one to decide when to leave and sent me to find Glimmer.

I'd found her all right. I'd trotted, crawled, staggered, and scooted back to Brimstone to pass on the most important message she'd ever asked me to deliver. 'Gimme ten minutes.'

"And... that one big fluffing one... is you..."

"Last bit! Last bit! I think..."

"I know! I'm... I'm building my voice! I just had a lot of whiskey remember! Add up the shot glasses into full glasses! I had... had almost a half! Whiskey champion!

I hiccuped, sliding off Brimstone as I unsteadily found my own hooves to limp alongside Glimmer the rest of the way back to the Mall. We leaned on each other for mutual support, both belting out the last line that we could remember.

"...no other s-s-somepony... will dooooo!"

The main doors fell open before us and we both collapsed to the ground in a giggling heap.

"I see you all were taking advantage of Master Red Eye's generosity to its fullest, then?"

I looked up, I saw Protégé standing there in the main corridor. He bore a saddlebag as though ready to leave for somewhere. We struggled and slowly got ourselves back up, Glimmerlight eagerly smiling at him.

"Hey, hot flanks!" She laughed out loud, offering me a hoof to lean on. I giggled and took her up on the offer. Oh, she was funny! She called him hot flanks right to his face! Hah!

Protégé seemed to blink with surprise, his usually stoic look dropping into one of mild confusion, before rolling his eyes and shaking his head.

"I suppose every worker needs their time to let off steam. Brimstone Blitz? You will make sure they get to their proper accommodations? I see you at least can hold your drink."

Brim nodded. Glimmerlight blew a raspberry at Protégé. It looked fun, so I did it too. Then she began to trot on. I noticed Protégé looking at me. Oh, he cared that I couldn't trot! He always cared about all of us!

"You... you..."

"Yes, Murk?"

I slumped forward a little. I had wanted to pat his shoulder but slid to the ground and suddenly could only reach a kneecap.

"You're my favourite master ever."

"I'm... glad you appreciate my methods, Murk. Now, I think perhaps you should be in bed."

He trotted on, nodding a thank you to Brimstone as he picked me up again. I spent the time back to the shop cell humming aloud. Soon enough, I felt myself placed onto the sofa. By that point, my mind was simply reeling and the walls were all going spinny, spinny, spinny!

"C'mere, lil'bro. That was a great birthday."

I felt her pull me into a little mutual snuggle. I'd have agreed with her.

But I had already fallen asleep.

Forget Wildcard. Forget Barb. Forget Shackles.

Now I was properly suffering.

In the haze between sleep and the waking world, I felt myself spinning and my whole head contracting into a tight, little thumping ball. I'd been briefly woken up earlier when Glimmer had risen. Somehow during the night I'd ended up flopped over her stomach sideways, and her movements to shift me off when waking up had led to a brief murmuring asking her to let me die in peace.

Only now the living world wasn't going to let me do that any longer. With a long groan, I let my crusted eyes creak open, and attempted to stir each limb into motion for movement. Hooves flopped and padded at the sofa and ground. Just... just move off it and—

I fell off the sofa, taking the blanket with me as I went. Rubbing my aching eyes, I gradually sat up and began to trot unsteadily toward the door, gasping for breath from a dry throat and a churning stomach. Oooh just kill me now. I could feel my barely healed wounds surging in pain as I moved. Perhaps a night like that wasn't the best idea even with a contained megaspell being my saviour.

All three of them were sat in the front of the store. Coral and Brimstone looked no worse for wear, while Glimmerlight rested against the wall nursing a little bowl of likely lukewarm soup. Her mane was a bit of a mess, but she still managed to look over and laugh as I staggered with dead eyes into the room.

"Uh oh. Looks like somepony is having his first post-birthday hangover!"

"Aaawuuughbya..." I responded.

She shook her head and laughed. "Come on. Protégé got them to fix and refill the fountain with better water. Go get yourself some of that and splash your face. I kept some food back from their morning handout for you."

Coral nodded in agreement, giving me something of a 'Why do you think I left early?' look and nodding her head to the fountain. Carefully putting one hoof before the other, I made my way out. Passing the shop's mirror on the way, I had to actually grimace as I saw myself. My eyes were sunken and glazed over, my mane and tail messed beyond quick repair, and even my wings looked a little ruffled.

"If you're wondering how I stay fairly normal, Murky?" Glimmerlight spoke up. "Just put it down to experience. Oooh that was a good one though. Seeing you smile, having a riot, letting loose, and ending it with a new 'friend' and some 'relief'... just what I needed after all that stuff recently!"

Coral rolled her eyes. "Because I clearly needed to hear that."

"Aw, c'mon! It's just a bit of fun."

I left them to the minor disagreement. Clearly they still had a little ways to go yet before they truly saw eye-to-eye, but part of me couldn't help but feel that they'd gotten better around one another.

Ow. Don't think too hard, Murky. Drama later. Cold water now.

As I trotted, I couldn't help but think on last night though. I couldn't remember too much. Everything came back in little spurts of memory. I remembered smiling a lot, getting lots of hugs, nopony cared about my wings, I'd danced...

Hehe! Maybe it wasn't that bad.

I stopped for a second, a certain little vision flickering into my head.

They liked my drawings! I showed the rest, getting lots of 'Ooooh' on each of the really good ones.

Blinking, I groaned and put a hoof to my forehead. Oh, please tell me I hadn't really done that! I trotted onward to the water, squinting at the disorganised order they came back in. How had I gotten back here again? Oh yeah, Brimstone had carried me. We'd met—

"You're my favourite master ever."

Oh no. Had I really... I had, hadn't I? My face sank as the nerves really began to kick in. How could I... oh dear! Leaning on the edge of the fountain, I just wanted the earth to open up and swallow me who—

"Well... first...!"

My mouth gaped open, before I simply gave up and dunked my entire head into the fountain with a groan of unending embarrassment, leaving my hooves hanging off the concrete lip. I was doomed. Cool cool water. At least you didn't judge me!

I felt my mane drift on the surface as my face cooled off and startled my senses into proper awakening. I could have sat here for hours, separate from the world until everypony hopefully forgot last night before I did.

Only, a sound caught my ears underwater. A single word that came through muffled. I ignored it. Water was good. Water understood me.

Then it came again.

“...urk!”

Wait. Was that..?

“Murk, would you please sit up out of the fountain?”

It was him! Gasping, I shot out of the water, coughing a little as I flopped back onto my rump and rubbed my eyes.

“S-s-sorry.”

Protégé glanced to the side with a light sigh before offering a small grin and a shake of his head.

“I see you’re awake at last. All rested up?”

I nodded vaguely, then immediately regretted moving my head.

“Excellent. You see, the shifts all start in ten minutes...”

“What.” Every part of my face drooped. Oh, he had to be kidding!

“...but,” he quickly continued, “I was coming to make you a brief offer. I have a task that needs accomplished in my own service. It would keep you away from the factories or whatever they have slotted for you all in here. If you would perhaps prefer that?”

Holding my head in a hoof, I tried to scowl but perhaps only gave a meek turn of my nose.

“Last time you said that I almost got killed in a Ministry. I d-don’t like being somepony’s personal slave. It never ends well.”

“This is why you’re hesitant to my offer then? Well allow me to tell you exactly what I am asking first. It is not dangerous, rather, I just wish you to fetch me something from an old building across town. We were near it yesterday, in fact, when I found you. An old library near the pegasus skyport? I have need of a new reading lamp and I am not particularly supposed to leave this Mall until Shackles returns.”

My eyes blinked and opened wider. That library I’d seen? The one my PipBuck had...

“Yes!” I piped up, hopping to my hooves. “I, uh, I’ll do it!”

Surprised by my turn of opinion, Protégé gave me an odd look before nodding.

“I am glad to hear it. It really is as simple as that, Murk. Besides, I doubt the clanging of a factory’s power hammers would be particularly good for you right now. A nice, quiet library could be just what you wanted?”

All right, that I couldn’t deny. Sucking it up, I nodded to him. “Okay.”

“Thank you, Murk. Have you given my offer any further thought?”

Ah...

“Well, um... I—not really. We, um, we were sort of busy since I left you...”

“Believe me. I saw.”

Wincing with embarrassment, I tried to cover for it.

“We, um, we were just celebrating my birthday, is all.”

His eyes opened a little wider. “Your birthday? I hadn’t known. Many happy returns, Murk. I hope this easy task will give you the best of a break you can perhaps get in Fillydelphia. Be back before dark, however. Good day.”

He turned to leave. Breathing a sigh of relief, I sat down against the fountain to contemplate it all.

“Oh, and Murk?”

Protégé had turned back. I looked up. He smiled thinly before trotting on.

“Favourite master?” I suppose it’s good to know I’ve made an impression.”
There was a brief pause as he left... and then there was another splash.

In the back of our shop, I took the time to dry out my mane with a somewhat dirty and half-ruined towel. It did the job at least. Beside me, Glimmerlight was starting to work on our inventory that they had been carefully hiding in the walls and floor. We had a bunch of spare brass casings Glimmer would turn into explosive lockpicks, numerous cans of solidified oatmeal or packaged gruel. The water skins had been slyly filled from the fountain. Brim had brought back a few picks and shovels under the pretence that he didn’t want anypony else using ‘his’ ones. Nopony had argued.

Aurora’s files were stored beneath the sofa while I’d sewn the maps we’d stolen from Protégé’s office into the cushions. When the slave market had come yesterday, not only had the others bought things for my party, but they had gotten a few little essentials. An old lantern now hung from the roof. Innocent enough perhaps, but necessary for use in the metro system. Spare clothes and longer cloaks for the wasteland outside were now hidden under Glimmer’s pile of scrap while she had stocked up on spark batteries and various other parts I couldn’t hope to guess at.

“Library visit, huh? So long as it keeps you from trouble it sounds good to me, Murky. Pity we can’t all go for it though.”

She sat sorting through some wires and little glowing gems welded to small boards as she spoke. Throwing on my fleece again and strapping on my battle saddle (plus little crosshair thanks to Blunderbuck), I sat down to buckle on my PipBuck. It may have just been a library, but I wanted to get used to moving with it all on anyway. Even as I tugged the last buckle shut, I felt Glimmer’s magic lay my goggles on my head.

“Now before I forget, c’mere.”

“H-huh?” I felt Glimmer lightly turn me to face her. Just like me, her eyes were a little hazy from last night, and we both likely still stank of alcohol and body sweat from the bar. Yet she smiled and leaned in with her horn glowing. What was she—

Something moved in my mind. All the little memories I’d been feeling coming back to me gradually over the course of the morning flooded to the surface and flowed somewhere. I didn’t forget them, but I knew they’d gone somewhere else, like a copy. I closed my eyes and felt oddly relaxed, her magic weaving through my mind gently and soothingly. Eventually, Glimmer gasped aloud and sat back with a little sweat on her brow.

“Whew. That was a long one. But here we are.”

“We’re... what?”

With a grin, she held up a small glowing orb. It sparkled with a distinctive light green.

“It’s last night, Murky. Alcohol, it doesn’t so much change you as just lower inhibitions. How you were acting? I have a feeling that’s the kind of pony you wish you could be. Happy, smiling, and laughing without a care in the world. Now you can feel it as many times as you want. Just ask me and I’ll take you into it. Let you relive the happiest night of your life.”

The memory orb dropped lightly into my hooves, where I just stared at it. What a gift...

“Th-thank you.”

Sometimes, those two words were truest when simply left to themselves. I put my hooves around her neck and tightly squeezed.

"You're welcome. Now you better get going. You want to be out of here before the shift leaders arrive."

I hesitated. "There is, um, one thing? Protégé, he, um, he gave me an offer. I... I don't know how to really describe it but, uh—"

"We all want you to do it."

"Because he, uh... wait, what?"

I looked up, but Glimmer just leaned onto the sofa from where she sat on the ground.

"You're a real chatterbox when you're drunk, you know that?" She grinned. "We'd all discussed it long before you got up and we all want you to take up his offer. Look, we know it means you'll be away from us, but we can't let Shackles get you again! He'll be back here after today is done and we need a way out for you now. Don't worry about us, we'll get by. Without you he might even leave us alone too."

"I... I..." I really didn't know what to say as I stared at her. She really was being genuine.

"This gives you a chance to see what you can do, Murky. We'll all get away from him eventually, and if you can convince Protégé to somehow make it happen it'll be great. We won't be separate for long. Do your best and see what you can do from the outside. If you stay here we'll all just get locked down again."

"Okay..." I nodded. "But I'm not leaving you here at all. He-he wants you all away from him too. He says all the slavers are fighting this really weird game to try and get things. I'll... I'll try to find a way to get you all out too."

"I know you'll manage it." Glimmerlight squeezed me back and set me down. "Now run along and don't think too hard about this. We'll be able to see each other before you leave to plan out how we're going to do this."

Allowing a smile to come to my face, I clambered away and moved for the door. Yes, Glimmer was right. I might be away from my friends for a little, but I would have so many more opportunities if I helped Protégé. I could try and acquire my friends back from under him! Yes, that was better than being with Shackles again! I wasn't any help to my friends stuck with them.

Also, last night was the pony I wanted to be? Able to joke? I got an amusing thought.

"Hey, um, Glimmer?" I smirked back at her from the door.

Seeing my smile, she leaned on the sofa with one hoof.

"Yeees?"

"Last night, when I came to fetch you before we left the bar?"

"Yeeeee?" Her face clearly showed she was wondering where I was going with this.

"Were..." I giggled to myself. "Were you really going 'woohoo'?"

Thankfully, even with a hard hangover, I managed to dodge out of the room and away from the shop cell, laughing, before she could catch up with me.

Unfortunately, the thick air of Fillydelphia, with all its chemical stink and ambient heat, was not particularly good for a pony with either a life threatening taint infection or a strong hangover.

Me? I had both.

It wasn't particularly far to the library, but the journey had made my head pound and the dryness in my throat feel all the worse. By the time I was coming to the same street, I was more than contemplating finding a secluded little spot to curl up and sleep for a few more hours.

Something in me decidedly did not enjoy doing more slave work. I was free of my own mind now and openly able to dislike it without feeling guilty. No wonder I'd made such an awful slave. My cutie mark meant the very opposite thing! I knew this was building to something worthwhile now. I wouldn't be doing this forever, and at the very least I was getting a step away from Chainlink Shackles.

Truthfully, knowing that Protégé's offer was there had been all that allowed me to forget about that monster if for but a while. The thought of someday having to confront him ever again made me shiver to my core. Free or not, that slaver...

Beep!

I stopped, looking down to the PipBuck. It continued its beeping while I saw the same symbol flicker onto the screen with much more clarity now. Three balloons that then faded to an arrow. Glancing up, I could see the library just ahead of me.

Well, here goes nothing.

A small layer of stone steps led up to the scarred, wooden doors. The closer I got, the more my PipBuck beeped until finally cutting the sound once I passed some unseen threshold.

What was I even doing here? Those balloons meant Ministry of Morale! That pink freak's merry band!

Even as I opened the door slowly, I knew that the answer was all too easy to come to. Simple curiosity. This group had taken Sundial and now his PipBuck was sending me to something related to them. If I could learn anything about what happened to him...

With an almost stereotypical creak, the door slid open and slammed shut behind me. Echoing the sound into the dusty interior, I let my eyes adjust to the darkness in here before taking a better look around.

A grand floor swept before me, filled with small working desks or circular benches right up to the lines of bookshelves that filled the walls. Below me, a large mosaic of Celestia and Luna led up to a low podium for lectures, and behind that, a great stairway that split and arced up to either side. It led to a balcony of bookshelves in a circle all around this large main room. Beyond the stairs on the ground level, I could see a librarian's desk and staff book returns.

Taking a glance at my PipBuck, the arrow was pointing directly forward and to the right. Somewhere behind the stairs on the ground floor, I bet.

Each small clip of my hooves echoed dryly, the mostly intact structure cancelling all outdoor noise. The lack of ambience was just what I needed. A break from the clangs and hisses outside that so hurt my head! Hypersensitive hearing was not a boon post-alcohol, I was finding. This place would at least let my head settle for a while during my search.

I had a job to do before any hunting for old secrets though, so I approached the desks. Most bore a smashed reading light that clamped onto the desk and plugged into something beneath the carpets either side of the mosaic. I checked six before finally finding one that—

I heard a laugh.

Spinning around, I flicked out my saddle's mouthpiece. The crosshair pinged up before my eye and I stood ready.

Nothing.

I was sure I'd heard something! A clipped laugh in the distance, something likely only my hearing would have caught! I waited at least a few minutes, keeping watch with both sight and sound while feeling the sweat of terror drip from my forehead.

Absolutely nothing.

I turned back to the lamp and started to unplug it, warily glancing around me. It came off easily and folded into my saddlebag. Only as I touched it did I notice it bore a lot less dust than the others. For that matter, so did the seat. In fact, there were a stack of cleaner books beside it as well along with others littered on the floor.

I slowly began to realise why Protégé knew this place had reading lamps.

Looking at this one lonely seat in the library, I genuinely began to wonder just how lonely he was in Fillydelphia that he would have come to sit alone in this library. Every time I saw him it was like he was seeking somepony. Once, I'd thought it was simply his interest in seeing me begin my journey to freedom, (Two years, yeah right) but I remembered every time he had been staring off somewhere. Every time he seemed deep in thought when I would meet him. Like he just wanted ponies to share in his vision. Or was it something more specific?

Shaking my head, I decided to take a couple of the books as well, moaning under my breath about my stiff joints and rebelling stomach when I leaned down. Whatever drove him wasn't a concern of mine. He had made his choice.

Job done, I turned again to the back of the library. There was something back there and I couldn't deny I wanted to know. For Sundial's sake. Trotting like a ghost, I hunkered down and softly stepped one hoof at a time around the staircase to the staff desk.

That laughter came again, a sort of giggle followed by a snort.

Ducking down before the staff desk, I closed my eyes and shivered. What was I doing here? This was stupid! There was some freak out there pulling me in with temptation! Yet I could not simply turn and go! That arrow beckoned me on the PipBuck! The laughter was muffled and distant, it could be some stupid sign outside for all I knew!

Beep!

I squeaked myself as the PipBuck, well, pipped up again. The arrow flashed and changed direction to be flickering to the left now. Around it, I could see a map open up on the screen, showing there was indeed deeper corridors in here. I walked under the staff door's ledge (noting with some annoyance that I didn't have to duck at all) and followed the arrow again.

Beep!

It changed to the right, sending me down that direction again. I passed between lines of moulding papers and ancient books that were never resorted into the main library. I couldn't help but notice my wings were flicked out slightly as though ready to suddenly flap and lift me away.

I reached a dead end. Ahead of me I found the back of the storage area with piles of disorganised books that were knocked free from the staff shelves in the blast. I saw posters above the walls bearing images of Twilight Sparkle and other unicorns joyously reading, whilst others bore a zebra glancing over the shoulder of a young pony reading a black and white book. Even without reading, I admired their ability to tell a message through simply the art of the poster, despite the racially charged meaning.

Then something caught my eye. A single book left on the shelf perfectly still.

Beep!

The arrow seemed to be indicating toward it. I should have been questioning. I should have been running in fear to get my friends. I should have been worrying and thinking, but after everything that had happened lately, I simply knew I couldn't go back to being like that. It was time to pony up and do something for myself to make a discovery!

Reaching out, I pulled the book from the bookshelf. Or rather, I tried to.

With a thick grinding of metal, it jammed out before sticking where it was. I retreated quickly, diving behind a bookshelf as the whirring of machines picked up. Pistons churned and a gear turned with rusty squealing as I saw the entire bookshelf judder and move. My mouth fell open when it began sinking into the floor before having to groan and clutch my head. Noise! Too much noise for a hangover!

Groaning and holding my mismatched ears to my head, I simply curled up until the noises stopped ringing in my head.

With a clatter of mechanical movement, the shelf finally stopped moving. Carefully, I opened my eyes.

A small corridor behind an already open metal door lay before me. Rather dark, it led to a set of steel steps heading downwards similar to that of the ghoulish bunker in the crater. Standing stock still, I simply didn't know what to think. Should I? Was I that curious to see? Anything could be down there. That laughter could be down there!

Beep!

The arrow flickered forward. With a brief look on the underside of the PipBuck, I saw my open shackles interlocked with Sundial's own mark. I couldn't turn back. He had disappeared just as I almost had. I needed to know what happened.

Buckling it back on, I trotted down the stairs.

That laughter trickled up the stairwell as I kept going down.

My hooves moved slowly, taking each step carefully to avoid any creaking or slipping. If something was down there, I was going to sneak up on it.

Gradually, the stairs ended. Blinking until I got used to the darker nature down here, I saw the corridor widen out almost immediately and uttered a low 'woah.'

An entire secret base was down here. There were offices to either side with half-height walls and glass panes showing right into them. Each was filled with terminals and overturned desks, and coated in streamers or balloons that limply lay upon the floor. Walls bore the symbol of the Ministry of Morale, terminals had some inscriptions or strangely pink glows on their screens, and I could see (and smell) the stench of a long-decayed trolley laden with cake and chocolate ahead of me in the walkway between offices.

Of course, what remained of the staff were down here too. I tried not to look at the bones that flopped over desks or chairs in front of still functioning terminals. Some lay under rugs at the side of the office in neat rows. They must have tried to survive down here with no way to get rid of their dead safely.

Turning away, I tried to steel myself. I couldn't get too distracted. I would just find out what this PipBuck wanted and then get the hell out of here!

Gently, I trotted close to one of the walls and gazed around. Every so often, I saw huge poster holders bearing pieces of paper and marked photos of ponies in front of several chairs. Even without reading I could guess this was some place where they had once secretly tracked certain ponies. The thought that I might find where they brought those ponies terrified me to the core.

I dove under a table, my ears picking up the traces of sound again. It was so much closer! Anypony could have heard it now! A laughing that descended into a mad giggle and a satisfied sigh. The sound wove through the dead offices and past the silent bones. Then I heard another brief snicker even closer than that.

Carefully, I poked my head out. It was in here! It was in this very room!

Yet I saw nothing.

Trembling, regretting coming here, I dared to step out.

"Naughty, naughty pony! You aren't meant to be here!"

Stopping dead, I let my head slowly turn to look the other way.

It hovered there. A little steel ball of a sprite bot buzzing silently in the air! No wonder I hadn't heard it. Those things made no sound at all when moving. Since I'd last heard its noise the machine had flown right by me without me knowing! Now it stared down at me.

"I don't mind though. Wanna play hide and seek?"

The voice was bright and chirpy, the kind of voice I imagined Pinkie might have.

My mouth stammered open. "I... I..."

"Okay, I'm 'it' first! Get galloping! I'll count to ten!"

It would have seemed harmless, had it not been for the small energy blaster that started whirring and protruding from the bottom of the chassis. Clearly this thing's definition of 'tag' was very different from mine! Scrambling up, I galloped off in the first direction I saw!

"One!"

Damn it! Why couldn't I see over the walls to find an exit!

"Twooo!"

Rounding a corner, I saw one door and struggled to push it open. The lock mockingly clattered in its almost broken hole.

"Th-Th-Th-Th-threeeezzzzzzzzh-TEN! Ready or not cheeky ponies, here I come!"

What!? That's cheating! I pulled at the lock and finally felt the satisfying crunch of the thin wood snapping beside the door frame. Joyful, I pulled it open to leap inside and—

It was a cupboard.

"Give me a f-f-flowering break!" I virtually screamed before turning to find another way. Behind me, the sprite-bot floated idly around the corner and spotted me galloping off.

"There you are! Ha! Ha! HA!"

The last shout came along with a flash of pink and a burning energy flaring right by my ear to atomise a chair ahead of me in the cramped office chambers. Screaming, I leapt onto and over a desk to avoid the next two blasts that slapped into the wood. On one hoof, the fact that it was only a sprite-bot was something of a relief compared to the nightmares of what that laugh I'd heard from upstairs was. On the other hoof, it was a sprite-bot that wanted to kill me!

Coming back to the main corridor that ran down the centre of the offices, I spotted the way out.

The sprite-bot had other plans. It whizzed out over the office desks and planted itself right in my way before charging its blaster again. I saw it leak some sparks and judder in the air through an electronic laugh.

"Nuh-uh-uh-uh-uh-uuuuuuuhFFFFKK."

I took the chance to flip out my saddle's mouthpiece and take aim. Blunderbuck's welding had proven true, for after setting the crosshairs over the sprite-bot and pulling the trigger, I saw the grapple whip out and slam right into the little metal nightmare! Rebounding from the casing, the hook itself knocked it clean from the air with a dull clang and let its blaster open fire into the wall with a spray of pink sparks.

No time to wait around. I turned and galloped down the office corridor until I found a way out, using the few seconds I'd bought myself to put some distance between me and it. Behind me, I heard the blaster firing wildly and that voice asking me if I was having fun yet. I must have knocked its voice box on that impact, for the tone was more robotic and monotone now.

Great, only I would have the luck to make it more scary!

Exiting the office, I found a few enclosed rooms and another stairwell. The thought of being trapped in the store cupboards or likely interrogation rooms was too nightmarish to think about, so I took the stairs. They curled around into a darker level lit only by sporadic lighting. On my left, I saw a medical symbol of butterflies and dove inside. I just hoped this was far enough to lose it!

After a brief period of hiding near the doorway and listening, I heard it still chirping away in the corridors above me and judged it safe to take a few seconds to hunt. The cupboards and drawers were all pretty empty, but I managed to find a new set of scissors for my sewing and a couple bandages to add to our growing inventory. To my delight, the old fridge contained a half full bag of RadAway, something I eagerly poured into my canteen. I'd need it by the time I got out of here, or was that just the alcohol on my throat? Urgh, Glimmer's parties could wait till I was out of Filly from now on.

"Wheeeere are y-y-y-yooooou? Hehehe! This is fun!"

A hoof shot to my mouth to hide the squeak of fear. That thing had been so silent coming down the stairs I hadn't even noticed until it was right outside! Pulling myself inside the fridge, I heard it bump against the door frame.

"You're r-really good at this!"

It was in the medical bay! My hoof gently kept the loose door shut. Please don't somehow notice me. Please, PipBuck, don't beep!

But there was no sound. None at all. In a way that was worse. What if it had just given up and was waiting outside the fridge! Oh dear, there was nothing else for it.

Biting my lip and trying not to whimper, I peeked out.

Nothing. It had gone. Breathing out at last, I trotted out into the room again before heading to the door.

"Won't you poke your head out? I wanna see you grin!"

It was upstairs again! I wasted no time in getting out of the room and delving deeper into this strange, hidden bunker. I could see a crossroads up ahead, but the path directly in front was blocked by a collapsed corridor in this apparently more unstable area. Watching behind me repeatedly, I moved across the buckled floor to see what was left or right.

Immediately to my left, there was a gigantic metal door bearing a brass seal of three balloons about ten feet down the corridor. I could see a terminal beside it but otherwise no way in. The other way looked and smelled damp, but at least had someplace to go. Warily checking behind me again, I began trotting that way.

Why was my PipBuck bringing me here anyway? I'd found Sundial's skeleton with the PipBuck itself, so what was dragging me in? A part of the broken PipBuck? I noticed the ground felt wet and I realised I was trotting into a slowly deepening liquid dropping from a broken pipe further ahead.

My ears perked up a little at an unknown sound: a mad clicking from my PipBuck. Huh? What did that mean?

Lifting it, I glanced into the PipBuck itself and saw it telling me nothing. It hadn't done that before. The symbol of balloons hadn't disappeared so what was... it...

My eyes fell to the water beneath me.

Glimmer had fixed the rad-warning. Oh cupcakes, I was in radiation!

I turned and galloped back the way I'd come, splashing through the water. Screw all of this! I was going to sneak by that thing and get out! This was too much now. I wasn't going to die of radiation down here from a leaky pipe! I was—

"I heeear you!"

I turned the corner back to the stairwell corridor again and saw the horrible sight of that sprite-bot wandering down it again. Seeming to hop with joy in the air, it began charging the blaster.

"I r-r-really am good at tag! I should have to-oooooo-old you!"

"Don't! EEK!"

I dove away down the other side of the corridor and curled away from the pink blasts flickering past into the wall. They left smouldering little holes in the thin metal that dripped slag to the floor. If that got me—oh no!

Scrambling to my hooves, I turned to run and slammed right into the huge blast door bearing three balloons. Oh please open! I started pressing every button on the terminal I could, only to have a cross looking Pinkie Pie shake her head in a two-frame animation at me from the screen accompanied by a rather loud honk of denial.

"OH COME ON!"

I bashed the side with my PipBuck. Come on, please!

"Coming to get you! Hehe! Nopony wins! I'm so good at tag I bet I would be the-kreeeeeee-champion!"

I fell with my back against the door, seeing the sprite-bot round the corner joyously and spin around to face me.

Another voice echoed around me. Male and robotic, it accompanied a sudden hiss of hydraulics.

"PipBuck unit confirmed."

Before I even knew what had happened, my frantic pushes back against the blast door led me to fall right through it into a pitch dark room. Rolling as fast as I could, with pink jets of energy spearing after me so closely that I felt one whip through my mane, I tried to scramble out the way. Immediately, the door slammed shut behind me, and cast me into darkness.

Lying still, patting out the small fire in my mane, I just slumped down, took a second to get my breath back, and swigged my RadAway, while making a mental note telling me to have no more adventuring when hungover. My head... RadAway did not agree with my stomach right now either.

Gradually, I brought myself to my senses again to take a few deep breaths and start to get up.

My eyes took a few long seconds to get used to the darkness, but I could see I was in a huge room just by a far off, tiny light. Clutching my complaining stomach while I stood, I began to look around. I could see vague shapes, but nothing distinct.

A beam spotlight snapped on, pointed directly at me. Yelping and closing my eyes again, I staggered back and peered out from under my hoof. Lights sprung on all around the edges of what I now saw was a circular room. Photos of a certain pink pony surrounded by neon lighting flickered into life and floor lights lit the borders of the room.

Only they weren't what took my attention. Yes, I could have seen the piles of balloon boxes, stuffed pony toys, and wooden candy canes against a wall. I could perhaps have seen the desk bearing that same tri-balloon symbol on a brass plate at the back or the masses of little tins across the floor near it. But my attention was rather more focused on the colossal cannon that now swivelled on the spot and pointed directly at my face. I had nowhere to go!

Pointed directly at me, the cannon fired.

I wasn't an expert on weapons, but the sound was unlike anything I'd ever expected. It sounded a lot more like the little thing Blunderbuck had fired last night at the table. A small, concussive force knocked me clean over onto my rump as shrapnel bounced and landed all over me.

It didn't hurt. Wait, I was alive?

Opening my eyes, I saw colours. I was covered in streamers and little paper flakes. The feeling of something striking me had been balloons that now floated above me.

What kind of cannon was that?

Even amongst my bewilderment while sitting back on my hindquarters, I couldn't quite bring myself to understand. I heard a little clink nearby as one of the balloons knocked something above me. Confused, I looked up to see the balloons had hit a suspended basket of little bouncy balls that now fell into tubes and pipes strung up onto the ceiling. I watched them twirl and cross over on their journeys. Eventually, they all began to reach one point within a basket that was slowly weighed down until it dropped.

The motion of it dropping pulled something at the side of the room up and let a large pink and yellow ball roll out across the room. It struck the side of the desk and upset a balanced pen that rolled into a mousetrap. I winced as it went off and set alight a whole process of strange 'coincidences' that carried all over the room and grew into chairs falling and stuffed bears being catapulted over my head with precision that would have made acrobats jealous. The whole room became a mass of activity until it all concentrated back in one epic movement of flying teddies and toy whirligigs whizzing across to the desk to all land in a huge toy chest behind it. Before my astounded eyes, the entire thing leaned forward under the weight, bumped the chair, and sent a fragile looking sphere rolling down a track that lowered from the ceiling.

I knew that sphere, and I could guess now what it would land on.

The moment it hit the holder, a little spark of light formed from within it and grew into a spiralling galaxy of shimmering gems suspended in mid-air. Whirling out from the orb they moved erratically and yet smoothly until they concentrated in one spot and glowed brighter. I knew the sequence now, following the recognisable shapes as they formed. A pink glow that solidified and wove itself with twinkling lines and patterns. Lines, curves, and shapes before... before...

No. ooooh no.

The shape of a pony with a poofy mane and rounded face bearing a gigantic smile came to. I shivered at the sight of her appearing. Pinkie Pie!

She looked at herself, as though no doubt feeling a magical sensation while recording this. Giggling, she looked up and directly at me. The shimmering lights shifted as she drew a deep breath and opened her eyes wide.

Wait, what had surprised her? What was she so happy about—

“HI, MURKY!”

I blinked. Then I blinked again.

Then I simply pitched over and fainted.

Gradually, my eyes blinked and squinted. The darkness fell away from visions where I felt myself letting go of somepony else. Of sitting down and closing my eyes with the last sight that of somepony watching me. Then of being carried somewhere. Was that my mother? Was it Glimmer? Coral? Protégé? They were too small to be Brim.

Then my eyes properly opened and it all evaporated. Another dream cast to vague memory.

Instead, I found somepony else watching me from above. Two huge sparkling eyes made of tiny star shapes gazed down from above and blinked incessantly.

Pinkie Pie.

My own eyes shot open. Scrambling so fast my scarcely healed neck and chest flared up in pain. With a yelp, I shot back and away from the pink demon!

“G-get away from me!”

“Are you okay, little Murky Wurky? Cos’ you just fell over there really, really hard and hit your head.”

I kept moving backwards when she trotted forward. No... no, forget this, I’d take my chances with the sprite-bot! This thing was talking to me! I got to my hooves, turned around, and made to gallop. Only the moment I turned, she was right in front of me.

“And I know that hitting your head can make you go all woozy and crazy-eyed, like this!” Her eyes swivelled and rotated in their sockets. “So I just thought I’d make sure you were all right! I used to take chocolate to make sure I was fine after I had a fall, cos’ the doctors say that stops shock, you know? I know all about chocolate, and cakes, and all the wonderful things they do can do; as well as being yummy in your tummy!”

“Y-you know me! How can you talk to me!?” I virtually screamed it, backing off to crash into her desk. They were just recordings! “Stop following me everywhere!”

The pink pony snorted and laughed out loud, rolling on her back before darting to her hooves again and skipping toward me.

“Aww, but I told you before! It’s my Pinkie Sense that lets me know what’s going to happen before it happens! Sometimes it gets really crazy and I’ll do something even I don’t understand, like this! Right now, I’m just talking to my desk and really, really hoping somepony called Murky will be doing all the right things for what I’m saying! I sent him a letter before when I felt an itch on three and two-thirds hooves!”

My breathing wasn’t calming down much. Had I actually died and gone to some crazy land? The letter, though. That was all that gave any sort of proof that this somehow made sense, by not making any sense at all. Why when I had a hangover?

“S-so you predict the future? So you’re, um, predicting what I’m going to say and do before I, uh, say it?”

Her head nodded frighteningly quick.

“That’s riiight! See? You aren’t a dumb little pony even if you can’t read or write, yet. I did this because I realised there were things I knew you wanted to ask and some things I needed to tell you! So I left little clues around to get you here, like a scavenger hunt! Did you have fun?"

At this point, I was terrified to disagree or inquire about exactly how. I nodded warily, and she beamed widely, the pink glow from the memory spell orb's form of her casting right over me.

"Goodie! The PipBuck, the letter, the little signal, and the picture of the balloons! I knew you'd get it!"

"The PipBuck? The-the arrow?" I looked down at it, before realising this was sort of what I had wanted. Answers! "This is Sundial's PipBuck! You took him away! Arrested him!"

"That's the smart bit! Let your old Auntie Pinkie explain!"

She reached out and dragged me away from the desk to trot beside her, one hoof around my shoulder. Then I stopped, and realised.

"Y... y-you're touching me..."

"Course I am, silly!"

"HOW!? The others! They couldn't touch me! Memory projections can't touch ponies!"

'Pinkie' merely rolled her eyes. "Eh, they just weren't trying hard enough. Now come on, I gotta tell you all about little Sundial!"

I just blinked and quietly decided to shut down the logical part of my brain for now. It was better not to be thinking too hard, for my own sanity's sake. Feeling her grab my hoof, I was dragged at high speed across the room before a little projector screen. Hopping back into view, I saw her lift a small pointer stick with her mouth and clap her hooves. The room darkened and I heard the projector spool up.

Before me, a sepia-toned image of Sundial popped up. The picture had been taken as he wandered in the front door of a small home.

"See, we spotted this cute little buck early on when some of those nasty zebras started talking to him! I felt so sad that he had to do what he did to try and help his marefriend! But we couldn't have our itty bitty secrets going to them, no no! But then we got a better idea!"

The projector clicked and changed. I saw a mass of small huts and tents in rows. It looked a lot like some sort of refugee camp. I sat in silence, partly through interest and partly through terror. I took this time to try and come to terms that Pinkie Pie was effectively here with me. Why my life?

"Fillydelphia's a really cool city! It's got awesome big machines that go chunk-chunk-chunk and sometimes even woowoo! It makes lots of the big fancy things we use, but it also meant that the zebras also kept trying to get stuff from it! All the ponies like me in the Ministries saw things going missing, like so many refugees in these camps. Poor Fluttershy was heartbroken, and I just kept trying to send her gifts to cheer her up."

It changed again, this time to Hearts and Hooves Hospital. Even in the pre-war era, it looked mismatched and in dire need of renovation.

"But then all these other ponies went missing too! One of the really big surgeons here called Doctor Heartcare disappeared for weeks at a time! That was so naughty that even the bigger doctors like Flowerpot and Weathervane started trying to get me to find him! Only Weathervane was out so often with Dashie and the Shadowbolts that it was hard to get a chance to see him!"

Heartcare... but that was the Magister in the ghoulish bunker Brim and I had found! What did he have to do with this? The slide dropped into darkness between pictures and blew up another of the Wartime Manufactory.

"Then even workers here started to disappear! Some talked about how they'd gotten better jobs but nopony ever saw them again! That's why we caught little Sundial. We were watching the factory for the missing workers when a sprite-bot saw him. They're so useful and cute! I just love the music they play, don't you?"

"Uuuh, yes?" Disagreement was not something I wanted, even if one had just tried to kill me.

Her face went shockingly wide with happiness. "Thank you! Nopony has ever said they liked them before!"

"N-no po—ACK!" She had grabbed me and given me a hug so strong that two hundred years apart it still nearly crushed my ribs. Gasping for breath and wagging every limb that had lifted from the ground, I realised that Brim had competition in strength! Sucking in air as she dropped me, I heard the slide change again.

This one was Pinkie with her hoof around a visibly terrified Sundial.

I could relate.

"I got him to go on a super special mission! He wanted to help Equestria and I asked if he could become a double agent for us! How cool is that? He would go and speak to the zebras again, give them things only we gave them, and become one of those workers that I guessed the zebras were taking!"

The slides shut down and the lights came back on. Bewildered, but beginning to take a breath and accept at least the immediate reality, I stood up and looked at Pinkie. I was seeing a different pony. For all the posters and scary watchfulness, she seemed childlike and playful, despite being much older than I was.

"B-but what's this to do with me?"

The question hung in the air, a rare silence from Pinkie as she looked at me and clearly thought about how to answer my question.

"Murky, you've probably guessed by now but there was something really, awfully bad going on in Fillydelphia! That's what I wanted to find, but I knew that I couldn't do it on my own or give it out to too many other ponies. There's a big nasty thing happening in Manhattan I need to go deal with so I had to make Sundial into the pony to try and deal with it and bring it to my attention after he had proof."

Sitting down, she actually looked a little sad with her ears drooping down and that playful tail resting upon the ground.

"There's so much going on now that I can't do it all, Murky. See, I had this really big weird out moment and my Pinkie Sense told me that I needed to take some extra special precautions! Sundial wasn't the first pony we'd sent to try and find things in Fillydelphia, but I hoped that because he was just a normal pony he might stand a better chance than an obvious trained pony. Even then I knew that whatever the zebras were up to or building with stolen ponies, we might not figure it out or get rid of it forever!"

Her hooves grabbed me by the shoulders, leaning her nose in to press against mine and tapping the side of my head.

"That's where you come in!"

"M-me?"

"Even if Sundial gets word to us and we stop it, there might not be enough time if anything really bad happens! That's why I needed to make sure I had somepony in the future who could pick it up to stop really bad ponies getting it! This might be a lot smaller than the big things we all need to deal with right now or that are going on elsewhere, but that doesn't mean it's not important! If all my old friends worked together we'd find it easy peasy, but we're too far away and busy to see each other these days."

I needed a second. Moving away from her, I trotted for a few seconds just to think. My mind just wasn't settling. So, this weird pony could see what was going to happen in the future, and had set up all this because she knew I'd find Sundial's PipBuck to act as some sort of insurance against something bad that would be left untouched in the event of balefire warfare?

A two hundred year insurance. One that I was meant to be in the grand scheme of pony history?

Suddenly, I felt very small indeed.

I couldn't deny it made some sense though. I had certainly seen these clues, just I hadn't figured they were all related. Magister Heartcare. Fluttershy mentioning missing refugees. Sundial.

Like the star shapes I'd once seen, it was all linked. Now somepony who had looked into future times had seen that I would know these things and chosen me to act as some sort of 'next in line.'

"I..."

This was insane.

"I just... I don't know."

I heard her trot up behind me.

"I'm really, really, reeeeally sorry for all you've been through, Murky. I know sometimes it gets real sad, dark, and lonely. I had to work on a rock farm too before I learned to smile! But I'll always be there to try and get you to learn how to as well! This is really important though. Sundial cared a lot and it could—"

"I just want out." I spoke quietly, turning to her. "I'm sorry. I'm no hero or anything. I just want out of this place! It's taking all I have just to do that."

Pinkie put her hoof to her chin and looked in deep thought.

"Well, I guess you didn't see my other little clue then, did you?"

"H-huh?"

"Didn't you see the little Pinkie-bot telling you where the way out was? I left it in an old, big cargo box that was so big I could hear myself echo in it!"

I stopped for a few seconds. I had—yes, I had heard it! List Seeker had sent me there before Barb's gang found me! What had it said?

"It said... 'the way out is just downstairs'..."

I thought I was remembering, but I saw Pinkie gurning as she twitched her legs and repeated it with rather frightening accuracy.

"You were telling me..."

"Uh-huh! Every scavenger hunt has gotta have a clue! Those zebras got out of the city somehow, those sneaky things! Every time we almost caught them they went underground into the metro and the tunnels!"

She was right. They couldn't leave above ground. The plan we had must've been on the right track! They had some sort of route out of the city down there in the metro! Briefly, I couldn't help but remember how Aurora had some strange goings on down there too. Coincidence? I thought not!

"So, Murky! If you take on this super Pinkie Mission, it'll lead you to the way out by the end! You were already on the right track, this'll just point you in the proper direction and make you the one to find whatever got left behind by the zebras and take care of it before anypony bad gets it too! It'll take you to the way out, ending all this forever. You'd have got there anyway, I guess but... I figured you needed to know it."

She paused, looking more sincere and serious than I'd yet seen her.

"Sundial believed in it. You've been so like him up till now."

Pinkie was right. Something about this felt right. I had been following Sundial's story, the least I could do was see how it ended and help finish what he had started before the spells fell upon Equestria.

"How many ponies have there been on this task?"

"Oh, before Sundial? Five! He was the sixth. This has come a long way, Murky, and if we can stop this now and get you your freedom because of it, that's perfect!"

"Yeah. Perfect."

I looked off to the side. Try as I might, I just couldn't comprehend this at all.

"Aw, c'mon Murky! Get that frown upside down!"

"Not exactly easy in the city these days. Pinkie, I don't know how much you know, but I don't even know if I'll get there! I can dream and believe but it's so hard to smile, and feel confident about it! Sure, part of me feels better now, that even if I die and don't achieve it, I'll have died trying. But I don't want that! I want to be free and feel it all! Live a life! I've never had the chance to truly feel happy. I'm not even sure I know what it actually feels like."

"Pfff."

I stopped dead in my ramble at her blowing a raspberry. How disrespectful! I was opening my heart here and—

"Course you do, silly! Here, let me show you!"

She reached up, standing on her hind legs and clapped her hooves loudly.

"Come on, bots! Get your voices on and come out to show him!"

I heard the vents open in the room. From within them, a low hum sounded. Growing in volume, I realised it was music. Bouncy and happy music. All around us, I saw sprite-bots float in. Arcing around in the air and between the laid out presents or candy canes, they bobbed and formed into big circles that constantly rotated around both of us with that music growing in volume! I fell closer to Pinkie, who only smiled and threw a hoof around my shoulders.

A quiet murmuring began to spread as more and more of them entered the room.

I recognised them! They were all the strange video screen ones I'd seen stalking me everywhere! They were speaking as they came, a low chanting chorus among them. Pinkie herself joined it, spinning us around to see them all, as three circles of sprite-bots floated in opposite directions around the room, all facing into me!

"Come on little Murky, smile smile smile..."

The screens began to light up. Each fizzing as they began to show me footage just like how Shackles' captured one had. I stood breathless in wonder as I saw myself in every single one of them.

"Fill your heart up with sunshine, sunshine!"

I was laughing coming down a helter-skelter, shouting with joy and my front legs in the air. Landing in the pit at the bottom, I upped and smiled directly at the sprite-bot's camera before trotting on with a spring in my step. Another had me skipping in circles inside the Ministry of Image, delighted and happy with finding Littlepip's trail and a massive goofy grin on my face.

"All you really need's a smile smile smile!"

I was standing in Weathervane's office, smiling as I glanced at his picture of Sundial with a warm and gentle happiness across my face. Then I was with Unity as we chuckled and shared glances at my journal while huddled together under a piece of scrap.

"And everything will be fii-iiiine!"

Each sprite-bot joined in, growing in volume higher and higher as Pinkie whirled me around to see each screen one at a time. I saw me sitting up, my wings outstretched for the first time since I was a foal. The look of delight upon my face indescribable! The bots swirled and turned on the spot, almost dancing in the air as they chanted and sung, repeating themselves on the same chorus. Pinkie swung me to face her, her voice picking up.

"Give a perfect grin for me! Just smile as wide as a mile! You'll be as happy as can be!"

One more spin and I found myself facing one sprite-bot that had come forward. Upon it, I saw it staring through a window. Inside, above a sea of laughing and cheering ponies, Glimmer and I danced hoof and hoof atop a table as they all chanted and stomped in time with us. I was just having fun, carefree and happy. A glimpse of the life I had been having without ever truly remembering all the good times.

I heard them chant again, growing in volume every time.

"Smile! Smile! Smiiiile! Smiile!"

"Come on and smile, Murky! You've got a beautiful smile! One of the best I've ever seen! Why don't you do it more? Look at it!"

Her voice in my ear when I simply saw that last clip from the Roamer felt so familiar. Almost exactly like something Glimmerlight had said to me long ago. Under the chants, under the persuasion, I felt a grin come onto my face. We had a way out for sure! The secrets of the past would light the way if we could simply discover that path! Sundial would be my guide, the story I'd always been following and was always meant to follow!

I would be free!

What was there to not smile about!?

Spinning around, I leapt up and spread my wings as best I could, letting it grow upon my face before finally exploding into being. A huge beaming grin from ear to ear. Pinkie's face seemed to explode in joy at the sight, cheering aloud.

"That's it! You just have to smile! Sing it!"

"I..." I laughed. "I just have to smiiiile!"

"That's it! You just have to smiiiile!"

"I just have to smile!"

We continued like that under the ongoing chorus of the sprite-bots for a while, before simply falling over from dizziness, exhaustion, old injury, and hangover all at once into a giggling heap. The sprite-bots gradually filtered away.

"You're not as creepy as I thought you were, Pinkie. Hehe!"

The pink pony snorted at the odd compliment and rolled back to her hooves, helping me up.

"We've got enough problems, if I can make a pony who really needed to learn to smile do so, I'll do it! That's my thing!"

"Thank you, Pinkie..I see why it's important. For me, for Sundial, for everyone I care for."

I stood more upright, my neck up proper like Weathervane told me. "I won't let you or Sundial down. Me and my friends, we'll find the way."

Pinkie almost looked sad for a second. "Isn't that always how it works, silly? Hehehe! They'll wonder where you are. Go give them a hug for me! I've got serious business to get back to in Manehattan!"

Across the room, I heard something unlock and a portion of the wall slid open to reveal some stairs. I could see the sparkles around Pinkie Pie's star-shape form beginning to fade and flicker. The memory orb was ending. She looked with wonder at her own hooves.

"Oooh. Well, this is it. Off you go, Murky!"

"Thank you... for watching out for me."

I reached forward and Pinkie bumped her hoof into mine. She giggled once more.

"I told them all. Pinkie Pie was going to watch over them forever."

Her immense grin became a more genuine, caring smile as the apparition of a pony slowly spread and warped into a little orb of its own, that faded from view back into the sphere and left a few words lingering in the air...

"I meant it."

I simply stood still for a few seconds. A lot had happened and been revealed, but I just gave a quiet moment of respect before moving off. I was confused and filled with questions, but also a purpose and drive. I had regained my life, my free will, my wings, and now my drive. The world that had took so much away had given them back out of the laughter-filled past.

Without really knowing why, I felt a few tears drip from my eyes as I looked back from the stairwell.

I simply saw the orb sitting on its holder and heard the sounds of smiling music fading and echoing away into the dark future around me.

It was approaching later in the afternoon as I returned to the Mall.

I hadn't rushed. Aside from feeling stiff, an odd sense of melancholy had overtaken me upon seeing Pinkie's shape fade away. Every time I looked up, I would see a huge balloon, billboard, or some poster announcing her presence. Pinkie Pie was gone forever, but she had lived up to her word. Seeing the future, she had prepared for me and what I would need.

Somehow, despite the terrifying thought of some benevolent force watching me across history, I felt strangely reassured whenever I saw those eyes watching me now.

I didn't return to the plaza immediately. Instead, I went directly to Protégé's office. I knew my friends were likely out on shift still and I had no wish to sit alone. Ragini was waiting on guard and wordlessly opened the door. Avoiding her gaze, I simply trotted inside and closed the door.

"Ah, Murk. You are back."

Protégé sat at the window, leaning back into the frame with a book hovering before him. With a little surprise, I saw it was the Daring Do one from before. Seeing me looking, he merely smiled and placed it down.

"We all have our escapes."

I offered a small nod, noticing the small hint in his words. Sitting down before his desk, I began to pull the desk lamp out, only realising now that this was likely why he was using the window rather than his desk for light.

"I, um, also saw these beside it. I don't know why I brought them."

I dropped the books out too. Trotting around his desk, Protégé picked one up.

"Ah! Applied mathematics, my my. It has been a while. Thank you, Murk. Judging from how relaxed you look, I imagine the library did you good?"

After a second, I simply nodded. "Yes, you could say that."

"Excellent." Protégé had turned to a smaller desk, fitting the lamp to it and plugging the magic wire leading into a tiny generator that sat in the corner. With a small flick, an amber light shone in the darker room.

"Um, Protégé? I thought about your, um, offer." I bit my lip, watching as he turned one eye to me even whilst sorting the new books. I couldn't help but notice he wasn't wearing the eyepiece. "I'd like to take you up on it, if it's still open."

If I had to choose a word to try and describe the 'ever hard to decipher' look on his face, I would have gone with relieved. Protégé sat a book on the small desk in front of a bench and placed a hoof to his chest.

"I'm glad you say that, Murk. I promise you as early as we can we will investigate getting your friends out too. For now, it will give you ample time to recover by acting as my assistant and aide. Truthfully, I just want you safe from Shackles. You can stay here in the spare room over there and you will remain under my protection."

"Thank you."

Protégé offered a small grin. "Now don't go thinking this is a holiday. You will be expected to still be my assistant. To be up and preparing my things for the coming day, to take needless busy work from my schedule, or to keep things organised. I'm sure you won't have a problem with that. Think of this to get you away from abuse as my gift to you."

That didn't sound so bad, even if the newly found will to never be a slave again in me hated the thought of doing anything for anypony. He was just doing his best and despite myself, I giggled a little and actually seemed to surprise him.

"A gift? You mean a birthday gift?"

Protégé laughed and shook his head, sitting upon the reading desk bench.

"No, Murk. A gift for you saving my life. No, no. This is your birthday gift."

My eyes shot open in surprise. He shifted in the seat to face the desk in front of it and pat the seat beside him on the bench.

"Come here, Murk. Sit down."

A little confused, I did just that. In the amber light, I saw him turn from me and open one of the books I'd brought back with me between us. It was just filled with words that meant nothing to me.

"Now..."

Protégé flipped to a certain page before turning back to me.

"...I believe we should start with the alphabet."

The Great Game

"It is of no use. They have never seen us as equals and they never shall."

"Was it any different, being his assistant?"

Different from what?

"Slavery."

Well he didn't strike me or shout at me. I guess that was better...

"You don't really sound convinced."

Of course I'm not. Slavery is slavery and I was still having to respond to his beck and call. The difference was I was knowingly disliking it and wishing not to have to do so. It felt more open or even honest if you want to call it that. I was a slave who didn't want to be a slave, kept by a master who didn't want to have to be one.

All the same, I can't deny that, from a sheer practical level, it was a massive improvement. In one clean decision, he'd saved me from Chainlink Shackles and the inevitable nightmare that would have descended upon me had I went back to him. Me being free from him, albeit still in the machine of Fillydelphia under Protégé, meant that I could focus on other things.

"Like getting your friends away too?"

Yes! I hated leaving them behind. There was a lot of guilt but we all knew this was for the best. With me away and with Protégé admitting he wished them free as well, I knew that I had to find a way to smuggle, steal or otherwise acquire them from him. Be it simply sneaking them out or finding some way to make them Protégé's stock as well didn't matter, it was simply a race against time before anything happened to them.

Glimmerlight had tried to calm me by saying he might leave them alone with me gone, but we both knew that wasn't true. They would likely suffer the hardest shifts and the worst attentions if I didn't get them out quickly. If I had to come back to even one of them... gone...

S-sorry, just a... yeah, I'd try to find a way, yet there were other advantages, too. With my newfound freedom by Protégé's side in his work, I would have access to the logistic hub of Fillydelphia. I made it my intent to steal and 'misplace' as much as my gleeful little thieving hooves could manage from the supplies or information contained there. Anything would be helpful for the final effort.

Of course, there was one greater prize than that.

Pinkie Pie's spell orb had shown me some of the truths to look at and help point me in the right direction. We'd been right about the metro being our salvation. Having that confirmed was a wonderful feeling. A way out was specifically built into it that zebra spies used to use to escape the city. If we wanted to use the metro, our best bet rather than aimlessly digging through infested caves was to find whatever it was before Shackles and his slaver 'council' managed to locate what they were looking for down there.

I had more than a suspicion that whatever Aurora Star was making there had something to do with all this. I may have been a dumb, uneducated pony, but even I could put two and two together with at least a moderate chance of getting four. The Ministry Station, I was betting, held the way out. At the very least it was linked into it.

Of course, that left me part of the intrigue that had been running through the slavers long before I even arrived. One that had sought to tear the mall away from Protégé and kill him off from the running. Now to find my own freedom, I had to aid a slaver against his enemies.

Then simply hope that he and I wouldn't come to a confrontation over our real objective in the end...

"Murk?"

There was a voice attempting to stir me. I didn't want to hear it. Right now, I was safe, comfortable and warm. No, no I didn't want to listen to any voices. Hazily, I could sense a thick blanket over me.

"Murk, wake up."

The words cut through the sleepy haze and forced their way into my warm little world. Oh just go away, I was so comfy here, the most I'd ever been in my life. I was having a really good dream as well. Let me go back to it. Lazily, I lifted a hoof out from under the warm covers and waved it to send the intruder away.

Annoyance taken care of, I drew it back in again. With a grateful sigh, I twisted further into the covers and tried to drift back into that same dreamland again. That was better. Now, Miss Pip... where were we?

"Murk, if you don't get up right now I shall have Ragini fetch a pail of water from the fountain."

Wait... huh?

With a sudden shock of reality, I felt everything annoyingly melt away to leave me staring at a blank beige wall and lying in a bed with the biggest sense of not wanting to move I'd ever felt. Shifting reluctantly under the covers I sat up and wearily opened my eyes.

The sight of Protégé standing by the bed was enough to drop a figurative dash of cold water over my mind. Bolting upright, I rubbed my eyes.

"I... huh... wha?"

His eyes narrowed.

"You were supposed to be up an hour ago, Murk. The tasks I set out for you this morning to arrange things have already been done. I trust this won't be an ongoing problem, will it?"

Even as he reprimanded me, I just kept rubbing my mane with my hooves and across my forehead to try and wake up. After my first lesson on reading (something I'd had a lot of trouble with) he had shown me to the spare room in his office area where I'd found, for the first time in my life, a real and proper bed! It had thick covers and everything, giving me perhaps the best night's sleep in my life had come from it. Unfortunately, that same comfort had now led to me oversleeping.

"Sorry... really really sorry, mm... just tired..."

"So I see." Protégé sighed and turned to the door. "Get yourself ready, Murk. We must leave the Mall within the hour if we want to dodge Shackles returning. I've picked out a few things we'll be taking with us, so be ready to carry some bags. This is your job now after all."

Carrying out the soul crushing movement of leaving the warm covers, I swung myself to the edge of the bed and reached for my fleece. The room was little more than a bed, a couple of shelves, and a bedside table, but it had been all I'd needed to feel comfortable for once. I hoped there was another like it where we were going.

"I'll, um, be up in future. I promise!"

"Don't worry, Murk. I'm not going to punish you for this, merely ask that you keep better time in future. Besides, I'd be something of a hypocrite if I did."

Turning back from his office, Protégé offered a small smirk.

"After all, I did the exact same thing on my first day as well. Now hurry up. We've got places to be."

Stumbling down stairs and veering from side to side in the corridors I had to quickly question Protégé's perception of a 'few' things. Two saddlebags were draped over my torso bearing books and scraps of paper alongside my own small amount of belongings while trying to carry the replaced reading lamp around my neck. The fact that Protégé trotted on with neater and smaller saddlebags only fuelled my annoyance. He'd said that it hardly cut a good impression upon those he needed to communicate with to be doing it himself.

Not for the first time, I cast an aggravated glance at him as he trotted so much easier than I did under all this weight. Apparently, this was the life of an assistant. At the very least it wasn't as bad as the factories or carts.

"We will make for the FunFarm, Murk. The logistics hub is off to its side, and there are a few errands to run across to the Alpha-Omega Hotel as well in service of our Master."

'Our' Master, Protégé? Try yours.

Really, I'd found it almost strange to so easily rebel quietly in my mind since my own revival. It was fast becoming a source of strength that I could do so and feel confident that I meant it than all the pondering of resistance I'd done before. Those days were over.

We travelled downstairs, Protégé reading over a small notebook as he went. Slaves passed us as they were directed onto the first shift of the day by Shackles' own followers. I couldn't help but notice the glances they gave Protégé the moment he was past them.

Truth be told, he was confusing me more than ever. Since his return, he had seemed more dedicated than ever to Red Eye to the point that he was willing to fight some sort of shadow war against slavers within the city to try and maintain the status quo. Yet at the same time, I'd see occasional glances at me or passing slaves. He truly wanted a better life for them. All the things he'd said before we went in to battle Barb felt so much more important for trying to understand this peculiar pony now.

More to the point, after admitting our plan and even asking him, I had no idea where he really stood. He didn't try to help us directly, but he wasn't exactly trying to stop us either. He wanted me free, but simply seemed too wrapped up in his own dreams of a better world for everypony under Red Eye to do anything about it.

What about yourself, Protégé? What about yourself?

Reaching the bottom floor, we moved out to the main corridor where Protégé stopped me.

"Ragini should join us soon. I'll be sending her on ahead with some instructions prior to my arrival. You can rest for a minute or so."

I didn't need told to be twice, the saddlebags dropped the moment I heard the word 'rest' spoken. The procession of slaves were still trooping out the doors into the street ahead of us and I could hear others being gathered behind. If I wanted a chance, it'd have to be now.

"Protégé? Could I go say goodbye? You said I'd get a chance, remember?"

Still looking at his notebook for a few seconds, he lifted his head up and seemed to think before responding.

"Yes, I did. You've got five minutes, Murk. You'll find them just outside the plaza, if I remember the schedules right."

"Thank you." I didn't waste time in cantering off toward the plaza. I knew the part he meant. It was just outside the guard room where we were often organised for the actual shift divisions. Upon arrival, I could clearly see them beginning to troop out and Brim's head rising well above the rest. If any of the guards gave thoughts to bringing me in, they immediately kept any thoughts quiet with Brim around.

"Murk." He nodded briefly as I trotted up to him. I found myself trotting to one side, staring at the hole where his eye had once resided made me feel awkward. The fact that this didn't seem to bother him that much spoke volumes about the raider mentality toward injury, and expectations of their life.

"I just wanted to come and see you all again before I left with Protégé. To say thank you..."

"Mm. You've said it about forty times now since you woke up in the hospital, and I'll still say the same thing. We weren't going to let you go. If I have to accept what I am and direct that to protecting others then that's something I can be happy with. Coral Eve was right, giving up in some last rebellious instinct isn't worth it. I hope you see that now too."

"I do..." Sniffing and nodding, I briefly placed a hoof on his leg. "I just hate leaving you all."

Brimstone snorted a little, clearly not quite as sentimental when it simply made sense for me to get out of here when I could. Sometimes I found it hard to really judge that cold, practical intelligence he had.

"So long as that kid can keep to his word to protect you."

I wanted to tell them that I at the very least trusted Protégé's word, even if I was still unsure where his loyalties truly lay, but my ears instead picked up a bit of a commotion approaching. One all too familiar.

"It doesn't even matter!"

"Yes it does! You come out all high and mighty to me and say you're trying to be better, and then I find you stripping it out all over again!?"

"I'm not forgetting it! It's just... just not how I want to see him!"

Brimstone only now began to hear it too and turned his head as we both saw Coral and Glimmer coming near the doorway out of the plaza. Coral Eve was pointing a hoof accusingly.

"It's an addiction! The entire point is you don't think it matters for just one little thing! You've gotten so used to doing it that there's always that temptation! You don't have any will to resist that for all your words!"

"Seeing him lying dead in a hospital bed was just destroying me, Coral! I... I didn't even sleep last night, I just kept seeing him again and again!"

Glimmer was half pleading and half arguing, but Coral just stomped a hoof and bared her teeth.

"Perhaps if you hadn't spent last night screwing some buck you likely don't even remember the name of while drunk off your head, you might remember him being alive again better! You say you can handle the truth of the past, but you can't even handle remembering a friend almost dying. How are you going to cope with seeing our friends and family butchered on the earth of Creaky Hollow?"

"I will! I... I'm trying, Murky's helping me and... and..."

I could only see this firing up further. I galloped in between them.

"Please! Stop arguing!"

Both immediately turned as they heard me.

"Coral, she is trying really hard. I... I've seen what she's seen. It's not easy but she's trying!" I turned back to Glimmerlight. "But I'm here, I'm okay. You don't need to strip memories, please..."

There was a small moment of silence between them as the tensions simmered down. Clearly neither wanted this little moment of goodbye to be filled with argument. Sighing deeply, Coral cast a look at Glimmer that communicated all her bitter disappointment and turned down to me.

"I'm sure she is. Are you leaving now?"

"Uh-huh, Protégé's just waiting for Ragini before we go off to work."

Glimmerlight took a few moments to suck in some air after their exchange, only now joining us.

"At least you'll be safe, lil'bro. Just remember what I told you, we all wanted this for you. Something even Coral and I agreed on."

Clearly seeking some common ground for the moment, I saw them share a reluctant nod.

"I know... and Protégé says he wants you all away from Shackles too. He's going to help me find a way, and if he gets any way to demand some slaves he'll do it. We won't leave you behind."

"That's good, Murky." Coral seemed a little dubious, but any hope was better than nought. "We'll be safe enough, we've lasted this long remember? You concentrate on what you need to do. Now come here..."

She leaned down, giving me a tight embrace for a few moments.

"Just remember you're a free pony now."

"I will..."

"Good."

She let go, trotting on by to leave me with Glimmerlight. She looked somewhat ashamed, lifting a small orb from her saddlebag.

"I'm sorry, Murky. I... I just couldn't stand lying awake alone and seeing you like that over and over... I... I know I shouldn't have. I just, well..."

I didn't give her time to fall back into losing hope, simply moving forward and hopping up on my hind legs to hug her around the neck.

"I think you'll do it, sis'." The words were about as comforting as I could think up on the spot, but feeling her hooves wrap back around me as she sat down to support herself I knew it at least meant something. "I know you can."

Gently, I felt her stroke my feathers on my back and saw her try to smile again. "If you can do what you've done, I'll keep going as well. Go make us proud."

"I'll try."

Both standing back up, I met her eyes and saw her push a smile through again. "Just look forward to us getting to check out all the cool stuff you nick from them and sharing all the little drawings you do when you're away. It won't be long I know, but it'll all be better for this. We're on the upswing, Murky. Look on this as a chance!"

Nodding firmly, I smiled back. Yes, this was going to be a big boost to us!

"So I've got three tips for you!"

Blinking, I cocked my head to the side. Huh?

"Tip one! If you can get me a proper gun repair kit I'll be able to maybe fix up some of the stuff those idiots throw away thinking it's broken. With a quick scrapyard visit we could get some real weapons then. Tip two! If you're in logistics, see if you can't get some travelling bags from the wagons. A few things like flint, weather cloaks, and water filters could go a long way. Oh, maybe even see about some proper explosives too, just in case we need to blow our way out. Stash it all somewhere we can get to afterwards. Sound good?"

Grinning at the sound of all this wasteland stuff, I nodded. "Real good! Um... you said three hints?"

I grinned. She positively beamed in return, shoving all her worries back to let my last little moment with them for now be a happy one. She bent down to my ear.

"Tip three, showing just enough to make them fill in the rest themselves is better than showing all."

I blinked for a few seconds. "What... what does that mean?"

"It's a tip to stick with you forever, Murky. It'll bring you a lot of fun if you live by it! You'll understand someday! Now, off you go."

Shaking my head and chuckling, I hugged her once before and turned to go. There was just enough time to stop and wave to the three of them as they entered their lines, exchanging a brief goodbye.

Be safe my friends. I won't let you linger long.

Showing just enough... what on Equestria did she mean by that anyway? What did that have to do with anything?

If getting down the stairs from his office was bad, this was worse.

Protégé was taking the direct route, cutting across small alleyways and larger roads alike to reach the FunFarm. Even on such a strange direction, my own route was somewhat more meandering under the weight of packages and bags slumped over me. Staggering from side to side every few feet, I desperately tried to keep the lamp from falling from around my neck while balancing his armour's breastplate on my back between the saddlebags.

In hindsight, why couldn't he have just worn it? For all his intelligence, he certainly could be impractical at times!

"Now, Murk." Protégé dropped his pace back as we entered the last road up to the FunFarm. "There is something I need to go over with you before we go here. You won't like it, but it has to happen."

"I'm not going to have to wear chains am I...?"

He shook his head. "Of course not. However, there is a bit of an expectation amongst many of our peers in the higher ranks that workers understand their place. I'd rather you not receive their ire, you will have to call me 'Master' when we are around others. Can you do that?"

I couldn't hide the look of annoyance on my face. With my cutie mark's new meaning in my mind, I didn't want to call anypony that ever again! Seeing the look on my face, Protégé only sighed.

"I know after all you've told me that you don't like it, Murk. Think of it just as a disguise if you really want to. It's just to keep them off your back. You are my assistant, there is a lot of emphasis put on rank within this place, and in these times ponies are more insistent about who lies where than ever."

His face turned somewhat more serious.

"If you fail to do so, I will have to reprimand you about it. This is my world in here, I cannot be seen to be weak or losing my authority."

I sighed. "Okay..."

"Okay, what?"

I almost stamped the ground in frustration. "We're not even there!"

"Yet there are, I count, eight overseers to our immediate right resting outside that old wagon park station. What if one overheard? That word can spread, Murk. Every ounce of perception matters these days, and I don't have many neutral parties in my favour as it is. You will address me by the title, Murk."

We had actually stopped, staring at each other briefly, a conflict of identity already starting to form. He'd given me a chance to get away from Shackles, only to turn around and request that I call him my master now around anypony else? Make them think I was some slave all over again? It was like he didn't even care how I felt now!

Unfortunately, he was always going to win a stare-down of willpower. I knew Protégé was right, if anything it would help me, too. Be the grey pony, don't stand out and become a centre of attention. That could aid me as much as annoy me...

"Okay, master..." I muttered from the side of my mouth.

"Better, Murk. I cannot afford any problems today. There is a power gap to be filled, those of higher rank are to nominate the candidates to fall in line behind Stern in the seniority of Fillydelphia. The mare who holds it currently is soon to pass away. The moment that happens, nominations go down for the replacement. This is a crucial moment in Fillydelphian politics."

"Wouldn't Red Eye put you in?" I saw his eye glance at me. "Master..."

"Master Red Eye cannot dictate everything, Murk. Slavers need some outlet, some source of control on their lives. They are not ponies who like being simply subservient, rather the other way around. If they feel they can rise in seniority or affect who does, it helps placate them. Make no mistake though, it's hardly as democratic as it sounds. From Master Red Eye to Stern to whoever tends to be the strongest among them usually. This will be the first time the system has been tested since its inception, I'll explain more to you later on how it works. Now come on, we're almost there."

The trot up to the FunBarn caught me by surprise. I expected us to go in through the main door or even the side entrance I'd once used myself. Instead, Protégé took us around the side of the gigantic pink building (Just smile...) to the somewhat less highly decorated rear. I'd never seen this side of the FunFarm before, the way it stretched out with hastily constructed materials to form a corridor linking into a nearby warehouse. Red Eye clearly had at some point outgrown the FunBarn's limited space and connected it to the nearest building he could to better house all the organising required for such a vast operation. The link between them was heavily guarded and sectioned off, as though this warehouse behind it was part of the FunBarn itself rather than just a handily positioned expansion outside the FunFarm's fence.

"This, Murk, is the logistics hub for Fillydelphia." Protégé indicated the warehouse. "The FunBarn's big, but it gets mostly used for scientific study and data these days. The logistical demand long outgrew it and we now use this for all the incoming and outgoing food, water, medicine, ammo, and materials checking and distribution organising."

A huge chunk on the side of it had been roughly cut away, acting as a massive open door. Inside it, I could see scaffold formed into shelves that slaves wandered between, their errands following designated letters or numbers mounted on the sides and glancing at sheets of paper. Behind them lay stacks of crates in a perpetual state of movement. Some were being dropped off, others filled by the slaves trawling the shelves for items, a few were being emptied and packaged into smaller boxes upon carts, and other larger boxes planted onto armoured wagons.

"Everything you see here is either being directed to where in Fillydelphia needs it, or addressed to where out in the wastes requires it. Those workers are filling in any missing items or removing extras for stockpiling. We can't waste anything by risking over or under supply in this city, Murk. Not that it doesn't still happen..."

We trotted through the organised chaos of the warehouse floor. True to his usual manner, I could see no whips lashing or canes beating. Most of the slavers stood around barking orders at the very most. Judging by what I knew, I could see the slaves in here were, if anything, rather content compared to what else they could be doing in Fillydelphia. One even hummed to himself without being told off while he wandered the shelves and looked for something amongst empty ammo boxes.

The little part of me that took glee in 'acquiring' things for myself was rather beside himself with imagining running riot here taking things for our effort. Or just taking some of this stuff in general. They had everything! I could see glue sticks, tools, light bulbs, empty bottles, cutlery, clothes hangers, and even stacks of freshly printed paper from the Ministry of Image's presses!

"Sir, I've got what you requested."

A shadow falling across me as the female voice spoke led me to turn and find Ragini having bounded over upon our entrance. Casting a glance to me, she handed a clipboard to Protégé.

"How you doing, flightless?"

The name felt like an old habit she simply spurted out without thinking of her own situation. Struggling to not dare move my wings and indeed to keep my eyes from her own mangled appendages, I just coughed and shrugged.

"All right, I suppose..."

"Try not to bring any of your calamity into here. The workers just spent all last night clearing up after a feral ghouel somehow got into the stock room." She almost grinned. "Knowing your reputation for trouble I almost would prefer a horde of them to whatever events seem to follow in your wake."

"I... h-huh?" I had a reputation?

"Don't tease him, Ragini." I could almost see Protégé grinning as he read from the clipboard and waved us both over to a large office filled with slavers and workers around a low and wide table.

Ragini simply grinned and winked at me before I followed them in, not knowing quite what else to do. Why were griffons so weird? Yesterday she hated me, but today she was just joking with me. Was this some sort of coping mechanism, or did she perhaps see me as someone who could even vaguely understand what she was going through, despite what she'd said? I kept an eye on her as I entered the bustling room, noticing the way she paced on her talons. Like she was ready to spring any time. Even without her wings, I knew she would be an agile and lethal combatant.

Very quickly, I lost track of what was really going on with this meeting. Protégé bent over the table, seeing the swathes of files laid out over it. Massive maps were pinned to the walls, showing all of Equestria. I tried to flex my new knowledge from last night and read some of the locations but at most I got a couple of the earlier letters. Somewhere with an 'f' had lots of lines coming out of it, likely Fillydelphia, given it was probably the hub.

Protégé, Ragini, and the slavers chatted repeatedly over timetables and supplies. I heard them talk of tons of food, daily munitions productions, and caravan pricing. It almost seemed more important than working in the Mall, but it was easy to see there was no true value here. Protégé had been reduced to merely a supervisor of keeping things running than any real position of power. A thankless job. Maybe that was why he wanted this nomination thing so badly...

"Krrzzztch... stupid thing on?"

"Yeah, I—kzzztch... out right now. Need to—kzzztch—as I can, dark room below."

I blinked a few times, looking down at my PipBuck. I'd had it left on near silent to hear any news updates with my ears without disturbing anypony else, but other voices crackled through it. Tapping the buttons a couple of times I tried adjusting to another station (Pinkie, really, you don't creep me out as much now but your music station still drives me to insanity) but the voices remained. After a few seconds they clipped out. Probably just a wayward frequency, it wouldn't be the first time I'd heard such a thing.

Something else caught my attention though.

"What about the attrition rates?"

"They've gone up, sir. With the salvage teams resuming their work and the extra power needed from the materials in the crater, the personnel's been burning fast."

That caught my ear. Sitting up from the side of the room, I trotted to his side and found myself standing around a fierce debate of how to best allocate ponies as resources around Fillydelphia. Protégé argued for safer tasks until they could build numbers again, whilst others pushed for greater exertion in light of 'coming threats from above.' Really, it was all over my head, but I glanced at the files below my nose with some interest. I had to hold my stomach as I saw some photos among them. The corpse pits I'd once hid in, a brutalised team exiting a Stable bearing technical prizes, a new machine in a factory driven by wasted ponies...

"Sacrifice must be made, but I will not send another fifty workers onto that deathtrap of a journey to Everfree until we can afford enough hired guns to get at least thirty five of them there, Mudball!" Protégé's voice cut in sharply, directed at a dull brown slaver across the table. After a few moments of silence, I saw him nod and back down. Protégé had won this exchange.

"Yes, sir. I'll see if the Hoof Beater's are willing to take a cheaper contract..."

"Good. The rest of you, start lining up the supply train for the journey and organise the distribution of food. We'll need to reduce rations until they can break into that processing plant's vault. The FunFarm workers have the most right now. I hate to take it from them, but it's the best we can do."

"Sir."

They all backed off from the table and took their notes. Gradually, they left one by one, leaving only a half dozen slaves in here carefully checking the lines between settlements on the maps along with the three of us. Sitting down with a sigh, Protégé wiped his brow.

"Every meeting is like a struggle for power now, they're all looking to get one over you every step of the way."

Ragini nodded curtly. "I caught Mudball openly dissenting against you being assigned here when I arrived. I think he believes he should have been made supervisor instead. I could get him in the locker room and remind him to—"

"No, no Ragini..." Protégé actually chuckled. "That won't be necessary. Now, we have work to do, Murk? I want you to... Murk?"

He had seen the look on my face. I'd been waiting for my chance to speak, standing looking at him with a more than a little distaste.

"Reducing rations to the FunFarm?" As much as I could, I tried to sound angry. "I know how little they get and it barely kept us alive as it was. How can you reduce that?"

I honestly felt disappointed in him. I'd just listened to them debate how best to exploit us slaves for their industry's end. It was Fillydelphia in a nutshell and everything I hated about it! Ragini shot me a stern look but Protégé only turned to the table, tapping it.

"Sometimes sacrifices need be made in Fillydelphia, Murk. There simply isn't the supply to go around. It's—"

"Horrible!" I moved up to the table, drawing the pictures across. "How can this all be justified? How can you just pick and choose who gets what and always put your own things before the slaves? I don't see slavers eating worse! Why don't they get rations cut? Why always us? I... I mean, look at all of this, it doesn't make sense!"

I expected a reprimand, I expected him to shut me down or Ragini to simply slap my mouth shut. Other slaves around us turned to look, as did some slavers from outside. Seeing them looking, Protégé waved them to keep working and turned back, looking genuinely interested.

"How does it not make sense?" Protégé motioned with a hoof for me to continue. "Go on, say your piece."

Oh... oh I had been waiting to do this. Taking a few breaths to let my tight throat open up and get some air, I stood and faced him.

"Everything about how this is run! It could be much better. I... I mean I know Fillydelphia isn't a nice place but... why not feed us better? If we got better food and... and rewards and less abuse maybe we might work better too? Red Eye spends thousands of caps to buy slaves, he paid five times my market value to get me! If... if they were healthy wouldn't that save him lots of money with them not dying all the time? Look at it!"

I shoved the picture of the corpse pit toward him.

"We're dying every day! Fillydelphia's making me choke on my own blood every few hours without treatment, and there are others who won't last past tonight! Why did you have to force us? If you offered security in here, better food, and maybe even used the money saved on paying us wouldn't some of us want to work here and build better things without just working us till we die? I've... I've never seen it from this side, of slavers debating around a table over how best to do all this. I never realised how stupid all of this really was! How horrible and brutal and merciless!"

"You feel there's a better way then, Murk?" Protégé's voice was measured and calm. He hadn't moved.

"Yes! How many slaves die every day? This can't last long, there's only so many ponies in the wasteland and if we die so fast how can we really help? Why doesn't Red Eye just... like... make everypony healthier and let us want to help make better things nicely? Why doesn't he get nice ponies to lead them instead of evil ones? Why doesn't he put safety railings on anything? It might be a bit slower but... but we'd not have to do all this..."

To my great surprise, Ragini watched and listened almost respectfully. Protégé did the same, before smiling to me and patting my shoulder.

"You and I think the same, Murk. We're idealists at heart. Unfortunately, reality doesn't work that way. I need to check some things, but I'll explain as we go."

He began to lead me around the room. Checking things on his clipboard and the walls he still spoke to me as I followed beside him.

"The first issue that causes this is simply that of how the wasteland works, Murk. Ponies are tough, weathered, and independent survivors by this point, save perhaps Tenpony Tower. Loyalty matters little against simply making the next day, I think your time in here has made you think of it as some sort of paradise out there. It's not."

He tapped the map, checking the lines of transit even as he pointed out vast areas of blank wilderness.

"For ponies out there, it's a day to day struggle without anypony to bring them food. They have to do it all for themselves by themselves for the most part. That breeds a kind of pony over a few generations, Murk. They don't like working for somepony else. They only think about themselves. If we were to simply rely on volunteers, we would never get enough bodies to make a difference in Fillydelphia. They simply would not come. Many places have tried that approach, and every time the wasteland decides it would rather take care of itself than give up anything. Why would somepony come from Tenpony to here?"

He indicated through a window over the stock yards outside where wagons were being filled. Behind it I could see the vast red haze and brutal landscape of Fillydelphia.

"If... if Fillydelphia was nicer and less smoggy, m-maybe they would—"

"It's not, Murk. Fillydelphia was like this long before Master Red Eye came here. Yet it is the only source of major industry left in Equestria now. How would we get enough volunteers to work of their own choice for years on end in such a hell, Murk? We even tried it a few times; offering better care for those who decided to come. Very few did."

"Then what about all the slavers? They're the worst thing here!"

Protégé hesitated a second, seeing the others around and guided me out of the office that we could trot alongside the warehouse floor, far from any prying ears.

"Slavers are a unique breed. Remember what I said about them needing an outlet of their own authority? That's only one aspect. Slavers are not a nice group of ponies, Murk. But they have skills we need to control a workforce, and unfortunately, the idea of a 'nice' slaver is a very rare one in the wasteland. There is no practical way to reform them all. That's the crux of all this, Murk. It's simply not practical to make all this good and nice for everypony."

"But it's not practical to burn through us this fast either! This can't last..."

"It won't. This is not intended to go forever. Indeed, you are perhaps among the last generation of... workers, to be in here. After Unity and after we have reached a certain level of infrastructure, the children of Master Red Eye will emerge from their learning to take over a pre-built city ready to accept their more advanced skills. Then we can focus on something greater. You see, Murk, this is all but an unfortunate means to a greater end. The most any of us can do is try to be what we can from the inside. Masters like myself, Old Grizzly, and List Seeker... we just try to protect who we can, knowing that the reality is that this was always going to hurt somepony."

Rounding on him, I actually felt myself scowl.

"Somepony? Try hundreds. Thousands maybe!"

There was a silence between us. Ragini had followed on, staying silent away from our argument. We passed by slaves pulling small carts full of oatmeal urns to the exit for distribution. I'd seen that cart before. It was the FunFarm's, now only half full.

"Why couldn't it just take longer? Do it a small thing at a time rather than launching for the whole thing and needing it to be horrible along the way? Spend longer finding nice ponies and working together to rebuild in peace over a much longer period? Why all the sacrifice to rush it?"

Protégé took a long time in responding, clearly thinking deeply. I saw him look at that clipboard, bearing the exact numbers upon it no doubt of precisely how horrible this city was.

"Industry can't be created in small scale, Murk. By the time we solved one issue, we would not be able to protect it as we moved on. We need this large scale to invest, protect, and create a real nationwide infrastructure. Equestria cannot linger in squalor forever, Murk. How many ponies die to the wasteland if we take our time? We could see a restored Equestria within our lifetime! Unity will be soon, and the opportunity will have been missed if we are not ready for it. Perhaps this is simply where perceptions of what sacrifice is worthwhile must agree to disagree."

He paused, looking up from the clipboard.

"Perhaps I was wrong. Maybe I am something of a realist with loftier goals, rather than a true idealist like yourself."

He returned his eyes down, turning away from me. It dawned that we really were looking at this from opposite sides despite his own experiences as a slave in Fillydelphia. I was looking at it from an individual pony's viewpoint and morality wishing for things to be right, while he saw it from the view of statistics and large scale practicality while wishing for a better end goal. Like master like pupil...

"But, you've seen all this too." I trotted a little closer. "You know how much it hurts us. The very things you support still want to hurt you, look what happened to you! Then you come back and just say it all again? How is that worth it?"

I pointed my hoof to the window beside us. Outside, framed in the dusty window, I had caught in the corner of my eye while speaking a slave by the side of the road being unhooked from a cart and falling to the floor. Limp. Dead.

Above him, a slaver tucked his whip away again before simply hoofing the body into the ditch by the side of the road.

Protégé glared at it. For a second I thought he would launch into a tirade, all the practicalities and all the realistic reasons that I knew made sense. I just didn't like them. Instead, he took rather more time than I had ever known him to.

"I... I don't like it." He spoke quietly. "It... just is. Sacrifices... must be made. That's what he taught me. I will see a new Equestria."

That was that. He trotted off away from me into the main warehouse area again.

Ragini, having kept quiet, glared at me with an odd look. A small smile creaked across her beak.

"Not bad, flightless."

She moved off herself as well. The idea was very strange, that she simply judged people by their confidence or ability to stick up for themselves. Was that how griffons worked? Or just her? Why couldn't they just be like ponies and be easy to understand?

I watched her disappear around the corner, leaving me alone in the supply area with an odd feeling of bittersweet 'victory' over the argument. I'd never seen him look that unsure of himself before in all the time I'd known him.

Then it hit me. For all the curiosity about that strange pony, he had left me alone in the supply area.

Left me alone in the supply area.

Hehehe!

I quickly cast my eyes around to the shelves, backing off out of sight from the rest. I was right against the wall of the huge complex, at the last shelves before the windows and very nicely hidden from sight. I didn't waste time and started scouring the shelves with my eyes, looking for anything that could be handy! Whipping my saddlebag open, I dropped in a set of matches for Coral's newly purchased lantern, a little monocular, several washers and nuts for Glimmer's modifications and even stretched right up to lift down two sets of glue. I could only imagine how handy they might be for odd tasks. Grinning madly, I even found a tattered old revolver. Lacking a barrel or grip, it was pretty much just the drum in the middle that was still intact, no doubt ready to be sent back to the manufacturing bays. I helped myself to that too, Glimmer would find a use.

Other things I mentally noted down to pick up later were the large swathes of cloth nearby that Coral and I could sew weather cloaks out of. There were also some larger saddlebags and plates of metal taken out of body armour. I'd never get them hidden right now but I wasn't in any rush. I would be here all day after all. My eyes fell upon a rather lovely looking row of spark batteries that glowed slightly, though. Maybe I could—

"Murk!"

I froze, dropping down and hastily attaching my saddlebag shut again as I heard the hoofsteps coming closer! Protégé stuck his head around the shelf corner and motioned with a hoof.

"Come on, I've got a job for you."

"Y-yes, master!" I hastily coughed into my hoof and trotted after him. No worries, that was a good haul for now. This place was a gold mine! We had tools, food, drink, a container for my RadAway, a map on my PipBuck, some explosive lockpicks made from brass casings, a lantern and now a monocular, matches, and tons of scrap between it all! Not to mention my very own battle saddle I was being allowed to keep for now. Oh yes, I could see this starting to come together!

Protégé waited for me beside a small cart, holding a sheet of paper in his magic.

"This will be a good chance for you to practice what you've learned, Murk. These files need sorted alphabetically on the shelves. They're near the back of the warehouse, under the gantry, all labelled. It's just my logs of what I've been organising; a little monotonous, but just the sort of thing it's helpful to have you for."

"I'll, um, try..."

I saw him raise an eyebrow and sighed.

"...master." I muttered it. He nodded and moved away.

Behind me I saw Mudball casting eyes at Protégé's back even as he left, being watched carefully by Ragini. After a moment of matching eyes with the griffon, he looked back down and they left me to work.

"This is 'Food' so that's, hmm... this one?"

I muttered to myself, crouching beside the cart with my eyes tracking over the document in front of me. I hadn't exactly made fast progress here other than the ones starting with 'M' after Protégé had taught me to spell my own name. Only now I was trapped between these little squiggly lines, one with a small line through it and the other without. Annoyingly, while this file was clearly about food, (it held a picture of a tantalising-looking pie) I couldn't remember what that looked like in word form.

Urgh. Protégé's records method wasn't exactly easy for the borderline illiterate.

Unfortunately, there wasn't much worth taking from where I was, and I wasn't exactly sure how wary the overseers were in here. Following on from my gatherings before, I didn't want to push my luck. Besides, I did want to learn to read.

Pulling a few folders out from the shelf, I skimmed them for anything similar to help me figure it out. I knew that 'f' had a squiggly line but did it have the extra little line or was it the snake? Everything felt so confusing. Protégé had told me to watch for letters called something specific; towels, if I remembered, but so far that wasn't helping. Especially when towels also meant the rugs you dried yourself with. Who designed words that way?

Eventually, I located another file about food. So it did have the little line! 'F' was a little line through a squiggle. Ok! I began shifting through all the ones on the cart looking for any other ones about food and threw each of them in at the end of the 'F' section. As it turned out, that was the vast majority. I umm'ed and aah'ed my way through most of the pile, likely knowing I got something wrong now and again. (Why was it 'double you' when the letter was clearly two 'V' letters?) But eventually I whittled it down and felt rather proud of myself as I did so.

The last one utterly stumped me though.

It outright told me what I was to look for. It held a straight line then a circle beside it at the top. I didn't remember that in the alphabet. I even tried to cheat and compare it to others on the shelf, but found none at all that matched.

Sighing, I eventually trotted over to the nearest slave.

"Um, excuse me... miss?" I shrunk back slightly as the scrawny mare looked down at me without much care. "Where does this go?"

Her magic lifted it, casting her eyes for a few seconds across the top.

"Ah, this? Exception form, goes in the little room under the gantry down there. See? Number ten at the top, if it's a number it's in there."

"Oh!" What a cheat. A number. "Th-thank you, miss!"

"Eh, whatever." She simply shrugged, returning to the heavy crates she was trying to pry open. I didn't expect much from her, if you got a safe job in slavery, you tended to just try and not attract any attention to try and keep it.

Meanwhile, feeling happier than I really should at having recognised a few letters for the first time in my life alone, I began to trot toward the indicated room with the form tucked under one wing. I was learning to read, we were getting stuff together to escape, I wasn't with Shackles, and I could move my wings! All things considered, life was pretty good by my standards.

The room's door creaked open, ahead of me, the room was almost entirely in darkness. I could see the vague shape of shelves and the numbers listed on little stamped bits of paper along with some old filing cabinets and desks on the dusty floor, but the lights had long ceased to work. I could see the number I was after, the line and circle right at the bottom of the room if I squinted, the light from out here casting inside.

Slowly, I trotted in. Hard concrete tapped under my hooves and without really knowing why, I softened my trotting to not make any noise. The further I walked in, the more the warehouse behind me dulled in sound. Past the first three shelves, then the fifth...

Then the door slammed shut and cast the room into utter darkness.

Squeaking as I blinked and let my natural sight adjust to the change, I made to gallop before stopping. No... no, the door had just been on springs, it was okay... it was okay...

All the same, I couldn't help but feel a rising tension in the air. A sense of something watching me as I went further in. I felt myself speed up, moving to a canter and pacing quickly with little whimpers. I didn't want to look behind me. The darkness seemed to gather in corners, shadows within the black itself. My neck tingled with sweat and I felt my breathing get quicker.

"Kzzztch—there?"

"Shut up you—kzzztch..."

I knew this feeling. I'd felt it in nightmares, and I'd felt it in the Stable. Like being chased by a ghost. Now as I heard that same frequency go off, I realised it sounded like somepony on a radio. Wait, hadn't it mentioned a dark room?

Was... was something behind me?

No, not waiting. Move. Move now. I didn't like this, somepony felt like they were right behind me no matter where I turned!

Before I knew it, I was almost galloping toward the last shelf and threw the folder into it hastily. Cringing, whining and hopping from hoof to hoof nervously to turn around, I fled immediately for the door, not daring to imagine what that presence was I felt in the darkness. It felt like something was right behind my tail.

Without hesitation, I flung the door open and dove outside, slammed it shut and spun to run further away from the dark room. I stopped on the spot as I collided with something.

Oh, wait... somepony.

I heard him grunt more in shock than pain. It wasn't like my little body was going to hurt anypony. Staggering away from each other, I felt like throwing my hoof in my mouth when I saw who it was.

"Murk..." Protégé rubbed his side with a hoof. "I can't exactly say you're not making a habit of literally running into me when I'm looking for you."

"S-sorry! I... the dark in there... just... um..." I caught my breath. "Sorry, master."

No need to sound foolish by talking about being scared of the dark. Even so, I figured he got the message and nodded.

"Well, your familiarity with the dark and sneaking around is what I need you for now, Murk."

"H-huh?"

Protégé's eyes narrowed.

"The Great Game continues. We've had a break in."

He took me up the gantry to a suspended level above the warehouse floor. A series of thin-walled offices atop the catwalk were occupied by banks of terminals or specialist sorting rooms attended to by slaves and slavers alike. Trotting to the furthest office away, Protégé unlocked the door to wander inside. I followed him, glancing around at the recently moved-in office.

"What do you mean a break in?"

"Someone infiltrated my office, Murk." Protégé shut the door behind me with a flash of his horn. "While I was out, somepony has stolen their way in here."

"What did they take?" Looking around it all seemed very sturdy and bare with smoothed plaster on the walls that had clearly once born a different colour, and held glossy wooden boards on its corners and bottom rim. He had brought the items I had lifted here up with him and dumped them by his desk and the remainder held a smattering of reading materials and organisation documents. On a rack at the back were a few changes of clothes with a low bed next to the window. It was a definite downgrade from the padded office in the Mall.

"Nothing."

"Then... how do you know someone broke in?"

Waving me forward, he lightly opened a drawer.

"Simple tricks, Murk. Anyone seeking ways to ensure things in here keeps careful watch on who is doing what. A simple thin thread stuck to the drawer where I keep more valuable information. One that would be snapped by anyone looking through it without even realising. I keep this drawer locked, the door secured and the only other way in is a window with a thirty foot drop, also locked. There's an attic above us, but it doesn't lead anywhere."

"Maybe it just got broken? If nothings been taken..."

"More than that. Specific organisation of how I leave my things. Scattered and untidy or not, I know where I leave them. I take measures to ensure I remember where each thing in my desk drawers is in relation to each other. It's been moved."

I couldn't much help but store these ideas away to watch out for in future from the perspective of somepony who often did the sneaking.

"So what were they after?"

"Information, Murk. Likely trying to find out what I knew, what my schedule was or anything else. Detail is key these days, Murk. They likely sought simply to dig up dirt or simply test the waters of whether I would notice.”

I wandered about the room, looking at each part of the sparse furniture and out of the window. How would I have gotten in here? I couldn’t lockpick, so the best place for me would be to try and grapple my way to the roof.

“Is the attic’s roof, um, solid?”

“The section above this room, yes. The interesting thing is, I keep another length of thin string by the door. It was unbroken.”

I stood and stared at the attic door up a small flight of stairs at the back of the office. There wasn’t anything to say they couldn’t lockpick themselves, and if they’d gotten into the drawer they must have, but they clearly hadn’t entered through the door. I saw Protégé sit down, tenderly rubbing his bandaged neck with a slight grimace.

“Are... are you all right?” It occurred to me I’d never once asked that yet.

“Yes, Murk. Thank you. Nothing worse than what I imagine you are feeling. It has not been an easy time for us and there will still be many dangers ahead for either you or me I would wager.”

“I’m sorry you lost what you wanted...”

I didn’t really hear his response, nothing other than general politeness that I let slip from actually listening to, for I heard my PipBuck pick up again.

“Kzzztch—right up there, you all right?”

“Yes, it’s fine. Sooner I can leave from up here the —kzzztch...”

It faded off into static with unintelligible noises.

I could hear Protégé asking what I was looking at, but I didn’t answer. I simply held up a hoof for him to be quiet and slowly trotted forward. Somepony’s radio hitting my PipBuck’s receiver from before...

They’d mentioned a dark room, then told somepony to shut up while I’d been in a dark room, then asking if they were fine ‘up there.’

I felt a very cold chill run over me as I leaned close to Protégé’s ear.

“Did you check the attic?”

“Not yet. I haven’t been up there in some time.”

“Then I know how they got out... they didn’t.”

I held the PipBuck up, close enough that he could hear. Occasional lines asking if they had ‘gotten anything’ or ‘when they could leave.’ They weren’t stealing into the room... they were always here, checking it and feeding information through a radio every time he left!

Very carefully, I saw Protégé lift his revolver from the pile beside his desk and get off his seat. He spoke quietly, soft enough to let me hear.

“E.F.S. can’t see them, but there are ways to block it. The stairs creak, they’ll hear us coming. This needs to be quick.”

“Kzzztch—just lemme know when they go and I’ll tail em.”

“Hold your hooves, Dirk. Least you get to stretch your legs.”

I knew that name. It was one of Barb’s shades! They must have been trying to help Shackles to feed him information on what Protégé was up to! My mind briefly wondered why they didn’t just go for the kill even as Protégé placed a hoof on the steps and readied his telekinesis around the latch of the attic door.

I saw him nod to me. Shaking, I nodded back. At least he was with me for this.

A couple of breaths... and then he pulled the door open and galloped up. I followed, unwilling to let him face those dark terrors alone again. Ahead of me, he burst into the room!

I heard somepony from above shout, a scrambling of hooves and Protégé shouting for them to ‘put it down.’ My ears split right as I ran in from a loud gunshot in such close proximity and fell to the side when the stairwell splintered and blasted wood into my face. He was shooting at us!

Protégé’s revolver fired back, I couldn’t see what was going on, cramped in the little stairwell before actually entering. Wood cracked and the sound of galloping hooves gave way to two more shots from Protégé’s revolver, snapping and echoing around the room. Dragging myself up, I pulled myself into the attic, saddle mouthpiece drawn for... some reason. The attic was large and surprisingly well lit around the wooden beams. Protégé was galloping forward to dive behind an old water tank.

“Murk, get down!”

He shouted it even as another round of buckshot blasted the beam beside me into tinder. Squealing, I fell to the side between two beams and onto the soft roof padding that I half buried myself in from the exchange of gunfire above me. I could hear screams from the warehouse below at the sounds. Daring to poke my head up, I finally saw our assailant at the far end. A shadowy figure visible only from the glint of a sawn off shotgun magically floating as it reloaded. Behind them, a newly cut trapdoor opened to the roof, designed to look exactly like a part of the roof itself. No wonder Protégé had assumed they hadn’t got in there from here!

Keeping my head low beneath the beams of wood that traversed the attic at this side I heard their shotgun blast into the water tank Protégé hid behind. Dropping back, away from the buckshot, Protégé blind fired around the corner before reloading his own revolver from a pocket full of rounds.

“You think I can’t hear that? Eat this!” The Shade pointed the shotgun and pulled the trigger. Protégé huddled behind cover as best he could, keeping his limbs hidden.

The raider’s weapon simply clicked.

“Ah shit.” Daring to glance up, I saw the shotgun floating up to his eye after the jam before the Shade clambered out of the trapdoor.

“He’s running!” I cried out to Protégé, who simply holstered his weapon and got up to make chase. Following him, we both ran onto the more solid wooden floor where the Shade had been residing. I saw a strange piece of arcane technology humming away on the floor. Protégé looked at it with surprise.

“Grab that, Murk!”

Throwing it in my saddlebag, Protégé and I ran to the trap door and glanced out. In the red light of Fillydelphia even a Shade could be seen galloping across the walkways of the warehouse roof. We both clambered out, dropping six feet to the metal catwalks and tore off after them. Protégé took an easy lead with his longer legs, weaving around the air ducts upon the roof to close the distance.

The Shade moved like water over anything barring the way! I saw him glide over railings and slide between thin gaps in a cage fence around a generator without so much as slowing down. Protégé vaulted the same railing and shot out the lock of the fence door to run through, with me following as close as I could after simply running under the first rail.

“Come on!”

He could shout, but I’d never be able to keep up here! Ducking and diving I kept my little hooves moving to keep sight on the Shade that fled across a mass of pipes, aiming to turn right toward a fire escape! Protégé put his head down and sprinted, smartly taking the direct route rather than the one the Shade had taken. Even when the Shade got near the fire escape, Protégé's shots slammed on its top level railings, making him leap back.

"Just get to fuck, you little weasel!" Growling, having had to jump back into cover, the Shade didn't have a choice but to abandon it now that we were close enough to catch him if he tried to go down the steep stairs. Even a Shade couldn't trot down them quickly!

My legs were aching under me though, I wouldn't be in this chase much longer. I could see Protégé was flagging too, his neck no doubt severely hampering him. I had to get smart... think, Murky, think!

The Shade ducked behind a massive air conditioning unit, disappearing from sight. I knew what I had to do.

Stopping, I ran backwards and spun around in the same direction, taking a route around the same unit to catch him if he doubled back. It's what I would have done! Dropping to my side and sliding on my momentum below the pipe, I whipped my saddle's mouthpiece back out and pointed it up the adjoining route through this maze atop the roof.

Sure enough, the Shade was running right toward me. Taking only brief aim, I bit hard on the mouthpiece and shot the hook right at him even while still sliding from my dive.

"Whoa, where did yo—!" Ducking to the side, the Shade simply threw himself at the ground, not having enough time to realise it was only a grapple and not a proper gun before choosing to dodge. Slamming into the other side of the thin gap between the air unit and pipes I at least made him pause and let Protégé loop around further ahead to come up behind the raider. We had him trapped!

"Don't move I said don't! Who was it that sent you? Shackles? Grindstone?"

The Shade, half blurring at the edges into the shades below each part of the roof, spun from me to face Protégé and snarled.

"Shades don't squeal, mister teacher's pet! Especially not to bastards who killed Barb! Didn't even need payment to take up work to fuck up your life when we got the offer!"

"You lot are assassins, why didn't you just kill me when I slept in that room? What information were you after?"

The Shade grinned. "Wouldn't you like to know? Goodbye..."

Neither of us had seen it but that blurriness had hid his horn casting a spell! Only when I saw the growing darkness did I realise it before he melted away through a space so thin even I couldn't squeeze through! A blink spell! Racing up, I saw him reform on the other side, grin at me through the gap and run off.

"Murk! Boost up!"

Before I even realised how silly an idea this was, I put my back to the gap and held my hooves together to boost Protégé atop the gap we couldn't fit through. Feeling my front legs burn with the effort of lifting even a lighter pony like Protégé I gasped and staggered when I felt him reach the top. Catching a breath, I used my grapple to get over myself.

From atop the unit I saw the Shade sprinting for the edge of the building, pursued by Protégé. Hopping from unit to unit, I knew I would never catch up to this chase again so I simply tried to keep an eye on what was going on.

"See you later, upstart!"

The Shade shouted over his shoulder before leaping off the building's edge! I actually stopped and saw him hang in the air from the abnormally long jump as he stretched out...

and landing on the building just over from here.

Behind him, Protégé clenched his teeth and increased his speed. I saw his horn glow, spreading around himself as he charged up and leapt! He was trying to lighten himself! I ran forward, aiming to grapple over.

He made it.

Barely.

Slamming into the side of the building, I heard him cry out in pain from his injuries at the impact. His hooves just grasped the ledge, leaving his hind section kicking in thin air below. Feeling horror in my gut, I sprinted up and fired my grapple to the other building, putting away my fear of falling to zip right across. Landing heavily from such a shallow swing, I scrambled across the pebbled roof and thrust my hooves out to grab Protégé, hauling him onto the roof.

We simply lay there for a few seconds. Exhausted and sore. The Shade kept sprinting even after our stamina had gone. Barb's disciples that still lurked Fillydelphia were very athletic raiders, and we were just a pair of small ponies recently out of hospital with still bandaged injuries. We'd never catch up now.

"Thank... phew... thank you, Murk. It seems I made the right choice in having you around..."

I didn't even reply. The long sprint was catching up to me and I just lay on my side, hooves limp as I struggled to get air. My throat was feeling sore and tight, leading me to rasp each time. With hooves that felt like lead, I took a long gulp from my RadAway canteen and coughed down the horrible mixture. The rampant thumping in my chest gradually died down, the taint growth slowing for now.

"He..." I stammered, having to swallow back the metallic tang left over in my mouth. "He got away..."

"Yes, yes he did." Protégé struggled to his hooves and stretched back and forth, checking his bandages. "That's a new move afoot, that my enemies amongst the slavers have recruited Barb's survivors out of their hatred for me. We shall have to tread softly and keep a wary ear out. Good thing I have you for that, hmm?"

He tried to offer a smile, likely happy to simply be alive after that jump.

"Um... yes?"

"Just from now on, I think I'll leave the telekinesis tricks to the Dweller. I'd heard she was good with them. Who said only you were inspired to ideas from her? Problem is, I don't seem to be very good at them."

Patting my back, he helped me up as we both tiredly limped to the nearest fire escape. His magic lifted the odd object from my saddlebag. Part of me felt a little odd, he could have asked first... damn slavers...

"This isn't common, it's an E.F.S. blocker. I wasn't aware we even had any in Fillydelphia that still functioned. Somepony is supplying them with advanced equipment to indirectly aid their interests."

"Shackles and Grindstone?"

"Well, that in itself is obvious. They've as much as told us before, but this makes me worry where they are getting this stuff. Now, we've got to go to the Alpha-Omega, Old Grizzly wants to see me with a drop of information somewhere where there will be less curious ears."

He smirked as we got onto the fire escape.

"Besides, I hear there's a couple of little fillies who are eager to see you."

"I just don't understand."

"Understand what?"

Protégé glanced down to me as I asked my question. We were trotting back the way we had come, around the FunBarn to the Alpha-Omega Hotel. Briefly, Protégé had met with a furious Ragini. She had tried to find us, but our chase had been on such an unknown direction upon the rooftop that she hadn't been able to locate her charge in time.

Couple that with losing a chance to take a shot at the Shades, and the griffon had not been pleased. She had been left to guard his office, in case anypony returned with a sneaky subversion. I'd heard her swearing and punching a wall even as we'd left, keeping her rage out of sight of her charge.

"I just don't understand why we can't go to Red Eye right now and tell him about all this. That they were happy to try and kill you when you found us yesterday. That they're stealing and that they betrayed you in the Mall!"

Protégé glanced toward the upper floors of the FunBarn. Likely where Red Eye was right now.

"My Master is exceptionally busy, Murk. Unity is near, and he has greater things than my life to worry himself about at this very moment. Even I cannot simply request an audience or walk in."

"You didn't see him after you almost died? Didn't he come to visit you?"

There was that pause again, before he simply smiled.

"He didn't have to, I hear he looked in on me before I woke up, but after that I reported to him from my bed. I will see him soon enough however, once Unity's preparations are finished in Fillydelphia. Rest assured, I will have a full report for him."

He seemed to grin a little to himself. Whether over imagining the satisfaction of Red Eye's sweeping authority dealing with this or that love of precise writing and reports I knew he had, I wasn't sure. Briefly, I pitied Red Eye having to read whatever extensive thing he'd wrote. (Knowing Protégé, it likely had graphs.)

"As you might have seen based on what you told me of bringing Lilac here, an act I cannot thank you for enough, security has had something of an upgrade in this place since Littlepip essentially trotted right in."

Ahead of us, the Alpha-Omega Hotel's gates were secured with great measure. The fence ahead of the lit building thrummed with magic power and two small towers held griffon snipers watching our every move. Protégé was permitted entry without a word though. They allowed him (and apparently, his 'assistant') in on sight. I took the fanatical glance from Red Eye's guard very seriously. He bore the mark of the fanatical elite core of Red Eye's army upon his combat armour's breast after all.

No. No trouble or hijinks here. In other places, if caught, I'd be punished. Here I'd be executed on the spot without a warning.

What awaited me just as we went inside was beyond what I could have imagined, however.

Fresh new carpets lined the main hallway of the hotel. That classic design of Fillydelphia to have a grand staircase just beyond the front doors and reception was lit and of a temperature that felt like a refreshing comfort after the stuffy outside. They had working air conditioning! With the doors closed and blocking the sound I could have imagined I was simply back in Old Equestria all over again.

"This is the seat of Equestria's future, Murk. We have done all we could to ensure a safe and happy place for them to grow, learn and dream. This main hall is mostly just for guards and exchanges, but above us in the old rooms they have their dorms while the grand ballroom has been converted to a place of learning."

We trotted in, me feeling distinctly out of place with my filthy fleece and matted coat. On a guard's insistence, I even had to scrape my hooves on a little mat before I was allowed to wander further into the hotel itself and view the long hallways of thick red and burnished gold fittings. I could hear them, children playing, laughing, and scampering around on little hooves in adjoining rooms and floors.

I couldn't help but make contrast to the empty orphanage I'd so recently seen.

After we dropped in our equipment and weapons (My battle saddle was a weapon. In my mind) to the reception, we were finally allowed to continue in. Protégé led me upstairs, making assurances to the robed staff that I was with him and having to hide his smirk as I hopped on each of the thickly carpeted stairs. What? It was designed for a time when ponies were bigger than me! No wonder the foals didn't come down here much.

Quite simply, I couldn't quite get over the sort of place I was seeing. It was clean! Those cabinets on the landing between stairs were actually polished and held growing flowers! The bannisters were all intact with recut wood! At the top of the stairs, the large square room bore clear tables, huge doors with intricate stained glass and beyond that a dining room where cooks hurriedly set out a meal upon the serving tables. Clearly, their lunch was soon.

Even from here, I could smell the warm cooking. Tasting the sweet scent of sugar and thick fumes of gravy or soup wafting from between the doorways... oh please, say we can have lunch here, Protégé? My stomach was actually growling at me with the need and temptation.

"Not even I or Master Red Eye are permitted to this food, Murk. He would not dare feast on this while workers do not. Sacrifice must come from all."

Clearly he'd seen me poking my nose against the glass and slightly steaming it up. Blinking, I blushed and stepped back from it.

"S-sorry... warm food and... um..."

"I know, Murk. I know. We'll get something soon enough. But please, come here. While we wait for Old Grizzly I think you might like to see how the foals are living? It might offer you a better perspective on this entire endeavour."

"Um, please. Yes." I nodded, feeling my hooves unwilling to leave behind the dining room. The chef was serving mashed potatoes out to the tables! I'd only ever dreamed of them! Yet I forced myself to move along and follow Protégé as he trotted down the adjoining hall. It was rather wide, definitely not just a corridor and arced around a massive curved wing of the hotel. Then as we trotted, I began to see the truth of this place.

Behind clear glass doors, I saw the foals. They were sitting inside the grand hall, dozens of them! Upon cushions resting over an old dance floor they sat and stared as an elderly stallion taught them something on a blackboard. They scribbled in little jotters, some bored and some avidly taking it up. Behind them I could hear another little group singing songs while a third was constructing little wooden models on basic workbenches. Across the grand hall where ponies must have once danced, Red Eye had created a full school.

Glancing in, I felt a little spike of envy at seeing them all having fun together as they learned the skills of life. All those foals, sometimes less than half my age, were likely more intelligent than I'd ever be.

Protégé rounded off and saw me staring through the window. One little foal turned and saw me there, waving with a smile. They were so idealistic and willing. Waving back, I felt Protégé's hoof on my shoulder, beckoning me onward to not disturb them in class.

"Don't worry, Murk. We'll get you up to speed. I promise."

The smile was genuine, I couldn't help but sniff and nod back with a little grin. Of all things, I was thankful that he was willing to help me with this, be it ten years too late or not.

Passing around the hallway that encircled the large ballroom, Protégé led me through to a series of common rooms and even a library that had been redesigned out of a music room. I could still see the piano there. Still hear the piano as a little colt tentatively plucked out a few chords upon it. The noise of children flooded into my ears as I discovered this was their place to play and do as they willed.

"Foals need time to discover their own likes, Murk. We don't drill them."

"Protégé!"

The squeaking shout went out and before I knew it a small crowd of them had followed the shout and surged across the ground to us. Allegedly, he was rather popular with the foals.

"Are you here to tell us another story?"

"I really want to hear the one with Daring Do again!"

Rather swamped along with all these foals, I stepped back a little, grinning at him. The thought of Protégé sitting and reading a book to them was, frankly, hilarious to me. That serious buck having to tell a tale would be something all right. He shook his head and talked to them, speaking to them all by name and asking how they were doing. I took a step to the side and looked around the room, not daring to leave it for fear of being considered an intruder without Protégé. I could see other rooms attached that led back to the school or on to the dining room while others clearly were large lines of dorms that foals came and went from.

They were healthy. Happy. Bright and with a delighted glint in their eye I'd never known from anypony other than a drunken Glimmer!

"...Murky? Is that you?"

Stopping on the spot, I heard the little rasping female tone and turned with all the hope in my heart.

Both Starshine Melody and Lilac Rose were stood right there. Clad in body covering robes other than their faces, the two little ghouls widened their eyes to see it was me. A sweet little smell came off them, emerging from necklaces that swung around their necks to disguise the stench that being a ghoul brought.

"Starshine! Lilac!"

Trying my best to smile widely for them, I knelt down before them. The pair offered small smiles, and shuffled forward, both hugging me at the same time. Really I hadn't thought about how they saw me, but I'd been the one to save both of them.

"Are you two doing okay?"

"Mhm." Starshine murmured a little quietly when she stepped back. "They gave me medicine to help the pain go away..."

The poor thing, she must have been coping with the reality of being a ghou! now, her experience had been far more traumatic than Lilac's. I didn't understand how becoming one worked, but in such a short and horrible way the idea of there being pain involved seemed all too likely.

"We help each other." Lilac stood rather adamantly beside Starshine. "We're best friends now. Star got them to let me play and not be scared of me."

"Good girl." I tried to remember how Coral spoke and emulate it as best I could.

"Are you here because it's time to go find Miss Coral again?" Lilac seemed hopeful. "Because... um... Star wanted to know if she could come too..."

I could feel things getting ever more complicated again, not to mention a bit of a horrible decision of what to say here. Yes, I'd be more than fine to help her get out, but I knew I was speaking for Coral here.

"Well... you can both certainly come with us, is that... fine?"

"Yes!" Both spoke at the same time, Lilac turning and nodding to Starshine as though saying "Told you it'd be fine!"

"But it's not right now. I'm just... um... on a really secret mission to get in and speak to you right now!"

Oh, my imagination. Here we went... I could see their eyes light up and hustle close to hear secrets. I could see Protégé still talking to many of the other foals and hearing what they had been learning.

"Listen close, we've got a plan coming together but I need to know how to get you two out of here along with Coral's son, Chirpy Sum."

"He's not here right now!" Lilac piped up.

"Yes, um..." Starshine was clearly the less confident of the two. "They said he got to go to 'advanced studies' somewhere else with one of the leaders cos' he's so smart with maths. I can't even do all my times tables but he can do really really complex stuff like square roots and... and triangle things."

Well now, depending on circumstances, that might make things easier to get him back, I'd have to pass that information on and try to find out where. Maybe Protégé knew.

"Good work girls." I patted each of their heads, remembering how I had seen my friend do it. "But Star, how did you get out last time? Could you do that again?"

"Uh huh. They never found my hole. It's near the drain pipe outside at the fence. I used to sneak down the old servant's staircase to get out to look around from it."

"I used that too at the orphanage!" Lilac beamed at her new friend and the pair laughed together. I joined in lightly, feeling impolite not to. It really was wonderful to see Lilac having found a place she could be with other foals.

"Right, I'm sure I could find it. Check the drainpipe every so often, Star. I'll... um... I'll leave a note there once we know what's going on. Okay?"

"Okay, Mister Murky!" Starshine lit up. "Lilac's told me about Miss Coral, and I told her about the really really big pony that carried you off when you got sick! You all sound nice and... and I kinda miss my own mummy and daddy since I came here. They're nice but... I want to go home..."

Straining harder than I ever had to stop my traitorous eyes from dampening, I embraced her lightly.

"We'll all make it. I... I promise."

"R-really?"

“Yeah...”

I felt like I'd made a mistake saying that. Promises set false hope. But she was just a foal, what else could I say? If there was one thing I knew I cared about helping, it was children. It always had been a thing to me, now that I could see my own life for what it was, helping them escape even these bright and shining chains that sought to turn them into Red Eye's personal little population seemed important. I felt sure Coral wouldn't mind.

“Murk.” Protégé's voice picked up from behind me.

Blinking fast, I smiled a goodbye to the girls and stood up. “Y-yes?”

“Old Grizzly's here, we have to go.”

“Well, Murk. I'm glad to see you have survived your ordeal.”

Old Grizzly broke that stern face of his for at least a small smile when we entered the small room. It was rather out of the way, quiet and hidden.

“Th-thank you... sir.” Better to be cautious.

“Now do me a favour, kid. Keep those ears out for anypony for us, will you? This has to remain quiet.”

“Y-yes, sir.”

The thickset earth pony sat upon the bed, casting a dubious glance as to whether the wooden chairs would support his weight. Raising one hairy hoof he shook off a thick brown weather cloak that almost seemed to match the colour of his coat and mane precisely, were it not for the grey hairs forming.

Protégé sat upon a chair. After a moment of wondering, I eased onto one as well until I was sure they weren't going to order me to the floor.

“Sir, you said you had something for me?” Protégé leaned on the table, his eyepiece sat beside him.

“Yes, Protégé. I apologise I could not come to see you directly but there are eyes and ears everywhere now.”

“I know. Murk and I chased one of them off just this morning. Ragini has her hands full just keeping the warehouse from going off schedule. It was a Shade, Grizzly. One of Barb's students that slipped away from the Mall riot. They've thrown in their lot with somepony to work against me.”

Old Grizzly grunted and lay back with his head on the wall.

“That bastard keeps it up even from the grave. Most raiders don't have that sort of loyalty. Strange that one known for backstabbing carried such an inner core.”

“It's... um...” I spoke up, then realised I'd done so possibly out of turn until I saw Protégé smile and gesture for me to continue. “It's how Brimstone's clan worked. He told me they were loyal to each other and that's what helped them do better than most raider gangs. That's why they hate him... because he turned traitor and left. They were the ones that threw me in the Pit with Wildcard because I killed Barb.”

“Makes sense, then.” Grizzly nodded. “You working with Protégé here, with Brimstone helping both of you out at times and already not liking you to begin with my boy. Must have one hell of a hate boner on for you all.”

I saw Protégé squint at the use of language. Clearly he hadn't inherited one of his teacher's traits over Red Eye's.

"I think it's safe to assume they are working with Shackles and Grindstone."

"They are, sir. Murk here reported that he saw Wildcard in league with them at a hidden meeting. I've heard Wildcard's been around the Mall sometimes, too. It seems they have—"

"Made an alliance, yes." Grizzly cut in before sighing. "That's what I'm here to tell you. The nominations for who becomes Stern's successor in the chain of command, it's not looking good. There's a lot of back room intrigue, as there always is, but I've been tasked with keeping track of preliminary nominations."

A lot of this was feeling beyond my station, but I couldn't help but notice a sudden change in atmosphere. Grizzly spoke with wary eyes while Protégé narrowed his darkly.

"Sir... you are not meant to tell anypony that, for fear of bias or blackmail and—"

"I know, boy, I know. That's why I needed you here. I've seen where a lot of the votes are going and it's not looking good. I'm risking all to break the rules and give you this information because in this 'great game' as they're calling it now... I don't want to see Shackles win out. Right now, he is."

Oh...

Grizzly continued, his voice low. "Naturally, most slavers vote for themselves. Shackles has done so, but Grindstone and many of the others have done so for him as well. Slit put in one for him so we can only assume he paid her a visit too. He has sway, Protégé. They're crafting a majority here. He's a nomination for sure and there's nopony else with enough votes to act as a competitor."

Blinking, I tried to keep up with all this.

"So... so if he's got a majority... doesn't that mean he wins?"

My voice felt weak beside Grizzly's deep bass and Protégé's strong tone, but it was both of them looking at me that made me realise just how stupid it was to speak. Both of them knew how this worked, I didn't really factor in. All the same, Protégé nodded to Grizzly and turned back to me.

"This isn't a vote to see who wins, Murk. This is simply a case of finding out which leaders are considered highly enough to be put in for a future vote on who becomes the actual successor. In essence, this nomination process is about finding out who the future nominees would be. But if there's only one significant majority vote at the hosting today, they win by default."

"Precisely." Grizzly stomped his two front hooves together. "If they found out I'm telling you this my head would be on a pike within the hour. Desperate times, Protégé. You know I've always opposed his style of rule, it's why I'm going to transfer my vote to you."

"To me?" Protégé seemed genuinely shocked. "But... but sir, you are the senior, I should be the one putting my nomination to you! You have far more respect among the leaders and —"

"Protégé, no." He cut him off. "I have much respect but I have hid away in the FunBarn for years now other than a small group nearby in the bumper plough pit. I'm not exactly going to be around for long anyway... there's a reason they call me old. It's sodding true. But there's a bigger reason..."

He took a breath, leaning closer.

"Protégé, Red Eye has cast his vote for you."

I didn't think I'd ever manage to see Protégé look so genuinely open mouthed and speechless ever again with that poised figure broken into a stunned student.

"He..."

"Yes, he did. That changes things. As we know, Stern will follow Red Eye's lead no matter what he does, which has led to her putting in for you as well. With my own and your vote that already puts you in the running to have a chance at being a worthy challenger to Shackles' influence. You have the rest of today, Protégé. Find those that you can count on to cast a vote to you. I recommend you start with List Seeker, his nomination has yet to come through but I heard he had been visited by Shackles' aid Wormtail this morning."

Protégé was clearly still trying to compose himself internally a little. If the discussion weren't so deadly serious I might have found it a little funny. Like if I'd been told the DJ had given me a named shout out on the radio or something.

"Yes..." He eventually spoke quietly, coughed and sat up straight. "Yes, I'll do that..."

"It's all backroom politics and intrigue now, Protégé. Be careful out there, they clearly know you stand a chance and I'm not going to make the assumption that they haven't stolen their way into my office to read who's winning too. They know you stand a chance, I'll bet. So you—"

"Ssh!"

I held up a hoof and Grizzly stopped talking immediately. I'd heard something. Hooves trotting lightly, as though they were sneaking. We sat in silence as I sneaked over to the door and held my ear against it. Behind me, I could see Protégé unclasp his revolver holster lock.

The hooves stopped.

I could feel sweat running down my forehead. If this was a Shade... or Wildcard...

"Ready or not, here I come!" A child's voice squeaked out, laughed and came stomping down the hallway. The set of hooves just outside took off, quickly followed by another.

Breathing out, I slid down against the door and shook my head. False alarm. All these waving lines of allegiance were beginning to set me on edge. The slavers were all meant to be together! Now I was finding ever more that this wasn't as much the case as I'd believed.

Of course, this wasn't helped in that I was working behind Protégé's back myself to my own ends. There were more sides than just "us and them" going on here.

Grizzly sighed and stood. "I should get going, they will miss me before long. Protégé, think about what you will say tonight at the hearing for future nomination. If we get you in there to stop Shackles whitewashing this and gaining more power, then you'll need to start making an impact. You're the poetic sort, think on that. Even one more solid nomination might sway it enough to put you in with a chance."

"Yes, sir. I... thank you sir. This all feels like it's coming apart, plotting behind doors and having to break rules to protect those same rules..."

Grizzly just snorted and headed to the door.

"Welcome to politics."

Closing the door behind him, I was left in the small hotel room with Protégé. Slowly, I saw him lean forward, head in his hooves. This must have felt huge to him.

"I knew I was considered a potential runner, but to go up against a majority group..." Closing his eyes, I saw him sigh. "Some days I wished we could all just work together, Murk. Maybe what you told me earlier is what I should have tried for more, right now with even leader working against leader I'm not sure what to think."

Biting my lip, I trotted back across.

"But... maybe if you win this, you could make things better in the future when Stern goes away? Isn't that worth bending the rules a little to get? To have something better for everypony?"

Slowly, I saw him open his eyes, rub them and glance across.

"Yes, yes that would be better. I'm just tired, Murk. Tired of these hidden meetings, always having to watch my back and never take any moves in the chain of command for granted. Shackles' play at the Mall was a major point of a power swing in Fillydelphia now that he has presence back. The sooner this is over, the better. The sooner I can speak to Master Red Eye, the sooner we'll solve it. Till then, we have to keep Shackles from rising ever higher, Murk. You up to it?"

He stood up, lifting his eyepiece.

"That is, if you'll help me. I'm not stupid, I know you have your own agendas here."

It somewhat surprised me how fast I thought about it and nodded.

"I... I want out. But I have a better chance of that with you than with anypony else."

"My way or Glimmer's way?"

We both went silent. I knew what this was: a test of trust. To see whether he could count on me at least for the short term.

"Both..."

He clearly thought about what I meant by that, before nodding.

"Then come on. We've got to meet List Seeker and find out what he knows about Shackles if he's had a meeting from Wormtail. Time to go back on the offensive in this game, Murk."

He swept past me, cantering out of the room at a speed that I had to almost gallop to catch up.

Protégé had Red Eye's blessing in vote form behind him. I knew he wasn't going to let this go easily, and Celestia please understand me, I wanted it for him too.

This felt familiar.

List Seeker's munitions forge made my feathers rustle with the sheer heat. I could feel them wanting to spread and bask in the hot fumes that would lift feathers and stretch out all the sore muscles. Truth be told, it was a fight to not give in to the urge, we didn't need to call attention to ourselves.

We had found List Seeker fairly easily, looking over a gantry where he had been shouting to groups of slaves to get an urgent order done on time. Nicer slaver or not, he still had quotas to meet to keep the higher ups pleased and allow him to continue aiding slaves where he could in here. Spying us from his roost, Seeker pulled the wrap from his face and waved, before pointing to his office on the catwalks above.

"I have a feeling I know why you're here. Come on in."

Meeting us at the top of the stairs, I saw him glance with relief to me. It seemed I had more people who cared about me being away from Shackles than I knew. Trotting ahead, he threw open the bare wooden door of his office and knocked it closed again the moment we were through.

"Seeker, I'm here to—"

"I know what you're here for, Protégé. You never visit without purpose and given the event later on today I can only imagine what you are after."

He lay back in his chair, wiping his dirty and sweating brow with a foul looking towel.

"I'm afraid I cannot help you."

Protégé took the immediate refusal in his stride, trotting over to lay a hoof on Seeker's desk.

"This could be crucial, Seeker. I know you hate Shackles as much as I do, that you try to protect your workers here as best you can, just as I do. We're alike, Seeker. If you help me then perhaps we can make something better of this."

"Would that I could. We aren't all willing to buck against those in power or have the ear of the big guy himself. Protégé, please listen to what I said in your mind again. I didn't say I didn't want to help you. I said I cannot help you."

There was a change in his voice, a vulnerability as he leaned over his desk to meet Protégé's eyes.

"These slaves below here in my factory, they are long term workers. I keep them because I ensure I make every one of them a crucial link. I understand my place, and they understand it, too. Slavers can't often request from me because I can simply tell the quartermasters how losing such a skilled worker would hurt production of munitions. Put simply, I have a good thing going here. I make no enemies in a position just important enough to get by, and the slaves stay safe for as long as I can help them."

Sitting by the edge of the desk, I could see ranks of photos behind him. Each a slave below taken on an old camera sitting in the corner. Each had a little note below them... likely the skill they knew.

"You fear that by taking a side, you would upset the balance?" Protégé spoke quietly. "Or is it perhaps a visit you got this morning?"

"Both, you might say. Unfortunately my hoof has been forced here, Protégé. Wormtail has visited, and he had information that I keep in a safe. I've already been told where to cast my vote to keep my workers safe in here."

"The Shades..." I muttered it just loudly enough that they both turned to me for a second.

"You're being blackmailed." Protégé spoke quietly and Seeker nodded sadly.

"Shackles has ambitions, and I think he knew you might come to me, on account of us thinking alike. My nomination must go to him or things will not turn out well for anypony in here if that information gets out."

"This information, what was it?"

"Nothing important. It was simply a gesture that he could get it. If somepony can get into my safe like that while I'm here then slitting a throat as I sleep should be no problem. They are blackmailing under a threat because they know I care, Protégé. If I die, these slaves shall suffer all over again."

"So we can't even steal it back..." I was muttering to myself as I looked at all the portraits. I recognised a few from my brief temporary stints here. Some had red crosses beside them. I could only guess what it meant.

"Seeker," Protégé sighed and sat before the desk, "this is important. They are playing to your fears. If Shackles gets that nomination from you and wins then eventually it will come back to hurt us. He will be elevated above any of us to such a degree he can simply order it. I don't know why Master Red Eye hasn't stepped in yet but you must see that we have to fight this! That we have to stand up and resist him attaining power. You know he used to—"

"I know my own city's history, Protégé."

"Then you must realise what is at stake! These workers below you, is short term safety better when it comes with long term submission? You believe better than this, Seeker. Listen closely, there is a chance that I might be able to challenge him, if I get enough nominations. Please, tell me you can do better than this, for all of us? Look what he did to Murky Number Seven here, that will happen if we don't take a stand!"

His hoof struck the desk hard enough to make me jump and squeak at the sudden noise. All four hooves leaving the ground, I staggered back and rubbed my ears. When I looked up, I saw List Seeker looking at me, having seen my nervous reaction.

"I... I saw what he did to you, heard about more. I..."

He was tempted. He wanted to do it. I could see it in his eyes.

"I swore I would protect those under my responsibility, Protégé. I am sorry. One pony's words and wishes cannot change Fillydelphia for the better. I don't take pleasure in doing this..."

I could see how disappointed Protégé was.

"Please, will you at least remember what I have said? When you come to mark your nomination... just ask yourself if you're doing it out of love to protect or out of the depths of terror. He's controlling you as much as any slave. If Murk here could break free of that and challenge him..."

He left the question unanswered.

"Come on, Murk. We should make tracks to find somepony else."

I saw Seeker sitting at his desk, looking wretched. I recognised the fear in his eyes as he spun his chair slowly to look at the lists of ponies behind him he cared for across the wall.

"Protégé?" He spoke quietly, not turning back around. "How do you know that you are in with a chance? The nominations are kept secret."

Both of us stopped in our trotting, sharing a glance. Before we could answer, Seeker turned his head.

"You know something the rest of us don't. In theory, I could barter that as information. You should be more careful with that. However, in this case I shall not do so, though others might. That said, it helps me to know you have something here. I am under threat and my nomination will be influenced but... I know something that might help you."

Protégé stayed silent, nodding carefully.

"You know of Mister Mosin, the armourer at the Mall. Shackles is trying to force through his elevation to become a lead armourer for Fillydelphia's defence network around the wall. That would then make him eligible to place a further nomination in. Wormtail let that slip when boasting of how easily Shackles would win, so maybe I can't support you... but if those application documents or his nomination slip were delayed..."

"I understand, List Seeker. Thank you."

"Information is key in this game, Protégé. That is all I can give you for now. I am sorry."

Protégé nodded a second time before turning to go, myself beside him. He spoke only briefly.

"Think on what I have said, Seeker. If you feel ready to take a stand, you know what to do."

He left the office. Leaving me to stare back in only briefly to see the gangly slaver meet my eyes.

"If I could have taken you in, I would have, Murk. He's an idealist, but if he says he'll take care of you then you can trust him. Good luck."

"Th-thank you, sir..."

"Eh, I'm just somepony trying to help folks survive. Goodbye."

Taking the notice, I closed the door and cantered to catch up with Protégé. We trotted side by side until we were out of the factory with only a few offhoof glances from me at him. Seeker seemed to think I could definitely trust him, but all the same, most of what I was doing was helping a slaver further his own agenda, even if that was Protégé.

I just kept reminding myself, play along and do my best. Take the advantages I could. If it helped slaves in general on the long term... well I guess that was good, right? I'd never have thought I could make a difference before.

"Murk?"

I blinked a few times, feeling a colder wind blow over us coming out of the factory.

"Um... yes?"

"Mister Mosin's documents, do you think you could do something for me?"

A chance to steal and mess over Shackles however, was an even better chance to make a difference.

"I think I could make something happen."

"Good, Murk. Good."

We met with a brief smile to one another, plan set in motion. After trotting a bit further, I bit my lip and thought to ask.

"You slammed your hoof to scare me on purpose, to try to convince him, didn't you?"

"I haven't a clue what you're talking about, Murk."

"You're grinning."

"No I'm not."

Huddled and quiet, I lay still near the vent's exit and waited for my chance.

Getting in had been easy, I knew the route well these days. Aside from the blood chilling sound of the ghoul stuck in the vertical vent I had to pass over sensing I was above him, there hadn't been any difficulty in getting to here.

In getting over his office.

Despite the fear factor, I knew it would be easier than coming in through the plaza duct. I'd have had to move through open and crowded ground there. If I came out into Shackles' office, I could sneak out the door and through the corridors to Mosin's armoury and his desk inside.

That is, if I could bring my courage to do it. Shackles wasn't even in the Mall, but I could see the familiar sights. The bed I'd made only a few days ago. The cell he'd locked me in. The blood stains on the floor. My blood...

I couldn't delay though. Taking a deep breath to calm my nerves and touching a hoof to the statuette in my pocket, I levered the duct's cover away and dropped out into the room. Landing and huddling to the floor, I closed my eyes and took a good listen.

Nothing. Good.

Creeping forward, I reached for the door knob and gently pulled to find it still open. Excellent, I had back up plans to scour the vents for another way through but it seemed Wormtail wasn't nearly as thorough as his master. Yeah. His master. Not mine.

Poking my head out, I glanced from side to side. The Mall was quiet this time of day. No slaves came up here and most of the slavers were likely directing the shift changes right now.

I gently padded out and turned down toward the armoury's direction. Just down the hallway, turn right, up a short stairwell and then double back with it on your left... okay.

At a quiet canter, I moved forward and kept my ears more than my eyes open. Sound travelled far in these corridors as I'd so often discovered to my benefit and hardship in the past. The sound of snoring came from my right, a staff break room converted to a rest area for slavers upon mattresses. The hairy stallion within drooped across one with a bottle of whiskey nearby. The sight of the drink made me flush all over again, I couldn't believe what I'd said... oh dear... Glimmer was no doubt biding her time to bring it up at opportune moments.

The thought of her had been the temptation to take the plaza route. I dearly wished I could see them again during this brief visit, but I knew they wouldn't appreciate me taking extra risk simply to say hello.

"Head high, Murky. You've got to stand on your own sometime." I quietly muttered, and turned back to the safer route.

Shifting up to the corner, I cast my eyes around and saw the way was clear. Holding my breath, I moved on to—

"Just heading to the shitter, mate. Won't be long!"

Stopping dead, I turned and cantered as fast as I dared back around the corner. Hooves upon stairs sounded out behind me. Glancing side to side, I ducked into the same room as the sleeping stallion. Please be as knocked out as I was and don't wake up!

The trot of somepony else came down the corridor, passing right passed the room I now hid in. Holding my breath as I heard them stop and turn on the spot, a head poked in the door. Crouched down, I simply held still in the shadow itself and prayed they wouldn't glance side to side.

"Never could handle his drink. Lightweight."

The head disappeared, but not until it had disappeared down the corridor did I dare move again. All this sneaking had been teaching me. They had said they wouldn't be long, implying they would come back. But that was no reason to go early and risk them turning around. Wow, I really could do this sneaking thing...

Smiling at the thought, I retraced my steps and headed to the stairwell again. That slaver had spoken to somepony, so there was no doubt a slaver up here. As such, I crouched low to the stairs and instead used my little mirror to see over the lip of the stairwell. Squinting to see on the shiny fragment, I saw movement up ahead. Another buck was already wandering away toward the security station we'd once laid our plans to take down Barb in. Perfect!

Tucking away the mirror, I sneaked up and kept behind the pony as they trotted onward. Watching the ground every half second to avoid loose plates, I bit my lip that they wouldn't turn around until I could reach the left hand turn that would lead me to the armoury. Ten feet... five feet... don't rush it... don't rush it...

The buck up ahead stopped. My heart skipped, but I had to keep going and risk it. If he turned...

One... more... foot...

There!

Creeping as best I could, I slid around the corner he had passed. Ahead of me lay the armoury door! Huge and thick, it nonetheless lay open. I could hear somepony trotting around inside humming to themselves. I couldn't risk hanging around outside, so I made my way to the door and used my mirror to glance in.

Blunderbuck was half skipping between cages and a workbench, humming musically and at times almost dancing even while he worked. Blunderbuck was a good pony, but I couldn't risk anypony seeing me. 'No evidence' was what Protégé had said. Seeing him looking away at his workbench and straining with a wrench, I took the chance to slip into the armoury.

Thankfully, it being so crushed in with cages and boxes, hiding or moving unseen in here was simple. Sticking close to the walls, I squeezed myself in behind the weapon cages and stayed completely out of sight as I moved toward the back where Protégé had informed me Mosin kept his desk.

"Hmm... I think you'll look lovely with a four holed flash suppressor won't you? Oh yes, you will! Then we'll take a look and see what sights you need to just complete you, honey! Oh! Maybe I can even give you a little paint job, you like a little orange?"

Blunderbuck spoke as though he was dressing up a foal, clearly taking a delight in his work. It became clear why he put up with Mosin if he got to play with the things he loved. Sticking to my route, I slid underneath a table bearing various guns in a state of disrepair and moved behind the primary cage in the centre of the room to reach the massive shelves that formed up the back of the armoury. I could see Mosin's desk at the far end under a flickering lamp, nicely out of sight from Blunderbuck at his workstation. Hoof by hoof, I made my way toward it as the light flickered on again.

I almost screamed as I saw somepony huge standing right there.

Stuffing my hoof into my mouth to stifle it, I staggered back and almost made to run. The colossal figure loomed up ahead of me, held aloft by wires and rope tied around them. It... it was metal.

It was a suit of Steel Ranger armour. Dull eyes stared forever outward from the massive figure while its powered joints looked primed and ready to... to... flex? Was that the word? Even the sight made the back of my neck feel all cold and tingly at the memory of those fire wreathed figures in the Stable chasing us with unimaginable firepower. With a chance to finally see one for what it was, I saw every line of metal, every carefully hoof crafted flourish of design and every thick rivet that stood out upon the plates. More than ever, I reflected on how huge they were, this one seeming even bigger than I remembered. The thought that normal ponies were inside them... wow.

It seemed older than the others though, bearing less machine produced parts and more adornment along the hooves and crest while yet seeming less advanced. Heavier and less refined, it clearly was an earlier model. Maybe even a proto... protowhatever it was. Upon its flank, I saw a single giant green apple.

Wow...

I'd have to draw it later. But for now, I had work to do. Trotting around it to the desk, I set myself behind it and opened my saddlebag. Protégé had provided me with a copy of both application documents and a nomination form to help me compare and identify anything of use to steal. Mosin's desk was filled with notes and schematics of various weapons, along with trinkets like a Hellhound's tooth and a glued together collection of various rifle rounds. Annoyingly, his documents seemed written with worse handwriting than my meagre attempts. Either that or it was just his own language or codewords or something. I still couldn't read anyways. Not that I'd need to.

Shifting through the papers with the copy documents in hoof, I got absolutely nowhere. Nothing seemed even vaguely similar!

"Let's just put you in a place you'll love. I've got an Ironshod over-under that you'll look a beauty next to! Look at his bayonet, isn't it shiny? Yes it iiiiiis!"

The cage this desk was behind opened and I heard Blunderbuck shifting around inside it. Grabbing a bunch of papers, I ducked down again and kept comparing. Nothing. Nothing. Nothing nothing nothing!

"Come on, give me a break..." I muttered quietly and placed the papers back on top, before turning to his drawers. "Just one bit of luck?"

Yanking them open quickly, I had to hop up on my hind legs to see inside, almost leaning my head right into it. My hooves scrambled through it all.

"Come on, come on... aha! Got it!" I grinned to myself.

His nomination form lay in my hooves, with a tick already on it upon who he wanted.

"Ohoohiet! I leave you alone for single second and already with the fucking paint! Ey, parshiviy, syuda idi!"

Oh no!

"Oh! Hello, sir! I was just—"

"What in fuck have you done to poor rifle? Using pussy plastic shit all over the proud wood it was designed for! Oyobuk! Get paint thinner before it sinks in and remove anything not ten years old! Is looking like fucking book of comic! You hear that?"

"Hear what?"

I sure didn't hear anything.

"That! Is sound of original designer spinning in grave fast enough to power fucking country!"

Feeling sorry for Blunderbuck, I bit my lip and looked up briefly to see their vague shapes through the cage. I liked his designs; he was just having fun trying things, I knew he could make things that worked too. I was wearing one. Blunderbuck just got carried away sometimes, that was all...

I heard a wooden hoof hit something and Blunderbuck yelping in pain.

"Fix shit now!"

"Yes, sir!"

"All is polnyi pizdets... at least I get to sort out ridiculous children with guns on wall soon."

I heard him trot across the armoury, thankfully not in this direction. Around the edge of the cage, I saw Blunderbuck sigh and reach for a tin of paint thinner and a bucket. The poor buck looked more disappointed in his imagination being stopped than anything else. I still believe in you, Blunderbuck...

Nevertheless, I had a job to do. My concern for him had to come second, if I were caught I was very much beyond help! Casting a glance to his form, I made to simply take it. Let's see him vote with this!

However, the thought eventually came to me. I got a copy of it... what if he could as well? This was a last ditch effort by Protégé and me, but it could still go wrong. I needed something better...

Oooh, thank you Glimmer!

Taking all of it, I trotted to the side and hid behind the cage I'd approached through. Pulling my charcoal out, I leaned down and placed Mosin's form beside my copy. I could see his signature at the bottom, a spiky and harsh kind of writing. With careful ease, I leaned down to the copy and began to copy the shapes. Letters were hard, but I knew curves and shape much better! Gradually, I sketched through it all.

“Assistant! Where is form?”

“No idea, sir! Didn’t you leave it in your drawer?”

Looking up, I saw relocating had been a good idea. Barely ten feet away, Mosin was messing around his desk, apparently uncaring that some things weren’t in the same place. He clearly wasn’t as careful as Protégé. Trying to move slowly, I finished up the signature. Now... the hard bit...

He had no doubt voted Shackles... so that was how his name looked...

Now, ‘p’ was... it was... um... oh dear...

I scanned the form, looking for Protégé’s name. I could do more than just have Mosin not vote!

‘P’ was a... a line with... um... a circle. But there was another that looked so similar with it all flipped, the ‘d’! Which was it? I sat and strained my head, closing my eyes and trying to remember Protégé’s patient tuition on these arcane symbols. I could feel my wings jittering nervously, overacting with their newfound movement. Come on, I was a new pony now! I could do this!

Oh... oh wait.

Looking at all the candidates, there was only one with a line and a circle attached. That had to be him! None started with a ‘d’! It was the best I could try, I just hoped I was right. Marking a little tick beside his name, I grinned and folded it back up. Carefully, I tried to copy all the little marks. Good enough!

“Is not here! Tell me you did not scribble your youth fantasies of what you call weapon on again?”

“I didn’t, sir! Here, let me look!”

Behind Mosin’s back, I gently slipped the false one back onto the desk and hid before Blunderbuck came around.

“Wha... what in fuck is... I must be getting old. Assistant, take slip and deliver. I will clean up after mess you leave, yeban’ko maloletnee! Go!”

Blunderbuck grabbed the form in his mouth and took off, no doubt glad to be away from Mister Mosin for a while. The stallion turned, his wooden hoof distinct on the floor before collapsing onto his chair.

“Is driving to madness, is this place... too much paper, too little action. Shouting worked much better in Stalliongrad. Authority through volume, yes. Ridiculous mountain trek shit on supply, giving slave winter rifle...”

Overhearing his mutterings, I was already creeping away and almost following Blunderbuck as he went. Stopping only briefly, I leaned onto a shelf and relieved them of a gun repair kit. Glimmerlight had wanted one, after all! Hooking the heavy metal box onto my saddle, I left the armoury and began my journey back to outside.

I just hoped this would make a crucial difference. Protégé had to be one of the nominations or Fillydelphia was in for a very bad future indeed.

“Murk! Were you successful?” Protégé got up from the old seat in the high rise we’d once visited, our designated meeting point after my mission.

It hadn’t taken long, really. After stashing the repair kit and some of my new acquirements outside near our old cell's door, I hadn't waited to get back to him. Now I wandered happily in and nodded.

"You got it?"

"Um... hehe... better, I gave him it back. Just with your name on it."

There was a moment of realisation in his face, before he couldn't hide the genuine look of sudden admiration at the cheeky grin I wore.

"Very good, Murk. I'm glad you're no doubt getting something from your first lesson alone. Now come on, we'll have to get back to the FunFarm, the nominations won't be too long from now and I must be there early."

"Do... do you think this can work?"

"It'll have to, Murk." Protégé seemed unsure for himself. "Shackles can't win here."

He led the way back through the corridors and past the old robot still cleaning up. Along the way, Protégé seemed to ponder on something and looked to me.

"Tell me, Murk. How did you get it back without them spying the difference? You couldn't have made it precise..."

I just smiled and continued trotting with my head held up like a pegasus should.

"Oh, showing just enough to make them fill in the rest themselves is better than showing all."

I quoted Glimmer word-for-word and trotted on proudly. Only after a second did I realise the very odd and confused look he was giving me as his lips silently repeated the words to himself.

"What?"

The trip back was cautious. Travelling through Fillydelphia openly was simply an invitation to anypony who sought a chance to get us alone. As such, we stuck mostly to primary routes to better remain under the watchful eyes of the griffons. Protégé was silent, occasionally moving his lips as though debating something to himself; likely about what Old Grizzly had asked him to do. Only after stopping at the logistics hub to find Ragini and bring her along did we finally move toward the FunBarn itself.

Protégé stopped near to the entrance and turned back to me. He held a dark look to his eye.

"Murk, you are sure you wish to come here with me? You could go back to the logistics depot if you want."

"W-why? Isn't it safer with you?"

He seemed reluctant, as though unsure how to word it. Unfortunately, Ragini decided to just say it for him.

"That bastard Shackles will be in here, feathers. Likely that's what he thinks about. You can go and hide if you want."

She smirked, as though taunting me to do just that. I couldn't be sure, but it seemed like she was daring me to try and be more than that. Protégé cast her a harsh glance for cutting in, but the griffon just shrugged. She certainly cared less about rank than before...

"I... I'll come with you." I gulped. "H-he doesn't own me now. Let's just... um... let's try and not go near him?"

Ragini scoffed and shook her head derisively. Protégé just patted my shoulder and noddled.

"We'll try. However, Murk, this is the nominations to take place. All higher-ranked slavers eligible will meet in the main presentation hall of the FunBarn for the announcing of it. If you are with me, you will see him there. This is it, Murk."

He turned and looked back at the entrance, flanked by heavily armoured guards.

"I just hope that the one trick you pulled is enough, Murk. That or requiring Seeker to pull through for us. Not to mention whatever else they have planned. I don't like those Shades on the loose."

"Bring 'em to me." Ragini murmured to herself and hefted the larger rifle of her pair, the energy one. "Talons and the Shades got a score to settle."

"This isn't about your revenge, Ragini."

"Just saying... if there's a clean shot between me and them, I don't care if Red Eye himself is talking at the time."

She moved on into the FunBarn ahead of us, leaving Protégé looking rather concerned at her back bearing the broken wings. Edging beside him, I coughed a little.

"I'll come in... m-maybe I might hear something needed. You need all the support you can..."

Protégé didn't remove his eyes from the building.

"All right, Murk. Let's just hope this goes how it needs to now. There's one hour till the announcements, but I must prepare first. We have to assume this will work. The moment this is done, I shall attempt to see if I can get an audience with Master Red Eye. He will be interested in what you have to say, Murk."

Following him up to the door, the guards seemed surprised to see it was me. Of course, they'd chased me when I was here with Unity. The interior was much the same, polished wooden or concrete floors alongside cracked pink paint upon the walls until we opened out into the central hub where slaves sat bent over terminals. I had to weave around slavers to follow Protégé as the crowds got thicker. Clearly, this event was of particular importance to any slaver that bore some sort of major responsibility in Fillydelphia. A few I remembered seeing on Red Eye's balcony at the Pit. One I remembered from Shackles and Grindstone's meeting. Some I recognised from shifts, while others were entirely new to me.

There was talk. Oh... there was talk.

Moreso, the moment Protégé had entered the room, I heard conversations change. Trotting behind him, my ears picked out hushed whispers remarking on his stance alongside Red Eye or muttered curses against the slave made slaver. If Protégé heard then he made no notice, simply stepping around the groups and continuing his way to the back stairs.

Fillydelphia was as divided about him as they were about how they treated slaves.

Of course, there were the glances toward me...

"Hey! Since when did his wings work?"

"Wasn't he the one in the Pit?"

"Looks like teacher's pet got himself a toy!"

Huge slavers or nasty looking overseers eyed me up, causing me to weave through the crowds to keep up with Protégé. I tried to keep my wings on my side, tried to not let them see the fear in my eyes that any next face could be his. Word would spread, he'd know before long. Oh this maybe wasn't a good idea...

Finally, at last, we reached the stairs and ascended out of the crush. Ragini was waiting on the far end for us.

"I'll keep an eye down here, sir. Get a feel for the ground."

"Good thinking, Ragini. I won't be long before I come back down." He turned to me as we continued on, Ragini taking up post by the stairs. "My apologies, Murk. It's just best to keep quiet and move on. Don't worry, it'll be quieter up here."

"Th-thank you..."

We emerged to the same line of offices I'd once seen before with Unity. To my surprise, Protégé moved into the same one we had once visited, belonging to Old Grizzly. With the window overlooking the side of the FunBarn and the rollercoaster, the red light of Fillydelphia lit up the desk and the massed Pinkie Pie birthday cards that Grizzly had apparently never bothered to get rid of.

Only, it wasn't unoccupied. Grizzly was there.

As was a foal.

A little colt sat at the desk wearing the black and red attire of Red Eye's students, but he bore an almost comically oversized, floppy hat that barely even fitted his head. I stopped in the doorway and stared. I'd seen him before in a memory!

The colt looked up, as did Grizzly.

"Mister Protégé!" The colt's voice was high pitched and excitable. He leapt off the raised chair to charge around the desk and barrel into the unicorn. Smiling, Protégé patted his head and gently stepped back from the tiny figure's embrace around his neck.

"How are you doing, Chirpy?"

Chirpy Sum!

It was him!

Coral Eve's son.

"You'll never believe it, Protégé!" Chirpy was, if anything, a colt who lived up to his name. "Mister Grizzly let me work on the procurement documents because somepony messed up all the numbers! I got to work with tons of decimal points and he even let me do it on the terminal and send it off! I did it for real!"

The little earth pony was bouncing on all four hooves with a huge grin on his face. His two tone blue mane and tail bounced about from his hopping, headed up by a massive white grin below huge rounded and bright eyes of turquoise. Unlike Coral's light grey, he seemed to have a soft and sandy brown as a coat instead.

"Very good, Chirpy. I knew allowing you to get more practical experience would be what you needed. I am very glad to hear you're enjoying it."

"Enjoying it? He's faster than I ever was." Old Grizzly chuckled while he trotted over and patted a big hoof onto the very proud looking colt's head. "Quick little learner, that's for sure."

"Uh huh! Mister Grizzly said I could come work in your place cos it's got lots and lots of stuff needing done too and was still technically a bit of the FunBarn! That's still within Daddy Red Eye's area!"

My heart almost stopped. Was that Daddy he'd said?

Already, I dreaded Coral having to find that out.

"So Mister Grizzly said I could come! Can I? He said I could!"

"Did he now?"

I saw the look they gave each other. Somepony had just been elected childminder without being asked. If I weren't so concentrated in the idea that Chirpy was right here, I might have laughed. What was I supposed to do? Did I tell him I knew his mother? Would it upset him? Did I try to get a message to him? I just didn't know what to say here, for the effect of Red Eye's influence as a teacher upon Chirpy was evident. Being present through the foal's development had set him into an important figure in the same way I saw Glimmer as a sister.

"I really really want to work with you, Mister Protégé! Cause you're real smart and stuff!"

"I'm sure we can arrange it, Chirpy. Sir, would you mind passing on the request form for out of hotel training for Chirpy?"

"Mind? Hah, it's already done."

"I... see." There was that look again, although Protégé seemed to take it on the chest and smiled to the colt. "I'll be glad to have you around. But come, where are my manners? Here's my current assistant for you to meet, Chirpy. This is Murk."

I lifted a hoof and waved lightly. "Um... hi?"

My hoof was suddenly shaken hard, the foal using both of his own to do so. Chirpy Sum skipped around me a few times. Hopping up, he landed in front of me and pushed his face up to mine, those impossibly large pupils in his eyes bright with glee.

"Oh! Hiya, Mister Murk! You're Mister Protégé's assistant? Wow, you're lucky! I've heard about you from Starshine and Lilac! They're two really good friends of mine! They said you knew my mo—"

"I believe we should perhaps get down to business, Protégé." Grizzly cut in. "Chirpy? Go next door to see Overseer Comet, he'll take you back to the Hotel for dinner and get your papers organised to maybe visit the logistics hub later today, alright?"

"Okay, Mister Grizzly!" Chirpy turned and saluted up with a hoof with a big grin. He jumped up on the spot and spun to face the other way to trot out.

"I hope we get to talk soon, Mister Murk! I... um... Lilac said—"

"Chirpy." Old Grizzly's voice dropped just a little.

The colt cut off and gulped. Nodding, he left the room. Old Grizzly and Protégé both seemed to glare at me.

"While I appreciate you bringing a new foal to us, Murk, reminding them of their parents they can't see again is not a wise idea." Grizzly didn't seem to enjoy the fact of saying it, as though reading off a mental script. "Don't mention Coral Eve to him."

"Yes, sir."

I could grin inside my head. I was lying through my teeth to say that. Protégé stared closely, maybe he knew that I was lying. He'd always been good at that, but he stayed silent.

"Now, Protégé. We should prepare for what will emerge, should you win out. We have forty minutes. Go over what you will say to me, I trust you to turn it into a speech to rival Shackles' call for union and results, but I want to ensure you say what they need to hear by my estimate."

"Sir, there are things Master Red Eye must know. You know this, but Murk has some information of his own we didn't have time to talk about about before regarding their plans to take to the mountains outside Fillydelphia and—"

"One thing at a time, Protégé. One thing at a time. We need to win you a nomination first. Then we'll talk about what needs to be done for the future. Now sit down, let me hear what you have. If you could move to the corridor and keep a watch I'd be very pleased,

Murk.”

“Yes, sir...”

Passing a last glance with Protégé as I left him with one of his old teachers, I moved to sit outside the door and await him. Even as I slumped back, a door beside me opened and an overseer trotted out with Chirpy in tow.

The little colt saw me and smiled, but didn't say a word. He just nodded.

Smiling thinly, I nodded back.

Smart kid, Coral had raised him well. He knew the score here. We would wait to get a better chance to speak.

The time passed slowly. For once lately, I found myself simply sitting with nothing to do but think. Occasionally I heard Protégé speaking through the doorway, muffled lines and test segments of speech quickly tempered by Grizzly's deeper tone. But on the whole, I was left to myself simply to act as a watchdog. Despite understanding the purpose, I couldn't help but feel detached from the entire thing.

I hadn't quite realised how important this was to him until now. It had just been taking time to help him at first. But feeling the time mounting and the clock ticking down to this moment, the realisation of just how important this nomination was began to sink in. This wasn't just keeping Shackles out, this was something truly meaningful to Protégé and his continued life. A chance for him to perhaps make some real change here.

The next few hours would be crucial.

So I simply sat and waited. The waiting was always the worst. I spent it drawing my friends or myself with my wings again, with the DJ in my ear. Eventually however, the urge to draw began to fade as ideas began to falter. After putting the finishing strokes to an image of Pinkie Pie cracking up with laughter and surrounded by sprite bots, I simply lay my head back against the wall. The thought that she had given me such clues and indications was almost like a dream unto itself. Really, I wished I could get another of Sundial's messages to play soon. If I was lucky, it might even contain further clues on what to expect down there; but truly I was just curious to hear what had happened next after Pinkie had set him to this task.

“We’ve not much news on the Stable Dweller’s little excursion other than a rumour passing by me that she was spotted heading away from Canterlot and toward Maripony itself. Now, my little ponies, we can only guess what she’s up to now, but don’t think this won’t be something beneficial. Just keep believing and keep fighting that good fight, wastelanders. We can all stand up for something now and again. I know I tell folks to keep your head down, but sometimes you just gotta put it up high and take the chance. Put yourself in the firing line to do what’s right. In the end, somepony’s gotta stand up tall. Here’s something to boost those fightin’ spirits...”

My PipBuck clicked and switched over to a wartime number by Sweetie Belle, intended to lift the mood of soldiers listening in the field and get them willing to defend their country. The DJ had mentioned all that before, but as I listened now I simply sighed and hoped that I could muster that same spirit when the time truly came.

Behind me, I heard the voices stop. Hooves trotted up and toward the door. Perking up, I tucked away my journal and hopped up. With a click, the door unlocked and opened for Old Grizzly to step out.

Behind him came Protégé. I'd never seen him looking so serious; so drawn and on edge as though desperately memorising things he needed.

"You will accompany us, Murk. You are my assistant and you should be in attendance."

"Of course, I'll come and—"

"Yes will suffice, Murk. Do not forget to address me by rank."

His voice was terse. Taken aback from the harsher look he gave me, I got a sense of just how seriously he had to take this. All the same, I couldn't help but feel myself rebel against that side of him. The slaver.

"Yes, master."

"Better. Now come on."

The FunBarn was all filtering toward one room. Amongst the crowds, we were afforded a decent space. Protégé and Grizzly led, followed by Ragini and myself. Despite myself, I stuck close to her amongst the harsh gazes of those who had once worked me to the bone. Once too close, as I felt her talon clip the side of my head to back off.

That one room they moved toward now opened before me. A room for Ministry of Morale trials.

A courtroom.

Everypony seemed to know where to go. Old Grizzly split off and shifted through the seating to where a judge might once have sat, taking his place at the seat of power itself. Of course, he'd been put in charge of the nominations. I just hoped nopony had got wind of the information he had 'leaked' to Protégé. Beside him I saw various officials from Red Eye's staff take their seats. Everypony else filed into the viewing areas by the sides and front of the room. In the middle, there lay two enclosed sections with one chair each, no doubt for victim and criminal in times gone past. Was that how it worked? I didn't really know. Before the primary seat, between those two areas was one more line of chairs, likely where somepony having to face the wrath of the Ministry would sit to hear their sentence.

The entire thing was somewhat thrown off by the party balloons painted on the curtains all around the edges. Oh Pinkie...

"Well... well... well..."

All the sound in the room disappeared from my ears but for that one voice behind me. Everything in my mind, rebellious nature and optimism collided with fear and loathing. To turn or to flee. He wasn't my master... he wasn't my master...

"Look what turned up here."

I turned.

Ahead of me, standing in the aisle with his enormous bulk, was Chainlink Shackles. Every muscle in my body was tensing painfully, my eyes trying not to cringe in terror. Huge, harsh, and bearing a wide grin, Chainlink Shackles trotted toward me. Only after my first glance did I see he was badly limping, one front leg stood up with a wooden aid and various body supports on his torso and neck. A tube ran from his nose to a small whirring machine clasped to his armour. Brimstone had truly messed him up; but even with that, the atmosphere he cast over me was impossibly strong.

"Come to return yourself to me, eh? Come back to your Master?"

Moment of truth, Murky. Do it. Do it for your friends.

“N-no.”

He stopped on the spot, ten feet away from me. His eyes narrowed. Slavers passed either side of him, but we were left to face one another amidst the crowd. I couldn't see where Protégé was. I was alone with him.

“I... I'm with Prot—”

“That isn't a choice you can make, Number Seven.” He resumed stepping forward, myself moving backwards and stumbling. “You are mine and after this is over you will return with me, understand?”

“No! I'm not yours, I'm—argh!”

I tripped back from moving without looking. Falling on my rump, he loomed over me and began to reach a hoof forward.

“Never your choice, slave. You're destined to be with me. You can run to the upstart, but he can't protect you. The longer you remain away the longer I shall make your punishment for defiance. You don't even get to die until I tell you. By your mark, by my will you survived by fate to be mine and—”

“NO!”

He could scare me. He could make me sweat and shiver. I could have nightmares about being his and fear the collar that still hung at his side. But I knew why I survived and that was not it!

“My friends brought me back, Shackles! My mark is to be free! I'm not yours! I... I never w-will be any more!”

“Insolent worm, shut up!”

His hoof struck me across the face hard. I hadn't expected him to move as quick. Feeling my jaw wrench I fell to the floor. Around me, slavers had stopped to watch. I saw some looking confused at my presence at all. Others grinned with satisfaction at the unruly slave being put in his place. Most just seemed annoyed at the disturbance I'd made by shouting.

“You've got some ridiculous ideas in your head to believe that, Number Seven. You're coming with me. In your collar, you shall be the icon of how I shall move forward in my city. Of unswerving obedience. Now hold still.”

I made to get up, to turn and simply flee, but slavers were all around us. I could hear Protégé far off! They had all heard my protest, they saw this as right. I wanted to shout, but the words didn't come.

“Back off, Shackles! He's not yours now.”

The collar stopped coming toward me, before Shackles stood back up and glanced angrily to the side. Ragini stood grimly with her eyes locked on him.

“Murky Number Seven belongs by his will to Master Protégé by stint of voluntary assistance rules. Unless Murk chooses to be yours again, he isn't.”

“You're playing a dangerous game, ‘flightless.’ Look around you... these are those who support my vision. The runt will be mine in time.”

I saw Ragini's talon loosely grip around her rifle's trigger guard.

“Rules are rules in this city. I only enforce them. Even if the dodo's an annoying brat, he's Protégé's annoying brat. You can take the issue up with Grizzly if you want. He's senior in this room.”

“Hehe... Old Grizzly is nothing but an appointed favourite for his tone. He is no slaver for time to remember. You wonder why he's never been anything but a senior advisor and small time master? You can keep the runt for now... but he'll come back to me eventually. After all..."

He narrowed his eyes, reaching forward and almost lovingly stroking my chin.

"Blood is thicker than water, runt. You'll come crying to me eventually. Especially when you imagine what your friends are going through."

"They... they're strong..."

"Perhaps. Slaves only last so long in the metro though..."

He grinned at the shocked look across my face. He'd put them in the metro! In the mines! Please... please be all right! I felt the temptation to give in now, just to try and bargain for them to be out of there, but I knew I had nothing to bargain with. Shackles cackled and turned to trot down toward the front of the courtroom with his supporters in tow. He knew the worry he'd instilled in my heart. The thought of that pony I'd seen with the infected wounds... then seeing Glimmer's face on hers and... no!

"Get up, kid. Don't dare move anywhere you're not supposed to. It's unusual you're here at all." Ragini muttered down to me as she nearly dragged me into the back rows.

"I won't... I just... th-thank you..."

"Shut up."

I hunched into my chair, trying to fight back the tears of anguish as I imagined my friends down there. I wanted to get rid of the images in my head. To stop seeing the worst. In an attempt to stay sane and even somewhat controlled to myself, I glanced around.

Protégé, Shackles, Grindstone, and various other slavers I'd seen hold higher authority sat near the front. I could see Slit off to one side near to Mosin. List Seeker was on the opposite side, looking grim and forgone. More filtered in, taking their positions.

I could see Shackles glancing back at me, eye to eye. I tried to hold the stare, I really did. But his mouth moved and I heard quiet words only for my ears whisper across the room.

"I can see you shaking, Number Seven. See the fear in your eyes..."

Squinting and pulling my gaze away, I only heard him chuckle and turn back around.

"This event shall begin now!" Grizzly had stood up, clapping a hoof on the wooden table before him. "Quiet down. This should not take long and you can all be on your way. The order of the day shall be the final announcement of the nomination votes as counted in the last hour. There were some late entries from newer promotions but the results now sit before me. In the event of a single majority, we shall hold a hearing from the winner and officially recognise them as Stern's successor in the future."

"Hold up! Hold up!" A voice cried out from near the front. "Where is Stern? For that matter where is Red Eye himself?"

"Hear! We cannot proceed with this in the absence of the leader!"

"Red Eye is currently tasked with the preparations for Unity itself with Stern's tactical aid." Grizzly spoke over them. "The timing is unfortunate, but he or she will not be joining us. They have cast their votes and Red Eye has given his goodwill to the restoration of democratic representation from those considered of a level to understand the elements involved."

He stopped, as though offering a space for somepony to talk. Nopony did.

"As said, in the event of a single noticeable nomination we shall declare a winner. However in the event of more than one leader with numerous votes, we shall enter into a formal path of election and hear from each nominee with their personal elements for the city as a whole to vote between them rather than having freedom of voting for anypony."

"What if one pony has a much bigger majority?" That was Slit, she sat looking rather bored and eager to try and point out any loopholes. I knew her as the kind to do that.

"No change. All that matters here is identifying those who have some degree of support."

"But if somepony is bigger on votes then surely they win!" Slit carried her protest, before being shouted up by many of Shackles' supporters. They clearly knew their route here.

"Because most of you all vote for yourself!" Grizzly shouted over the noise. "A secondary election will then force you all to pick a candidate and get a true majority! That is Red Eye's will! That is how this will be done!"

"Sounds like double voting for me! A chance to screw them over!" Another Shackles supporter.

To my surprise, it was Protégé that stood this time.

"Master Red Eye has decreed this! It is by his neutral opinion that this be designed to allow a better system rather than a simple popularity contest!"

Didn't he sound different! I'd never heard him so harsh in argument, but I figured this was the place for it.

"Neutral position? Says the teacher's pet and 'prodigy' himself?"

Wormtail was making his presence known, I hadn't even noticed him slipping in.

"Master Red Eye knows how to do this, Wormtail." Protégé turned to glare up at him. "This is, by simple mathematics, a fairer system."

"Then why does it allow bias in the room for decisions and support of speeches, hmm? Never think of that, upstart?" Wormtail was taking from Shackles' vocabulary again. "They bar slavers of greater knowledge yet allow you to bring a mercenary and a slave in here to support you?"

That got a good cheer, I could hear Grizzly attempting to gather some sort of 'order' over it all.

"Especially as one of them is a known mutant that could overhear sensitive details and pass it on to you! Who knows? That PipBuck of his could send messages to your little gift from Red Eye!"

"This is ridiculous!" Protégé shouted up, a hoof stomping on the seating panel. "The system works, you are simply trying to confuse it under your own bias!"

"Now who's accusing who?" Grindstone stood beside Protégé. "Perhaps if you wish to prove this 'unbiased way' of Red Eye in such a good system you should remove those two from this room? Or do you have any objection to that? By rule they shouldn't even be here if other slavers are not here instead."

There was a silence. I was sure Ragini, Grizzly, and Protégé could see what just happened. That was a planned argument. Slowly, I saw Protégé look up at us and slowly turn to Grizzly. The old pony knew it, they were forced into an argumentative corner.

"The masters are right, Protégé," he spoke slowly, carefully, "technically Ragini and Murky Number Seven should not be present if they are not permitted to bring their own aids and assistants in as support."

He was being forced to allow their wishes. Everypony knew it made no difference, they just wanted to force him to concede to something. If he didn't, the entire process was likely to fall apart in argument that I was sure Shackles would take advantage of. Slowly, Protégé nodded and sat down again. Grizzly looked up to us.

"Ragini and Murk, if you would return to your place of work. The hearing is being broadcast on the frequency of Red Eye's secondary channel should you wish to listen in still.”

That was that. We hadn't a choice but to up and leave. I passed a smugly grinning Wormtail on the way out. Looking back, I saw Protégé sitting alone at the front, surrounded by those who would seek to bring him down. I hated to leave him like that, but really... I had no choice now.

We were led away and escorted from the FunBarn, a few of Grindstone's slavers ensuring to not let up on our tail until Ragini and I were outside. Really, I was glad she was still there at the very least. Without her I'd be easy prey.

“S-so what now?” I looked up (and further up) at the taller griffon.

She just snorted derisively. “You go back to the warehouse. I've just been given a bit of free time to go about my own business. Now where did you last see that Shade?”

I told her, pointing out the building across from the warehouse behind the FunBarn. Ragini lightly unslung her rifle and loosened off her neck.

“I'll be back soon. Just going to go hunting...”

“They're probably gone. They are really good at sneaking and, um...”

“I caught you didn't I? Those raiders aren't going to get away. They took my fucking wings, I'm going to repay the favour to them before they die. Talons. Don't. Forget.”

She stalked off, clicking her head around to the rooftops as she went. That griffon sure was intense. I remembered her breaking necks with her talons alone in the Mall, with any luck she might find the Shades. Much as I hated killing in general, it would be a weight off my mind if they were gone.

Unfortunately, it left me rather alone. Not wanting to take risks, I galloped off back to the warehouse instead. The guards let me through without incident, allowing me into the main store room. Within, I could see some of the slavers surrounding a radio, listening to the hearing themselves. The thought to take the time and lift some more things occurred to me, but seeing Mudball staring and seeming to grin at me being kicked out of the hearing, I really just wanted to go someplace safe. Taking the catwalks, I instead went to Protégé's office and clicked the lock shut behind me. After a second of seeing only his chair and his bed, I instead trotted to the stairs and wearily climbed them into the attic. It felt safer. More hidden.

Besides, I hoped the height up here might eventually set off a message I was dying to hear.

The Shade's kit was still lying around. Some discarded tins of food and notepads to take details on. Even a camera rested on one side, presumably to take pictures of Protégé's files without having to conspicuously steal them. Aside from that, the attic was mostly empty, just a set of dusty chairs and cabinets under the wooden beams and the bullet hole ridden water tank. An old roll of wallpaper about ten feet wide lay nearby too, but that was about that. The attic had long been stripped clean of anything that wasn't junk wooden furniture too heavy to lift, or cobwebs. How boring.

Fiddling with my PipBuck, I wound the frequency dial around until at last I heard Grizzly's commanding voice shouting over as much of an argument as when I'd left. I heard Grindstone protesting about the precise ranks involved. Protégé argued the case by definition. Most fell into a blank noise.

"This process is to build a better future! One where might does not simply make right, Grindstone! One we might be able to transfer away from these dark days to past Unity and the new generation!" Protégé argued passionately but sternly.

"Fillydelphia was built upon leadership! You would seek to remove strong leadership to instead permit vote gathering and politics to muddy that which should be counted upon! Red Eye has always led us well, why should this not continue?"

"He has already made his choice, this was his idea! This isn't about changing the boon of leadership, but simply finding the best way to ensure a continuation of that leadership. This is not an election of a new leader for us all."

"He has been wrong before and changed plans based upon our feedback, Protégé! Long before you came here, we helped him shape this. Why risk a fracture? I know it's not replacing Red Eye, but this could set a precedent for the future."

Briefly, I wondered why Grindstone was seeking so hard to overrule the entire process. Didn't he want Shackles to use it to win? Maybe they were getting wind that it was less of a sure thing now and didn't like the idea that Protégé could seek a victory based upon him and Shackles in competition?

This was all far over my head. Either that or he wished it to avoid this process to simply see Shackles' majority as the only clear path. They were trying to shut Protégé out, rather than allow Shackles in.

"The process is decided." Grizzly cut into the argument. "Red Eye gave his order to carry it through, if you wish to object upon it, you can see him afterwards. But for now we will do as commanded and count the nominations. Much of it has already been drafted from early submissions."

"Then reveal them already!" I heard Wormtail shout that, followed by most of the arguing slavers present. "Who voted for who?"

"We will not be revealing names, anonymity is assured, that is why I have my position. However, even as I see them before me here, there is one clear majority."

Oh no.

"One clear majority and one smaller spike in votes for a second party. These being for Chainlink Shackles and Protégé."

The courtroom burst into opposition and support. Most of the older slavers called for the simple clear majority to simply take it and win. That was no doubt the crux of Shackles and Grindstone's plan, to use the theory of 'most wins.' Now I saw it, they knew he would get the most and simply wanted to, well, simplify it all. Push it on through with 'popular' support. Protégé had to try and argue for it to be an ongoing process without looking like he was simply defending his own chances now.

I didn't envy him that awkward position one bit.

"The process is clear, we have two noted candidates nominated for future vote and—"

"Bullshit!" Slit interrupted Grizzly. "Look at the numbers! Master Shackles has more than twice the nominations! That's clear as glass!"

It all fell into more and more argument. Passive aggressive threats mixed with debates of logic and individual meanings of words. It all dragged onto an almost pathetic level, a struggle for power where nopony was truly allowed to say what they honestly wanted to. The whole idea of having to work that way made my head hurt. Leader and follower was all I'd really known until lately too.

"They can—"

Beep!

The signal cut. Replaced instead by the familiar chirpy of my PipBuck. Sitting up, I held it before me and eagerly leaned toward the screen.

Beep!

Try as I might, the excitement of hearing him again went deep, even if it had interrupted the hearing. Alone in the attic, I grasped the PipBuck and waited impatiently while staring at our combined cutie marks upon the device itself.

Beep!

Click.

“So... um... I, I really don't know what to say to begin this again. After the last one, I just... I'm sorry if I scared anypony. I know it scared me. Things have happened. Things have changed. I don't think my life is ever going to go back to the way it was. Whether that's good or not I... I just don't know.”

I could hear a roaring wind behind him. Perhaps he'd gone somewhere alone and high to talk. I'd certainly do the same. That's why I'd come up here.

“See, they got me. The Ministry of Morale. I won't go over all the details but... I thought that was it. That they'd memory strip me until I wasn't me anymore! They put me in a cell and I... I admit it, I just lay down and kept crying because I was afraid I wouldn't see anypony I knew again. No pony told me what was going on! Not until she came. Pinkie Pie herself...”

His voice was still shaking. It couldn't have been long after for him.

“Sh-she came and told me not to worry. That I'd been 'naughty' but that she wanted to help fix it all. I just spilled, told her everything. Told her why I'd done it. That I'd been so worried and-and driven to my wits end by constant Stable drills and test megaspell sirens that I would do anything to get Sky a ticket! Pinkie, she... she just hugged me and told me that she understood what it was like to go a little crazy when you were worried about losing your friends.”

He stopped briefly. Holding my ear close, I could hear him sniffing a little in the background. The wind kept whipping around, stronger than before. Where even was he?

“So she offered me a deal to make up for it. To go into the zebras as a double agent. That she would provide me with some secret plans they'd long given up using to act as a way to smooth myself into them again. I was to find out what was going on then get back to her. If I managed it, she'd get me a ticket for Sky. 'Better to do good for Equestria if you're that bouncy to help your luvy duvy marefriend out' she said. She's right. I accepted.”

Try as I might, I couldn't help but see something oddly familiar in this. Just as he was to help Pinkie in her task to achieve what he wanted, I was now working with Protégé. Pinkie had been right, he and I were pretty similar.

“Well, long story short, it's worked. The zebras found me within hours of me getting out. I thought they might kill me, but the plans worked. I don't know what she did to make them believe I'd escaped, but whatever it was it worked. They told me that I couldn't do it like before though. If I wanted to keep helping them it'd be as a worker in their plans. I... I've to go where I'm suspecting those missing Wartime Ministry workers are going, to do the same job. They told me to wait here, outside the city and... and...”

He stopped. I heard him shuffling and looking around as the wind picked up again and blasted white noise into the recording.

"They're taking me somewhere. I don't know where. I've heard them talk about somewhere underground or a-a mountain or something. I don't know which one they are taking me to. I don't know what they want me to do there. I... I'm scared... this is so out of my depth. I just hope I get to see Sky again."

I clutched the PipBuck close. I couldn't comfort the past, but I sure anything could try my best.

"Just go with them. Do what they want. Find out what's going on, and then get back to the Ministry in a week's time when Pinkie returns to Filly. Just one week. That's all I need to do. One week and all will be fine. One... week..."

He went silent, then took a sudden breath.

"I... I think they're coming. I can hear them nearby. This is it. I don't know why my life suddenly became important but... I'm going to try. For Sky. W-wish me luck I guess? Here we go..."

Click.

"Good luck..." I half muttered to myself, clutching my hooves around my own body through just imagining the fear. I'd been through scary things myself but I knew all too well how he felt.

Settling back against a wooden beam, I sat with my head in my hooves, trying to make sense of it all.

My friends had been thrown into the hellish pit of the metro, mining for Aurora's secrets.

Protégé was alone at the centre of a desperate conspiracy net to try and prove his place.

Shackles and Grindstone were making their moves for power.

Pinkie Pie had revealed to me we were on the right track but that a veil of mystery had descended on our route out.

Sundial was a potential guide on his own journey. The plans of the zebras.

I know the pieces. I could see them moving across the game board.

I just didn't know why or for what.

As I sat, all the little things started coming together in my mind. All the things I'd heard. That I'd seen. There had to be some solution! Something that told me what it all was! A growing urge within me to just know began to build. I'd been in the dark too long! What was it all?

That urge became action. I wasn't a cohesive thinker. I wasn't somepony who could deduct and make educated guesses.

But I could draw.

Surging to my hooves, I grabbed the wallpaper roll and tugged, drawing the massive sheet out across the attic floor. The very ground would be my canvas! Digging for a charcoal stick, I let my mind drop into the past and of everything in Fillydelphia I now knew. Beneath the dull light of the attic I scampered to and fro, adding lines here, curves there, shapes between them and letting it all emerge.

I drew everything, letting it all flow out. I drew three zebras, then Sundial near them. I drew what I imagined Ministry Station would look like with its abandoned platforms. I drew memory orbs, spell orbs, and the machine that I had seen in the Ministry of Arcane Science that let ponies see the past without being a unicorn. I drew Magister Heartcare and his cult like ghouls of the zebra belief. I drew refugees looking lonely and scared as they were taken somewhere across the bottom of the canvas, a full six feet long. I drew Wartime workers who had participated in Sundial's area, the ones he'd said had disappeared from arcane projects. I drew the lab in the Stable where they had been researching ponies learning things through memory orbs for education.

Lines... lines! They were what mattered! I was sweating with the effort, the movement to bound and jump from image to image haphazardly with no real order. But only now did I circle and connect them all in a great spider web of elements drawn into one! A star shape...

I drew Pinkie Pie toward the side, making her mane as huge and poofy as it truly was. Shackles and Grindstone went on the top left. I circled them and connected both to the Ministry Station. They wanted it. That then connected to a new sketch of Aurora Star! Which in turn connected to the memory research! Which went to the spell orbs!

Again and again, even as I heard the hearing argue in the background over projects and authorities, I dared to simply ignore it and focus what I needed to. Over and over the lines went, crossing and connecting! Beneath me, a huge floor of the past and future connecting unveiled!

There it was...

I fell back, exhausted and staggering. Looking down and letting the charcoal fall from my mouth, I gazed upon my work.

A huge lattice of connected sketches, with the centre blank but for the dozens of lines that crossed over. The one gap that connected everything. That which this was all about.

Memory research to help ponies learn, it had worked with spell orbs. Aurora had wanted that, and had possibly even continued her research without being allowed to in the underground Ministry Station, and in some mountain range outside the city; Grindstone had mentioned that was hers! The zebras had mentioned 'underground' and 'mountain' to Sundial. Those had to be the same places, so she had to be in league with them! A traitor of the highest level!

Aurora Star had places to work and zebras who were bringing in refugees and skilled workers through bribery or threat. All together into... something. Something that Shackles and Grindstone now wanted. Something they had protected so much as to make it a secret that not even Red Eye had found. A secret that would also hold a way out of this city for us, no matter what horrors lurked in there.

Pinkie had said Heartcare had been disappearing, too... he'd certainly been in league with zebras, based on his cult. What if those ghouls with him were the refugees? Why had they all been so fanatical? Had he been allied to Shackles and Grindstone? He had been preparing for a battle after all.

My colossal drawing finally brought it all to reality though. Find out what Aurora was doing, and you find the Ministry Station.

Find the Ministry Station, and you find the way out of Fillydelphia.

We could do this. I'd said that line a hundred times the last few days. Only now did I really begin to feel it. Whatever she'd been doing was long dead. Pinkie had said it wasn't as important as other things, so it likely wasn't a rogue megaspell or a huge hidden army or something. Aurora Star was all about memory... something to do with memory... teaching zebras to fight better?

I would follow Protégé. He would want to find this out to stop Shackles. We would want to find this out to escape.

I just hoped he'd understand and not try to stand in our way at the last moment...

"The nominations are final! That is enough, Slit and Wormtail!"

Grizzly voice came through so hard my PipBuck crackled with static and shook my mind from its thoughts.

"As demanded by Red Eye we shall hear from both the nominations and end this hearing until a future vote is organised with Red Eye's own authorisation and acknowledgement! Chainlink Shackles, would you care to start?"

The hairs on my neck bristled as I heard the clanking and stomping in the background of the signal. Whoever was holding the broadcast equipment clearly had to move quickly.

"We can see where the opinion of Fillydelphia lies."

Warped by the bad quality, his voice sounded more rough and unsettled than ever. I could hear him having to wheeze between sentences, a lingering hurt.

"We can see where those have cast their feelings. Fillydelphia is a strong city, the one that truly rose upon the backs of hard work and proper authority. Power shifts... power changes... but always there is master and slave."

I wondered if Red Eye was listening to this. He knew what Shackles had been before. He deposed him in the first place, after all. I had always wondered why Shackles hadn't reacted worse to that.

"Out there, we build. We grow. We lead. We rise above. You all in here know that in the future, when our dear leader and his second eventually are brought low by time as always happens, Fillydelphia will still need its master. The wasteland can bring anybody to their knees. Remove anybody from life. Would you have somepony who does not understand the history of this city taken to authority?"

A loud cry from the ranks of those involved forced the signal into static. Shackles was brutal and at times even incredibly thin natured, but he wasn't stupid. He knew what to say.

"Fillydelphia grew on power and strength to hold those slaves into their work! You know who would offer this! You know who has done this! You know who is master!"

How could Red Eye know he was here and not stop this? Shackles would undo much of what he tried!

"Fillydelphia can rise further. A superpower of the wastes, one who is not restricted. Red Eye's vision is clear to us all. To create through sacrifice. Oh... I agree."

Like hell you did! I heard the stomping of hooves as he stepped down. Were they voting out of alliance or out of fear? How many other slavers had been threatened like List Seeker? Protégé had to talk to Red Eye soon. This had to stop!

"That is our first nomination, Chainlink Shackles. Bear in mind, this is for Stern's successor. So think to your future, those assembled. Hear both before deciding and—"

"Are you biased, Old Grizzly?"

Grindstone's voice cut in, leading to another retort and gradual argument. Struggling to hear, I pressed my ear to the PipBuck, sitting atop my massive drawing.

"I am... kzzztch... ot biased here. This is a mere reminder that others may have alternative elements to—kzzzztch—"

The PipBuck's sound warped.

"Kzztch! Dirk? Dirk? You there?"

My eyes widened. That was the Shades! The broadcast lingered off, changing back to Grizzly.

"Kzzztch—please come to the stand for his opposing message to the assembled slavers of Fillydelphia. Protégé, if you woul—kzzzztch"

Another drop!

"Kzztch—here, mate. Don't worry, it's all done. Seems somepony fucked with the votes, he got in by one single fucking slip. Plan B's all ready though."

"Kzzzz—you, Grizzly. To those who nominated me." Protégé's voice, before it dropped right back to Dirk again.

"Come and give us a hand if we need it in the escape afterwards. This is going to be public."

"Really?"

"R—kzzzztch—lly. They still think it's just Barb fucking with Protégé from the grave. They ain't wrong, either. Means we can get away with it. Little fucker's going down the moment he finishes that speech, right in front of everypony. Dramatic, right? Same way they fucked Barb before us. Shades don't forgive."

My hooves trembled on the floor. Around me I saw Shackles and Grindstone drawn with circles surrounding them connected to the mountain and Ministry Station. Connected to a sketch of Protégé I'd done. One that settled right below the image of my friends... one that was connected to Ministry Station itself as an escape...

They had been waiting to make their move. To destroy him just as he tried to change Fillydelphia. To prove him wrong that ponies weren't better.

"Kzzzztch—let's go. Grab the rifle with the E.F.S. sight Mosin left us as you come and —kzzzztch!"

Protégé's voice took over the signal.

"This shall not be a speech for the attempt of changing the minds of those who support slavery at its core. This is a message to those who are, within Fillydelphia, the leaders. Those at their heart whom are not slavers. A message that shall, as my chance to speak to you all, bring with it the crux of my belief. The record that should hopefully remain in those very minds even if I were to fade away. The record that Fillydelphia is not just a place. It is potential. One that we can shape, for good or ill."

No! They were going to outright assassinate him! I paced on the spot and in circled, treading on my massive work. Ragini was out there somewhere... she... she was meant to stop it! But I didn't know where she would be! I didn't have my friends. I... I couldn't fight Shades alone!

What could I do? I was just one little sla...

"A potential that stretches longer than all of our wills here today. A potential born of sacrifice and generosity not just of the body, but of our individual wishes to create a greater shared dream. To give up, that others may have."

No. Little, maybe. Afraid, certainly. Helpless?

No I wasn't. Not now.

I turned, grabbing everything I owned along with stopping to throw something else that had been left behind into my saddlebag. My saddle wrapped around me as I spun and wriggled into it. I had to do this. No pony else was going to stop it! Buckling my PipBuck back on, I turned and galloped for the door, leaving the entire star shape of threads and imagery behind me.

Down the stairs. Across the office. Out onto the catwalk.

"I dream of Master Red Eye's vision. We all know it, like this world, isn't perfect. But we could do so much more if we were to put these arguments and this greed behind us, to finally let us change this ethos. What could Fillydelphia achieve then? On this very single day I have met those who would help others, at their own risk, because they believed it right. On this day, I have met those who would put their own life on the line to help protect a future. Yet on this very day I have seen the shadows that seek to strike and draw us back into the wasteland. What could we make without them there?"

I clattered down the gantry, drawing stunned looks from those around me. Almost falling, panting, and desperation lit in my eyes, I galloped for the exit! Slaves stopped and watched as I leapt carts and ducked below empty shelving. Careening outside, I swung to charge toward the FunBarn, passing the Alpha-Omega Hotel on the right.

"Look to the foals we care for. That we protect and so nurture to make them into a greater generation than us. They move on, they improve who they are, despite the hurt. Yes, they are not without hurt; they have each been taken from their parents. Parents I have seen suffer. Yet they make friends. They smile. They push themselves to be better."

The mud clung to me that I bounded and hampered through. Looking around, I tried to watch for any Shades. None appeared, but the back of the FunBarn was coated in deep shadow. How was I even to get into it? They had it locked down! The Shades were likely already inside!

"If they, a generation of children, can improve and change, why not us in turn by their brave little example? Why can we not change for the better and move past the black history that stains this city and forces our hands to be partnered to brutality?"

I saw guards at the entrances. They stood with readied battle saddles. All around the sky above I saw griffons patrolling. There wasn't a way! How could... how could I...

My eyes found the way I'd left before. The very same unrepaired hole that my grapplehook had been found in before! Sprinting forward, I heard a guard shout and give chase. Above, at least one griffon swivelled to drop. There was no way to hide and still keep moving, so I simply galloped for it in plain sight!

"Look around you all. How many of you have been coerced into how you feel? How many simply see no way out? How many of us are but slaves to our own slavery? When we creep in shadows and carefully lock our doors out of fear of one another, what have we become? Do you not wish for something better in the end? Something to let us stop being the monsters? When I look into the eyes of those who are simply afraid to try... I recognise the way they look back at me. I feel the same way..."

Slipping down the slope into the grounds of the FunBarn, I swerved and rolled underneath a slaver's charging tackle. Springing to my hooves, ignoring the pain in my neck, I pointed my grapple gun upwards and flexed my leg. Blunderbuck's aim pointer swung out with the mouthpiece and I laid it upon the hole near the top floors. With a deep bite, I fired and swung up to the wall. Grasping for purchase, I hurriedly began climbing vertically away from them with my hooves against the sheer wooden face of the tall building, almost like I were running very unsteadily upwards.

"Yet, I have been shown that we are the cowards here. The ones afraid to stand up. For I have seen even the weakest of ponies show a strength that anypony amongst us has lacked. One that comes not from power or ability but from somewhere deep down that we in this bleak world have forgotten. A will to endlessly strive and above all... hope. A pony who is more than he will ever realise."

Gunshots slammed into the wood beside me. Shrieking at the splinters firing into me and the growing pains on my recovering body, I tried to sway and bounce side to side as I neared the hole above! Throwing my front hooves up, I dragged myself in and retracted the hook. Under fire, I rushed into the FunBarn. I was in!

"If a slave we have battered into the ground can look to himself and be more than he ever was... where has that left us? Is it not us with the power that have fallen behind Master Red Eye's dream? Who have failed to do as he would wish? We are the monsters. The ones who sit idle while those we teach and those who serve us have shown us what being a pony means."

"Hey you! Stop!" A guard shouted at me as his hooves wrapped around me.

I had no time to argue with the slaver who grabbed me. My back hoof lashed out hard and he reared rather silent, collapsing against the wall trying to scream with an open mouth for somepony else to stop me as I galloped on! Skidding around a corner, I passed through the medical bay and headed into the offices we'd been in before! I could hear the griffons behind me coming in through the hole I'd entered.

"Intruder in the FunBarn! Fan out! Stop him! He's got a saddlebag loaded up with something!"

I was trying to save somepony! Leaping down the stairs, I yelped and fell to the side, against the wall. Dazed, I looked up to see the main terminal hall before me. Not far!

"Thus, to end this... I will ask one thing of you all. Is there not a better way than these shadows and fear beneath the lashes? Master Red Eye would if he could, so I merely ask... is such a dream is truly outwith our power?"

He was finishing! No!

I reared up, firing my grapple above me to hit the old lighting systems above the slaves clattering on keyboards. Clenching my teeth on the trigger, I leapt from the stairs and swung over the terminal floor entirely, shocking many of the slavers so much they just stared.

Yet even as I dropped and hit the floor, they were on me. Three slavers rushed me and piled atop. I squirmed and I fought. I bit, I used the hooks of my hook and my legs bucked out. I'd never beat them, but the little jabbing attacks bought me room to wriggle free. Reaching into my saddlebag, I threw the bag of nails I'd stolen earlier behind me and ran on. An old trick, but it gave me just a space I needed!

The doors were ahead!

"I leave this decision to you all now. Thank you."

There wasn't much applause or stomping, perhaps only one of two wary ones. Ahead of me I saw the doors! I felt a wound open somewhere below a bandage, and felt my throat choking up and drawing air away from me. My vision blurred from exhaustion. I leapt forward, crashing through the doors.

Dozens of heads turned to me, not in the least Protégé from the stage. I didn't even hesitate, sighting with my eyepiece and biting down hard on the trigger again.

The hook rocketed out, the compressed air blowing my tired body from it's hooves.

It made a much louder sound than normal, so loud my ears rung and ached and forced me to close my eyes and shrink to the ground. The echo of a huge calibre round set off in close quarters somewhere above us all in the rafters.

Ponies leapt to their feet, crying out and swarming for the doors. Crowds kicked up, those not used to combat rushing away while others drew weapons and backed off more carefully. They rushed past me, almost keeping me from pressing through to... to...

...to see.

Upon the stage, I saw Protégé simply lying on his side.

Behind him, Old Grizzly pulled a confused guard's rifle from him, and unleashed the full magazine into the rafters. I heard the sound of something metal dropping up there, before being bowled over by Wormtail sprinting with a panicked look on his face. Grizzly reloaded, spraying fire into the assassin's area, while I sprinted to Protégé.

I heard him groan in pain, before stirring and sitting up.

The relief that came through me as I saw him mostly unhurt but for a bleeding wound on his cheek where my grapple hook had struck his face and knocked him out of the line of fire.

"Murk? What are... I just..."

He was dazed, confused.

"Get out of the room!" Old Grizzly screamed at us, firing again before being tossed backward into the table, a rifle round spearing into his shoulder. Other guards were joining as they got past the surging crowds.

Keeping low, I grabbed Protégé and helped support him as we ducked behind Grizzly's seat and away to the side. Protégé recovered quickly from the stunning blow, outstripping me as we got out of the courtroom and into a small preparation room that the judge had likely used in times gone past. Even so, behind us the fighting died down. I heard Grizzly say something about them slipping away.

I turned back to Protégé, finding him sitting loading his revolver.

"I... I heard them on the radio, saying they were going to—"

"I can gather. Now come on. Those Shades will just try again in a less dramatic way next time, I don't intend to give them the chance."

He bucked open a door leading to a very thin set of stairs, the age old Fillydelphia style for staff that I'd seen in the orphanage. A couple of smaller bucks had no trouble as we raced up them toward, I presumed, the rafters.

"I should say, thank you, Murk! It seems you've helped ensure my life's continuation once again."

Long way to say it. "I... uh... I couldn't just wait there..."

"I appreciate it. Now let's end Barb's last attack from the grave."

The door ahead of us burst open toward the rafters. Immediately somepony swore and fired a rifle. Those below us took cover at the new sounds from above. Galloping right out onto the thin rafter walkways, Protégé fired back into the darkness. Blinking, I tried to let my eyes watch for dancing shadows, but instead saw the door at the opposite end open and close.

"They've run away!"

"Come on!" Protégé didn't wait for me to reply, charging out across the rafters himself, shouting for them to hold fire below and to seal off the main exits. I followed still, as we crashed through the door after the Shade.

"Kzzzztch—after me, Dirk! He's got that fucking E.F.S!"

"Get down to the maintenance chambers! They're empty!"

"The maintenance chambers, Protégé!" I almost felt proud at my PipBuck doing its job still and them not figuring it out yet from their radios. Ahead of me, I saw him swerve down the next set of stairs. The Shade was fast ahead of us, long gone, but we knew where he was going.

Both of us arrived into the maintenance area at once, and immediately dove for cover.

We had been chasing them well, but they were the ones who thought to lay an ambush. Shotgun shells and pistol rounds flew across the open workshop toward us! Outside, I could see Fillydelphia itself through a large open door. Had all the guards run inside to secure it?

Where were the outside ones?

Hugging behind a thick metal workbench, I finally got a chance to see the area. We were both on a raised section of benches and tool cupboards, but the fire was coming from behind crates in a lower garage like portion near two wagons near the exit. A silenced weapon cracked alongside the throaty roar of the shotgun from earlier today.

Protégé was in that age old problem. He only had one gun against their two and maybe even three. He could hardly outflank them. Already, I could hear somepony moving to the side, seeking to get around us. The thought of one advancing and mercilessly firing with no way to hide was sickeningly haunting.

Thankfully, Protégé was not going to wait for that.

Looking above them, he aimed to the roof and fired twice. An already wrecked air duct pinged free from its rusted housings, dropping directly on top of their position. Under a deafening crash it obliterated the crate they hid behind and forced two blurry shapes out in the open.

Protégé was waiting.

Charging out, he galloped forward and shot at the first as they landed from their dodge. The shots went wide or warped around the frantically blurring and shifting shadow magic user. The tell tale click sounded. Protégé was out of rounds!

“Game over, colt cuddler!”

“Really?”

I only saw his horn glow for a second from my hiding spot, before screaming myself as a deafening bang assaulted my ears and drove me into blindness from a flare of white light. Falling to the ground, I held my ears and whimpered as my eyes blinked away the assault of my senses. I heard the raiders screaming too, before one cried aloud when I heard Protégé reload and fire once again.

Still dazed, I could see him and the second raider exchanging new fire. The Shade struggling to see clearly just as I was. The sound of padding hooves came from my right, and I ran forward to avoid being caught out. Sticking to the far side of the room, I dove in beside Protégé again, screaming as rounds from the Shade that had flanked behind us opened fire from the shadows.

“Are you all right!?” Protégé dragged me into cover, hearing me shouting.

“I... I’m... not shot...” Why had I come into this firefight? “I... I didn’t know you could do a spell like that!”

“Stun Flare spell. You get a lot of time to read when you’re in bed for as long as I was...” He tried to grin a little, but it was still tinged with worry. We’d really bitten off more than we could chew here. At least two other Shades were creeping around our cover and I knew Protégé had to be running low on ammo after the chase this morning as well.

“I was rather hoping the guards would have caught up by now. Can’t help but feel Shackles is up to something again,” Protégé muttered, firing off a shot to drive one moving shadow back into cover.

“I... I can help... I think...”

“Right now, Murk... I don’t think you have a choice. They won’t let us run. I saw one of them carrying an E.F.S. scope though, you can’t sneak around them.”

“Um... yes I can.” I opened my saddlebag, revealing the little E.F.S. blocker device I’d lifted from the attic. Nervously grinning, I nodded. I’d try to help.

“Good thinking, just don’t try to run out of cover.”

He was right. If we tried to flee, they'd only gun us down as we went. I'd have to play my part here. Willing myself to stay strong, I took comfort in knowing that Sundial managed to do it, I could too.

"All right..."

I took a breath, looked up to gauge where they were and slipped back under the raised section. I started creeping into a small trench that was obviously once used to repair rollercoaster cars from below and made my way across the floor. If I could get behind them, maybe I could cause enough of a distraction or make them get out of cover so Protégé could end it!

Unfortunately, it seemed they were even more intent to close down on Protégé than before. Above me, I heard their hooves tapping lightly on the ground moving forward. They weren't Barb... I could out hear them. Maybe even out sneak one!

Creeping around their position, I watched the pair of them firing at the increasingly devastated cover Protégé kept himself behind. Just a pity I didn't have Rarity's Grace with me.

"Go, Dirk! He's pinned, you've got time!"

One of the Shades rushed out of cover. I could hear Protégé struggling to reload his revolver in time! Only six rounds was a huge disadvantage compared to the weapons they had! Dirk galloped forward, that shotgun raised to point over and try to kill Protégé!

Biting hard on my mouthpiece, the grapple hook shot across the ground in front of Dirk. Swearing loudly, the raider tripped over it, slamming into the ground. Protégé leapt up, his revolver pumping shots into the stricken Shade, who only had time for one howl of pain before the third shot slapped into his face and sprayed me with red droplets. Squirming away from the mess, I almost fell into the trench as my grapple hook ground its way across the floor to retract.

Then it stopped.

Looking up, I saw the third and final Shade had stepped on it, holding the wire taunt and stopping it retracting while his magic aimed the silenced pistol toward Protégé.

"Too eager, study boy. You're good, but you're not that good."

I started forward, maybe I could—

The pistol swung and pointed at me for just a second enough to make me stop, before catching Protégé again as he made to re-aim his own weapon.

"Ah... ah... aaaah... you've killed enough of us now, colt cuddler. You harmed us, harmed our leader. Now you're going to die screaming, lacking all that pride you like to think you have."

"Oh yes. That you are."

The female voice came from above, before a much larger shape dropped directly down onto the Shade. I saw feathers fly and talons glint in the dull light as Ragini landed right on top of him. A squelch of punctured flesh popped into my ears.

"You and your little gang, I've been trying to track you down all afternoon!"

"Fuck you, bird!"

Ragini twisted, her claws on those hind legs digging in. I could see she was holding him down by the neck, one of her hind legs pressing right down upon it while her talons grasped her hard shot rifle.

"Fuck you, raider! You took my wings! Stripped me of flying with my brothers and sisters forever!"

"Ergh... and ain't we proud to hear it fucking hurts, huh? Argh!"

The butt of her gun struck his forehead.

"Oh, you get to hear me say that because I want you to know it!"

"Go on, fucking kill me then!"

"No."

Beside me, Protégé trotted across rather breathlessly and nursing a small wound to his front leg. His neck bandages seemed to be bleeding too. The two of us were a wreck, really.

"Ragini," he spoke, "just end it."

"He doesn't fucking deserve a simple death!"

Below her leg pinning him, I could see the Shade's magic flaring and bubbling over his outline, clearly trying to build up power for a blink spell again.

"You think your magic will save you? That's all you have going for you, you cowards! I'll bet those spells are pretty much permanent when you activate them, a part of you! Something that matters more than anything, something to let you weaklings sneak and steal. Ever wonder what happens if that were to be stripped from you?"

Her rifle barrel shifted upwards away from between the Shade's dark eyes. I saw his gang like pride beginning to waver. It was pointing at his horn.

"You want to feel the pain you put me in? To know you'll never be able to do it again?"

"N-no! KILL ME! JUST KILL ME YOU WINGLESS COWARD!"

Her rifle cracked.

Never... never in my life... had I heard a pony scream in that way. I actually felt faint, staggering to the side to throw up and cover my ears. I heard a static spark of magic, like whenever Coral's failed. Only this was sharper and more painful, like a conduit overloading. I heard somepony wriggling in agony. The sound he made...

"Ragini!" Protégé grimaced moving up behind her. "End this! This isn't how we work!"

"It isn't how you work! An eye for an eye with the Talons! He can bleed to death through that capillary and trauma in his horn for what he did to me!"

She had spun off the Shade, who rolled, squealing on the ground and trying to hold his hooves over a malfunctioning, shattered and bleeding horn that I couldn't even see... nor wanted to. Ragini stood with her talons balled up into fists between him and Protégé.

"Revenge is revenge. It isn't pretty, but that's how it just fucking works! He's getting what he deserves, I saw him laughing at me when that hammer fell! Just leave him."

Ragini walked past Protégé. I watched her go, with a grim look on her face. She didn't look satisfied, just black and void of emotion.

A few seconds after, I heard Protégé's revolver fire, and finally the screams silenced. She spun, facing him eye to eye. They said nothing for a few seconds, but I could see the conflict there. Her revenge against his morals.

"I watched you kill a pony in cold blood for betraying somepony you care about, sir."

"I wasn't causing them suffering for savage revenge, Ragini."

"He was unarmed. So what makes you any better than what you preach?"

"Because now I believe we can all do better than the mistakes we've made!" Protégé bit back, leaning toward her. "I am not the same pony I was then!!"

"You're just falling back into that naïve little shell of a pony you once were, only with power to actually think you can make a difference now."

Protégé's glare was like ice. "That your professional opinion to your charge?"

Ragini, however, was flippant. "Just the one that watches you make enemies with fancy speeches that then try to kill you.”

A third voice broke in.

“Only because Protégé is more of an idealist to the ideals I taught him than I think he truly knows.”

The arguing pair fell silent, as did my own thoughts. I’d hung by the wayside, not party to this debate of position and test of trust beyond contract. The voice came from behind me, from outside the FunBarn’s main exit with an easy grace and dominant power within it.

I turned with the others and saw him simply standing there as though it was nothing in the world. Red Eye angled his head as though in slight greeting before trotting into the maintenance area. Yet even as I watched him, his movements seemed a little more sluggish than normal. I could see a heavy darkness under his one organic eye.

“I highly encourage debate amongst my leaders, but I must say this has been a rather extreme set of circumstances...” Red Eye almost seemed to smirk at the whole situation as he carefully trotted around one of the Shade’s corpses from earlier. “I had hoped this would resolve itself without my needing to be here. My my...”

Ragini backed off, falling silent and bowing her head with a talon clenched over the same symbol on her armour. I simply stood shivering, and trying not to attract his gaze. Where had he even come from? By his side I could see that cybernetic canine, Winter, prowling around and glaring at me as though I were some sort of squeak toy.

Protégé meanwhile, quickly cantered forward on shaking legs.

“Master Red Eye! I have much to tell you! If you would give me one hour to discuss with you and—”

Red Eye held up a hoof. “There is much work to be done, my dear student. Unity nears and my presence is required soon. I cannot stop for matters, I am afraid. Not even for sleep...”

He bid us forward, moving out of the bay and away from the corpses. Upon a bandstand of the FunFarm next to the barn he stopped and sat upon one of the older wooden benches. Then he did something I never thought I would see in the authoritative figure that controlled this city and my life.

He sighed and held his head in one hoof, rubbing his eye with weariness. Sitting down across from him, I saw Protégé move forward in concern.

“I am tired, Protégé.” Red Eye lifted his head back up, smiling to his student. “It’s been three days since I have last slept and yet there is more to do before I can truly rest. The wasteland is changing and I must move with it, lest we fall behind and be caught unprepared. It had been my hope this election might conduct itself independently but I would imagine there is more to this than simply the revenge of raiders. Tell me quickly, what happened?”

Protégé looked ready to say a dozen words at once, but gradually caught his breath, stood before his master and spoke at length of the Mall and of the things I had passed on to him.

“However, Master, it is more than a simple petty squabble. They have been seeking to acquire secrets from the past. Murk here has confirmed this to me from eavesdropping on their meetings. Aurora Star’s work, from the Ministry? They seek her underground station and her mountain retreat. The Shades were working for them to attempt to ensure Shackles has power!”

Red Eye listened carefully as Protégé told him more of what had happened in greater detail. I couldn’t help but notice Ragini had slunk off during the talk. I sat nearby on the bench, trying to edge further away from Winter who seemed intent on nuzzling my side curiously. I hated dogs.

"I can see that they clearly are." Red Eye nodded, turning to me and beckoning me forward with a lazily waved hoof. I simply hopped up and trotted forward to find him looking at the E.F.S. blocker sticking out of my saddlebag.

"This sort of technology is not common, indeed we only have one in Fillydelphia left in Grindstone's care within that Ministry, and it is non-functional. This is indeed proof they are harvesting things already more advanced than what we know we have. I can't say I didn't expect this eventually from Chainlink Shackles, but he could not have picked a worse time. Better the devil you know, they say. Keep your enemies close. It has worked until now."

"Then we must throw him down from his rank, Master!" Protégé knocked his hooves together. "Fillydelphia must be rearranged to remove their betrayal! If they got this device working then they must have found something! Murk has spoken of them uncovering artefacts in the metro and—"

"No."

The look on Protégé's face was the picture perfect form of astonishment. Red Eye grunted and rose to his hooves again. It was so strange seeing him anything less than perfectly formed.

"The Enclave draw near, my student. Unity approaches and I need Fillydelphia strong, not split in civil wars of loyalties. We cannot risk a schism at this point, or the Enclave will destroy Fillydelphia and the very industry we tried to create! I have known of this divide between idealism and power for some time"

"But what about their efforts, Master? We can't just let them go with nothing! The technology they find might shift the balance and—"

"I understand, Protégé. If they feel they have enough power from whatever they find then they might attempt their own coup upon Stern. I cannot have that, the wasteland cannot have that."

Protégé gulped, licking his lips to try and get some momentum going after that surprise task.

"Indeed, we can't. Aurora Star has some projects that were important enough that they were taken into a Stable and protected even against its inhabitants, Master. Murk has confirmed this. If they were to use this in some sort of arms race for power... it would undo what Fillydelphia has become."

"Yes, it would." Red Eye nodded, an odd look in his eyes. Far off and pained. He had seen what Filly was before his changes. "This is awkward timing. We cannot face them directly for fear of a schism, yet we must face them in the shadows to prevent one."

"Then you must help end this, Master! It threatens everything you've done, for all the hurt its brought, if it comes to nothing because of them, all the suffering for nothing? You will do something now we have proof?"

Red Eye looked up from resting his head on his hoof.

"Oh... I'm not going to do anything." He smiled. "Because that's what I want you to do. I can trust you, my faithful student. You must go forth. Strive to seek them out, to find what they search for and never to yield to them. After all, you already have a companion to be proud of, with dear Murky here. I give you my blessing for this, Protégé. Do this quietly."

I felt myself oddly blush at a compliment from Red Eye himself as he looked across.

Protégé, however, was stunned. Taking off his eyepiece, he stared in abject shock.

“Me?”

“If they go to the mountains then you must go there too. Find whatever secrets lie there and bring them home to Stern. I have every faith in you, Protégé. This is, in a way, what I have taught you to eventually do. To be my extension. To be somepony I trust the opinion and morals of.”

He smirked.

“In a way, this is an appropriate journey to mark what I’d always hoped for you. To hope that you become the successor behind Stern for this city. The foals need somepony young to lead them.”

Protégé was agape. His mouth was hung slightly open, with wide eyes. Yet even amongst the sheer pride and astonishment in his eyes, something clearly came to his mind first.

“Then you’re not coming, Master? You speak like you are not to return...”

Red Eye hesitated, then slowly shook his head. Overhead, I heard several alicorns before they gracefully landed alongside a griffon pulled chariot off the side of the bandstand. Slavers piling into the area to secure it after the event were giving us all a very wide berth.

“I depart Fillydelphia for the Cathedral and Unity this very hour. Protégé... one way or the other, I shall not be returning as I am now. It... it does fill me with regret that this is likely the last I shall see of you in this time.”

Protégé couldn’t quite hide the crushing feeling on his face. “I... I knew it was soon, but...”

“Do not fear. You have been every inch the student I could have wished for since that day I helped pull you from the muddy pits of slavery. It has been a worthy pleasure to watch you grow, learn, and become the stallion you are today. Look forward with pride.”

“Th... thank you, Master...” Protégé was clearly having to struggle a little, I knew he saw Red Eye as a father more than a leader in many ways. To him this was a parent leaving. He trotted behind Red Eye on his way to the chariot, as though trying to lengthen the time spent with him. Somehow, I couldn’t shake the feeling of how I was taken from my mother in my head.

“Remember our dream, Protégé. Follow it. You aren’t the student any more. Go forth as who you are and what I have taught you to believe in. Unity, and a new Equestria.”

“A new world for all of us. I will, Master. I will...”

“Good luck, then. And goodbye.”

The griffons took the command from a sharp rap on the chariot’s edge. The intimidating alicorns beat their wings, rising up alongside it. Protégé stood watching his master disappear into the sky, disappearing to lands beyond across the wastes.

He stood there for some time.

Eventually, I approached him.

“P-Protégé?”

“I am... al... alright, Murk...”

He didn’t sound it. I saw him have to wipe his eyes before turning. Respectfully, I avoided looking directly to his face. Just because people were used to seeing me do it didn’t mean I had to make it seem so in return.

“If we’d had but one more day. How I wish we did. Yet Master Red Eye has trusted me to do this in his absence. For him.”

He turned and looked out over Fillydelphia, toward the mountain ranges that could be seen over the hill. They rose up, peaked with oddly glistening snow with some even going past the clouds...

"I cannot do this alone, Murk. These days, I know few ponies I can trust, and fewer still who would follow. My foes have sworn guards, multiple masters, an armoury, and official backing with an expedition to those mountains. What have I? A few rounds left for my revolver and an E.F.S. eyepiece..."

Gulping, I stepped forward. "Y-you have me..."

Protégé actually smirked. "Of course. I knew I could count on you, but we may need a larger group than just us two to go against them, Murk."

I bit my lip, before thinking and biting my lip.

"Well... um... there are some who would follow us. My friends..."

I saw the smile spread across his face.

"You know where they are?"

"Yes... in the metro. Down where, um, they're trying to find the Station."

Protégé nodded slowly, then clapped my back gently.

"Then let us creaky injured bucks go get a few healing potions, a few hours recovery and something to eat at last. After that..."

He glanced out over Fillydelphia, seeing the lines of Masters and Overseers trotting out. I could see those recognisable figures within leading their supporting mass away.

"...we're going back into the shadows. If I have to break free workers to help stop him I will. I will not break this trust in me. We're going to rescue your friends, Murk."

He smiled and turned to canter at speed back to the logistics hub. I followed, casting only a brief glance back to those slavers again and seeing the back of Shackles' head moving toward the metro.

Just hold on down there, my friends. We're coming!

Low Hoof (Rank 2!) – Just when they thought it couldn't get worse, you're turning a nasty little cheap shot into an acquired skill that you actively turn to and try to be good at with an idea on precisely where to strike hard. Instead of stunning, your chance to critical hit will now paralyse the target for a brief time. Ouch!

Just Downstairs

“One simple survival instinct. If you smell rotten mint... gallop away as fast as you can and do not look back. Do not stop and do not try to hide. Just gallop. Gallop... and pray.”

“What was it like having such a, well, bizarre idea on what to do?”

To be working with my ‘master’ on a mission from Red Eye, or to be on a journey pointed out by a hyperactive pink pony from the past?

“I guess you could say both.”

Well, Pinkie’s one... I dunno really. It didn’t hit me as hard as anypony might have thought it would. That sort of stuff messes with your head if you think about it too hard. A pony seeing the future, leaving messages in precisely the right places that she needed to and all. Maybe I took it a little at face value, but given it wasn’t actively trying to hurt me, could you blame me for taking the chance?

“It sounded like she told you precisely what you knew anyway.”

Yeah, that’s true. But there’s a difference between having a plan and knowing it’s the right one, y’know? Glimmer and I figured out a plan that gave us a bit of hope, but Pinkie’s message helped give me the confidence I needed to really try again.

I guess you could say she just helped me to learn to smile.

“You do have a beautiful smile. Glimmerlight wasn’t wrong when she said that.”

Heh... I, ah, thanks. Hehe! Well, um, I guess what I mean is that I was free to concentrate on other things without worrying about whether we were heading to the right place. Now that I was with Protégé, I had a mission. To get my friends.

“But Protégé wanted to go to the mountain afterwards?”

Yes, he did. The first thought in my mind was pretty simple. If my friends were in the metro, I could get them there, and we could make a break for it that very day! We could get Sunny, use the safer inner tunnels as a hideaway, look for Unity and start thinking about how to get the foals out! Starshine seemed to know a way, but that was the real problem.

Protégé was with me. He wouldn't allow that, and he had direct orders that went against our wishes. There was a confrontation coming if I didn't find some new thing that would allow us to leave. Well...

"Well?"

There... there is the fact, I guess, that...

"You're taking an awful long time to say it."

Well, I just guess I hadn't quite given up on him coming with us. He was a better pony inside than I had thought. He understood slavery the way I did. Yet, we had different objectives, different mindsets, different inspirations. How could all that come to a head? In the end, it was never going to be as simple as us just slipping away then and there. There were obstacles in front of us, still. Ones that would take a bit more effort to get around.

"You seem to be skipping ahead a little, Murky."

Sorry, I know. It's just that this was when it started to accelerate. The moment when I felt my life speed up and start careening forward in ways I hadn't known since that first day in the Pit. We were about to learn about what this 'way out' exactly consisted of. The remnants of the past would be a lot clearer in how they tied together in this race for information, one that Protégé wanted to win and one that mattered to us just as much. We had to share in his quest while all the time hoping that in the end we wouldn't have to fight him.

The metro held secrets in the dark below the city.

"The way out is just downstairs," Pinkie had said.

That wasn't all that was down there...

I had a tough decision to make.

Protégé and I sought to find, release, and steal away my friends from under Shackles' nose to bring them into the fold and beat him in the race for Aurora's secrets. Really, I just wanted them back and safe without thinking much about what would come after. The trouble was, I held a key to this little quest succeeding, and I wasn't sure if I should use it or not.

I had retreated to Protégé's attic above his logistics hub office while he took care of business prior to our departure. Having even a little space to myself helped me to think. That, and it gave me time to add to my vast drawing upon the ground. Details sprang into life from the much larger canvas. Just being able to doodle and let thoughts wander helped me think so much better.

I could get us into the metro without being seen. I knew a way. It was the same one that I'd exited through before, the one that the ghouls below had told me about. A safe and sneaky way in that would work for sure.

Unfortunately, it was also the same one we were to use to eventually escape. I'd have to reveal a portion of our hoof and a potential vulnerability to Protégé if I wanted to use it. Could I risk it? Was it worth that risk? Perhaps I could try and act like I'd just spotted it in the distance. Not that I imagined I could fool Protégé for long. He seemed to have a knack for knowing when I was lying.

A sharp rap on the door in the empty office below perked up my ears and pulled me from my pondering. Charcoal in mouth, I raised my head up and looked at the stairs heading downward when the knocking came again. Protégé wasn't in; but it had to be someone for him.

I sat and wondered if I should open it or not, before eventually sighing and getting up to trot downstairs. The knocking on the door came again and then once more quickly afterward even when I pressed my ear against it. I couldn't see anypony through the warped glass, but they could have just been standing off to the side.

Biting my lip, I reached out to unlock it. Pulling the door back slightly, I peeked through and stood ready to leap back.

"Hiya, Mister Murky!"

Jolting my head back a little and wincing as the high-pitched voice squeaked right into my ears, I looked down to find Chirpy Sum standing upright and grinning wildly with that big, floppy hat of his right before me. He looked rather impossibly happy.

"Ch-Chirpy?"

"Uh-huh!" He nodded rapidly. "Is Mister Protégé here? I want to see if he'll check my work before I go back home to the Hotel! I like getting him to check them, he always leaves really cool and tidy corrections and examples that are so fun to—"

"He's, um..." I interrupted him before he really got going. "He's not here right now."

Gathering my surprised thoughts, I glanced around before turning a more serious face to Chirpy and motioning him into the room.

"Come in though, you can, um, wait for him. I need to talk to you."

"Oh yes! You were going to tell me about my—"

"Shhh!" I held my hoof to my mouth desperately, as though pleading him to just be quiet for a second! "It has to be a... a secret! Yes, a real secret! Come on."

Chirpy's eyebrows rose before he put on a downright conspiratorial grin and over-exaggerated a sneaky look around before creeping inside. Rolling my eyes, I shut the door behind us and turned.

"I can keep real good secrets, Mister Murky! Please, is my mom out there? I like Daddy Red Eye, and Mister Protégé is really cool and all, but I do want to see her..."

His big round eyes widened out as he looked up to me. I felt distinctly unqualified to handle this level of childlike endearment and wishful thinking. Biting my lip and rubbing my head, I sat down and tried to explain things.

"Well, Chirpy, you see. Yes, she is here and—"

"She is!? Can we go to see her? Can she come visit? Aww, I can't wait to see her again and show her my cutie mark!"

The pang of sadness I felt from merely seeing him and hearing about 'Daddy Red Eye' only doubled as he proudly showed off a mark of four symbols Protégé had explained before in our lesson. Coral had missed her own son gaining his cutie mark.

"See? One for adding, one for subtracting, and then one's for multiplying and—"

I had to look away briefly to take a breath as he went on a ramble about how he'd gotten it in a lesson where he'd told the teacher they were wrong.

"Chirpy..." I coughed, covering the urge to snifle at the thought of just how broken Coral's family had become to miss so much. "Coral, your mom. She's here but, um, see it's not easy. You know she's a slave, right?"

"A worker? Mister Protégé said—"

"Mister Protégé says a lot of things, Chirpy." I regretted realizing this myself. "Your mom isn't as safe as they say, but she is coming. We're all coming. You're going home, Chirpy. This is all going to be over. We're going to get you back to her, and then we're all going to take you back home where you belong!"

He stopped his talking, for once, as he opened his mouth wide and let those eyes expand with quivering pupils. "H-home?"

"Y-yeah."

I willed him not to cry or react loudly, but the young foal just looked confused and uncertain, scuffing his little hooves on the glossed wooden floor.

"I... I am home, but like my second home and I like two cos it's higher than one and-and-but I can... wow! Will it be like, a real adventure or something? They told me coming here would be an adventure, but then I had to stay in that hotel for months and months! I like it, but I wanna go out there again but they say they can't let me, and they—"

"You will, Chirpy." I couldn't help but find his interest somewhat endearing. "It'll be a big adventure with, um, lots of running and hiding and exploring."

"Awesome! Lilac and Starshine both said that they had an adventure to go on and told me that my mom might be there! Now I can have one too! Can we go now?"

Chirpy galloped forward, making me yelp as he launched himself at me and thumped his two front hooves onto my chest. Fighting back the rancid cough as my lungs complained at the impact, I found his face looking right up at me, mouth held open, ready for the answer he wanted. At the very least, he wanted to go. That was one big thing out of the way.

"N-not right now..."

"Aww..."

"Sorry, Chirpy. We need to get your mother first... and a few other friends of mine. You stay with Lilac and Starshine. They'll be the ones who get in contact with us. Okay?"

"Yes, sir, Mister Murky, sir! Wasteland Adventurer Chirpy Sum is on the job! I'm gonna make a big cape to wear and stay warm like the ones Mom used to sew for me! Like my hat!"

He fidgeted with the huge, floppy wool hat. It seemed a habit of his to have to push the big drooping thing back up again, like it had been sewn for somepony twice his size. He rushed off and leapt onto Protégé's chair, holding a hoof up and spinning to address, presumably, the walls.

"I'm gonna go swishing out of here on an adventure! Gonna see things with my mom and catch up, and then I'm gonna bring her back to show her the cool things Daddy Red Eye taught me to do once we get allowed to work in the big places in Fillydelphia! I can't wait! You can come too, Mister Murky, I like you! You're really cool!"

He stopped.

"Mister Murky?"

He must have seen my face.

"Mister Murky, what's wrong? What's wrong? Did you forget something? You look—"

"I'm all right, Chirpy!" I moved away. Gritting my teeth, I tried to push away the thoughts that had landed harsh upon my heart. While she wasn't here, I found myself wishing for her, 'Coral Eve, I'm so so so sorry. I don't know how you're going to cope...'

He was adorable, yes; but Red Eye had his hooks in deep with the poor colt.

"Just-just watch out, okay, Chirpy?"

Coral's son wandered across, hopping up with his hooves on my shoulder in curiosity to why I wasn't really looking back.

"Your mom loves you, Chirpy. More than anything else. Just... just remember that above everything, okay?"

I turned and pulled him a little close, hoping to myself that Coral Eve would have the strength in her long-enduring body and mind to handle how her son had changed.

"I will, Mister Murky."

"Good boy." Coral had spoke like that before, just copy her Murky! "Now you should, um, go, I think? You're safer in the hotel. Don't stop for anything, okay?"

"Yes, sir!"

"You, um, don't need to call me sir, Chirpy, and I'm a bit young for 'Mister' yet I think."

"Okie dokie, um, Assistant Murky?"

My ears perked up as he tried a few different titles in his politeness. Outside, I heard a familiar voice. Protégé was in the warehouse. I heard hooves on the gantry.

"Okay, you should go, right now! Don't speak of this to anypony else, okay? Your mother will be with you. She won't stop till she finds you."

I took him to the door, letting him gallop out in front of me even as Protégé could be seen approaching the end of the catwalk about twenty feet away.

"I'll not say anything, Mister!"

"Good, good. I'll try and get a message to you all soon. Protégé and I just have to go get a few friends and your mom. She's alright. She's a strong mare, and I know she'll be fine."

"Wasteland Adventurer Chirpy Sum rogers that and is on his way! I do hope to see her again!"

He skipped on the spot, turned, and galloped flat out the door, running right into Protégé. My heart skipped a beat as I saw him much closer than I'd thought. He threw me a curious glance that set me sweating with worry as to what he'd perhaps heard at the end there.

"HI MISTAH PROTÉGÉ! I wanted to meet you! I was just talking to your number one assistant Murky when I was coming to see you!"

"Good afternoon, Chirpy. You do seem in a rush. Are you late in getting back?"

"I'm on an adventure now I've got free playtime!"

Protégé stepped aside to let the rushing colt past. "Good for you. Well, I do hope it's for a better Equestria."

Chirpy stopped briefly, hooves pacing on the spot as he clearly wracked his mind for something.

"It's, uh, yeah it's a quest for the best Sparkle-Cola in the world! It's being held by the evil King, um... um, Stinky! He's bad!"

I couldn't help but slap my hoof to my forehead, but Protégé didn't let it faze him as he lifted the colt's work in his magic and allowed Chirpy to go tearing out of the warehouse to meet his escort guards.

"The fun of foals sometimes. Quite a group, Murk. Quite a group."

"Um, y-yeah?" I didn't know what to really say as Protégé bid me to follow him down the catwalk, apparently having just been coming to fetch me.

"Very impressionable. Open-minded. This way a second, Murk. We just need to get supplies. Was Chirpy doing well?"

I followed close behind, feeling excitement rise. We were going to go on the rescue now! Our own little adventure! For real. Heh, maybe Chirpy wasn't the only one who could get worked up. At the very least, Protégé didn't seem to have heard anything I didn't want him to.

"Y-yes! He was, um... chirpy."

We walked behind a set of shelves into an unused line of the warehouse.

"Yes, he tends to be."

Without warning, Protégé spun and grabbed me by the collar, pulling me off balance before forcibly pushing me against the shelves. Crying out in shock, I almost lashed out until I saw the fierce look in his eyes, one just visible below the eyepiece.

"So, 'I do hope to see her again?' I don't know how much you told him, but let me get one thing straight right here and right now with you."

His voice was harsh, spiky, and tinged with aggressive passion. Lowering his eyes, he leaned closer.

"You have your own little wishes and dreams, and I'd be a fool to think Coral Eve would ever agree to help you without wanting her son to come with her. I'm content to let you and your friends seek a better life, and so help me that's something I'm half tempted to let go under my nose without raising a problem. But this..."

"P-Proté—"

He leaned right into my face, eyes locking to mine with a protective anger I'd never seen.

"If you ever endanger any of these foals, I won't hesitate to put a stop to this, understand? You can run around and do what you feel you need to, but keep them out of it, or you'll find me a much less allowing master, Murk! They are the core of what shall save this world. Do not make this tougher by reminding them of a past they have already left!"

"Like leaving his mother?" I tried to pull his hooves off, but he let go of his own accord and dropped me back down. His glare was no less fierce as he invaded my personal space to keep me on the back hoof.

"We all make sacrifices, Murk. Coral can work for her freedom and join us to see him again if she wants; the choice is there! I will not let you put any of those foals in danger, Murk! Is that very clear?"

His hoof slammed into the shelf beside my head on the last word. I'd never seen him like this. I felt awkward, robbed of any argument momentum by shock at him treating me like this.

"Y-yes."

"Yes, what?"

"Yes... master" I muttered the word, moving my eyes away from his own stern gaze. I was screaming at myself to be defiant, to just stay quiet or say it with anger, but the truth was his sudden harshness had shocked me deeply.

I had been too easily forgetting where his true loyalties were.

"I give you a great amount of freedom, Murk." He trotted toward the warehouse exit. "But do not cross me on that which I truly believe. Stay away from those foals. Now come on. We have work to do, and I'm sure you don't want to wait any longer."

Picking myself up, I placed a shaking hoof to my throat. The pressure had irritated it, leading me to hunch over and cough horribly. Shivering, I took a glug from my quarter-full canteen of RadAway and brought myself back up to see Red Eye's prodigy moving away to the exit.

Taking a few breaths to clear the shock and calm my nerves, I began to follow, staying a good bit farther behind him than I ever normally would.

I'm not sure why I told him about the way down. Perhaps I was driven by thoughts of saving my friends by using every method I could just to make that happen. I had always been a little short-sighted, after all.

Now, I sat at the bottom of the hole, having rappelled down on my grapple line past the drifting dust and growing darkness of the metro. Red light beamed through the distant hole above me as I struggled to get the saddle off me. I'd considered acting like I'd just spotted it, but Protégé was too smart for that. In the end, I'd just admitted that I'd found it while looking for a hiding spot. That seemed to have done the trick.

Wedging the mouthpiece's lever to retract the wire in, the battle saddle whirled out of my grasp and pulled itself back up without me, allowing Protégé to strap it around himself for his own descent. Glancing up as it disappeared, I squinted from the light and instead turned to the dark.

I'd known I'd have to come back here at least once; back to this underground nightmare. Last time had shown the reality of a world where Shackles had full control, and now I'd have to enter it again. The images of a mare with a distended stomach full of pus or a stallion lacking much of his skin from some unknown punishment kept forcing their unwelcome horrors into my mind. My friends had only been here a day or two now, and I doubted they would be badly hurt yet, but the thought still assailed me.

The service door out onto the inner metro line's tracks lay slightly ajar from where I'd been unable to close it last time. Beyond it, I could hear the slow clink of pickaxes and murmurs of ponies wafting down the tunnel itself.

With a thump, Protégé landed behind me, staggering to the side as he untangled himself from the wire.

"I dread to think what drew you down here last time," he muttered, trying his best to get the small saddle buckles undone.

"I just wanted somewhere really far away from anypony who would hurt me. I didn't realise that he was down here." It didn't take long to help him out of the battle saddle. Nor to put the saddle back on and adjust the straps to my size again. Thank Blunderbuck for his forethought of adjustable sizes!

Protégé advanced to the door, slowly slipping his eyepiece off to hide its blinking red light. We hadn't exchanged many words since the confrontation at the logistics hub. He had been professional, curt, and polite, but there was still tension in the air. He knew my intentions to some extent, and they didn't sit well with him, yet he needed my help and my friends if he was going to achieve his aims as well. I almost wished for the days when we both knew where we stood on things.

"Which way?" He apparently couldn't hear the sounds as I could.

"To the left. I... I think it's about two hundred metres down the metro line. We'll start to see them if they are still in the same work teams."

Together, we crept out into the thick darkness, with myself taking the lead; after all, I could see and hear better than he did, and knew the way. Slowly, sticking to the sides of the arched tunnel, I began to advance. The metro was always distinct to look at. Smooth stone over metal track with old, surprisingly elaborate lights hanging from the ceiling, and fuse boxes littering carved out inlays in the rock. All mass produced and 'modern' by Equestrian standards, of course, but surrounding an architecture too grand to be wartime. If I squinted, I could see lights sometimes in the distance. Two hundred metres really wasn't very far at all for that to travel.

“Protégé?”

“Yes, Murk?”

“Why are we doing this alone? Why not bring Ragini? Doesn’t she obey you?”

It was a question that had bothered me for a while. An extra gun could have been handy. Turning back to Protégé, I saw him look distinctly unsure.

“Ragini isn’t in the best of minds right now. As I said before, her loss of flight hasn’t put her in a good mood. You saw what she did in the FunBarn, Murk. Frankly, I am unsure of her stability right now, and this expedition requires a subtler touch.”

He looked as though he were about to say something else. Hearing a shout of a slaver around the far off corner, I stopped for a second and decided to push my luck.

“Is that it?”

“Her contract is to Master Red Eye, and he has told her to report to me. How she would interpret this, I am... unsure. Despite what my Master has told me. I don’t like uncertain things when dealing in this type of work. Keep moving, Murk.”

I nodded quickly, taking the hint that he wasn’t happy to pause down here. Stepping over the rails, I shifted closer to the inner wall of the long curving corner and hugged closely in its shadows. A sharp scream sounded after the snap of a whip. I heard chains moving, drills whining, and the rumble of something on the rails.

Cautiously, slowly, with nerve wracking care, I led us behind a small outcrop of supplies, tools, and fabric to gain sight of it all.

Stepping out, shrouded in darkness, we now stood before a part of the mining operation I had once seen before. I took a heavy, strained breath before turning to Protégé.

“You’re a slave too; well here’s what you’ve forgotten. This is what Fillydelphia is to many of us.”

Clustered around a changing lane between a service lane and the inner metro, we saw the lines of ponies chained together in eternal labour. We saw those lying upon the rock floor trying in vain to rest between shifts at their very workplace. We saw the huge forms of Shackles’ personal slavers ruthlessly beating them awake to continue. We even saw the empty look in their eyes and the paleness of skin below fallen hair, mangy and coated with blood, sweat, and infected fluids. In the corner lay a morbid pile of ponies being loaded onto a low rail wagon while among them were ghouls lacking pieces of themselves. Worked to the very bone of their immortal lives in an all too horrifyingly literal sense. Their lack of needs abused to the full.

Like before, I saw the shift patterns coming in and out with an almost orchestrated routine. I could see ponies wobbling on legs with very little body fat left at all. Many were blindfolded, set only to do the task and not even look around.

There were so many. So many shapes that barely resembled ponies any more thrust into the hellish end of their lives to be nothing more than organic tools for a master whose presence was more symbolic than physical in their minds. A legion being forced to think the way I once had.

Inefficient.

Pointless.

Brutal.

Shackles’ own brand of slavery. Control for the sake of control. Only his own wishes mattering in the end with no care to the cost.

I could never have possibly described the look to be seen upon my companion’s face.

Protégé simply stood and gaped, his eyes focused on a wide arc of the ghastly sight. Hundreds of ponies were being driven to death in service of a goal they likely did not even know or understand, and I saw him have to fight to accept it.

His mouth fell open to try and speak many times as he witnessed one pony simply fall, twitch, and then lie still, his body giving out. Just another forgotten soul not even recorded as a statistic to history.

“Sacrifice... sacrifice is needed, Murk and...”

“This is what happens to ponies in Fillydelphia! This is what happens every day behind closed doors that ponies like you no longer see!” I turned to him. If only I could make him really see here that what he wanted was a lost cause! “This is where he sent Sunny! Where he sent my friends! Where he wanted me!”

“We didn’t... no.”

Protégé took more than a moment to try and compose himself, shaking with what I hoped was anger. He struck the wall with a hoof.

“There were always going to be acceptable losses in having some slavers here and... and...”

“This is acceptable?”

A hoof went to his face, resting between his eyes. I wasn’t sure if I saw it wipe something or just slide away. His body shivered, and I couldn’t be sure if I saw anger or fear in his eyes. He turned to me

“We need... we need to do what we came here for, Murk. We shall press on.”

His voice was cold. I knew he was looking past me at those slaves. I could see his hoof gently rubbing his sides where I knew laash scars like my own lay beneath those clothes. I wish I knew what to say to finally get through to him.

In a way, I pitied him. I saw only a pony in the same place as I was once, just with a shinier collar. Or eyepiece.

I heard the slow, steady march of hooves coming this way. Perking up, I hurried over to the tools we had hidden behind and pulled some of the fabrics free. Seeing my haste, Protégé tore his eyes away and joined me as we hid ourselves.

“Station number four needs this shift change ahead of schedule again, eh?”

“Bloody right. I told ’em to keep it to twelve hour shifts with two small breaks, but that stupid bugger’s had ’em working all last night to try and get the big guy to grin!”

The slavers leading the shift were heading down the tunnel we’d come from! Had they expanded their operations again? Were my friends part of some new line of slaves? The thought of them being marched into the mouth of those doors to the metro station behind us, into Shackles’ personal den, was beyond thought. Many times I’d been imagining what horrors really lay beyond that barrier only a few hundred metres further in.

The slaves trooped past, as much pulled by one another as they were by the slavers. If anypony fell, they were simply dragged. Twice I saw them being drawn over the rails as their legs failed them. I couldn’t resist peeking out; if only I could have seen my friends, this would have been easy! Yet down here, ponies of all colours were horribly hard to tell apart. The filthy rags, stained injuries, and boils turned them into a group too terrified to do anything other than obey.

Exactly what Shackles wanted.

However, as they passed, I did recognise one pony. Or to be more precise, one ghoul.

I whispered for Protégé to stay where he was and dared to sneak out. Keeping low, I shifted along the lines of the miners further into the junction. Slaves wandered past me; each time I simply huddled into the lines of workers to try and hide from slavers. I could see him up ahead. Baton Round was sluggishly chipping away at the concrete, trying to break through the reinforced walls in their hunt for Ministry Station. As I neared, I saw Nurse Bedlay Broom behind him, her blind face not even looking in a particular direction as she scraped the rubble into the middle of the tunnel for disposal.

They did not look good.

Before, they had been falling apart, but here I saw a lethargy like no other. Baton Round's flimsy muzzle was visibly swaying on each impact of his pick. His body looked loose and drooped, like what remained of him was close to slipping right off. I became very glad that I hadn't eaten much lately, for once.

"Baton!" I whispered near to him, but the ghoul just kept digging. "Baton!"

No notice. His eyes were blank, simply given to the job.

"Baton!"

"Little Murky Number Seven?"

Bedlay Broom looked around, her one remaining ear perked up. Clearly in her blindness, other senses had taken over.

"Is that you, child? The little pony? Baton, look who it is for me?"

He heard her voice. Twitching and blinking, he turned to her and then to me. With a quick check to see that the guards were not looking, Baton Round slowly shifted to face me and drew Bedlay Broom closer.

"Murky Number Seven. It... it is you. You came back. Is it... time to go?"

I could see Protégé anxiously watching me. I was rather exposed.

"Not yet, but we're almost there! We need your help, though!"

"I am... I am not sure I..." He staggered and dropped to all four knees. I heard the distinctive click of bones slipping out of place. A small glow of magic across his body from the nurse seemed to help him regain the strength to speak.

"We are failing, Murky Number Seven. The shifts are increasing. What do you need?"

Before I could speak, a slaver further back let loose an air horn into the cramped tunnels. I screamed and covered my ears.

"Shift's up! You lot get back to Shackles' den for food! Ghouls? Get in your fucking hole to regenerate!"

The movement shifted up slowly around me. Slaves began to move in sluggish and clearly predetermined lines. The fluid of blood and other unthinkable things was left behind at the rock face as the new ones came in to pick up the tools. I fell in with the ghouls as they headed back to the store room, then waved at Protégé to join us.

"Baton, some of the friends we need to make our escape happen are down here. I need to know if you've seen them!"

"Maybe... maybe Nurse Splint has, they had her on the way in yesterday. But so many... oh so many, so young too to look like they do. They... they've been moved to—arrrgggh..."

A slow and quiet cry of pain came from him as we moved into the supply cupboard and he dropped to the ground. Behind me, Protégé and the blind nurse Bedlay shifted in. I recognised the smaller figure of Windtail Breeze behind them. Nurse Splint was ahead of us. The four ghouls were all on their last legs. Most of them in here were, and all dropped to the floor on wobbling hooves.

"They've been moved to where?"

Baton round blinked a few times.

“Ministry Station.”

Behind me, the door slammed shut.

“They found it.”

It took a few minutes for the nurses to give aid to their ghoul comrades. Protégé and I sat unsettled together near the door, as the ghouls around us carried out their self ‘maintenance.’ They took it in turns to bathe under a small pipe, the one I had been reminded last time was highly radioactive.

Eventually, Baton Round limped toward us.

“My apologies, little Murky Number Seven. They have worked us hard since last time. We can recover here, but every shift brings us closer. We lost three more last night and two last week fell to the feral while on the line. Old friends from the Fillydelphia Post Office. We had to watch the slavers put them out of their misery after they launched at one of the slaves unfortunately chained to them.”

“I’m sorry, Baton...”

“We’re losing friends fast. Ever since they discovered that station, we’ve had to do more. Dig more. Find more.”

Protégé narrowed his eyes. “If they found this ‘Ministry Station,’ why do you still mine here?”

The question hung in the air for some time.

“Materials? Rebar? Old rooms? Who knows?” Windtail spoke quietly in his higher pitched voice. “Everything we mine gets taken off. Somepony once said to fill a gap. Must have been a big gap. Remember that old sinkhole?”

“Mm.”

“Yes. Held up traffic for a full hour. I missed the game because of that.”

I shared a glance with Protégé. I didn’t know how much experience he had with ghouls, but these ones were prone to nostalgia as much as I was prone to tears.

This wasn’t good. Shackles and Grindstone had Ministry Station. They were one piece ahead of us now. We had to get my friends and beat them to whatever that mountain held now! Whatever it was that connected them...

“They took the slaves there, the new ones,” Baton Round spoke out suddenly, “I remember now, they said ‘all the new ones.’ The new ones, yes. If your friends got in recently, they went there.”

“Then we would have to enter through Shackles’ own hidden den to get there then? Or through their mineworks?” Protégé leaned forward.

“Oh...” Nurse Splint looked up. The gruesome sight of four white ribs below her chest made me have to look above her head to not feel my stomach turn. “That wouldn’t be easy. The guards there... they don’t even let their own kind through, and no shifts ever came out in the days since they found it. You need to go through their very holdings, through the doors in that station down the line. The ones you passed before, little one.”

So we would have to go into Shackles’ own place. It seemed inevitable. It seemed impossible, was more like it.

“We can’t do that.” I looked to Protégé. “They know us too well now. I... I saw it from the outside. It's crammed with his slavers and supporters! Whatever's in there, it'll be like a slaver's paradise or—"

"Don't let your imagination go, Murk." Protégé chided sternly. "However, you may be right. We cannot break in through a single fortified entrance and sneak ponies out. Not to mention Brimstone."

I heard a raspy cough beside me. Baton round held up a shaky looking hoof.

"There may be one other way."

That got our attention. We trotted over, but Nurse Split placed a hoof on Baton's shoulder.

"No, Baton. They are our friends and saviours for an escape. We cannot—"

"Nurse, I..." He paused and coughed violently. Foul-coloured blood splattered before him. "I cannot but let them decide. There is another way. A way that helped them find where Ministry Station was recently. Farther back the way you came, they broke into new tunnels five days ago. I thought it nothing but hearsay."

A shivering hoof clutched at his throat as he hacked and coughed again, worse than any I had ever done. Behind him, the ghouls lay out soundlessly. They were dying. Some I could see would likely never move again after today.

"They found new tunnels. It was the outer metro."

A chill ran through the air. I saw it among the ghouls but more so than anypony on Protégé. He visibly stiffened up.

"Master Red Eye cut off access to there. It was a place nopony could make safe. There were things—"

"They did not care. They sent in teams of slaves. It seemed to be working, they said that whatever had once been in the outer metro had died out. They even got a powered train down there to move and search. They said that it had been cut off on either end, away from the greater ring around the city, by collapsing tunnels. So they judged that it was safe."

He leaned forward.

"They moved in and they found Ministry Station. A back entrance, a way that should not have been there. Something that didn't make sense. They sent more slaves in to start connecting it up to these tunnels more easily. They said it was safe."

His whole body trembled.

"It wasn't. We heard the screams echoing down through the outer metro into the inner. Their radios went wild with shrieks and cries about something... a... a smell or sounds. Grindstone ordered them to close up the tunnel. He just left them in there! Sealed them in with whatever it was, to prevent it getting out."

"You say this is the only other way in?" Protégé seemed cautious.

"Yes. We moved freely in there for at least a day before anything emerged from the depths. So, if you must do it? A couple of small ponies might be able to—"

"No!" Nurse Splint pushed in. "Dozens died down there, Baton! The outer metro is not for ponies to ever walk within again! They never even got to see what it was, they just got the same warning that we all used to know before Red Eye! That if you smell mint on the wind, you die!"

They broke into argument. Protégé and I merely looked at each other. I could see he was shaking, just as I was. A decision lay here. We had a way to save my friends, but it involved going to the deepest, darkest, and most dangerous place in the entirety of Fillydelphia.

I gulped. Protégé seemed to be wordlessly asking me something. I knew what.

The words seemed impossible, but I still forced myself to turn and said them to Baton Round.

“T-t-take us there.”

They went silent.

“If it w-were me, they would have done the same to get me out.”

For all our arguing today, I felt Protégé’s hoof on my shoulder, to try and calm me.

“Tell us where to go.”

It wasn’t easy to leave them behind. I could see how bad Baton Round’s health was getting, alongside all of Weathervane’s other old friends. He had trotted us out as far as his chain would allow, pointing down the tunnel and directing us back the way we’d came, to follow the slaves that had passed us.

Watching the ghouls shuffling away, grunting in pain and seeping from horrid injuries, I could only resolve to ensure we would come back for them. For their sake. For Weathervane’s sake. He needed somepony he really knew to help him stay away from ‘the feral,’ as they called it, as much as they needed him to save their rapidly failing lives.

“We’ll get them, Murk. Don’t worry.” Protégé trotted beside me in the quiet tunnels with a stern face. “They’ve survived however many years, they will survive another few days until we can cleanse this place.”

I sighed. “How can we do that? This is such a big operation and Shackles has a lot of influ... influa...”

“Influence. Yes, he does. Hopefully, I can raise enough support of my own to at least warrant an investigation through Grizzly, or even Stern if we’re lucky. It will take time, however. Time we do not have right now if they have already located Ministry Station. At the very least, after today, we shall know where it is as well.”

“That’s true...”

I still kept my head lowered. It didn’t make me feel much better.

The knowledge of where I’d have to go to find the next step of our escape was hardly sitting well with me.

The tunnels around us stretched on, lit only by occasionally flickering gemlights that still did their duty after all these years, casting a pale white haze over the uneven concrete and rusted metal below us. Occasionally, wind would blow down the tunnel, drawn into motion by the fires the slavers lit for warmth. Feeling my mane blow lightly felt surreal so far beneath the ground, although Protégé told me that trains would once have also done this. Welded doors lined the sides occasionally, and we even had to pick our way around one abandoned train still sitting on the tracks. I dared not step inside it. A train this far from a station must have been abandoned for a reason.

Protégé glanced in through the loose passenger door, however. The sad look on his face spoke all that needed be said as he gently closed it over once again.

“Probably thought it was a good shelter.” He muttered quietly.

It became obvious we weren’t discussing the subject of our destination. We both knew where we were going, yet he began to look back from ahead. I’d been falling behind, making tiny trots as though to prolong the time for arrival.

“Murk.” He, for once, didn’t seem to know what to say.

"I... I just... I'm scared."

"I know."

He waited for me. When we started trotting again, it was at my pace. I saw him checking his revolver a half a dozen times. I kept flicking my saddle's mouthpiece in and out.

We were going to the outer metro. The thought just simply hadn't sunk in yet.

We had been told to watch for the red signal lights still running and turn into the service tunnel there. It took a good ten minutes of slow and careful trotting over the uneven rails to spot the little blinking light up ahead. We must have been catching up on that group ahead of us from before, for I could hear low voices drifting out of the black fog further down the main metro line itself. Thankfully, we had reached our turn long before we'd go where they did. Go into the service tunnel, look for the maintenance room on the left hand side, and in there we'd find a stairway to the outer metro.

The service line was hardly as clear as the inner metro itself. The roof had partially cracked and dropped chunks of rock and rebar all around it, leading to a very cautious advance through it. Multiple times, I trotted right into a poking point of metal or banged my knee on a rock despite my pretty good sight in the dark. It became a game of tentatively pushing a hoof forward, feeling around, and then finally stepping. Puddles of foul water below us set my PipBuck clicking, and the ground became uneven in a torn part of the underground system. I wondered if we were below the crater, where the balefire's enormous forces had cracked the metro's tunnels apart completely.

We were getting nowhere.

"I think we should perhaps risk some light, Murk. This will take us all day. Your PipBuck?"

"O-okay..."

Looking down, I played around with it till I found the button for the light. Glimmerlight's repair work had done well. It responded after the first push this time, even if the bulb itself was still weak and inconsistent. One way or the other, it gave us something to see the floor by. Having some light helped me feel safer. Really, the inner metro was beginning to feel like a haven. Images of ghastly beasts and unthinkable creatures shrieking from the darkness and dragging me away underground played through my mind again and again.

After a moment, in an excuse to stop again, I turned down the PipBuck volume. Sundial's messages could be set off at this depth, and a sudden beeping was the last thing we needed. Mistakes couldn't be made. Not now.

"Have you noticed where we're going, Murk?" His dark coat was almost invisible in the tunnel. I could only barely see Protégé looking up at the ceiling.

"N-no? I just see tunnels."

"I mean above us. This is heading back in the direction toward the neighbourhood of the Ministry of Arcane Science. I suppose that's only logical, likely why they started hunting down here in the first place."

I hopped up on a larger rock, pushing over it. Ahead, I could see a few doors.

"You think they're connected?"

"Not impossible. The Ministry turns up secrets every other month. There may be some form of hidden entrance inside or near to the Ministry that's difficult to find or activate from the surface. Maybe in a random house's cellar, or some secret elevator command."

He shook his head.

"The thought that something so unnatural and abandoned was always just below us; it made me sleep restlessly after I did my research into it. I... I've had nightmares of being trapped in the outer metro."

Protégé walked near the wall, tracing the coloured lines that led to each door and around various arcane boxes containing the systems that no doubt powered the rails. Hearing him open up like this, I saw the same sort of look I'd only seen once before, as he'd tried to comfort me during Barb's sick game, something that felt so long ago now.

Yet, suddenly, I didn't want to turn and say what I saw. It took a few attempts until I finally pointed.

"I th-think these are the d-doors, Protégé."

Four entranceways lay ahead of us atop a raised stone platform that arced around the larger tunnel section. Short metal steps led up to them from either side. Climbing carefully, alert for any rusted steps ready to snap below us, we came to stand in front of the entrances.

The maintenance door was obvious amongst them. Protégé pointed out the word on a sign, but I could see the toolkit symbol. The others, it seemed, were sotrage for replacement track links and electrical components. Yet the maintenance access was lying open with a paper sign crudely nailed onto it. Trotting up, Protégé tore it off with his magic and read aloud.

"Lower levels quarantined by order of Master Grindstone. Do not descend stairs or remove barricade. Death awaits."

We glanced at once another for a few seconds, before he gently let the sign fall into the train tracks behind us and warily stepped inside.

Behind the door lay an already stripped bare repair bay. Only a few steel tables and spare tracks and track pins lay against the walls, while every drawer, cupboard, and container had been looted clean by the slavers and now lay open and empty. On the walls, I saw posters and charts displaying measurements of nuts, wrenches and various safety regulations bearing the mark of the Ministry of Wartime Technology.

Before us, however, we could see the stairwell leading down. It had been blocked off by numerous barrels clustered together on the landing, and planks of wood nailed across the doorway out of the bay. The layout was clear, this was as much to try and stop us from going down, as it was to try and stop anything coming up.

That alone was unsettling enough, it was heightened by a square section of balsa wood nailed to the blockade, bearing a painting of a screaming pony across it, circled and crossed in red paint. A warning from somepony who couldn't write meant for those that couldn't read. They didn't want to risk anyone going down by accident.

Putting his hooves around the rotten wood, Protégé pulled near the nails and prised a few of them apart. The sign came off easily, clearing the way into the blocked stairwell. Stepping through, I found a long drop where an elevator had had once gone. The stairs surrounded the empty pit, winding around the cage that blocked anyone falling down where the elevator had once moved. Below us, I could see the shimmer of a puddle and little else as it fell into the depths. We were going deeper underground.

"The outer metro is significantly lower in places than the inner, Murk. This could be a trek. So... ready?"

"N-no..." I couldn't help but be honest.

"Your friends are at the end. Just keep thinking of them."

Biting my lip, I tentatively stepped around the crudely stacked barrels, following him onto the stairs. I couldn't believe I was going this way. They were down there. The outer metro was a death zone. Someplace ponies didn't go.

"Then what are you thinking of?" I asked him quietly.

Protégé hesitated, before shifting another barrel to the side and reaching the first landing.

"Master Red Eye faced down this place before. I... I'm just trying to think that perhaps I can steel myself as he did. Now, come on. Let's get this over with, before we both lose our nerve."

All the same, even as I shook terribly and began to travel down after him, I could see that he wasn't as calm as his own words.

Flight after flight, around the rusting cage elevator, we travelled down into the damp and dark void below us. I strained my ears, but all I heard were the drips or sounds of slavers passing by the maintenance room above us.

My PipBuck light illuminated stained walls rotting with soft weeds. About half way down, I felt the stairs change from stone to a thin metal with punctured holes in them, reminding me all too uncomfortably of the hazy thoughts from when I'd dreamed in a coma not a couple of days ago. Cages and metal stairs.

It took five minutes. It felt like five days.

Every second, I expected to hear something unnatural. To feel a chill on my spine. Protégé even put his eyepiece back on, activating his E.F.S; he wasn't taking chances.

Eventually, reaching the bottom, we found what truly sealed the over metro. A colossal metal door stood before us.

"An old fire door, to contain any metro incidents from reaching the other tunnel. This would hold anything in or out."

"D-does it open?"

My eyes had found the blinking control panel to the side. Holding my PipBuck near for him, Protégé toyed with the controls. It was all I could do to not beg him out of opening it.

It really began to hit home. A real and true fear that made my gut twist, my stomach feel empty and set my hooves pacing. We were going to some place that had monsters known for killing hundreds of ponies, and no one had ever seen them. How could he expect me to do this?

"Remember, Murk."

Looking at his face, I saw that I was not alone. We were both scared. Sighing, I turned back and looked up.

"Rotten mint. If we smell rotten mint, we simply gallop back the way we came. Don't hesitate. Don't stare in fear. Just... just run. Don't look back."

"I d-don't want to do this, P-Protégé..." The thought of me admitting this when I had to help my friends made me feel wretched.

"Neither do I, Murk. These tunnels... we sealed them for a reason. Even Master Red Eye d-doesn't talk of what really happened."

I saw him suck his lip, a nervous tick even if his body held still.

"This is the only way to get to that station."

"Are you sure? We could hide in the slave lines! We could bribe somepony! Or wait for them to come out?"

My voice raised in pitch each time. I put both my hooves on his shoulder, as though pleading.

Protégé simply shook his head. I knew he was right. I'd seen how stringent Shackles' nest was, and we had no idea what lay beyond. I heard him take a quick breath, pushing his courage to do it.

"Here goes..."

He hoofed a large blue button, having to push hard until the rusted device actually depressed. For a few seconds, nothing seemed to happen. Until a deafening whine of hydraulics filled the room, followed by the groan of metal being torn from its rusted stasis. To our right, a red light began flashing and spinning, casting its dual spotlights all around the bottom of the stairwell and playing havoc with my night-vision.

I could see the door before us begin to lift. Thick and heavy, it slowly rose up, giving us a view of our destination, of the outer metro.

Before my eyes could even adjust, other senses felt the difference immediately. A slight breeze carried a crude, milky damp that washed through my nostrils. A strange warmth followed it, sticky and humid, trapped underground with no outlet to cool down. It reminded me of the Stable, yet with a rough, earthy tinge to it instead of the oil and metal. A sweet scent that burned my nostrils.

Yet, my first sight was not of the metro.

The moment the door raised up, something lunged out of it. I screamed. I even heard Protégé yell as we both fell back. I saw a revolver drawn and scrambled to turn in the wet ground. A crackling, boney noise fell around us with movement all along the bottom of the door.

I was already going for the stairs, my wings flaring out in shock. I heard Protégé move quickly behind me.

"Murk!"

I dared to turn.

Protégé stood sweating below, breathless and coming down from the adrenaline spike. He was looking toward the door.

Below it, I saw the remains of ponies. Skeletal, bearing still-decomposing flesh, they had fallen against the door, left behind when Grindstone had sealed it. There were at least a dozen of them, torn bodies that had been lying in a heap against the gate. They'd finally gotten through it as soon as it had opened.

I had to hold my stomach and turn away when I realised that it was only parts of them, more so when the sickly sweet smell hit my nostrils. The farther in I saw from my PipBuck's weak light casting into the outer metro, the more I saw body parts simply strewn around. One face still bore a scream upon it, a mask of terror and agony. There was no rhyme or reason, no repeated patterns of death. Some had been torn apart from the chest outward. Others limb from limb. Some were intact with their necks bent at unnatural angles. Some had no significant pieces left to recognise them at all.

Enough. I couldn't look. Holding my eyes shut, I had to let Protégé lead me past them. I could hear my heart racing, feel the sweat dripping down over my closed eyelids. I didn't want to be here. I really didn't want to be here! Please, please, please let me just pass without incident! Tell me they'd gone away, that these ponies had killed whatever it was!

Coming to the bottom of the stairs, I had to gently help my wings to rest against my side again. Their newly strengthening muscles twinged after having sprung open in shock.

"They were locked in." Protégé's voice held no anger, simply a horrified realisation.

He looked at me, eyes sad and wide from the massacre around us.

"They were trapped when whatever did this came for them."

Stepping inside, I had to check that the door wasn't going to close behind us as I got my first look at the tunnels of the outer metro myself.

It could not have been more distinct from the inner ones we had just been in. Instead of the smooth concrete, it was made of brickwork and sandstone. The outer metro tunnel was rectangular instead of curved, other than the arch along the roof. Up there, I could see tangled power lines where trains must have once connected to get their energy from. Below us there was little other than thicker metal rails and inconsistently sized wooden blocks for a train to run on, not the same powered ones we had seen before upstairs.

"This place is old, even by wartime Equestrian standards." Protégé shifted along the small platform and glanced down the lines either way. "I'd heard the outer metro was different, like a maze, but I hadn't realised it was like this. Remarkable it even stayed intact in the balefire impact. Look, are those mosaics up there?"

This hardly felt important to talk about, but I knew he was trying to distract himself. I could see the cracks in the strange, almost ornate patterns in the roof, and missing bricks that now clustered in piles on the rails or to either side. Moss actually grew down here, turning the ground into a sticky mush while the air held a faint, still mist. Even as I walked, it felt wrong to be wandering through air so still that my own movements sent a ripple effect through the trails I could see floating above me.

It felt too otherworldly. Like someplace where evils beyond my imagination could lurk.

"Murk! Over here, look!"

Snapped to attention by his words, I turned to find Protégé. The slaver had trotted down the platform to gaze into the tunnel. We'd been told to go left, take no side tunnels, and that we'd know the area when we saw it. Trying to avoid moving near to the smeared remains of those who had been trapped here, I couldn't help but notice how the line of bodies went all the way to where Protégé was. Around the rusted mesh wire holding defunct generators, I saw him trot toward a lump in the darkness.

"The ghoul said they'd mounted a cart down here. I think we may have found it."

I moved closer and saw what he meant. Upon the tracks, just where the dead ponies had come from, was a small wagon with a crudely wired engine and pistons to let it move on the tracks. Three seats faced us with another three on the opposite end. A little area for supplies was mounted between the seats.

They had tried to escape on this from wherever they had been.

Protégé climbed up onto it, looking over the controls.

"Looks like it just stalled and cut out. It still works. I don't know about you Murk, but I would much rather have something that can get us back here fast if we have to. At least we know the door is open."

"B-but noise..." I bit my lip, advancing around the rails rather than continue walking through the decaying remains all the way to the cart. "It might bring them!"

"They were working here for days before it happened, Murk. I... I think that it should be fine. Listen, we're both injured and only just properly healing now. I don't think either of us can claim to be the fastest galloping ponies around. If anything happens, we need a way out. This almost worked for them."

"Almost." I looked back at the door, afraid it might close on its own. "B-but... okay."

I began to climb up onto the powered rail-wagon, taking his hoof as he pulled me into a seat. He breathed out slowly, playing his hooves over the levered controls until he found a large key.

"Here goes..."

Twisting it, I heard a dull squirting warble of the engine mounted just behind us. Cutting out, spluttering, it died. He tried again, then again. Finally, with a roar that sounded shockingly loud in the quiet tunnels, it caught and surged into being. Before us, two huge lamps illuminated the tunnels ahead of us with their hanging weeds and uneven muddy ground around stained brickwork. Farther than twenty feet, the darkness simply ate the light.

I was taking long breaths. Through the lingering mist, even the sway of underground vegetation or a puff of warm air felt like some sort of ghost. I heard Protégé curse quietly as he played with the levers, eventually finding one that released tension and set the rail-wagon rolling slightly forward. Then, with a grinding squeal, it began to pick up speed.

"We go in, we get them, we get out."

"In and out. Y-yes."

"Here we go." He pushed the lever forward with a hoof after resting his revolver right beside him. Carefully, slowly, we began to accelerate, and I saw the metro's brick walls shift past us a little faster. Giant pillars holding up the arches above them swooped by as we rounded the corner and passed out of the station.

Gripping the seat, I simply held Unity's Littlepip statuette close to my chest and tried my best to not whimper too loudly.

"Murk, I need you to keep watch."

Shivering, I had to force my eyes open from curling up in the seat. Protégé's voice was strained, tense, and reflecting the same anxious nature I could see on his face as he kept the speed controlled over the ramps and unstable rails of the ancient tunnels.

Biting my lip, I looked up and around. These ghostly tunnels were flying by a little faster than I'd expected. Little rushes of air blew over us every time we passed a set of pillars; them being placed at odd intervals with no consistent pattern. Our passing disturbed the strange underground fog that had gathered in here, making it part and twist behind us in small spirals. Casting my eyes around, I saw our rail-wagon pushing its way through vegetation and passing under dripping water from partially collapsed sections of roof. With Protégé driving, I had to watch our sides and presumably, our rear.

"Do you see anything?" For Protégé, this was a rather stupid question, like he just wanted to hear communication. I somewhat felt the same.

"N-no." Behind us, the tunnels curved away and were lost to the dull yellow gemlights that barely lit our way. "It's like it's dead."

I wasn't sure if I believed myself. Every so often, I'd hear faint noises in the distance. Rocks cracking, wood creaking... all too often like something alive moving down one of the many side tunnels.

"Pray it stays this way." Protégé simply muttered, before scowling as the rail-wagon jarred and bounced over a broken junction. The engine cut out, sending us drifting forward on momentum. After a horrifying few seconds of silence, it spluttered to life again.

I was just watching the side tunnels instead. Each one gave way to thick darkness. Some were as thin as alleyways, hiding the unsettling orange lights of repair rooms or old generator clusters. We passed a construction area made of rotting wood that barely held up an unfinished piece of brickwork refurbishment. I whimpered when I saw long-dead bones huddled together in the corner, surrounded by empty food packets.

“Oh for the love of—!” The engine cut out again, this time long enough that the wagon rolled to a halt on a flat stretch. The lamps died, leaving us isolated in the flickering green glow of my PipBuck.

“Protégé?”

“It’s just stalled out.” He gunned the engine once, then again. Each time, it died.

I felt my hooves shaking. Keeping the light away from my eyes, I peered into the darkness. Without proper light, the underground mist flowed and twisted in the black like moving shapes in the distance. My ears twitched, hearing distant sounds. Creaks and rumbles. Drips and brief sounds like a kind of ‘whup whup whup’ in the far off tunnels. The heat down here was making my mane stick to me, so clammy and uncomfortably close. I couldn’t even hear the sounds of industry above us, we were so deep now.

“P-Protégé?”

The engine gunned, unhealthily stuttered, and died.

Looking behind us, I swore I saw movement. Or was it just the fog?

My ears twitched in the thick air. I could hear so much in such a silent place. Little drips or pebbles falling. The vibration of the passing rail-wagon had been making things fall from the roof.

In the distance, I heard something larger fall and clatter on metal.

“Protégé!”

“What? What is it?” He leapt up beside me, revolver pointed.

I pointed where the noise had come from.

Everything went deathly silent. He was breathing hard, his revolver pointing to the left... then the right. I saw his eye glance more intently at his headpiece.

“T-try the engine again, quickly!”

He turned, gunning it once more as I stared in the direction we had looked. Groans of moving air in the tunnels came from either side. Behind us and to the left, I heard a pop, like something wet and sticky bursting.

Squinting my eyes, I saw there was a door right there, falling apart from time. The sounds were coming from there. From within the haze behind that rotted door. I kept hearing things, little noises I couldn’t identify, before—

I yelped as a sudden noise broke through the air. The engine flared back to life, and light washed over the tunnels. Falling back in the seat, I saw a foul mess near the door, stained yellow like pus. It glistened and seemed to creep up the walls and door from inside. Some sort of spreading, mutated fungus that had overwhelmed the entire room.

I didn’t want to think about what those noises inside were.

The rail-wagon began to move along, clicking and clacking its way over the uneven tracks.

“Murk, try to pace your breathing.” Protégé looked away briefly from the tunnel at me.

I hadn’t even noticed that I was hyperventilating and gripping the seat tightly. “I... I... trying...”

“Just... keep watch.” I heard him take a breath himself, gulping hard.

We passed a full crossing, one side entirely collapsed and sunken with earth and the other leading to a concrete dead end where a platform narrowed into a caged area. Benches and lockers lay within that were so rusted they had begun to disintegrate. There was a safe there, but any wish to stop and loot was far from my mind.

"Something's worrying me, Murk." Protégé slowed the wagon.

"What?"

"My E.F.S. Usually it picks up masses of signatures from things like radroaches and tox-slugs when I'm underground. But it's got absolutely nothing. It's like anything in here has just... gone. We've tried all sorts of infestation control, and it's never worked. But here..."

We passed beneath a gaping hole where huge fans lay inactive, the sound of a large passage making a strange groaning hum from our speed.

"...it's just dead."

My teeth were grinding rather uncomfortably, but I couldn't help it. Climbing into the back of the rail-wagon, I kept trying to peer as deeply as I could into those passageways while hunkered down beneath its raised sides.

With a sudden clank that jarred us both, the style of the tracks seemed to change. We passed under an elaborate arch, Celestia and Luna engraved into either side, and suddenly the area overhead was smothered with thick cobwebs that stretched for metres in every direction. The green light of my PipBuck turned to a sickly yellow as it hit them, giving the small area I could light tunnel a pus-like colour. We saw shreds of rotting flesh by the wayside. At a guess, it was those that hadn't gotten on the wagon in time during the evacuation.

"Not long now. He did say it only took six minutes."

Beep!

I squeaked slightly, perhaps not even heard by Protégé. But looking down at my PipBuck, I held it close to me and kept the volume low. I didn't need anything being heard by Protégé by accident that I didn't want him knowing...

Beep!

Click.

"I don't have long. They've left me somewhere while they check something. They've brought me underground to some huge chamber just behind somepony's cellar and locked me in while they went deeper. They've been right beneath us all this time! The zebras have been right here!"

So they had taken him to the metro first. That just about confirmed right off the mark that Aurora was involved with them. I kept looking around as we passed away from the cobwebs into the darkness once again. Even the interest of Sundial wasn't enough to quell my fear. We began passing through an open area filled with wooden beams and old storage pallets piled high with bricks and a thousand dark places to hide.

"A-apparently, I've to work on something for them. They asked me what kind of terminal I used so they could get one for me. They have something for us to do, some job they need Wartime workers who know arcane things to help with. Oh, Pinkie... please help me get out of this when I know enough. If I could go now and just tell her where they are, I would! I—wait. I think they're coming back. It's some sort of elevator that goes down below the city! I can hear it coming up!"

A shriek from mismatching rails sent sparks flying off the wall, illuminating stone carvings of the sun and moon that had been warped and corrupted by moss and lichen.

Protégé pulled back the speed, but going downhill, I could still feel the rush of air pick up. We were going faster!

"I just keep feeling like I'm out of my depth. I don't know why I'm here, even though I... well, do. I'm not the pony for this. They've got others in here with me. They look like refugees. I don't know any of them. I just have to keep reminding myself who I'm doing this for!"

Barely able to listen, I grabbed the holds of the wagon and held tight! Lights in the labyrinthian side tunnels flashed by faster as we rode around a corner. I could have sworn I saw something dash by ahead of us in the lamps under the mist! Ahead, I saw flickering red and orange lights spearing through the fog.

"They're coming now. To take me down. Sky, Dad... Mom. Whatever happens now, I love you all, okay? I have to stop before they hear me. Whoever finds this, I hope you can understand why I did what I did. I—"

"All of you. Stand up and move forth to the vertical stairs."

An exotic tone cut through the speaker as though from further away. The fog swirled all around, becoming thicker and cut with heavy particles of dust that hung in the air. I jolted forward as Protégé hit the brakes, the lights ahead beaming harshly into our eyes before the rail-wagon slammed to a halt on the end of the line with a juddering snap. I flew forward into the front seats with a yelp.

Protégé snapped up his revolver, staggering to his hooves as he pointed it all around above me. I could hear groans and distant pattering sounds. Somewhere, a pipe gurgled. Every noise sounded alive, the heat having staved off suddenly to a dull, lukewarm ambience. I heard Protégé leap off onto the soggy floor.

"Let's go Murk. We're here. I don't want to hang around here any longer than we have to. This place is not natural..."

Creeping up, I poked my head above. The brickwork was patchy and stained with a dark red. It led to a massive hole in the wall. Mining tools scattered the floor where they had been left. Some bore black marks on their blades, the same as that on the bricks. As I stepped off the wagon, the ground sank beneath my hooves for a few inches, and I dared not look down too closely to see why.

Through the hole, carved into the remnants of some archive room, we could see that somepony had knocked clean through the wall into something else entirely. In here, there were massive rows of filing cabinets and haphazardly stacked boxes. All of them, and most of the floor, were covered in rotted paper. The architecture changed slightly in here. Once past the cut rock leading into this document room, I could see the glint of metal and polished tiles alongside smooth walls that had once clearly been a bright white. No longer.

Protégé led the way in, his revolver whipping from side to side rapidly. Ancient papers were strewn by more rotting bodies lay all around. Grindstone hadn't just left a team down here. He'd created a massacre to contain the threat.

Slowly, both of us hesitating and glancing at one another nervously, we shifted onward into the hole, passing into whatever this place was that Shackles' teams had found.

As I moved, I heard somepony else shifting and almost freaked on the spot before noticing it was my PipBuck. Sundial, with his PipBuck still active, was being marched into the lift. I heard the cries of ponies echoing, as he entered into the same place as this two hundred years before.

"Wish me luck..."

"Baton Round was right. This doesn't belong."

Protégé went first, stepping in with his revolver raised and E.F.S. active. The hole itself was a good six feet deep, a thick wall that had been mined through to reach this place. The presence of metal linings and mesh wire perhaps hinted they'd spotted it through an air duct that once stood here.

Only, Protégé was right, this wasn't like the area we'd just been in.

What we had found was a connecting underground corridor. It bore the same brickwork as the outer metro, still clearly of the same era. Yet the light fittings and flooring seemed newer, more wartime in their design. Protégé looked down and trotted in a circle as he looked at it. I cast my light for him to see. Mouldy tiles ran along the edges with a laminated centre. Other than two hundred years of disuse, it would have been seemed pristine. Clean. Clinical.

"The doors are prefabs, Murk. Somepony refitted this place from what it once was. The outer metro has many old constructs within it where ponies once did engineering work or held storage areas."

My hooves made little tapping sounds on the floor, which was different from the more common, satisfying 'clack' of stone that I'd become used to. Even those tiny sounds seemed to carry for a long way. Dirt had trailed all the way in and inactive lanterns hung on either side, but this place seemed frighteningly basic and secluded. The gloom went off into the distance, revealing the prefab doors Protégé mentioned. Almost a half dozen in a line along this corridor ended with double doors bearing cracked glass.

"He said it's through this place that you get to Ministry Station, right?" I kept my voice low, my head as well. Every few seconds I checked behind me.

"He did. Only now I'm wondering why."

Gently, we stuck to one side and crept further toward the double doors. Each one of the prefabs we passed was jammed shut, bearing huge metal padlocks over bars that blocked them off.

Suddenly, I heard something. Every muscle in my body stiffened painfully as I heard the definite sound of movement behind us. I dared not speak. I simply spun around fast enough to attract Protégé's attention. Gasping, he backed off and pointed the muzzle of his weapon at the hole.

The sound kept going. Earth and metal being rung upon. Then I began to hear something Protégé had mentioned a long time ago. I heard a distant beep. I swallowed only to find my throat dry... something was out in the tunnels we'd come through. I glanced to Protégé and found him sweating profusely, his mouth open a little.

Looking closely, I saw his eyes wide in terror. There was a tiny, deeper red dot on his eyepiece shivering wildly from side to side.

I dared to whisper. "H-how... f-far?"

"Distant. Sssh."

We held still for a few moments. Slowly, he began to back off, his hoof nudging me to back away from the hole as well. Dust fell from it, disturbed by our passing. The opposite route down this new place was filled only with hazy yellow dust swirls hanging in the air.

My eyes ached to let loose tears in stark terror.

Beside me, I heard Protégé sniff the air every few seconds, just to check. I heard it again, a little far off bleep like an alarm clock, echoing down the tunnels.

I counted in heartbeats. After ten or so, Protégé seemed to sigh.

"It's gone. But whatever it was, to be so far away and move that fast from side to side, it must be—"

"D-don't..." I had to stop him. My imagination didn't need anything more to work with. I wanted to run away, run and hide, get back to the inner metro. Yet, now that I knew it was out there, I didn't know what to do. And that thought was the worst of all.

"We shouldn't be here, Murk. We might have gotten lucky. Let's get farther inside, maybe they're just in the tunnels."

Sounding calmer than I, he turned to the double doors and gently eased one of them aside. They creaked, turning on rusted hinges, and I couldn't help but keep watching behind.

"What is this?"

"Huh?"

Daring to turn and quickly move through after him, we found ourselves in a much larger room. Basic metal benches lined the entirely tiled floor that led up to a canteen at the far end. It seemed normal, other than that the kitchen was protected with mesh wire, only bearing a hole for food to be passed out.

We moved in, stepping over discarded metallic trays and shattered bowls. Both were stained green from where food had once rotted away. Straws and plastic cups lay near them. I tried to ignore the shattered skeletons near the door, yet Protégé wandered nearer them and lifted a riot shotgun in his magic.

"Empty. Loose casings on the floor. They fought here. These sorts of weapons were given to security guards more often than anypony else."

"What does that mean?" I didn't turn to him, instead looking up at the massive banner still hung above the area with smiling ponies beside white-clad employees handing them hay and flower sandwiches.

"It means something down here needed guarding. I've never read about anywhere like this in any of my books on Fillydelphian history. Some sort of prison the Ministries kept hidden away?"

I knew the Ministry of Morale was known for that, yet I couldn't bring myself to believe it. Pinkie would have mentioned it, wouldn't she?

We continued on, shifting toward the larger doors that lay ajar out of this place. On the wall beside them, I could see dark stains alongside impacts from buckshot cracking the old bricks. Despite being away from the tunnels, this was still the outer metro. All this new place had done was put new age materials inside old tunnels. Try as it might, it couldn't hide the grim sickness and dull green moss growing everywhere.

The door was heavy, leading to us both pushing it open at once. To my surprise, there was a dull light through here, like the next room was still lit.

Yet, trotting through, we found something far deeper than what I had expected down here.

We were standing on the upper level of a plaza, similar in shape to the one in the Mall, if smaller and more crowded. Our level was like a rectangle around a large open-plan hole in the middle. It was dimly illuminated from barely active gem lights in the ceiling that flickered and cut out every few seconds. Dark and mouldy tiles clicked beneath our hooves, while tangled wires were strung over the gap at the centre.

“What in Equestria...” I breathed in disbelief as I stepped over to the edge of the hole to look down.

This was much larger than a few rooms.

This was a haunting place, as dark and gothic as it was sterile by design, with enormous columns that rose past us into arches on the tall ceiling. I could see three floors below us through the great balcony-ringed hole. Rows of doors littered every level. Each one bore a small viewport in it, surrounded by rubber sealings and sliding locks. Down there, amongst the mist, there lay a shattered ground level, similar to the ancient designs in the metro. A giant clock face had been dashed upon the floor below, fallen from a broken mural on the wall, and was now surrounded by a cluster of skeletons and piles of metal beds and chairs in the centre of the room. Other remains lay upon the floors above as they ringed around the great rectangular hole.

“This is no quick refit. This is something older.” Protégé breathed lightly, before whipping around. “Back! Into that room, there!”

We shifted quickly as he pulled one of the iron doors open. Diving inside, I felt the ground soften with a warm dampness. Protégé backed in, his weapon pointed through the crack in the door. He’d seen something on E.F.S. further off. I couldn’t help but creep nearer, focussing my ears and peering out. I listened for beeping.

Beep!

I yelped in fright. That had been right beside me! I felt Protégé clamp his hoof over my mouth to keep me quiet.

Beep!

It was my PipBuck! I wrestled with the volume switch, how had it turned back up? Convincing him to let me go, I held it closer to me in the darkness of this tiny room we hid in.

Click.

“He-hello, it’s Sundial again. I—oh geez...”

He cut out. In the distance, I heard something fall and clatter upon a tiled floor. Then I heard a door slammed shut. Whimpering, I turned away, back to my PipBuck as Sundial returned.

“S-sorry, they were near. I’m down here now, trying to record what I see, l-like Pinkie asked. This is incredible. Incredible and terrifying. They’ve got a whole operation down here in some sort of station! There’s bucks and mares I knew from work who went missing here! Every so often I see troops of ponies like refugees. But they look more like slaves. They don’t look happy...”

If only he’d known.

“Every room I go by, they’ve got some sort of odd tool inside with a few workers. Zebras sometimes pass with these weird weapons to keep an eye out, way more than could normally sneak in. Are they planning an underground invasion? They’ve told me to work on the same things I helped design in the Ministry, to make miniaturised spark batteries like I did for the armour. I don’t know why.”

“Murk, we have to move soon. We can’t stay here. The signal’s gone.” Protégé didn’t turn around when he spoke. I saw him push the door open a little and had to fight the temptation to tell him not to.

"O-okay."

"Just listen out. We're not alone in this place now."

Oh, great. Just make me feel a lot better, Protégé.

"But I did see something. Those refugees, they're taking them somewhere else! Somewhere deeper. One look through the door, I saw it looked like some sort of prison, they even had guards. I swear I saw somepony too. I don't believe my eyes but I'm... I'm sure it was her."

I stopped, looking down. Was this confirmation?

"She was directing things, talking to zebras and looking over what we're doing here. I know it's her. I saw the pony who leads the Ministry of Arcane Science in Fillydelphia. Aurora Star is a traitor."

Click.

I'd known it, but somehow hearing it in his voice made it all seem much more real. Aurora Star had betrayed ponykind to work for the zebras. She had turned against them, working against Equestria from beneath the very city she'd sworn to Twilight Sparkle herself she would defend.

Protégé pushed the door fully open. Shaking, I followed him only to see him look back into it.

"What?"

"That room..."

"What about it?"

He pushed past me, putting his hoof on the ground and walls, pressing in.

"Padded walls, iron doors, viewports... oh no..."

He moved back, looking distinctly uncomfortable.

"What? What is it Protégé?"

This place, it isn't a prison." I saw him bite his lip. "It's an asylum."

Quickly, he moved around, looking over the lip of the rails surrounding the gap between floors.

"We're moving on, now. I don't think we should be here, Murk."

I nodded, before cringing and whining under my breath when another creaking slam came from somewhere above us. I heard something moving on creaking floorboards.

"Protégé. Why didn't you see this one? It sounds closer..."

"I don't know. I don't know. Let's go. Right now. Just hope it's a wayward ghoul or... or something. We need to find the way through. Stay quiet. Don't speak."

He trotted, then cantered, and clearly had to stop himself galloping from nerves to get through this nightmarish place. We headed around the balcony, passing each of the barred asylum rooms as we went. Some lay open like the one we'd hid in and held nothing but festering wool leaking from the padded walls, or the remains of broken chains and dark stains.

We found some stairs and hopped down the gap in them. Picks lay nearby. Somepony had started destroying this stairwell but had gotten caught before they could finish. Coming to the next floor, and pushing open the heavy wooden and glass windowed doors, we saw that this one straightened out at the end. It had a much larger 'common' area underneath where we had been on the floor above, that stretched back into the wall. Passing quickly alongside the guard rail into the hole again, we moved toward it. In theory, a common room might have a route to the main way in, right? As we moved cautious, I kept seeing shadows moving in here, in the hole to the next floor, or within abandoned inmate rooms. They sprang and stuttered with the inconsistent light of my PipBuck.

Protégé pointed to a sign. I didn't know for what, as it held a word I was in no mindset to struggle to read right now, but the little picture of a pony running toward a door beside it gave me a clue. This place was, according to Sundial, lower than the Ministry Station, so any emergency exit had to be toward the level the station was on. Right? Did that make sense? I hoped so. The increasing sense that this place had realized that its territory had been breached by two wandering ponies grew with every metre we moved into it. I didn't dare think about how far we had to gallop if we needed to flee back to the rail-wagon.

Then I heard it again. A distant beeping. Feeling about ready to just curl up and cry, I tapped Protégé's shoulder to get him to look around. Judging by the angle of his head, it was above us again. The noise got louder. A locked door was struck so hard that even Protégé heard it. Then it was hit again... and again.

We both staggered back and huddled against the wall as an unearthly shriek pierced the air in the asylum. Long, high-pitched, and only growing louder and higher, it echoed down the hallways from wherever it was. I heard a shattering of metal, as whatever door had dared bar its way broke down. I felt my cheeks become wet. I even saw Protégé look frozen in terror. Something was in here, and it was very real. I felt him pull my hoof, dragging me onward. At a canter, we kept moving.

I didn't smell anything.

I didn't smell anything.

I didn't smell anything.

Repeating the mantra again and again to make me feel safer, I stuck to the rules. We didn't smell anything, so it wasn't near. Sound just echoed here a lot. It wasn't near us! It couldn't be!

Passing into the common area, overgrown plants in pots wrapped around the benches they had clung to and almost tripped me. My PipBuck began clicking to warn of radiation. Tugging on Protégé's clothing, I pulled him away from where it was. Had something got caught in radiation down here? How could Balefire reach so deep?

Avoiding the radiation took us closer to the larger rooms where I guessed staff might have once resided, at the far side of this level. Only, something caught my eye. Wires and thick cables snaked into it, and I could see the faded light of a terminal. The cables looked too new for this old place.

New things looking out of place were what we were looking for down here in the first place.

"In here," I whispered into his ear before creeping forward to poke my head inside.

What I saw made my face go pale.

There were terminals all right. A whole bank of them connected to the cables were placed on a crude desk. Yet what lay before them is what had caught my eyes. In this area of all places, I saw something I recognised from long ago. A huge machine that dominated the room. A pony could sit in it, with straps that held them tight and a headset hanging on a half-torn cable above it.

After a second, I realised something. It was two machines, two machines I had seen in two separate places connected.

Aurora Star's memory machine for ponies who didn't have magic seemed to have been combined with the device that had created spell orbs in the Stable. Two kinds of research had been connected down here. A machine that showed you memories combined with a machine that created orbs you could learn from. Was this to... no, this was beyond my mind to guess. This was something for Glimmerlight to figure out.

Just, why here?

"The fact that this strapped its users in pretty harshly worries me, Murk." Protégé shifted the leather straps with a hoof. "You only do that if it creates spasms—"

"Or if somepony didn't want to do it." I finished for him, a hoof gently caressing one of my own wings. Still unused to them, they had remained frozen to my side since we entered this place.

He nodded back, before simply shaking his head.

"What kind of asylum is this place?"

Trotting back, he made it very clear that we weren't pausing to go terminal file hunting. Yet even as we passed outside, I saw more rooms next to the chamber. They contained surgery beds, stained with oddly-coloured liquids and ranks of unidentifiable bottles near them. Lamps craned over each one, while loose buckles hung from either side. Suddenly, the groaning of the decrepit structure was all too eerily similar to what my imagination saw this place sounding like while in operation. Ponies had not been treated well here.

Across the common area lay various open windows. Cracked, and in some places, shattered, they looked in on a third chamber bearing banks of similar machines. Memory machines, all linked to one glowing orb at the top. Locked in its own little cage, there was no way we could access it, and I highly doubted Protégé would want to use it. Now was no time for memory orbs.

"Memory technology?" Protégé peered closer. "Why would you force somepony to watch a memory? Some sort of torture? Interrogation?"

"Or to show them something?" I added, before realising that that is pretty much the purpose of memory orbs anyway. I cast one more look into the room before turning to leave.

I did see one thing. Lying on the ground was a pack bearing the mark of Red Eye. Reaching over, I pulled it up and found it to contain little more than an audio tape. Ensuring the volume was low, I plugged it into my PipBuck as we trotted on.

Click.

"I can't get out. I can't get out!"

A buck's terrified voice whimpered into the microphone.

"They told me it was safe! They told me there were no monsters in the old metro! They lied to me! They lied! They're all dying out there now! Can you hear me? Do you read? Do... do you hear me?"

He'd thought it was a radio. Protégé leaned closer.

"There was something downstairs! We were sent to turn the power back on, but it was down there! This smell, a horrible smell! Can you hear me!? Get out if you smell it! GET OUT! GET OUT BEFORE THEY COME! PLEASE HELP ME! HELP! HELP ME, SOMEONE!"

I had to turn the volume down again as he shrieked. Protégé glanced around quickly, revolver creeping up again. The buck in the recording let his yelling fall to a defeated whimper.

"You... you aren't there. Why won't you answer? Please be there..."

Sniffing, beyond crying out, I heard him slump down.

"I can hear them coming. They heard me!"

In the distance, I heard something. A banging of doors followed by some sort of frantic movement and mad shrieks. Something knew where he was. It was coming.

"I can smell it. Oh no, I can smell it again! The rotten stench! Death! They're here! They're h— NO I DON'T WANT THEM TO BE HERE, GO AWAY! SOME PONY GET ME OUT OF HERE! NO!"

He dropped the device. The microphone crackled from the fall and the dent on the side suddenly made sense. He wailed, rushing off in the distance, his galloping quickly fading from the recording. In the time after he had fled, the sound of movement only increased in volume, getting closer, and closer, and louder!

It kept getting louder.

My eyes went a little wide.

"P-Protégé..."

The noise kept getting louder.

"Murk, what is it? I'm sorry, that was tough to hear—"

"Protégé!"

The horrid sound of something approaching stayed in my ears as I showed him the recorder.

It had stopped some time ago.

"...no."

Behind us, a tremendous slam of metal echoed across the entire balconied section of the asylum.

We both turned, a cold sweat forming on me as I saw dust explode from one of the locked and sealed doors. It struck again, throwing up more pebbles and fragments of brick. Dulled, yet high-pitched, a great, unearthly shriek of bile and rage keened out from behind it. The noise made my legs go weak. I fell. My entire body felt frozen up as I heard it.

Huge thumps, rends, and slams sent the heavy door buckling in its slot! A gurgling howl, desperate and repeating, roared up from behind it.

"It-it doesn't show on E.F.S..." I heard Protégé, his revolver shaking even in his magic as it raised. "Why can't I see it!?"

The door bent inward as the seal broke. The frame fell off, leaving only the hinges to hold it back.

There was a tiny hole at the top of the door that now let the smell seep into the room and burn my nostrils.

Rotten mint, sickly and distinct.

"Pr..."

"Murk, run."

"I... I can't... I'm..."

"Murk! RUN!"

He grabbed me, threw me ahead of him, and then took off. I couldn't do anything but scream until my throat gave out and sprint after him. The world around me became a blur. My eyes watered. My heart slammed against my ribcage with every single smash of the door behind us. The shrieking became a cry of desperation and infernal rage, as though it sensed us getting away from it. An unnatural ambience, like a low moan, began coming from every corridor and air vent that grew until it filled my ears with its deathly, haunting sound.

Protégé rounded a corner, easily overtaking me. I hoped he knew where we were! I saw open doors!

"In one! We can—"

"NO! Just run!"

I felt exhausted, my injuries coming up as I exerted myself. Concern for my own lack of speed made me doubt myself. We ran through banks of broken doors. Every room held its own obstacles to climb, jump or crawl around. I at some point leapt over several beds crammed into an old fitness room. Behind us, I heard that worst of sounds.

The sound of a door springing open.

There was no delay. No great scream from whatever it was. I simply heard something push the door aside and tear off after us. I felt my wings shivering, moving instinctively to try and speed me up. Protégé hit a door ahead of us, rebounded from its padlock, and fumbled with his revolver to aim it and blast the lock off. The first shot missed entirely, the second skiffed it. I heard him curse in a way that hardly befitted him before the third sheared the lock off. We ran through. Ahead, I saw a glint of green, the same symbol for the exit!

Both of us almost fell down the stairs, slamming into the wall of the landing before rebounding off to launch down the next flight. Behind us, the sound of something tearing past beds, upturning them, and screeching with lust and a desperate want and need to catch us. The stairs we went down led to another twisting series of wards. I was completely lost. I didn't remember where we'd turned, and I barely got a sense of where we were.

We came to a crumbled section of roof, sheer rock jutting down. Squeezing, turning side on, I had to wriggle past the thin gap it left. I threw myself into it behind Protégé, kicking and pushing with my exposed hind section until I was just inching through. I felt Protégé pull me from the other side, the clamor near behind me! I couldn't see it! I was trapped and I couldn't see what was bearing down on me! I screamed as something slammed into me, until I realised it was Protégé's magic pulling me through. Something scrambled, fumbling at the wreckage I'd just emerged from before turning and leaving, a sound like tearing on every motion, tinged with metallic tinkling.

Then the unthinkable. I heard a second howl join the first. It came from the corridors beyond us. Somewhere off to the right, a beeping sound picked up as I saw a flash of movement in the shadows outside of this room. We were far past it before I actually saw anything, but I heard the the frenzied screeching and that low, drawn-out moaning erupt from those deep corridors. The distance made me wonder just how huge this place was.

It tore into the room behind us, bringing a wave of nauseous smells in its wake. Protégé turned and slammed a filing cabinet down in front of the door we just passed, locking it in behind us. Peeled wallpapers of a peaceful Equestria lined the walls on either side, and maps of the area fallen upon the floor. The door behind us shattered, the wood and glass exploding like shrapnel.

Protégé led us through what I suddenly realised was a reception, yet Protégé turned away from it as though to run deeper in! I shouted to him, grabbed his hoof.

"RECEPTION! DOOR! WAY OUT!"

I just cried words wildly as I ran instead to the main doors, suddenly realising my guilt that I had just run ahead and not even helped him up. It was getting hard to see. I felt dizzy as I slammed into the heavier doors. Behind us, the creaking moan, beeps, and howls grew closer. The smell grew greater. I struck the doors again and again, but they wouldn't open. I cried to anything to save me, until Protégé pushed past and pulled a huge lever to the side.

With a dull clank, the doors began to open just enough for us to squeeze through. I didn't even see what was on the other side before I ran into the wooden planks barricaded over the entrance. I heard his gun fire, and I squeezed through the shattered hole. Somewhere, somehow, I felt another lever on the other side and pulled it.

Turning back, I saw the entrance closed over like the ones on the inner metro. Signs of danger had been painted across it. Falling off the lever, I saw the doors begin to slam shut again. Through the tiny hole, I caught one final whiff of the smell before they came together. The last thing I saw was the doors to the reception blasting open as though Brimstone himself had charged them.

These metal doors were too thick to break. The creatures slammed into them and pounded hard. I heard their muffled, horrific sounds for minutes afterwards as we limped and clambered away. They made keening wails that cut deep into me. Each scream went on for half a minute or more. I hadn't even seen Protégé until we emerged into a dark tunnel.

Protégé fell against the wall, slumping. His ponytailed mane had come loose in the frantic chase, and I saw him lean over, his revolver and eyepiece falling to the ground as he put his head in his hooves.

I had never seen him shed tears before.

As for myself, I simply found the nearest corner, curled up with my wings and hooves around me, and finally let it all out as the adrenaline painfully wore off.

Not a word was spoken between us for some time.

We had shifted away from the door the moment we got our breath back. Neither of us wanted to be anywhere near the asylum right now, and it was all I could do to stop my imagination running rampant with replays of that minute of terror. I found myself preferring the silence and melancholy of Stable Ninety Three over what lay in the outer metro.

The path had led upwards along a gently tiled slope shaped almost like a large tube of smooth brickwork walls, almost pitch black but for our lights. It was, however, entirely silent.

At least, I thought it was. Every so often I could have sworn I heard something nearby. Just a whisper in the dark or a feeling as though we were nearing something. Like I could sense something deep down below. Shaking my head, I took a deep breath and a gulp of RadAway to ward off whatever I'd stepped in. Brimstone's birthday gift had made my life so much easier.

Ahead of me, however, I saw Protégé stop and stare for a second. He looked to the side briefly as though just at the wall, before shaking his head and moving on quickly. I could have sworn I heard him mutter 'nothing' under his breath. I trotted closer.

"You, uh, alright?"

"I'm fine. Just... thought I heard someone there, felt something in the air."

"S-so did I."

There was a brief pause to look at one another. He simply shook his head and kept moving.

"This place was not meant for ponies. Let's just... just go..."

I followed behind him. Yet even as we trotted, I kept looking behind or below me. Little sounds of air moving whispered through the air, yet I felt no draft.

Protégé seemed more than a little uncomfortable, shaking his head again as we turned a corner.

There, finally, lay our destination. Ministry Station.

The great door ahead of us, the way out of those nightmare. It bore a massive bronze emblem of the Fillydelphia Metro.

It surprised me, really. This was a place I had been searching for. A place that could contain the key to escaping our bonds forever. I might have given more thought to what it might have looked like or even what I might find, but with my mind so preoccupied on simply wanting to see the outside world again, the very place I'd strove to find to make that happen held little imagery my head.

Now, far beneath the city of Fillydelphia, I had found it at last

The large door before us slid open easily. Yet once Protégé had pushed it, there were no creaks or stiffness. It fell quietly aside.

This was not what I had ever expected. Not in any of my active imagination.

Inside, it was not like my world. I had to squint as bright light flooded into the corridor. I heard Protégé mutter in disbelief and cover his eyes briefly. A white glare, clean and warm, filled Ministry Station. Peering past, I saw that there were fully functional lighting panels over white tiles; a smooth marble flooring dotted with polished metal patterns. There were clean walls, free of graffiti, stretching to either side along a platform studded with benches and backed by colourful murals upon the walls. They bore visages of the Ministry Mares, or green countrysides.

It was not unoccupied. Before us, once our eyes had adjusted to the metro platform's light and shining brilliance, we saw slaves working frantically around it. They polished the murals and swept the floor of any dust. One was repairing a vending machine near the back. If it hadn't been for their threadbare clothing and bony bodies, I might have never realised what they were.

Only, none of them seemed to care that we had just wandered in. I felt exposed as we trotted onto the clean flooring, but no slaves looked at us directly. They continued to murmur and go about their business so steadily that it took me a second to really realise what was different.

They were smiling.

None bore any chains, they had no fresh injuries, and worked with a confidence and genuine effort instead of the dull and slow grind you would see on the surface or the inner metro.

Yet that smile... every one of them bore it. Almost identical, sharing the same expression and look. Some chatted idly as they worked.

"We're almost done."

"I know, almost done!"

"I'm so glad I came here. I can help Equestria."

"I know, me too!"

"Yeah."

"I can't wait."

Protégé wandered forward, finding them completely oblivious to his presence. The platform stretched ahead of us, with three low, rounded passageways on the left leading further into the station while the metro line lay over a lip on the right. The tunnels at either end had been closed off entirely or had never even been dug. It was just smooth stone blocking them off. No wonder it had taken so long to find this place.

"What in Equestria is this?" Protégé muttered as we moved further in, holding his head and wincing from the bright lights.

I didn't know, but I could feel the hairs on my neck rising and my heartbeat increasing. I had expected blood and whipping and slavers shouting and...

Not this. This was somehow worse.

I could see it in their faces. They all wore the same expression. Their mouths were smiling, but their eyes were dead and lifeless.

"I've finished the panel!"

"Good work, that's one more thing finished!"

"Wonderful, there's so much to do."

"I'll go ask what else I can do."

"Okay. Goodbye."

"Goodbye."

A slave wandered past us, passing between Protégé and I, and I got a good look at that lifeless face. There was no spark there. He moved into one of the passageways and disappeared up a stone stairway.

Even as I glanced at those stairs after him, I heard the sounds of working going on above and below us; the soft tapping of hooves moving calmly in every direction. All seeking just to help what they could nicely and without any spoken worries. A yawning feeling that there was something different here. A new feeling that was wonde—

I stamped my hooves and shook my head, knocking my hoof off it a few times. No, this wasn't good. There was something wrong in here. I could feel it in the air, an ambience of stillness lacking the personality and colour of life.

"Protégé, what's going on?" I voiced the question I knew he couldn't answer, but I needed somepony to talk normally.

He didn't answer. I turned over to find him.

"Protégé?"

He was near two of the slaves, watching what they were doing quietly. Both were working on some wires behind a metal plate in the wall. One of them stretched a hoof to find a wire cutter, and Protégé lifted it to the struggling pony with his magic.

"What are you doing?"

He blinked and turned back to me, as though surprised or even embarrassed I'd seen.

"I... just handing it... no, nothing. Nothing, I'm fine. This place is not what I expected. There's something very, very wrong here, Murk. These ponies, look at their eyes."

Stepping closer, peering around the worker without her even acknowledging me, I saw what he meant.

Her eyes were fighting something. Small shivers in her hooves matched up to rapid blinks. She looked horrified, aghast, but only in her eyes. Only there, above that bright smile. I recoiled in confusion and fear.

Protégé lowered his head, taking a stoic look. "Let's get deeper in, find out just what Shackles is doing down here. I... I don't even know what to guess or where to begin."

He certainly looked at a loss as he went the way the slave had gone. Those behind us simply continued their work without even noting our leave.

Yet, even as I went onto the steps, I heard something. A scratching, earthy sound of something moving quickly. Turning back, I saw nothing but could keep hearing it. The sound was coming from the metro line, behind the smooth stone that blocked off the tunnels.

Very faded, lessened by the thick stone, I heard something gurgling and beating against it. Dull thumps and wet cracks. Then I heard a creaking moan. Then another. A third. A fourth.

It was them.

The stone that blocked up the tunnel trembled as a muffled shriek broke the calm silence. I felt Protégé stand ready to flee again as the beasts slammed again and again into that apparently thin wall of concrete keeping them out. Fragments of dust fell from above. Sickeningly wet slaps of something impacting against it rose higher.

Yet the slaves around us didn't pay any heed. Two of them were right beside the wall applying new layers of material to the tunnel to cover any of the small cracks I could see. They didn't even acknowledge what was right outside!

"Murk, please tell me, are you seeing the same thing I'm seeing?"

"It's like they can't think for themselves..."

"Come on, let's get out of here. I don't want to be around if those things break through."

He tugged at me a little while I stared. I could hear more impacts on the opposite end of the platform too. The sound was drawing them in. Even from behind me, a yawning sound of wind rushing through the tunnels caught my ears, yet I felt nothing upon my skin.

Suddenly, Ministry Station didn't feel very safe at all any more. But I wasn't sure what it was that truly scared me more. The physical threat laying siege to it or the unsettling atmosphere playing on my every sense that lay within.

It seemed Ministry Station was not simply occupied by mindless slaves. After little more than a few dozen metres into one of the half-circle shaped passageways, we had to duck behind an old ticket booth. I'd heard two ponies conversing more normally up ahead, laughing in rough voices.

We settled in behind the old chair where a ticket-pony might once had sat bored all day. Listening carefully, I heard the loose banter that unmistakably belonged to slavers.

"—so I says, 'look, I just want out of this place.'"

A female voice responded.

"Same, the sooner we get that damn shift change back to the inner metro, the better. This place just freaks me the fuck out. Keep thinking it'll do to me what it did to the ones Shackles broke in. You know Squib woke up screaming last night? Saying he heard somepony whispering in his ear in some zebra language or some shit."

Protégé glanced back at me as though to check I'd heard the same. This place truly was unsettling to those staying here. What was wrong with it?

"You kidding? Fuck me... let's just check on those slaves on the platform and get the hell topside back to the den as fast as we can. They told us it would only go for the slaves."

'It'? Had something changed them? I could feel a cold sweat of fear passing over me. I hated these things, the things you didn't understand or couldn't see. The effects of magic beyond what I could understand.

The slavers trotted quickly past, grumbling about Shackles keeping them down here so long. I gave them time to pass down the stairs we'd come up a few minutes before and took a peek out. The white tiles and colourful artworks covering the unblemished walls stretched out to a junction ahead. No pony in sight. I could hear many more though, somewhere above, along with a deep throbbing in the air.

Only going for the slaves. What did that mean? We had to move on, I needed my friends out of here as soon as possible. I needed out of here as soon as possible!

"Protégé, it's clear."

I moved out, before realising I'd heard nothing from him.

"Protégé?"

Turning to look back into the booth, I saw him just sitting and staring behind us. With a start, I looked back... and saw nothing. I whispered his name again and shook his shoulder. Blinking, he made a little shake of his head and a little gasp.

"Are you alright?"

He looked over at me, as though surprised to see me there. "Yes, yes. Sorry, I was j-just finding it strange that such a place exists. I'm fine. This place is just... incredible. If we could preserve this..."

"Maybe..." I just muttered to myself, not really caring much what anyone did to it so long as I was nowhere near it for the rest of my life. "It's clear, come on!"

This time, he followed and we crept further inside. The roof opened up, revealing the junction to be part of a larger network of tunnels down here. On one side, there lay a gigantic curved staircase of the same marble, while every exit from this junction bore a brass emblem above it. Likely leading to each of the platforms. I had seen this sort of style before, but witnessing the old Equestrian architecture properly lit and cleaned was as breathtaking as it was unsettlingly different in the dismal future we lived in. Amongst this light, I felt exposed, unable to hide.

At the bottom end of the junction, opposite the stairs, I saw a large metal door with welded plates holding it shut. I could only imagine why.

"Do you hear that?" Protégé stopped and looked around.

I couldn't, that in itself was unusual. "Hear what?"

"Just... something out there. I swore I heard somepony trotting nearby, but all of the slaves are still."

Clearly, Protégé was more spooked than I'd known. I just shook my head, cantering past quickly to the stairs. They had to lead to the main level of the station! I hopped up each of them in turn, trying to ignore how loudly my hooves seemed to echo in an area that no other sound echoed in turn. My head was hurting.

Just get your friends, Murky. Concentrate on your friends and getting out.

I reached the top and found the source of the noise. Wait... a noise? Why hadn't I heard all this below? The sounds of mass ponies moving around, of work going on, and others shouting or conversing everywhere! The sound flooded in, only realising it as I walked across some unseen barrier and left the silence of the tunnels below.

I came across the primary floor of Ministry Station itself. I had expected some shop outlets, ticket stations, and benches. I got them. They were all there.

But I didn't expect this.

What I had emerged from was but a small stairwell down to the platforms. Ahead of me lay a gigantic room, taller than it was wide! Great columns of white marble rose out of a mosaic patterned floor toward a curved and lavish roof. Archways decorated in brass vines surrounded the open floor, hiding the empty units where the shops or waiting rooms might have been in. A huge, round desk lay in the middle of the open floor, where tickets much once have been sold. The similar designs in the outer metro, and even in the asylum made it clear, this was made before the war had broken out.

It was filled with slaves. They moved in lines, hooves moving in sync with one another as they trailed or collected wires. Some hung from the ceiling, repairing the lighting panels that had shorted out. The floor was covered in Ministry workbenches that I'd once seen in Aurora's workshop and each bore another slave fixing all manners of talismans, spark technologies, and mechanical items. Others offered inane and dead conversations on basic observations as they swept alongside one another to get rid of the industrial burrs and fragments that fell to the floor.

I simply stood and gaped. Ministry Station, or whatever it had been called before the balefire, was a masterpiece of design hidden below the city. Only now it occurred to me, this was supposed to be the link between the inner and outer metros, a primary location for anypony who came to Fillydelphia. It was undoubtedly to be a crown of design, and it likely had been dropped and left unfinished the moment the war effort had taken its funds away. For all its grand nature, it held no equipment, nothing to set a metro station in motion.

Now it was nothing but a precious secret to those who had found it. Aurora Star's hidden research area where nopony would ever bother looking.

I felt my fleece grabbed and pulled back. A black hoof covered my mouth from the squeak I made in shock, and I felt somepony hold me still.

"Sssh."

Protégé! Confused, I shifted to look before the slaver trotted by while munching on an old packet of dried biscuits. Blinking, I began to see the familiar things I'd missed in my astonishment. Slavers wandered around them, checking on progress. There were no whips, chains, or canes. They simply watched quietly as the slaves did what they were supposed to, those empty smiles on their faces the entire time.

Yet every so often, I swore I saw one slave look up and around and gasp, before holding their head. Amongst so many moving at once, it stuck out. Within a minute, they would fall quiet, and drop back into their routine, where the smile would slowly creep back onto their face and they would pick up their conversation again.

"Let's go. The others are waiting for this."

"I know, I hope they make use of it."

"Me too. It will be good to see this working again."

"Haha. Yes. It will. Haha."

Two slaves cantered past us, smiling and looking dead ahead as they talked without looking at one another. They talked just like the ones below, like they all had the same personality in different bodies.

There was something about this place. The slaves acted strange, but the slavers didn't! They said it only affected slaves but... why?

Something about the atmosphere in here... it had to be. My mind hurt from trying to think on it. Glimmer would know though, she'd have figured it out!

Glimmer...

Glimmer...

I stopped and gasped. Glimmer!

I saw her! Right ahead at the opposite end of the great underground hall, I saw her looking along a line of small magical talismans with a careful eye. Throwing a few into a pack, she rejoined two other unicorns and began to trot toward an exit. I didn't see her face, but that unmistakable pink mane shone bright amongst the jaded and dulled slaves who had been in this sterile place for longer!

Taking a quick look around, I scampered out of the stairwell we hid in and took cover beside a workbench. The slave working at it didn't seem to even notice my presence and kept working on her wires. I heard her whispering.

"Yes, masters. I'll do it, masters. It's for the best, masters. But I... no, no... you know best, masters."

Creepy...

I made to go on, before turning to see where Protégé was.

He was... what!?

I saw him having stopped in the open, helping up another pony, and getting their fallen cargo back on their saddle. Smiling like I'd never seen him do, he patted the buck on the back as he reasserted the heavy load.

"Protégé!" I hissed strongly. "You're in the open!"

Ensuring the pony was fine, he turned, seemed to realise and ducked in.

"S-sorry. I was just... just helping."

"Helping?"

"Helping him. A... a slaver might have gone for him if he was late."

I just stared open-mouthed. Had the mint beasts really shaken him up that badly? All the same, his face hardened again and pointed ahead.

"If you go now, you could make that next workbench, the slaver's looking away. Go now!"

Almost wanting to shake my head, I hurried as quickly as I dared to get behind the slaver and heard Protégé creep behind me. The two of us pressed into the abandoned workbench, trying to stay out of sight of any slaver we saw.

This wasn't working. We were too conspicuous sneaking about. We needed to speed up. We needed to blend in. Looking up at the workbench, squinting as the lighting fixtures above flared into life with a joyless cheer from the slaves, I reached for the rags some ponies had left behind and threw one to Protégé. He took it without a word, clearly guessing the plan.

"You, um..." I bit my lip.

"I what, Murk?"

"You still remember how to, uh..." Oh, this was awkward. "You remember how to trot like a slave?"

He held onto the rags for a second, his hooves tightening around them. There was a faraway look in his eyes.

"Two years is a long time, Murk." He spoke quietly, sighing as he did so.

I wanted to call him out on the hypocrisy. That he had forgotten the suffering while still feeling bad for his own memories. To look at the inner metro mines and the waste of life, or to even see Fillydelphia above and callously talk of 'acceptable losses' while still daring to look sad.

Yet right now, seeing that look in his eyes, the one I knew I gave to a lot of ponies, I just couldn't bring myself to do it.

We pulled the rags on, waited for the next passing of slaves, and slowly slipped out to trot behind them with our heads level. They might have been falsely cheerful, but they still moved like slaves. Ordered, shivering, and clearly weak of body. It felt strange to feel like I had an experienced eye for slavery, but there was, even amongst their strange behaviour, something amiss.

They weren't entirely mindless. Their bodies sometimes showed a reluctance, or a staggering like they would normally. Whatever was affecting them wasn't a complete change. It seemed imperfect, like it came and went every so often in subtle ways. I wondered if they would stay like this if you took them out of here.

As we fell among them, I hardly needed any help to blend in, my body was still aching from the exertions earlier on my healing wounds, but it almost shocked me by how easily Protégé fell back into the routine. With his loose mane, lack of eyepiece, and that look on his face below the hood of the rags, he really did look every inch the born slave.

He had to come with us. He had to... I couldn't leave him here.

Rubbing my head, trying to get my ears to stop twitching and aching from the odd atmosphere down here, I tried to move as fast as I could. I could see Glimmer exiting ahead of me! She was talking to the mare beside her, probably flirting or something. I couldn't wait to see her again!

We came to the same passageway she went into. It was ringed with that same brass pattern and lined with carved wooden benches either side. She wandered in ahead of us, turning a corner farther down. We both sped up, now that we were out of sight, cantering after we left the main room.

It was so quiet in here. It was...

Wait...

I turned, hearing the main room again behind us filled with activity. I saw Protégé look oddly at me. But it had just been silent. Why had all the sound went for a few...

"Murk, what's wrong? Come on!"

I felt my breathing increase. This wasn't right. Turning, I followed him as we pursued Glimmerlight. The corridor led to a larger room with plush couches and low tables. An empty space for a bar was across one side behind crystal clear-stained glass. Some sort of VIP lounge! She must have gone already, had they galloped?

I heard a door close to the side.

"There!"

We both turned... and found a blank wall behind the VIP couches.

"Murk, what are you pointing at?"

"I... I..."

I didn't know. I had heard it! I looked closer, seeing the lines where a door had once existed before it had been filled in. Protégé trotted up to it, running a hoof along them.

"They've laid concrete to cover the door."

The wall shook in, a guttural howl right behind it. The sound of bone cracking against a hard surface set the entire blocked door trembling. We both screamed, falling back across a coffee table to get away from it, the reason why they'd blocked it up becoming clear! Those things were even inside here! Trapped in pockets of sealed rooms!

The wall splintered, pieces of dust and pebbles falling from the joints. I saw small cracks form up the sides. That blockage was strong, but it wouldn't hold forever. Rapid, hoarse retches like something trying to throw up without any success emitted from behind the barrier.

Yet none of the slaves within earshot of it in the room we'd just left reacted!

I couldn't take it anymore. I galloped! I leapt over the couches, sprinting to the other side despite Protégé's protests and rounded the corner, away from the monster behind the door even while it shrieked and drew slavers running behind us. They started shouting, ordering slaves to patch it and block it up! I heard one cry 'They're trying again!' before we got out of there.

Away from the lounge, down a gentle slope, the corridor opened up. The walls turned to frames of large windows, empty of glass. They looked down on shallow depressions on either side, where I could see banks of terminals and various machines of magical technology all around the walls, their cables leading into rougher, more newly carved tunnels at the sides. Slaves tinkered over them or typed on the terminals with strange excitement on every movement other than their faces. Huge blueprints had been pinned to the walls, bearing arcane symbols and florid writing as much as they did hard print and diagrams. The zebras and Aurora had torn this entire part of the station apart to fit in a full laboratory!

"Woah..." Protégé breathed as he saw the torn walls and advanced machinery in various states of activity within. "They must have somehow smuggled entire generators down here to power this."

"Or it's powered from something already here." I muttered, remembering (and indeed still feeling in my skull) that same throbbing of power from somewhere deeper. Somewhere up ahead.

We slowed down, seeing the slavers below wandering amongst them. We were still close, only a few steps kept this corridor higher than the lab areas either side. Cables hung from the ceiling, all connected to memory machines and tables for ponies to lie on beside headsets. The thought of those same ones in the asylum came to me rather uncomfortably.

The raised walkway we were on continued right over it, meeting another one going horizontally across the room too, leaving four giant lab areas around it. Reaching the cross, I looked to either side. There she was again! Off to the right, about twenty feet past where the walkway ended and became a clean corridor again, Glimmer waited beside a huge metal door that had clearly been installed by Aurora's teams. It looked like the kind I'd seen in factories.

I was so close! I had to really fight to keep my trotting at a slave's pace with so many more slavers in this area. I felt dizzy from hope, and a pain in each leg like it were slowing me down and holding me back. My eyesight blurred as I felt the world around me spin a little. Voices from below mixed, sounding older, cleaner, more scared.

What was going on?

I could see slaves below all holding their heads, some sort of pressure in the air...

Staggering... I tripped. A sound of wind passed by again, throbbing in time with crackling sounds in the air. There were more voices here, somewhere, down amongst the slaves. A different language...

No... no! I willed myself to wake up, Glimmer was there! I wasn't sure if I actually shouted to myself, 'Wake up, Murky! Wake up and move on! You're almost there!'

Opening my eyes, not even realising I'd closed them, I began to move forward unsteadily, hearing the groans around me. Protégé had fallen too, like many slaves. The slavers looked unnerved and silent. I heard voices, but no pony was talking!

Then it passed, as suddenly as the pressure began. It left and normality snapped back.

I couldn't take this. I galloped forth, trying to catch up with her before that door opened. I felt more waves of pressure and more fuzziness in my head, but I pushed on. I heard Protégé stop behind me, gasping suddenly.

After too long, I reached Glimmerlight. She was looking at me, and I threw myself onto her.

"Sis! I... we're here!"

The pony I'd grabbed turned to me, surprised at this little buck holding her. Her emotionless eyes above a dull smile raised an eyebrow.

"Hello. I've got to get back to work. Sorry. Shall we talk later?"

Not since our argument had I ever felt my heart sink so far.

No, Glimmer, no... sis...

I pawed at her even as I heard the door behind her open and the sound of a booming voice within cry out for them to go in. A familiar voice. One that snapped at my very soul. Somepony was tugging me, throwing his hooves around me to pull me desperately through a door to hide. My hooves flailed out, a hoof covered my mouth to stifle the plea.

Yet even before the door closed, red magic snapping it shut, I saw that colossal metal door slide away and Glimmerlight smile and walk inside past Chainlink Shackles himself without a care in the world.

Even as I struggled with Protégé, crying and wanting to shout out, I heard the gigantic door slam shut, and I fell back, hopeless, before collapsing into a curled little ball.

Sis...

Just Downstairs

“Are we any closer to the primary chamber?”

“N-no, master. The door remains unbreachable. The slaves say that... that it just resists everything. It must use Stable technology in it or something, the Ministry of Wartime Technology did build it after all and—”

“Silence, cretin! Do not lecture me!”

There was a sound of somepony being grabbed and lifted from the ground. Sat in the room we had hid in, I could hear the conversation clearly.

“If you cannot go through the door, go around it. If you cannot go around it, go under it. Whatever it takes. This operation has drained much of what we can muster in this ridiculous mountain expedition already. Now get to work.”

“Y-yes, master!”

“Don’t forget who it is that saved you from losing your life, and who could happily throw you back to the wolves of your debts should you begin to think yourself above your station.”

“Yes, master!”

They were dropped and quickly galloped off. I heard somepony else trot out of the huge door behind Shackles. The horror of what had become of Glimmerlight tore at my mind, but the fear of who lay just outside kept me silent, merely watching the door that Protégé held his ear to.

My hearing had no such requirement.

“I suppose you can’t blame the poor buck. This place tends to leave most with headaches as it is.”

That was Grindstone’s voice!

Shackles made a low, dangerous sound in reply.

"Only those that matter. This place holds secrets, Grindstone. It is a nexus for slavery of the mind, the source of Fillydelphia's history of servitude. I won't tolerate delay on finding why."

I saw Protégé narrow his eyes. Shackles' words were grand. A nexus of slavery?

"One of many secrets, yes." Grindstone coughed harshly and trotted past the door, joining Shackles' stomping tread. "My work in the Ministry has encountered similar problems. We miss one piece of the puzzle to make the simultaneous memory experiment function properly. We try orbs, but they simply fracture. They are not designed for it. We need one made for it, just as you need what I would presume to be some sort of key to find the end of your own search."

"You believe this mountain holds these secrets?"

"I only know it is something Aurora had great interest in visiting regularly and supporting it with funds diverted from her own Ministry's records. All off the charts, disguised as payment for several non-existent experiments that all 'failed' and were disposed of. Simply put, whatever lies in her Ministry, this place and the mountain's mines are linked somehow. Perhaps we shall..."

His voice trailed away, even for me they had moved too far down the corridor for me to hear the rest.

Finally, I dared let out a small sob with any volume. Free of the fear Shackles left in his wake, the memory of Glimmer came racing back.

"We need to go in there!" I gritted my teeth, moving toward the door until Protégé blocked me.

"We cannot open it, Murk."

"We have to! Glimmer's in there! She's... she's not well! I need to help her! I... I need to!"

I almost fought with him, trying to push past and scraping my hooves on the ground.

"The door is locked shut, Murk! Calm down, we can—"

"Calm down!? They've done something to my sister! I need to help her! Help me, please!"

It was almost a scuffle. I fought and shoved, but the bigger pony held me back before dropping me to the ground.

"Murk, listen! We..." He blinked a few times, putting a hoof to his head with a groan before wandering away from me. "We can't get... in. We just need to find something... something in this place for it. So we can help to get it open. Help..."

The change in his voice broke my mood. My eyes followed the slaver as he leaned on the wall. His eyes closed, and he kept looking side to side.

"P-Protégé? What's wrong?"

"Just a... a headache, Murk. Like I can hear things in here. That sensation when we pushed after Glimmerlight. There's something down here, Murk. Something that affects ponies."

Getting to my hooves, I couldn't help but glance to the door we passed through in order to hide. I dearly wanted to just shout through the door, maybe she would hear me! Yet I knew he was right. The door was massive, and we'd heard it slam shut behind Shackles and Grindstone.

All the same, I didn't fancy hanging around here much longer. I had a growing headache, too, and the sensations of moving air and thick, throbbing power below our hooves was getting to me too. Protégé seemed to especially dislike it. He'd been acting really strange.

I trotted over to him, finding him apparently very interested in the walls of the darker room. They were broken tiles, dark with rot and yet uncleaned like the remainder of the station.

“Protégé? I... I’m sorry. I’m just worried. and scared.” I crossed my front hooves. “The things earlier and what happens to ponies here I...”

He didn’t even seem to notice me.

“Protégé?”

“Seems odd to miss cleaning this bit here. Wouldn’t take long if somepony went at it with enough effort. Finish it off. They’d feel happier about it, wouldn’t they?”

He spoke conversationally. Like he’d forgotten what we had been even talking about.

“Protégé?” I hoofed his shoulder hard, and he snapped around like he’d seen a ghost.

“I...” He looked around, down the darker corridor, his eyes wide, his pupils dilated. “I just... nothing. Was sure I heard somepony saying this place needed sorting. Sorry. We should head on. Find a way to open the door.”

I just nodded while he wandered away in front, but I watched him warily. This was dangerous enough without him losing it.

Or without the same happening to me.

The corridor was actually a room, now that I saw it clearer, with low arches and with cages barring entrance on either side. The air stank of unwashed ponies.

At the far end of the corridor, I could have sworn the shadows shifted in between my blinks. Like ponies were moving without anypony there. Sweat dripped down the back of my neck. This place... I almost preferred the obvious danger of the metro lines we’d passed through.

Cantering after him, I looked into each of the caged arches. Slaves lay in little pony piles, sleeping in strange unison. After a second I realised why. Each of their breathes made their torsos expand in sync with one another.

“What have they done to them, Protégé?”

“I don’t think it’s the slavers, not directly anyhow. Shackles said this place did it. Those machines we saw, do you think—”

“Murk?”

I stopped on the spot. The deep, gravelly voice rumbled out of the cage just ahead of us. I knew it! I knew it! I galloped past Protégé and right up to the rusty bars, pushing my head through them.

Brimstone Blitz was getting up right before me. Dropping a thick piece of fabric away to the side, he advanced to meet me before bending down. Behind him, I saw Coral Eve look up before rushing over. Pushing her front legs through, I met her in the best hug I could manage.

“What are you doing here, you two?” Brimstone glanced at Protégé.

“Getting you out.” Replied the unicorn. “Both Murky and I need you, for both our purposes.”

“Our purposes?” Brimstone’s face showed no hint of giving any games away.

“Don’t take me for a fool, Warlord. You and I both know what you are all trying to do. What we want just happens to coincide right now. Are you and Coral okay?”

“As good as we can be.” Coral looked up, letting go of me and wiping away some of my tears with a hoof. “It’s been hard. We’re hurt and starving... very weak. But we’re alive.”

She looked it. Coral had always had a strong frame to her body, but now she seemed thinner and more drawn. Her cheekbones were noticeable for the first time. Even Brimstone looked lethargic, his injuries in the Pit still recovering. The massive burn scar on one side of his body looked raw, and I still wasn't used to seeing only one eye staring back at me.

"G-Glimmer..." I didn't even know what to say.

Brimstone growled under his breath, looking beyond us. "So you saw."

"Glimmer, she hasn't had it good, sweetie." Coral stroked my mane gently. "Since we came here, she kept saying she saw things or had dreams of Old Equestria. They got bad, turned to nightmares, and she started using her orbs to remove them. I... I tried to stop her but... something in this place, Murk. Something she was vulnerable to, we all felt it, heard things. But for her it was worse. Then she started volunteering for shifts. Even with it just being a couple of days down here she doesn't even recognise us any more after that."

Whatever tears she had wiped away were quickly being replaced. My sister had needed me.

"I'm so sorry, hun. We've seen it happen to others. I don't know why not us. We feel it, things out of the corner of our eyes in the dark, winds we don't feel, sounds of ponies whispering, yet nopony talked. This place is evil, Murk."

Protégé looked behind us at the door.

"If this is a slave pen, they may be back any time. Brimstone Blitz, we need to get this cage and that door outside open. Do you know how?"

Brimstone snorted and knocked the cage with a hoof, the strong bars clanging hard.

"I tried to bring it down. Don't think I'm quite as strong as I once was, boy. The only pony with the skeleton keys down here would be Shackles himself, likely in his own room. If you can get them, we might be able to get out. Just be aware, I will not leave this station without Glim."

"I wouldn't imagine it." Protégé was hasty to add.

"Good." Brimstone snapped the word out, staring down at Protégé. "Head back out of here and directly to the opposite end of that big bloody lab they have. Good to see the sassnach bastard's still limping."

Brimstone seemed rather pleased with that thought. His one eye turned to me and saw me crouching down fearfully. We had to steal something. I knew who it would be that had to do it.

"He's not your master now, kid."

"I... I know."

"Aye. In, out, grin afterwards when you imagine how pissed off he'll be imagining you stealing his personal slaves away from him. You two better get going now. They'll be changing shifts within half an hour."

I gulped and nodded. Protégé was already moving away from the cage to check outside. Shivering on the spot, hearing the strange ambience of Ministry Station in the air and feeling the stark terror of confronting Shackles himself in my mind, I realised I had to rise up here. I had to rise to the occasion.

How many times had Glimmerlight saved me? How many times had Coral helped me keep going? How many times had Brimstone obliterated an obstacle I couldn't fight?

For them, I had to manage this. I saw Coral's weak but confident smile as she rested her hooves on the cage, and I saw Brimstone winking that one remaining eye at me. They believed in me. They believed in me.

Oh Goddesses, they were insane.

"Come on, Murk. You're not alone. I'll help you do this."

Protégé trotted beside me when we put on our slave disguises and crept back out.

“Thanks...”

All the same, the way he'd been acting and what Coral had said, I worried all the same.

Why didn't it affect Coral or Brim? Why Glimmer?

All the more, why Protégé?

Beep!

My hoof flew to the PipBuck quickly, tapping the volume dial rapidly to make sure it stayed quiet. I had been hunched behind an abandoned cleaning cart left lying by the side of the smaller labs we had entered when it had gone off. After passing through the main area, Shackles' room hadn't been hard to locate. Following his voice wasn't exactly difficult.

Now we simply waited opposite that imposing steel door amongst a small lab of ponies fixing up spark batteries and magical talismans. Protégé watched them, but I had something else to listen to, waiting for my chance when Shackles left...

Beep!

Click.

“Um-um, hi.”

“Hi...”

“Just a quick update. I'm in a room with some sleeping workers, so I have to be quiet. It's been three days now down here and I... I don't think they're going to let me out. I'm trapped. I'm so scared. I know that Sky must be so worried about me. We were supposed to meet two days ago, but they won't let me leave!”

I looked up at the workers toiling with dead smiles around me. The atmosphere was eerily cold and calm, mixed in with hoofsteps going back and forth in the corridor. Sometimes, I could swear no actual ponies had passed by when I heard them.

Gulping, feeling the hairs on my neck crawl, I returned my gaze to the PipBuck, and my attention to poor Sundial.

“I've been briefed by Aurora Star herself. She's really weird. Like, she's intelligent, but she's a little socially awkward. A bit like me before I met Sky actually. She seemed really nervous, constantly glancing at the zebras. Did she get trapped in this as much as I did? She wants me to join a team and help construct these memory orb machines. Really, it seems to be an adaptation of the same techniques we used to help the spells in Ranger armour 'remember' user settings. Something about orbs that can teach ponies things.”

That matched up with what I'd seen. Just like the Stable, they had continued her research down here and developed the same things from Aurora's theories. Spell orbs.

I heard hooves getting up in Shackles room and nudged Protégé. The unicorn took a second to respond, looking dully across the room, before jolting his head up.

“There's something bigger planned, though. Some expedition soon to take some of us to another place. They keep talking of 'safe zones' to develop something. What's dangerous about memory magic, though? It's just teaching ponies things they couldn't learn otherwise. All the same, I woke up last night hearing somepony screaming, running away from what I now know is an old asylum the Ministry built and then abandoned after Fluttershy had deemed it unsuitable. I saw the pony run past our room from the direction of it... her hair had gone white.”

My teeth chattered a little. Just what was in there? What were they doing? Was this zebra magic? I'd heard all the legends about the things they'd done in the past, like melting ponies alive or devouring them for food.

"I... I hear someone. I need to—"

Click.

If I'd hoped to have any time to think on that after it ended, Shackles wasn't going to give me the chance. His voice rung out from his room.

"There is no shortage of slaves to use for testing, Grindstone. I will get more if you require them."

"Be that as it may, Master Shackles, the slaves here are unsuitable after this place has had its way with them. They are too defined, too imperfectly aligned for any sort of memory tapping. The ones on Fillydelphia's surface, perhaps, yet many retain too many thoughts unwilling. If we had a foal, we could—"

Grindstone's careful tone was interrupted. I had begun to learn that one could never get too long to speak before Shackles would take control of any conversation.

"We don't. At least, not yet. Maintain what you are doing, I'll deal with that in time. You and I both know what's coming. There is one that might help us with minimal effort, however. Leave him to me. You simply get the team together for that mountain, if you believe it will help. Waste no time."

"Of course. Heh, you really are getting younger by the day with all that ambition showing, Shackles. Not seen that look on your face for years."

"This is my city, no matter what Red Eye thinks. It always was. Now I own its heart."

Shackles and Grindstone moved from the room and wandered along the side of the lab, facing away from us. I could see Grindstone was limping, stopping to cough every few feet in the thick air down here. His elderly frame shivered and struggled to keep up with the gigantic slave master beside him. It really felt odd. Grindstone must have been the only person in this entire city that could actually hold any sort of conversation with Shackles.

I didn't waste time. Nodding to Protégé, I sneaked out behind them and pushed my way into Shackles' room.

The inside was sparse. Made of steel on all sides, it clearly had been put together by the workers down here rather than when the metro was built. A worryingly identical desk to the one in the Mall dominated the room with a rusted cage in the corner, likely where I would have been put had I still been his. To the other side, there was a musty old bed on a metal frame. Listening out behind me, I rushed to the desk and started hunting right away.

While my hooves tore open drawers and hunted among piles of odds and ends upon his desk, I couldn't help but ponder more on just what this place was. Sundial hadn't mentioned any strange ambience, so that must have come later in his time. Something had happened here, maybe because of the balefire? Or after? Did it have to do with some crazy memory experiment that went wrong and released a memory orb into the air that created recurring perceptions of all who were in the area that perhaps now manifested as ghosts caught between the physical world and their own memories?

I stopped for a second and blinked. My imagination really was on overdrive today.

"Could anypony blame me?" I muttered, digging into Shackles' things.

I moved drawer to drawer, hooves spreading the papers, tools, and shotgun rounds he kept aside in the hunt for keys. Shackles was a practical slaver. He had to have spares! I'd just take any I found and—

"Aha!"

I found one large ring of keys and threw them into my pack. The thought to rush out now entered my mind, but who knew if this was all of them? I needed to make sure. Shivering the longer I stayed here, I moved to the next line of drawers and began digging through sets of hoof cuffs he had stored ready.

If he came back, there was only one corridor. I'd be trapped.

"Come on, come on..."

Minutes passed. The drawers were finished. I began to hunt along the edges of the bedside table and under the folders he kept there. I flipped through them to look for anything in between the papers, and instead got a rather unnerving sight of photographs. They were of slaves, each in the same collar and each on their last legs. Every photo bore a red cross over them. There was one of me in here, one I hadn't even remembered he had taken. It bore no cross.

I was a skeletal, broken figure, looking up at the camera with submission in my eyes.

Sweet Goddesses, I'd been so hurt I hadn't even remembered things like this.

Well, not anymore.

Throwing it down again, I noticed a ring pointing out the side under it. The ring led to a huge and fancy looking key. Yes! Throwing it in my bag as well, I made to hunt over the last things.

I should have gone then. I knew I should have, but I didn't want to leave anything to chance!

I really should have gone then.

The stomping hit my ears just a moment too late. He was in the corridor outside.

Standing rock still, my body froze with fear and my mouth dropped open in shock. He was coming! Oh Goddesses! I had no way out! There was no airducts or floorboards! He had no cupboards or drawers big enough to squeeze in, it was too sparse!

"Get back to work, worm!"

I heard a whip slap into somepony's back, and a stallion shriek in pain. Then again and again until a begging was heard, promising that he would work harder. Shackles was in the lab outside! Protégé must have had to hide!

But I couldn't.

No, I could! It was the worst hiding place ever, the most pathetic attempt born of a foalish comfort. But it was all I had.

I hid under his bed. Crawling right to the back corner, I curled up and shook terribly. I was sweating so hard I feared he might smell me. My heart slammed into my ribs hard enough that it hurt. With shaking hooves, I gulped down far too much of my RadAway than was necessary just to ensure I didn't cough.

The door opened.

And he entered.

His hooves were visible in what I could see. They made the thin steel floor bend beneath him as he limped his way in, having acted stronger when around Grindstone. I could hear the rasp in his breaths after Brimstone's attack a few days ago. Clearly, he was still recovering just as much as I, Brimstone, or Protégé was.

The hooves moved forward, setting to his desk where I heard a low growl under his breath.

"Somepony has been in here."

I had to stifle the squeak. He'd noticed! Oh Goddesses, it had to be the same trick Protégé used in his office! I'd been so stupid!

"Somepony after keys..."

'Please... please, please, please...' I endlessly repeated the word in my head.

He moved in further. His mere presence, the smell of that mangy coat washed into the room so thickly that I wanted to gag. He was moving right toward the bed! Reaching the side, he stood right before my hiding place, before turning and sitting upon it. The bedframe protested and groaned when the huge stallion's weight sank. With horror, I felt the wire mesh holding the mattress above me press down, pushing upon me and effectively trapping me here. Claustrophobia set in, the frame lowering down and keeping me in my little corner, restricting my space till I couldn't move! If I did he'd notice me for sure, it was too small a space to move quietly!

I heard him pick up the folder and open it.

"It seems our little thief is getting bolder every day, eh? Daring to come here. Daring to steal from their Master."

Biting my lip, eyes clenched shut, I simply covered my eyes and prayed internally. He knew, he had to know! Maybe if I came out, he'd go easier! If I gave up.

The bed frame suddenly released and he stood up again, his hooves clattered to the ground before me. I heard him put the folder down and move further into the room.

"The perfect slave in the heart of Fillydelphia. The eternal chain... hehe. The Master will be so again. Nopony escapes it, not even the ass, for whatever that ageing mule thinks. There is only one Master."

To my immense relief, he moved toward the door. Only then he stopped.

"Murky Number Seven."

Never in my life, had my heart felt so still. Hearing my full name spoken without him even knowing I was there. Or did he? Oh no. Oh no!

"It won't take long to break you back in. The born slave. The servant who knows his place. You were meant to come to me. None of the others... just you. Just you and that lovely broken mind... hehehe."

The door opened, and I dreaded hearing even one step back as he stomped out and left. His hoof treads echoed long as they disappeared down the hallway, leaving me in the dark.

I emerged a couple minutes afterwards, trotting into the small lab to find Protégé. Trotting toward me, he clearly saw the look on my face, saw the tears. He'd seen Shackles go in.

I fell forward a little, sitting down awkwardly, and leaned against the wall with my hooves covering my face.

It didn't matter that he was a slaver, or whether or not I could call him a friend. Just feeling anypony resting a hoof on my shoulders and quietly telling me it'd be okay was enough for me right at that moment.

Our return wasn't so simple.

The moment we had poked our heads through the door leading back to the main lab, we had dropped back rapidly.

Chainlink Shackles stood at its centre, dominating the proceedings and bellowing orders.

He was right on the elevated bath between them on the centre. We'd never get past him!

"Find more materials to block the exits! I will not lose another room to these beasts forcing in! Should they take a room of importance, it will be you retaking it! Get going! NOW!"

Shackles didn't threaten. That was an ultimatum.

It only confirmed my thoughts. Ponies in this place were attracting whatever lurked in the outer metro, drawing them to every possible entrance. They couldn't possibly keep it much longer if they ran out of supplies; these things were finding every possible way in that ponies might have overlooked. Now that I cast my eyes up, I could see that even the air vents had been welded shut with huge iron plates.

"There has to be a way around, Murk. We passed a few other corridors. Let's go before we're spotted."

He was right. Much as my eyes were focused on my ex-master (I did like to remind myself of that whenever possible), we had to get moving. I didn't want to be here if we were spotted, let alone if something broke in...

However, just as I began to step back, my eyes caught somepony amongst those moving back through the labs. There was a group of slaves awaiting instructions on where to go at one side of the large room, mostly sitting or leaning on the wall. Slavers were dividing them up.

An earthy yellow coat with a deep brown mane streaked in red.

Sunny Days!

She was right there! I knew she'd been taken here, but I'd thought it was the inner metro she'd been left in! Yet here she was, lying against the wall and resting as best she could. Filthy and bearing injuries, she looked weak. Heart in my mouth, I dearly hoped she had held up down here, and not become one of them. I knew she was strong inside.

A massive blue mare began shouting at them, dragging slaves up to move elsewhere.

"C'mon! Git oop! Getcha movin' now!" Her odd accent, seemingly formed of many origins, penetrated the air with sharp, whiplike cracks before Sunny's group began moving. I saw her slide in between the ponies, staying out of sight and inside the crowd. Smart mare. A few others trotted with her, mutually helping one another.

"Murk, what's wrong? We have to go!"

"There one pony more we've got to get, Protégé. An old friend."

He pulled me back from the door and let it close. "We won't get anypony by standing around, let's go."

He was right. I nodded, and we slipped off into the deeper areas of Ministry Station. We passed by many of the fallen slaves idly chatting while carting supplies around or attempting to break into sealed rooms. Others made a point of securing some rooms. The lower we went, the more we found they were having to block it all up.

Eventually, we found ourselves entering less populated areas. An old café near some interior windows that had been stripped of anything useful lay ahead of us. This wasn't getting us anywhere. Every direction we'd taken was putting us farther away from our goal of the slave cells, yet no way around presented itself. Hanging around to wait for Shackles to move back in wasn't much better...

Behind me, Protégé stumbled and caught a table with his front hooves to keep himself up, groaning and holding his head briefly. He looked behind him, staring at a bare wall.

That wasn't helping much either.

"It's getting to you too, isn't it?"

"I'm fine, Murk. Let's... let's just keep going. I'm just... hearing things. What they said for Glimmer, I won't fall to it... s-something about her orbs weakened her. Come on!"

He pushed on ahead, knocking a few chairs out of the way with more aggressiveness than I'd seen in his movements in a while. Not since he'd grabbed me earlier on today at the thought of the foals being endangered.

"But it got others..."

My words went unanswered, the strained look on his face showing more frustration and anger than anything. He didn't like that it was happening.

Reluctantly, I dropped the issue and followed him to where he looked through those interior windows. Below the café, about fifteen feet beneath the window, I could see another level. It held open platforms beside metro lines. These, however, bore only smashed barricades at the openings to their tunnels. Something had broken through before the concrete had been laid down.

"That platform, it runs all the way to the east, the direction we want to go, Murk. Look down there."

I craned my head and hopped up on a small box to see over the lip better, feeling decidedly dejected from my height. The platform was between four metro lines, studded with smashed benches and ruined signs that bore, presumably, times and departures. I looked at the yellow text upon them, taking some time to decipher the single word, eventually realising they all said "delayed." How appropriate.

"What was I looking at?"

"The stairwell on the far end."

There indeed was one. It went up to—

Ah, that could—

My eyes found those smashed barricades again, and I gulped.

"Nooooo, no, no, no! I don't think this is the best idea."

"It takes us to the opposite end of Ministry Station, below that main lab area, and back into the place we found your friends from the opposite side."

"B-but the barricades. Those things must be down there! It's open to them!"

Protégé glanced at me, before unlatching the window and pushing it open. Stale air swept in over us both, the stench of decay and dust blew into the café.

"No mint." Protégé muttered to himself. "It's only thirty metres or so. If we sprinted..."

"No!" I pleaded with him. "If we open it, they'll be let in here! Everypony will die!"

"We could rappel down from here."

"There'll be another way!"

"There isn't."

"I... I..."

I was quaking so hard that I hadn't even noticed that Protégé looked afraid, too. He was right. We couldn't risk staying unseen forever, and we had to get over there. Shackles knew I had these keys, he might even have known it was me! We couldn't delay. He might go for the cells to cut us off!

Taking a slow breath, I muttered quietly to myself. "For Glimmer, Murky. For your sis."

Letting the breath out, I nodded, and spoke up.

"Okay."

Getting a boost up from Protégé, I sat on the windowsill, attracting a curious glance from Protégé to the way in which I sat on my rump with my legs dangling out. (Why does no pony get it? It's comfortable!) He vaulted up after me and held on as I hooked my, uh, hook onto the window and bit hard on the mouthpiece to lock the wire in place. We didn't need to jerk and fall. Breaking a leg in an area they could reach would just be horrific.

"Ready, Murk?"

"N-no."

"Glad I wasn't the first to say it. Let's go."

He bit his lip, a strangely meek expression from the stoic slaver. I closed my eyes and released the tension on the wire a bit, dropping us from the window. Gradually, we lowered down, the wire taking both our weights fairly easily.

From below us, I heard a small, metallic sound. Like a bit of tin hitting the ground.

I stopped immediately, ready to bite to pull us back up. Protégé's revolver flew out, pointing down toward a tunnel where the noise had come from. We simply swung in silence, waiting...

Waiting...

Nothing.

Whimpering to myself, not in the least from the weight on my saddle tugging at my torso, I lowered us to the ground.

"Th-this might make noise when it comes loose to retract, Protégé."

"Then get ready to sprint. We can make it."

The repeated line was whispered to himself, something I wasn't meant to hear. Taking a breath, I released the tension. The sound of the saddle whirring and dragging the released hook back in seemed deafening, the clack as it jammed even worse. Wincing, I tugged at it, but it wasn't moving.

"What happened?" Protégé seemed impatient to get moving, I could see his hooves pacing.

"I'm stuck!"

My hook had wedged on the window as it slammed shut above us, the rusted joints failing. I was stuck onto it! Like I was chained to a post! My hooves tugged at the wire, biting for it to retract hard enough that light traces of smoke flew off from the airgun mechanism and smelled like burning. I looked to either side at those looming dark tunnels. Things lurked in there. If they heard us...

"Come on, Murk!" Protégé pulled with me, the wood above cracking.

I didn't want to leave my precious saddle! I'd never get another one, but it'd take me so long to get out of it! If I was caught half way...

From behind me, I heard that same sound of metal striking the ground, echoing down one of the metro lines.

I had to fight not to scream. Another sound, a scraping sound, came from down one of the tunnels, rippling out. I saw Protégé's head snap around and gasp. He suddenly redoubled his efforts, pulling harder until the wood splintered, the hook almost free!

"What is it?"

He gritted his teeth, pulling again and again with me.

"Protégé, what is it?"

The hook flew free, dragging the entire rotten window with it. Falling away, the hook almost slashed my face as it sucked in and snapped to my side, the window collapsing from above us. We dove to the side, hearing a shattering of glass and wood on the filthy marble floor behind us from the entire frame coming crashing down.

“E.F.S. spotted something red. GO!”

I needed no telling. We made for the opposite staircase at top speed! My hooves clattered on the flooring, leaping over the piles of scrap and weaving around the benches. Protégé clambered over one to simply move in a straight line. The sound from the falling window echoed around through every tunnel.

Fifteen metres!

We passed under the platform board.

Ten metres!

The stench was unbearable! Rotting bodies were near the stairwell, insects scurrying over them when we approached. Such a sharp and sweet scent like...

...mint.

“Protégé, RUN!”

I couldn't help the scream, the pain from my chest and neck was too great, but I didn't dare slow down! On all sides, I heard sounds, something scything along the ground at high speed, faster than us! Snorts, wails, and bellows preceded the greater wash of the nauseating smell that exploded from the tunnels ahead of it! Shrieking, like a child reaching for something they couldn't have, echoed around us.

Five metres!

We were there!

Protégé galloped ahead of me onto the stairs. Something crashed from, down a tunnel behind us. I heard a frantic alarm sounding from the tunnel just to our right, clipped and broken, like some security sensor someone had set up to warn of things coming down it. Protégé struggled with the doors, trying to heave the massive valve lock with his body weight. I joined him, crying and not daring to look behind me. Slowly, it ground around, slipping and opening.

Moving at the same time, we piled through the door together, landing in a heap. His horn flared, pushing the door shut and spinning the lock again on this side. Ten seconds after that, the door was slammed into by something... and then another. A metallic clang and an unnatural roar, like something in terrible pain, cracking its voice.

I scrambled up, getting off Protégé, and pulled him to his hooves, before we both simply galloped away. There were no words, no ‘thank goodnesses,’ no ‘pauses for breath,’ no jokes about never taking the train again.

We simply ran because we were in terror. The haunting moans and metallic scraping fading behind us, as whatever was down here departed to find another way to reach us.

We didn't stop, we just kept running. Up the stairs, into the Station again, through a shop, and down the tunnels that led back to the main area.

Beep!

I didn't cease moving. I could hear it just fine! I dearly hoped Sundial would say something to make this place feel more real! Something to make me less unsure of just how far beyond sanity it went!

Beep!

Click.

I heard a frenzied panting, not unlike our own to get away.

"I... I don't think they saw me. By Celestia, those zebras are cautious. I'm only allowed this PipBuck to do my work. If they saw me using it to say any of this..."

His voice fell away.

"It's been two weeks now. Sky must be terrified. My family must think I've disappeared like all the other ponies going missing! I want to tell them so bad, but I now know how important this is. There... there's something being done down here that is not natural. Something of Aurora's invention that's been corrupted by the zebras and their weird rituals. I hear them sometimes, chanting in small groups. I'm so scared."

It felt strangely unreal to hear him sniff and clearly hold back tears. I wanted to just hug the PipBuck close, as though it would help him somehow. That is, if we weren't sprinting for our lives. I wasn't taking any chances. I'd seen one of them rip down a steel door to get at us!

"That's not all, though. I kept wondering how they got in, that's what Pinkie wanted me to find out more than anything. They have this... this room, across from the main lab. It's closed off to us, and they tell me I'm not allowed. That's their secret way into Filly. But I know it doesn't lead anywhere! I've been in the overhead wiring ducts around it! It's just a room to nowhere, but somehow it lets them in and out. I've got my suspicions, but I dunno..."

"Murk, keep up!"

"I... I'm trying! I'm tired... I can hear ponies nearby."

I could, even over Sundial's terrified message. I heard the stomping of hooves, of many hooves at the same time. Sound was unclear in these tunnels, echoing in ways that noises shouldn't.

Wait... that room he mentioned. That must have been the one Glimmer went into! Just off the main lab?

"That's the least of my worries. Those refugees that came in? Some are put to work. They are interrogated for skills. B-but some, they just never seem to be around at all. I saw some being taken to that weird prison place. They were saying something about "Orb Duty" or something. Aurora's all about memory orbs, but what could they want from refugees' memories? I... I thought it was just to teach them spells from those, uh, spell orb things, but I've seen earth ponies and pegasuses, I... I mean pegasi going in, too. I don't know what's going on, but I'm a part of it now. Two weeks down here, and... and..."

He stammered.

"Aurora Star spoke to me. She told me quietly, away from the zebras, that this is for Equestria's benefit when the time comes. I don't know for sure, but she sounded worried, like she was even more scared than I was. Look, I've got to go, they need me to hook up another of those memory devices for non-unicorns. I have to be close, I feel like I've got all the pieces of the puzzle, but no idea on how to solve it, nor any clues as to what's the end goal of all this. Um, goodbye. I, um, I realised that I haven't ever told you how I got my cutie mark. Hehe... silly right? M-maybe when I get out."

Click.

All the pieces of the puzzle but no solution, didn't I know the feeling. Memory orbs, spell orbs, memory machines, missing refugees, Aurora acting stranger than ever, hidden inventions, and some secret in a mountain. It all had to fit together somehow!

For the betterment of Equestria, yet in the company of zebras that wanted to destroy it. I really wished I knew what Aurora had meant by telling him that.

"This... this way! It has to go right back up to—argh!"

Protégé shouted back to be, having run ahead, clearly following some sort of tracker on his eyepiece to get back to my friends. Only as he galloped past a corner, I saw him collide into somepony coming the other way. Yelping, I fell back and hid behind a polished bin for a few seconds. It wasn't cowardice! I was just aiming to maybe ambush them, if they weren't nice!

Unfortunately, it wasn't somepony nice.

Protégé fell off to the side as half a dozen ponies crashed down around him, their chains pulling one another off their hooves from the impact. Within it, I saw a huge blue shape rear up.

"What in the fakka!?" The slaver mare we'd seen earlier spun her head furiously, spotting Protégé instantly. "Come 'ere and see!"

She stormed forward, throwing slaves to either side. They shrunk back, cowering. They clearly hadn't fallen yet to whatever happened here. I saw her pull a length of chain from her back and start dangling it in her mouth. Protégé reached for his revolver, but I saw the chain flash forward, and heard him cry out in pain when it scythed over the hooves protecting his face.

"A fuckin' gun! I oughta... I oughta... wait, wait..."

She threw him out of the crowd, sending Protégé slamming into a shelving unit piled among these old passenger lines.

"Fuckin' you!? Spah! You spahin'!"

Oh flustering heck, she'd recognised him!

Protégé rolled away, trying to come to his hooves, looking for his dropped revolver. The chain flew down to one side of him, then the other. The mare swung her head, holding it in her mouth and arced it right around, catching his legs in it. Too injured and slow to dodge, he was pulled from his hooves and dumped down.

I couldn't stand by and watch this!

Steeling myself (by which I mean, repeating 'Oh my goodness' multiple times with every breath) I galloped forward, flicking out my saddle's mouthpiece, and fired the hook into the ceiling. Hopping off my hooves, biting down until it pulled me off the ground, it whisked me up to land on her back. I felt muscles coil as she flailed, screaming blue murder loud enough that my eyes watered at the stinging pain in my ears, and sending echos down every route of the station tunnels. I held onto her mane, being thrown back and forth. If only I had my old metal ruler, I could have done some damage! What could I do?

What I always did. Fight dirty. So, I grabbed her neck and bit down on her ear hard.

"Aaaargh!" Her voice roared as she reared up and dropped the chain from her screaming mouth. "Lil' bitin' midge! Fuck ya!"

We had to end this quickly! I hoped Protégé would do something, her screaming would alert the others!

She spun, hurling me so hard that I came flying off her and smacked into the wall. My chest heaved with pain, making me choke as the iron-tinged fluid burst into my throat. Sliding down, I coughed and held my bandages, feeling the swollen wound below pulsate around where Wildcard had... yeah.

Through blurry eyes, I saw Protégé launch back on her.

He ducked one hoof, stamping on the side of one knee before diving away again. I could see him looking for his revolver, using his magic to keep that chain away from her! I saw him charge up to her again, trying to spin and buck for her neck, but the mare twisted away, launching onto him with both front hooves! In a grapple, her huge size was always going to win, and even while I tried to pull my sore body up, I saw her grab him bodily, and throw him to the ground before her.

Her hoof slapped him right across the face, before a second impact tossed him right into me. I howled out, falling to the side, blacking out for a few seconds in pain.

The world swam back into view. Protégé was stunned, holding his head as he lay atop me. I could hear the huge blue mare advancing on us and the sound of a chain being picked up.

“Little spahs in mah place!” Her rasping mouth spat to the side. “Gonna take ya to Master and he’ll deal, y’right!”

Her slaves cowered back behind her, their chains rustling as she advanced on us. I could see Protégé’s revolver lying nearby, but the pain was so great. I couldn’t push that far! Not with his weight on me.

“Protégé!”

“H-huh?”

I worried if she had concussed him. He just stared with empty eyes.

“Your gun! It’s right there!” I hissed, trying not to let her hear.

“I... not mine... Master owns all... I...”

I gasped at the words, seeing that faraway look in his eyes from the dazing blow. This place was—no! No, not now! I shook him, trying to get him off me.

“Protégé, fight it back! You’re confused! Please! Your gun’s right there! Argh!”

I’d tried to force myself toward it, but my chest was in dire pain. I hoped it hadn’t reopened the wound. There was nopony to help me down here!

“Right, c’mere!” The mare stomped over, that chain swinging up and around, making a lethal hum in the air!

I could only look up, seeing those glinting eyes awaiting her revenge and adding a couple more to her roster. I could do nothing but just watch. Every second lasted a minute as the chain slowly descended.

Slowly, in just as excruciating slow motion, I saw the form of another rise up behind her. That fiery mane over an earthy yellow coat. I saw her bared teeth and sheer determination burning in her eyes. Sunny Days rose up from behind the slaver, launching onto her back with her own chained hooves twisting around the slaver’s neck.

The moment Sunny had a grip, she pulled hard and crossed her hooves, wrapping her hind legs around the massive slaver’s thick neck. I lay open-mouthed in wonder.

I began to hear properly again as Sunny’s dire cry of rage struck past the slaver’s roar of anger. The blue mare fell back, staggering as her windpipe was crushed, throwing herself against walls to try and loosen the mare upon her back! Yet Sunny held on tight, grimly locking on a death grip, her eyes mad with fury. Weeks of rage and pent-up frustration exploded forth on the slaver that had held her, as she saw, finally, a chance to unleash all of it on her!

“Remember when you choked me, bitch? How d’you like it!?”

The slaver gurgled, eyes turning from rage to panic as she found herself suffocating.

“Going to watch you black out just like that slaver who tried to have his way with me! You ever wonder where your little crony went, eh? You’re getting the same!”

She tumbled to the side, trying to slam Sunny off the floor, but even under the crushing impact, she held firm, digging in her rear hooves and pulling so hard that the chains actually began to break the slaver's skin! They writhed together on the floor, screaming and gasping. Even below the injuries that covered her body, I saw that Sunny was not weak. Those muscles were still strong as ever!

The slaver's hooves began to twitch and waggle more than kick, her movements slowing. After a long and slowing battle, she slowly died before my eyes in a horrible and panicked fashion, twitching and choking even after her eyes had rolled back into her head.

Then there was silence.

The slaves didn't seem to know what to do. Most of them cowered from us and stayed safe near the wall, awaiting another master to come fetch them. A few came up behind Sunny, asking if she was okay, no doubt companions she had survived with. They all looked stronger than the others, more alive in their eyes.

But my eyes weren't for them. I could only look at my saviour. Sunny Days stood shakily, exhausted and still venting some anger with little bucks to ensure the slaver was dead.

"Been waiting a long time to do that. Always told myself I was saving it for when I knew I was going to die anyway."

She spat on the corpse, before finally turning back to me. I managed to get myself up, pained and limping, to move over to stand before her.

"S-Sunny, I... I'm so glad I... I mean I'm sorry and... or I came to, you can..."

I didn't even know where to start. There were too many things. I held myself against the wall, taking deep breaths just as she was, and instead settled on something simpler.

"Thank you."

"Yer welcome, Murky." She managed a grin through her dry, split lips. "Just surprised to see you here in our deep little corner of hell. Didn't figure you'd got away after the psycho-raider jumped us. I mean, I'd have stolen something to drink if I knew you were coming."

That little grin. Oh, that grin. Such a relief! I'd witnessed her hurt, afraid, and dragged into the worst of Fillydelphia, but here she was still managing to smile. Very quickly, I realised what the bright sunny face on her flanks really meant. No doubt that attitude had kept her alive.

There were so many questions I had for her, so many things to tell her.

Yet with the groan behind us, I knew they would have to wait. We both turned, finding Protégé sitting up, his back against the cold tiled walls and looking around as though absolutely unsure of where he was. Slowly, I advanced and held out a hoof.

"P-Protégé?"

His eyes snapped around to me, breathing hard and looking almost afraid of me.

"Where is he?" His voice was weak, higher-pitched than normal, like it was about to break with emotion.

I bit my lip, hearing Sunny and a couple of her friends trot up behind. I waved them back, he needed room.

"Protégé it's..." I couldn't believe I had to say this. "It's okay. It's just me! Um, Murky!"

"My... my Master, he's... he's down here, he'll be looking I... I should get back to work and..."

I shifted forward again, placing a hoof on each shoulder.

"C-calm down!"

There was advice I never thought I'd be the one giving.

"Look at us. You were just hit on the head, b-breathe or, um..."

Sunny knelt beside me. "Listen to me," She began, "Just hear our voices, it's all right. This place does that. Concentrate. You're fine. Breathe slowly and calmly. In..."

I saw him follow her instructions, breathing in deeply. Clearly, this wasn't her first time reciting them.

"...and out."

A slow exhale.

She repeated it a few times. I saw the colour returning to his face, his eyes becoming sharper, looking around. He made a sharp twitch, his hoof almost pushing us away.

"Space! Please! I just need a little..."

I gave him it, the unicorn trotting off to get his revolver and reasserting his eyepiece upon his head. The moment it was back on, I heard him sigh almost in relief.

"Protégé, you were saying—"

"I wasn't saying anything. A-a concussion." He snapped back over his shoulder at me, not even looking fully round. "I just hit my head."

"We can't ignore this, Protégé, you're—"

"Fine!" He made to stomp a hoof, before seemingly thinking better. "I'm... fine. Nothing's wrong. Just-just hit my head and... l-let's go."

He began trotting ahead, leaving me with Sunny and the rest of the slaves. I looked to her.

"We have friends. We're getting them out of their cells. We may have a way out!"

Sunny nodded, not taking her eyes off Protégé. "All right, I'll help you. Come on, I'll explain on the way. I'm sure you have questions."

She turned to her friends, explaining for them to stick with the group, to hide the body and get back to their cells before it was found. The cover story was that Protégé and I had killed her, given we weren't meant to be here anyway. I hoped it'd hold.

Then we took off, just Sunny and I to follow Protégé as he waited up ahead. Watching him trot I saw him constantly looking around, often stopping to hold a hoof to his face. He would seem to breath deeply before trotting on, his pace slower than his usual confident stride.

Instead it looked, if anything, like how I'd used to trot.

Meekly.

"This place, it does things to ponies."

Sunny moved beside me as we made our way through the lower tunnels of the metro. We were going up stairs, moving out of what looked like engineer's routes back to the pedestrian levels. Most corners bore some slaves in hypnotic-like motions, working away at their tasks.

The tunnel itself was held up by recurring archways, each bearing carved stone of the Ministry symbols, gleaming with gemlights. Aside from our whispering and the background hush of slaves, everything was silent. I half expected Shackles to appear. This is when he would. He usually did.

"I've seen them, my friend Glimmer, she's..."

"Fallen?" Sunny's face sunk a little. "I'm sorry, Murky."

"Wh-what does it?"

She took a long breath, holding her head up. "We don't know. But there's something deep in here, we never get to see it. It's all behind this big security door, somewhere a few corridors along from the main lab. I've been near that door before, Murk. Huge, engraved with some sort of symbol. There's... there's something pulsing in there. Something that does all this, I just know it."

"My friends told me that it makes ponies like this."

Sunny looked grim for a second.

"It does. I've been down here for some time now. I've seen the patterns. The symptoms, the dreams, and all the strange things. The ambience in here is like it's out of the past, Murky. I sometimes hear ponies talking around the corner who aren't there. They talk about the war. You'll see somepony in the corner of your eye at the end of the corridor, but when you turn they're gone."

She shivered.

"It goes for those who are vulnerable, plays on their mind and hurts them, making them into automatons. My friends and I, we stuck together. Kept ourselves going, stole things from the slavers to survive and shared between us all. They never caught us, no matter how much Shackles wants his 'little thief.' He probably thinks I stole those keys you have. We've lost some along the way. There's maybe only half of us left now."

With a glance up, she looked across those working at a table. The ponies were making an eerie similar laugh, one that stopped at the same time, as though coordinated.

"It goes for slaves because we're hurt, Murky. We're suffering and being told to only listen and never speak. To do this and follow orders. We hear things, things to make you want to do jobs. Eventually you just... fall. Broken slaves are the worst, the ones who see nothing other than master and slave."

I felt my lip quiver, my eyes turning to Protégé striding ahead of it now, determined as though driving himself forward by anger.

Glimmer though... it must have been her memory orb addiction that did it. Made her vulnerable, open to its indoctrination!

"Sunny... I'm hurt. Protégé's falling to it, a-and my friends are locked up. I need your help."

"I already said I would, Murky."

She smiled down to me. I couldn't help but say it again.

"Before, I'm sorry I brought you here and... what you went through. I heard you were sent to the Stable. I saw you in the Ministry! I'm sorry I got you sent here."

I felt her hoof pat my shoulders.

"It's all right. You didn't mean for this. I'm still here." She took a deep breath. "They wanted me broken, so I gave them what they wanted. Oh, they heard me beg, plead, and say 'Yes, Master' so many times; but every time I let it build inside, telling myself, 'this is just for now.' When the time came, I knew I wanted to snap out of it. If I'd rebelled all day, they'd have killed me by now."

Simple, practical survival. I guess a hardened wastelander like herself really knew how to do it.

"We are here." Protégé announced ahead of us, speaking bluntly. Ahead of him, I could hear the main lab still, Shackles' voice rising above the rest and making me falter back.

"The portal room will be stripped by the end of the month, Run About! Your excuses are false!"

I heard the slaver squeak his affirmation back, before running off. Poking my head out, I could see him still standing there, watching them all. Seeing him suddenly turn, I pulled back drastically.

That had been too fast. Did he know? What if he knew? What if he was just waiting!?

Thankfully, Sunny had no such requirement. She trotted out as though simply going to the cells. With a brief glance, I heard her whisper.

“Go!”

We moved out, and I felt that one heartstopping moment of fear, as we ran into the lab, over to the portal room corridor, and into the cells. I could see Shackles moving away on the opposite side. I didn’t stop, almost tripping over the oblivious slaves around us, as the pain beneath my bandages flared up and drove me to hustled limping. I pulled the keys out as we arrived. Protégé hung back near the door, keeping a wary eye out on the way we’d came with his E.F.S.

“Murk!” Coral galloped across, seeing me struggling with the keys in my shaking hooves. “Good job, my dear. Well done.”

It took a minute of hunting, but I finally found the right one and threw the door open, falling into her waiting hooves. Brimstone surged to his hooves, bending the cage door further open on its rusting hinges, and cracked his neck out, making the scar tissue up one side of his neck warp in horrid ways.

“Glimmer.” He spoke simply, as though there was no other possible course of action.

I couldn’t disagree. Helping Coral to her weakened hooves, she limped out of the cell where Sunny quickly took over in aiding her along.

“She-she went into that big door, Brim!” I moved across to him, the big pony’s eyes focused on the exit back to the portal room corridor behind us. “Sunny, i-is there any way to turn people back from it?”

Sunny cast a little glance to Protégé, before shaking her head. “I’m sorry, Murky. We’ve never seen—”

“There has to be!”

I’d forgotten the hollow feeling in my rush to stay alive and the hunt for the keys, I didn’t need reminding now that she was nothing but a shell! I refused to believe it!

“Maybe... maybe if she saw me and—”

“Murky!” Sunny cut me off. “I’m so sorry, but I’ve had friends who have died for one another in here, just like you I’d imagine. We could never get through to them. There was no way to make them see! They just... keep working.”

“Lost or not, she isn’t staying here.” Brimstone began moving toward the door, leaving me standing between them all.

“She isn’t lost!”

I was whining, I knew, but I didn’t want to believe it! Glimmerlight couldn’t be just gone like that! She was... she was her. Always the one to make a joke... to... to...

No, I’d have to try! I had to! She was in there, I knew it!

Sunny helped Coral toward the door where Brimstone was peeking out.

“The slaving fuck’s gone. We can get in.”

Protégé glanced behind us, seeing the other slaves still in their cages. They lay on their sides or padded uselessly at the walls. None of them seemed sane. None of them even noticed us.

“Should we not help them?”

“They are lost, slaver.” Brimstone didn’t even look back. “They wouldn’t follow us and even if we wanted to take them, we can't carry them all."

That was that, it seemed. Nopony dared to suggest that we take time away from getting Glimmer in front of him right now. I could hear the intensity beneath his words, just waiting for a chance to explode after being locked up and no doubt worried for her. Protégé bowed his head, still looking breathless and weak, and dropped the subject immediately.

Then we moved.

We didn't go like a swift group of experts. Most of us were limping, and all of us exhausted. The voices in the background of this place were beginning to filter in, unintelligible and distant. This wouldn't help us at all here. We had to get out soon.

The huge door lay before us, and I held the elaborate key in my hoof.

A door to nothing, yet a way out.

Were it not for Unity and the foals still being out there, I might have been excited, but this was not the time for contemplating escape. This was the time for saving my sister!

Hoofing the card forward, I shoved it into the slot and heard a series of clicking sounds. They gave way to a hiss of gas and clanking metal struts inside the thick metal. Gradually, slowly, shaking the material as it went, the door began to slide apart. Intricate metal plates swept away from one another and the emblems rolled to the side, revealing the inner room's contents.

I had been used to my expectations being let down. Not so this time.

It opened to a room lit by humming lights attached to a generator in the corner. Three banks of terminals lined each side of the large chamber, and I could already sense the hum of power within.

Yet at the back, as the doors parted, there lay the way the zebras had entered and exited Fillydelphia so easily. Their pathway in.

Beneath a huge shard of a purple gemstone, surrounded by a cage of shining metal and flickering with bands of light that sparkled and gleamed, there lay a platform. Even I, in all my illiterate lack of education, could tell what this was.

A portal. They'd used a portal to get into Fillydelphia!

Suddenly, the scale of what the zebras had been capable of was far beyond what I had ever thought. My companions clearly thought the same thing I did. Who wouldn't think it?

That being, 'did it still work?'

Ahead of us, I saw a pink mane bob upwards, and Glimmer's face look up from working below the gantry of the portal's platform. It slowly turned to show a rictus grin below lifeless eyes.

"Oh, hello! Do you have the parts I need? I could use them very soon. This machine won't work like it used to anymore, but we could still use it to power some other rooms. Wouldn't that be nice? It would be bright."

"Yes!" Another slave chimed in. "It would. So much easier to see!"

"Oh yes." Glimmer replied to her. "Then it would be comfortable to stay here."

"I'd like that."

"Me too."

"Haha."

I was standing in front of our group, the first into the room. I knew how many things should have been racing through my mind. All the theories and possibilities we'd just unearthed in this room! Wishes and dreams should have sparked me to think about what it could do for us.

Yet, confronted by what this place had done to my sister, I couldn't bring myself to think of anything but her. Even when we had argued, I had never felt like this. So helpless, so at a loss to comprehend my own love of a friendship that was now at threat, if not already gone.

Those behind me said nothing. They simply watched me trot forward.

"Glimmer..."

"Can you pass me that spanner? Thank you."

She didn't even look up, simply ducking her head back in to tighten something.

"Glimmerlight! Sis!" I felt my words go into a higher pitch, fears of being caught fell away. I just needed time. Time to get through to her. Please...

I cantered up to her, shaking her shoulder. Those eyes looked up at me. No, they looked past me, barely even recognising my presence.

"Oh, hello there. How are you?"

"Glimmer, it's me! It's-it's Murky! Y-your lil'bro!"

She simply sat and stared, wordless, then she laughed. A dry and humourless expression.

"It's nice here, isn't it? Do you like it? I've got a lot of work to do, but maybe I can see you —"

"Glimmer, it's me!" I grabbed her shoulders, leaning closer. I could feel my eyes becoming damp, my body shaking as the fear grew. I shook her, I actually shook her as I tried to get her to just focus on me!

"R-remember? We were going to escape together! How we've fought and-and saved each other? You taught me so much!"

The thing that I was shaking merely looked confused, even a little scared. It didn't know what was going on. It tried to smile.

"Do you need a drink? You seem rather tired, perhaps—"

"IT'S ME! PLEASE!" I screamed into her face, feeling my eyes well up and tears stream down my cheeks. "We've done so many things! Why don't you recognise me!? Glimmer, you're in there! I... I know it! Wake up, h-hear me! Please, Glimmer, please! I need you!"

I had to wipe my face with a hoof, and my words got caught up in a massive, quaking sob.

"I don't want to lose you, Glimmer. So... so if you can even hear a bit of me, fight it! Fight it and come back! I know you can! I KNOW YOU CAN!"

Her eyes just stared. Her mouth formed a sudden 'oh' look.

"Y-yes! That's it! See me! Remember how you made me all embarrassed? How you'd joke about s-stallions or something? O-or how you'd try and make me giggle, even when I was sad, because you wanted so bad to see me smile?"

She just blinked, seemingly focused on me, confused and looking more than a little 'off.' The world was just me and her! I could do this! I had to!

"Every time I was at my lowest, you came back to me, Glimmer! I... I want to help you! We'll get by this, we always get by things! You and me, sis! You and me! R-remember how you told me that when we got out you'd show me places and we'd travel? How we dreamed together? H-how you'd laugh with my drawings? So..."

I spluttered, tears dripped to the grind, my hooves rested on her chest.

"SO COME BACK TO ME! I KNOW YOU CAN!"

I didn't dare look up.

I didn't once dare even consider any other possibility.

Then finally, I heard her speak.

"You..."

She took a breath.

"You want to help? That would be nice if you could."

'Glimmer' smiled wider. Her eyes weren't even looking directly at me any more. Crushed, I fell back.

"I just... no... G-Glimmer... if only I'd been here I... I could have stopped you using those orbs and..."

I fell to my haunches, hanging my head, my hooves dropping off her. Behind me, I heard the others shifting uncomfortably. Brimstone's heavy tread approached from behind me.

"We don't have time. We have to go now. Sunny, was that your name? Is there any other way out of here?"

Protégé's voice kicked up, quiet and thin. "We came in through the asylum, but I doubt the main doors are accessible anymore."

"There's a way out through the asylum? You came in through its reception, right?" Sunny responded to him. Protégé must have nodded. I didn't hear him respond. "There's one other way. Brings you onto the upper levels. I can take you to it."

"Fine. Sunny, get Murky and take him ahead to wherever this is. We'll follow behind, and I'll carry Glim out. We have to leave now. We have no time for this."

I was just sitting in a little heap. My mane hung over my eyes, hiding the lost face before me. She simply returned to work, talking idly about the temperature with the other workers who had never even ceased their tasks. She ignored me.

I felt Sunny's hooves around me. "Come on, Murky. We have to go, you have to—"

"NO!" I screamed, throwing my hooves around. I didn't care about the pain as I struggled to throw her off me.

"Murky, I'm sorry! She's—"

"No she isn't!" I fought her, struggling like some desperate foal. "She's my friend! I can... I can!"

Slowly, I felt myself being pulled farther from her. Like I was being dragged away. Too many times, had I been torn away from ponies that I loved! Thrashing, squealing, and kicking Sunny off me, I galloped back and threw myself onto Glimmerlight. My hooves crushed around her, and I buried my face to her chest.

"She can come back! She can! They might have something down here! I can fix this! I... I can... I..."

It all came out, even as I heard her aloof voice ask if I needed somepony to help me find something, it all just came out in one line, screamed through all the tears and pain.

"I just want my sister back!"

None of them dared even touch me in that moment, as I did nothing but wail into her chest, not even letting her move away to work despite all of her dead words. They hurt more than any wound, harsher even than her telling me not to call her 'sister' long ago. That was still her.

Now I'd lost her...

It felt impossible to accept. Impossible to let go. I realised what I'd lost, and what I'd never have any more. All I had now were memories.

Just... memories...

My eyes sprung open, and I felt myself gasp, nearly hyperventilating. I let go of her, and began digging through my saddlebag. She couldn't hear me telling her who she was. But there was one last chance, one last hope!

This place had come after her when she had been vulnerable, afraid of bad memories. But I could fight fire with fire! I could fight memories of a cruel past with memories of a glorious present!

My friends behind were getting anxious, but I ignored them. Protégé even pulled at my foreleg, but I swept him away, and pulled out the bright, glowing, light-green orb that Glimmerlight had given to me! A present of my very first birthday.

Tentatively, afraid for if I was even right, I turned back to her.

“H-here! Glimmer, can you hold this for me please?”

“Oh, of course! I do like to be of help to other ponies. Don’t you?”

Her magic caught the orb, and I immediately pushed it through the air to her horn, wishing and praying for anything to help her.

I heard her gasp, and then the world fell away.

I didn’t know why it was different. I knew memory orbs were supposed to take as long as their original length, and this was a very long one. Hours long, a whole evening. It was a stupid idea. It would trap me and Glimmer within it until we were caught. But I wasn’t thinking. Nothing mattered to me except finding some way to help her.

Maybe it was something she did, I never asked her. Maybe something deep down, but the orb passed so much faster. Whirling into my own memories and showing her, from my tiny perspective, what it was like to have a big sister look down at you and smile like there was nothing wrong in the world.

It all flickered past, like I was blinking again and again and seeing something different every time. From trotting out across Fillydelphia toward the Roamer’s inner-wall extension and seeing her bouncing before me, to seeing them all sat around that table with a ridiculous set up of balloons and little hats. From us laughing at Brim sitting with that silly get up, looking like he wanted to be somewhere else, all the way to her cuddling me and setting a mug of alcohol before me. She laughed, I laughed back. Whizzing shots of faces and jokes kept flying past. I floated between them, a limbo of my own life.

I saw her getting very quickly drunk! How she grinned and hugged a lot, how she teased and flirted shamelessly with those around her. I saw my gifts from her, she must have seen the little engraving she had done on my PipBuck! We shared stories, I laughed because of how she gave me confidence. Please, Glimmer, see how you changed me. How you made me better.

That iconic image to me... of me and my sister dancing upon a table, like there wasn’t a care in the world, and we were free. Ponies cheering and stamping around us as music blared and gave life to a place that so often took it. The sights of us stumbling and singing at the top of our lungs even while griffons and slavers wandered past with their weapons and whips.

No, you didn’t make me better. You made me the pony I am. You saw it the moment you met me. You saw what so few other ponies had. You didn’t see a slave, you saw a little pony who wanted to be cheeky and funny! You saw one who wanted to enjoy life with friends, not one who ran away and cried.

You saw me for who I was, and you did everything in your power to make me realise it.

Please, Glimmer, see. See and remember what you did for me! Who you are! This is you, my big sister best friend forever!

Forever doesn't end now! We're going to get out! We've found something that could help. The door to the outside! We're going to escape and travel the wastes! You're going to show me Tenpony Tower, and we'll go hunt my mother to free her! We can even stay together, stay safe, and have fun for the rest of our lives, the siblings who chose each other as brother and sister!

Remember me, Glimmer! Remember that little buck who cuddled up to you after you gave him the best birthday ever and let that show you who you are...

...because he's never going to forget you. Not ever...

Please...

I was lying down when I awoke. Cold tile below my body cast a cutting chill through me and reminded me all too harshly of where I still was. To go from being in a warm memory of happier times to being stuck in the outer metro, within a labyrinth of nightmares and unseen threats, was not easy. I simply curled up tight to the pony across from me and longed to go back there again.

"Easy, Murky. Don't worry..."

My ears perked up as I heard that form speak and feel it wrap thin hooves around me. With a gasp, I opened my eyes and hoped beyond measure.

There was that smile, gently looking back to me. Please... was it truly her?

"S-sis?" The words felt so quiet, so hard to say. "Please... tell me it's you..."

There was nothing but her and I. No sound, nothing but this close little moment. Gradually, to the joy of my heart, I saw her smile grow far past what it had been. I saw eyes gleam and spring to life, and her face lit up like the sunrise did in my dreams.

"You'd better believe it! You always did wake up after me from orbs."

She grabbed me, holding me tight to her chest with my head over her shoulder.

"I knew my lil'bro wouldn't give up on me, Murky. I could see you the whole time. It's like being trapped in a body you can't control. I was screaming, crying that I couldn't just reach out and grab you! To be trapped in the cage of my own flesh for the rest of my life, it scared me so much! Thank you, Murky. Thank you."

She was shivering, so much so I worried that she might be in some way hurt and not herself. What if she wasn't quite the Glimmer I knew once the adrenaline wore down?

She got up, pulling me to my hooves.

"Now come on, let's get to the others and get out of this place. I've been two days working beside the second best mare flank you've ever seen and not even able to have a little date with rosie hooves to let it out! By all the mad gods of the wasteland, I am in dire need of a drink! All they had was lukewarm water!"

Scratch that. She was fine.

We'd need to have a talk later, work it all out. Yet for now, this was all I needed to hear. I laughed. I actually laughed and dared to let my heart rise again.

"So who's first? Leafshine?"

"Pfft, who do you think?"

I wanted to think of all the other mares I could name or mention. I wanted to spend time joking, but this wasn't the place.

"Really... thank you."

Glimmer shifted closer to ruffle my mane again, before almost falling against me. A hazy look came over her eyes, a dizziness as I sensed another wave of unsettling ambience pass through the area.

"My head's aching worse than after my eighteenth birthday. Feeling weak."

"We need to get you out of here."

We both turned to wherever we were. It wasn't the portal chamber. Brimstone and the others had carried us elsewhere and now clustered near the door. Only Brimstone remained by us, standing watchful during our recovery. He hadn't said anything, but I saw his nod to Glimmer. I knew the big guy enough by now to tell when he was genuinely relieved.

Coral lay against a barrel in the corner of the dark room, getting her breath back. Sunny and Protégé were keeping watch outside. I saw Sunny looking over almost in disbelief.

"You actually did it, Murky. I... I didn't even know—"

"Memory magic did this." Glimmerlight cut in, trotting forward a little unsteadily. "I can feel it in the air. I know memory magic well enough to recognise this is the work of a master. Whatever happened to cause this... this effect in the area, it had its origins in memory magic. It attacks the subconscious, I think. It's the same thing as a memory orb, just less directed and more widespread."

That sure made sense. Even waking now, I could still sense that great well of power surging through the facility every few seconds.

All the same, I could hear its whispers and flowing air going through my mind, like I could always remember it before it even said anything.

At the door, I saw Protégé groan, looking behind him sharply. Most of the others shook their heads harshly to clear it.

"I don't know what caused it," Glimmerlight continued, "but the things they're doing here, I got a good look at them while they had me working. Even if I couldn't control my own willpower, I still learned. That portal, it's inactive. It'll never work the way it did ever again. There was a schematic or something I must have skimmed. It was all a blur."

Brimstone lay a hoof carefully on her shoulder.

"Think, Glim. That room could be our way out of Fillydelphia."

"I know! It's broken for sure. Used to be able to take ponies and whoever else in and out every few minutes! But..."

Everyone looked up, that one word standing out.

"But maybe it could do one more, if this place were fully running again and if somepony did a little jury rigging and if you had a good half an hour to work on it! That's without even considering that you have to know the coordinates of where to go to and none were ever left behind, let alone what kind of input it requires. Presumably they did it all from... heh... memory. Appropriate, I know."

She shook her head slowly.

"Look, even if we ever got a chance like that, it's unpowered. Not been active in centuries. Since the zebras, probably. It isn't our way out, but this place has other routes to the outer metro we could use to get outside the walls and—"

"As much as I am willing to listen to you all talk of escape from my Master while in the very same room as me, I cannot help but feel you would be better served talking of all this outside Ministry Station and the outer metro line?"

Protégé moved back into the room. I couldn't help but agree. I had questions and all sorts of things to say to Glimmer and the others, but we had to go. We wouldn't stay undiscovered for—

"It must have been that big bloody raider! Choked her right out and then he disappears with his own cell mates?"

I almost yelled, quickly shouting to the others for silence and pulling the door to this dark store room closed. Multiple ponies went running by us, the sound of slides being pulled and magazines being loaded all too clear to me.

"Where are we?"

Sunny slid up beside me, poking out after them. "Not far from the portal room, about two hundred metres from the nearest way to the asylum. I can lead you all there, if you're that damned insane as to go out there again!"

"We have no real choice." Coral Eve finally stood up and limped over. "Shackles' den is impassable, and there is no other way out of Ministry Station."

"Very well..."

I gulped hard, sharing a look at Protégé. I could see the same shiver in his body as I felt in mine. The others hadn't been out there. They didn't know...

We waited another minute, with me in front beside Sunny to listen for anypony coming, then we made a break for it. Our store room emerged into the same primary chamber of the Station, those immense pillars and arches above us with dozens of other slaves moving around. Sticking to the sides, we moved only when most of the slavers seemed distracted, using the massive columns for cover, them being so big even Brimstone could take a few seconds behind one before moving.

Sunny was amazing. A born survivor, she took to sneaking alongside me like a radroach to a sewer and helped guide the others up by using my observations as her decision maker. We made a good team, really. Before long, we got to the same raised staircase Protégé and I had emerged from originally.

"There's a good chance they'll see us going in, Murky. They've got guards above and likely down there too. Your big friend could take them, but the word will go out."

"Oh... oh dear."

I peeked out and saw the rifles swinging from above. They were watching the main concourse for anything untoward.

"That Warlord cannot hide his bulk so easily! Find him!"

Falling against Sunny when that booming voice echoed out into the archway hall, I felt my body turn rigid. Chainlink Shackles surged forth from the opposite door.

"Search the platforms! Get those slaves for the mountain expedition out of here!"

Behind me, I saw every pony with us have the same thought, that they were going to block us. We had to go, and it had to be fast and hard. No sneaking if we wanted to get there before them now.

They wouldn't follow us into the Asylum, would they?

Curiously, out of the corner of my eye, I saw Sunny slipping a hood from her rags up over her face. I didn't have time to ask though.

"We need to go, now. Brimstone Blitz?" Sunny looked to him. "Can you lead the way? Down the stairs to the left then on the far end of the platform. Door's locked down there."

"Not for long." Brimstone snarled and rose fully to his hooves. "Just keep up. Don't stop moving!"

Glimmer nodded. So did Coral. The pair of them were supporting one another as we went, one weak physically and the other still suffering from the ambience in here. I kept seeing her make the same twitches as Protégé.

“GO!”

Brimstone surged forth from the pillars, charging directly for the three slavers blocking the way down! We galloped out after him even as Shackles’ voice roared for the slavers and any slaves to stop us!

I saw Brim go past a ticket machine, pause for only a second, and rip it from its mountings on the tiled floor. With a great heave, the machine flew fifteen feet and crushed the slavers guarding the way. The enormous projectile bounced off the floor, rolling end over end down the stairwell to the platform tunnels. He didn’t hesitate, rushing right after it, and sending one guard flying a full ten feet. The slaver’s high-pitched scream echoed off the walls as he followed where the machine had gone.

Two of them ran up on our left. I heard Coral cry out, before a thick snap of pressure that sent my mane flying into my eyes exploded in the air around us, and knocked them into one of the huge pillars with a sickening crunch. Whipping her head to the other side, her horn flared and sparked. I felt the backlash of telekinetic power fly sharply over me, as the receptionist’s desk spun off the ground as though kicked by a dragon. Its heavy weight slammed down atop group of guards getting to their hooves in shock. One managed to dodged to the side. and Sunny tackled him quickly, stamping a hoof into his groin hard. I heard others run from our path, fleeing from Brimstone!

We were clear!

“Down! Down! To the left!”

We hit the stairs. I looked behind us and saw two dozen slavers gunning for us.

Then I saw something else.

Somepony else.

There was a large group of them, chained and waiting for the ‘mountain expedition’ at Shackles’ order. They were being marched out. But who I saw made me want to believe my eyes were tricking me in this strange place. Somepony amongst them being led right at the front. I saw her cream body, and orange mane streaked in red.

Unity.

It made me hesitate. Lost in seeing her golden-hazel eyes looking this was, I didn’t even give the bullets smashing the enamel tiles on the floor around me a second thought. There she was, staring at the chase and witnessing a little dirty green pony looking right back to her. I could have sworn I saw her mouth move, saying my name. They had her chained and kept apart from all the other slaves. Why? Why her more than the others?

“Murky! Come on!”

I didn’t even know who it was that grabbed me, but gunfire whizzed above my head as I was pulled away.

Ahead of us, I saw some poor guard come to see what the commotion was, and rather unfortunately discover that the common was called Brimstone Blitz. His soon flattened body lay groaning when I passed him.

Unity! Unity was up there! She was still in Fillydelphia!

We ran left, making our way through the low curved tunnels to the opposite platform from the one we had come in from. I simply kept thinking of what I’d seen! Of her! She had been unmistakeable! It was my very first friend in Fillydelphia.

She would be on that mountain. We were going there.

I had a chance to get her!

My mind was snapped back to the present, being huddled ahead of my friends and helped along forced me to put that away for now. If we wanted to save her, then we had to get out alive first!

“That door, there! There!” Sunny pointed hurriedly.

A huge steel door sat partially ajar before us, slaves working around it not even noticing us as we ran inside and into the dank service corridor. Coral yanked it shut behind us. Stepping back, her horn flaring dangerously, she stumbled and was caught by Glimmerlight. Sunny threw a mop through the handles of the door, and we kept going, with Glimmer supporting her old, bitter friend.

There were huddles of slaves in here, mostly all working on the ground in their blank ways, trying to vain to clean a floor that never really could be. They weren’t even paying attention to us.

I dared to feel a sense of success. The slavers wouldn’t catch us now before we found the way out, not with a barred door behind us.

Before us, a massive boarded-up door had been placed into the wall, bearing the same design as the one from the asylum’s reception. Just how intermingled were these two places?

Brimstone began to smash the boards, not even giving thought to what lay beyond.

“Murk!” Protégé shouted to me, “Give me your PipBuck!”

I didn’t even hesitate, tossing it to him while he played with his eyepiece.

“You went through here once. Your PipBuck will have mapped it out. I can lead us with my eyepiece. Listen, all of you!”

They turned to him, and I saw the slaver genuinely look taken aback. Almost scared that their attention was on him alone. Only Brim kept up work on the door.

“Mu-Murk and I came through here. There is something in this place. Something that we do not know and which I’m sure you have all heard at least once in that Station. We must move quickly, but cautiously. If you smell mint...”

“...run.” Sunny finished for him.

“Yes. Do not stop. We have a tram on the bottom floor through a hole that can, I hope, outrun them.”

“You hope?” Glimmer almost choked.

Protégé didn’t even respond to her, connecting a wire to his eyepiece from my PipBuck and hooking it to his clothing.

“Just... keep moving. Don’t look back. These things are not natural. They hide from E.F.S.”

The last board fell from the door with an almighty crash. Then another smash made us aware of slavers outside the door behind us. It buckled in, the mop beginning to splinter.

“Let’s go!” Brimstone shouted loudly, pulling the rusted door open. “And close it behind us, lest every slave in here die from a breach. Those things want this place.”

We were a group of ponies fighting for good. We were rescuers. Heroes, even, if somepony wanted to be dramatic. But that didn’t mean that we went without hesitation. The musty smell erupted from the darkness ahead. Even Brimstone himself took a second to consider before leading the way in. Then Coral, then Protégé, and lastly Glimmerlight with a glance to me. I motioned for Sunny to go first.

Then she held up her hoof.

"I'm staying."

"Wh-what!?" I stood up straighter, ignoring the crack from the mop in the door behind us. Ignoring even Shackles. "But you can't!"
